The enemie being not farre off, lay ſtill and would not remoue, ſo as all that harueſt there was no other memorable exploit done. In the end, after that Alphonſo had aſſembled all the confederate forces conſiſting of ſixe ſcore companies of men at Armes, with an infanterie to their Cauallerie, he marched againſt the new Orges. Sanſeuerino though he were inferiour to him in number of horſe, yet being his ſuperiour in foot forces, went to the old Orges, ſuppoſing that the enemie would come thither. Nicolao Treuiſano Gouernour of Breſſia, accompanied Sanſeuerino with a gallant troupe to the new Orges.

Alphonſo in the meane time being come to Metella, enforced the townſmen to yeeld, together with ſome other places of meane importance: From thence he went and ſeized on Varioles and Scoſariolles, and then continued at Baignolles: But the Venetian who ſtill followed him, ſeeking for a fit occaſion to giue him battaile, went from Maclodia to Torbolles, and from thence not long after encamped at S. Zenes betwixt Breſſia and the enemies campe. There peace was motioned with more likelihood of good ſucceſſe, than before at Ceſenna, and as it had a better beginning, ſo was the end more proſperous. For the Captaines (which ſeldome happens) who were wont to abhorre the name of peace, became Authors and Vmpires thereof. Alphonſo takes Metela. A motion of peace.

Sanſeuerino on the one ſide, and Lodouico Sforza on the other, after ſundrie meſſages from both parts vndertooke this treatie ſo much deſired, not onely in Lombardie, where warre was hote, but ouer all Italy.

During this treatie of peace, or not long before, the Venetians receiued a great ouerthrow neere to Ferrara. Certaine foot-companies of the Garriſon of the obſcure lake had made incurſions to the verie gates of Ferrara, ſeeking to draw forth the enemie into ſome Ambuſcado: but the Ferrarois ſtill contained themſelues within their walles till the Venetians retired towards their campe: for then they ſent certaine troupes of horſe againſt them, who skirmiſhed with them as farre as the Parke corner which confrontes Caſſagio, where the Venetians in diſorder were put to rout, diuers were there ſlaine, and many wounded: but the number of priſoners was verie great, who (according to the manner of the Italian warre) being ſtript, The Venetians are put to rout.

were diſmiſſed. Troni Prouidator at that time of the obſcure lake, falling ſicke, and being carried to Venice, died there.

Peace concluded with the Venetians.

Peace (as hath beene ſaid) being motioned by the Captaines did then take effect, on theſe conditions: That the Venetians ſhould reenter Aſola Romania, and all other townes loſt during that warre of Lombardie: That they ſhould withdraw all their Garriſons on this ſide, & beyond the Po; raze all the Forts built vpon the riuer banks; and ſhould ſurrender to Hercules whatſoeuer they had taken from him: the Polleſin of Rouigo excepted, which themſelues retained; and ſhould enioy the ſame liberties old and new as they were wont to haue in Ferrara, and places neere adioyning: That Sanſeuerino ſhould ſtill continue in the Venetians pay, and yet ſhould be Generall to all the Princes and States of Italy.

Conditions of peace.

How much the Venetians ſpent in this warre.

Such was the end of the confederate warre of all Italy againſt the Venetians, the greatneſſe of whoſe preparations may be imagined by this: That in two yeares ſpace or little more whileſt this warre laſted, they ſpent three millions and 600000. Ducates. The Venetians of a long time had not ſo willingly entertained peace. In all Townes and Caſtles ouer their dominions, bonefires were made in ſigne of ioy.

Beſides, triumphes, turnaments, and fight at barriers, were proclaimed which ſhould continue certaine daies. The rewards propounded to the combatants were two peeces, the one of cloth of gold, and the other of ſiluer. Great multitudes of people came from all parts to behold thoſe ſhewes. Hercules de Æſte, and Iulio Count of Camerin were preſent at them, whom the Prince and Senate went to meete. Leon, ſonne to Lodouico Sforza, and Galeas Sanſeuerino came from Milan to Venice. Old Sanſeuerino choſe rather to be a dealer in the triumphes than a ſpectator. The Roſsians of Parma, and the Prince of Mirandula came thither likewiſe, with many other great Lords, ſome to fight, others to looke on. The market-place of S. Marke as farre as S. Geminians Church was to this end ſumptuouſly adorned. The combatants preparations were magnificent: Three of Sanſeuerines ſonnes, who ſundrie times made ſhewes a-part, cauſed fiue and twentie braue courſers to be richly trapt with gold and purple. The Roſsians of Parmas ſhewes were in a manner like this: But that of Count Camerins nephew, ſonne to his brother, was accounted more ſumptuous than all the reſt. More than an hundred thouſand perſons beheld theſe triumphs.

Prince Mocenigo accompanied with the Senate and Citie Magiſtrates had a place prepared for them. Theſe turnaments laſted certaine daies. In the end, the honour of the triumph was adiudged to Sanſeuerines ſonnes, as they that had beſt deſerued it, Fracaſſo and Antonio Maria diuided the cloth of gold betwixt themſelues, and Galeas alone had that of ſiluer. Count Camerins nephew, who in all mens iudgements had done brauely, refuſed three hundred crownes, which the State would haue giuen him. Some thought he did it in diſdaine, becauſe others were preferred before him. Mariotto, a younger brother of the Roſsians of Parma, doing more at barriers than his yeares promiſed, was rewarded with a horſe richly barded. Many others were recompenced according to their merit, many were likewiſe knighted. Iulio Count of Camerin was made Generall of the Venetian troupes, ſeeing Sanſeuerino commanded thoſe of all Italy.

The end of the ſecond Booke of the fourth Decad.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE FOVRTH DECAD OF THE HISTORIE Of Venice.

The Contents of the third Booke of the fourth Decad.

THE Dukes Pallace burnt during the warre, is ſumptuouſly reedified. The Peſtilence begunne in Summer doth in Autumne make diuers places in the citie deſolate. A brieſe Deſcription of their Sea-traffick. Foure Gallies trading into France are taken by Pirates on the coaſt of Portugall. Troubles in Friull by the ſodaine arriuall of the Hungarians. ROBERTO SANSEVERINO with a braue Cauallerie goes to the warre lately begunne neere Rome. The election of MARCO BARBADICO who ſucceedeth MOCENIGO in the Principalitie of Venice. A brieſe Declaration of the warre of Rome betwixt Pope INNOCENT and king FERDINAND. Three Commiſsioners are appointed to preuide all things requiſite to purge the Citie from the peſtilence. SANSEVERINO diſſoiled of his troupes, returnes to the Venetians. Their vſuall cuſtome at their Princes funeralls. The cauſe of the warre with the Archduke of Auſtria, and ſodaine commotions of the enemie on the very confines of Italie. The beginning and end of the Rethicke warre. The kingdome of Cyprus is ioyned to the Venetians Dominions, by a conueyance made by Queene KATHERINE in her life time. The inuention of harquebuzes, and the recompence of ſuch as learned to ſhoot in them. An extreame cold froſt at Venice, and ouer all the Lakes. A league betwixt the Pope, Venetians, and GALEAS SFORZA. The preparations of CHARLES the French King for the conqueſt of the kingdome of Naples.

THat part of the Dukes Pallace which was burnt during the warre, was from the foundation reedified this firſt yeere of the peace: It is an admirable peece of worke, and likely to laſt long. The Citie was greatly moleſted with the Infection the next Summer, which increaſing in Autumne, did make Venice very deſolate. This domeſticke loſſe was accompanied toward the end of Summer with an other farre from home. But before wee enter into this Diſcourſe, it ſhall not bee impertinent to mention the Venetians great induſtrie, & wealth, purchaſed by traffike at ſea.

The Dukes pallace is reedified

A great plague at Venice.

There is no place in all the Sea from Gades, betwixt Affricke and Europe, towards Syria and Egypt in the Leuant; nor from the North and Weſt towards Boſphorus and the Fennes Meotides; nor any place ſo remote, which the Venetian Gallies haue not at all times frequented in trade of Marchandize. It is almoſt incredible to thinke how the Venetian veſsells doe ordinarily enter into the Hauens, not onely of Italie, but of Liburnia, Dalmatia, Macedonia and Greece, as if it were in the ſuburbs of Venice. Wee will ſpeake of thoſe, who at the Common-wealths charge are yeerely ſent to take in lading in the remoteſt places of the world.

Of theſe, foure great gallies bring home into Italie, Spice, Silke, Pretious ſtones, and Pearles from Syria and Egypt. Three others goe into Lybia, for gold, iewells, and ſlaues. Two ſaile into Fraunce and bring home wooll and Spaniſh ſilke. Others goe towards the Tanais, and Fennes Meotides, from whence they returne loden with Tapiſtrie and Emeraldes. And beſides this number, foure direct theyr courſe into the French Ocean, and from the Martes there, loade themſelues abundantly with woolls, gold, tapiſtrie, and cloth of Flaunders.

According to this cuſtome foure Gallies for this purpoſe were abroad vnder the commaund of Bartilomeo Minio, who comming into the Spaniſh Seas, mette with young Columbus, (nephew to Columbus the famous Mariner) who with ſeauen tall ſhippes of warre incountered them in the night neere to the ſacred Promontorie, modernely termed S. Vincents Cape. But although at firſt hee determined to aſſault the Venetian Gallies, yet hee abſtained that night, and reſoluing to fight with them, came ſo neere, as the prowes of the pirates ſhippes were aſterne the poopes of the Venetian Gallies. So ſoone as it was day Columbus aſſailed the Venetians, who were inferior to him in men and veſsells, but ſuperior in courage and reſolution. They fought fiercely for certaine houres ſpace, and with ſuch great ſlaughter as is ſeldome ſeene in any fight with ſuch enemies, who rarely come to fight but vpon conſtraint. Diuerſe that were preſent at the bickering ſay, that three hundred Venetians were ſlaine at that fight: others mention not ſo many. Among the dead were Lorenzo Michael Captaine of a Gallie, and Giouanni Delfino brother to another Captaine. The Venetians were wearied with long fight. The Gallie Delfina was taken by the enemies, whereupon the reſt yeelded. Some ſay, that in one Gallie foure ſcore dead bodies lay betwixt the prow and poope, which ſpectacle the victorious enemie lamented, ſaying in deſpite, That the Venetians by their wilfulneſſe had procured that loſſe. The dead bodies were throwne into the Sea, and the wounded ſet on ſhoare. Thoſe which eſcaped went to Liſbone, and from thence were ſent home.

The Venetian gallies are aſſailed by Pirates.

Lisbone a cittie of Portugall.

Liſbone is a Citie of Portugall ſtanding vpon the Sea, I thinke it was in old time called Oliſipone. It is at this day very famous, as well for the ordinarie reſidence of kings, as for her great wealth. The Venetians were there very kindely entertained by the king, and thoſe that were ſicke he commaunded to be carefully looked to, the reſt, according to each mans qualitie, receiued mony and cloaths, and were ſent home into their countrey.

League betwixt the venetians and kings of Portugall. The cauſe of this league.

The Venetians are in ancient league with the kings of Portugall, the which being deriued from the Father to the Sonne, they inuiolably obſerue. They ſay, that the cauſe of this league and friendſhip proceeded from the Venetians courteſie and liberalitie. It is reported, That a king of Portugall came in time paſt with a ſmall traine to Venice to ſee the Citie, where he remained certaine daies in diſguiſed habite. But ſo great a gueſt could not long be concealed: For the Senate hauing intelligence, that a Noble man of royall parentage lay in the Citie, it did honourably receiue and conducted him to a goodly Pallace, where he lodged, being accompanied by certaine Senators to ſhew him the ſingularities of the Citie, and to wait vpon him whither ſoeuer hee went: At his departure they gaue him rich giftes, and for his greater honor appointed ſome to attend him as farre as the Venetians confines. This did the Venetians, not (as they thought) to a king but only to a priuate perſon of blood royall. At his returne into Portugall hee acquainted his Princes with the Venetians curteſie and liberalitie; and made a Decree, That his ſucceſſors ſhould for euer acknowledge the Venetians bounty towards him. And for this cauſe the king of Portugall gaue ſuch good entertainement to the diſtreſſed Venetians:

ans: he did likewiſe commaund that none of his ſubiects ſhould buy any part of the Venetians goods which had bene ſtollen from them. The newes of this loſſe did greatly afflict the Citie, the which exceeding (as it was reported) the ſumme of 20000. crownes, touched ſome particular perſons: But the death of ſo many men did much augment their ſorrow. The peſtilence at this time did greatly infect the Cittie, in regard whereof, the Senate was of opinion at that time not to reuenge that wrong, but to deferre it to a fitter time.

At the ſame time there aroſe ſome troubles in Friull. Certaine light horſe, ſent by the King of Hungarie (as it was afterwards knowne) made ſodaine incurſions vpon the very confines of Italy, to ſurpriſe Porto-nouo, a towne vpon the Riuer Lizonza. The Hungarians made a ſtay vpon the Thryeſtines territorie. But the Senate, though it certainly knew that the ſame King made warre ſtill vpon Frederick, and that thoſe troupes were expreſly ſent into Italy to ſurprize Porto-nouo and Tryeſte, which Frederick yet held; yet becauſe they were not well aſſured of the Kings intention, they forthwith ſent certaine troopes of horſe which lay in Garriſon betwixt Verona and Padua, to the Carnons territories. But the Hungarians paſſing quietly through the territorie of Vdina, and fruſtrate of their hope to take the Citie, which the Bandetti had aſſured them of, left Italy, and returned without any farther attempt.

The better part of Harueſt was alreadie ſpent, when Roberto Sanſeuerino (who notwithſtanding the peace in Lombardie ſtill remained in the Venetians pay) earneſtly ſolicited by Letters from Pope Innocent who ſucceeded Sixtus, went without the Senates conſent or knowledge (who were then at peace by ſea and land) with his ſonnes Fracaſſo and Galeas and two and thirtie companies of horſe, firſt into Faminia, and afterwards to Rome in the middeſt of winter: but hee arriued ſomewhat before his forces; for the Pope being preſſed by Alphonſo, haſtened his comming. Sanſeuerine aideth Pope Innocent.

The cauſe of this warre proceeded from the commotions of the Volaterrans, and rebellion of certaine Princes, who by a ſodaine conſpiracie, reuolted from Ferdinand, retiring to Pope Innocent, requeſting his aide againſt that King. The Pope finding them not onely worthie to be protected by his authoritie, but likewiſe to be freed from all wrong by the forces of the Church of Rome, it fell out that Virginio Vrſino, who (as we haue elſewhere ſaid) beſides ſundry townes which hee poſſeſt neere Rome on this ſide, and beyond Tiber, had likewiſe diuers others in the Marſhes as farre as the lake Fuſcino in the confines of the Realme of Naples, remained ſtill loyall to the King. At firſt he reſolued (as it is reported) not wholly to abandon the King, nor likewiſe in any ſort to take Armes againſt the Pope, but together with Ferdinand defending the Realmes frontiers, following his Anceſtors ſteps, to make no attempt neere Rome. In this maner, he remained, as it were, neuter amidſt theſe new garboiles of warre, when after Sanſeuerins arriual, by the perſwaſion (as it was thought) of ſome chiefe Commanders of the contrarie faction, the Pallace of the Vrſini vpon Mount Iordano, (which is the name of ſome part of the Citie) was ſodainly by the ſoldiers ſpoiled and burnt: whereat Virginio being incenſed, did preſently declare himſelfe together with the other Lords of that familie, an enemy to the Pope. Alfonſo ſtrengthened by this mans power, and hauing ſeized on certaine bridges neere Rome, began after Sanſeuerines arriuall, to waſte and ſpoile all places round about the Citie. We onely mention this to acquaint the reader with the cauſe of the warre betwixt the Pope and King Ferdinand.

Now while theſe things were done neere Rome, Prince Mocenigo died the ſeuenth yeere of his Gouernment.

¶ MARCO BARBADICO, the 73. Duke of Venice.

MArco Barbadico, a Senator of great wiſdome and authoritie, was by a generall conſent choſen Prince in his ſtead. This man (the Commonwealth being quiet at home and abroad) repaired the Ducall Pallace begunne a while before, with ſuch expedition, as in a few moneths whileſt he remained Prince all that part thereof towards the Eaſt was with ſtately Architecture almoſt finiſhed. The cold weather nothing abating the furie of the Peſtilence, it did greatly afflict the Citie. Therefore three Senators were appointed, who had ample commiſſion to doe whatſoeuer they ſhould finde neceſſarie, to free it from that calamitie. Theſe men, that they might the ſooner take away the cauſe of the ſickneſſe, in an open place for the purpoſe cauſed a great quantitie of infectious apparell which the couetous graue-makers had layed vp together, to bee burned in one fire. And becauſe great numbers of people did ſurcharge the Citie, they ſent a great part of the vulgar to inhabit elſwhere. At the ſame time the great Chanell, oppoſite to the great market-place, was clenſed, the which by a decree of Senate, though it were of great extent, was in all places ſcoured. They ſent certaine foote companies (according to their vſuall manner) into Cyprus for to guard the Iſland.

In the meane time, warre betwixt the Pope and the Vrſini (who as hath beene ſaid, ſhewed themſelues openly for Ferdinand) brake forth into great flames, after the arriuall of Sanſeuerines forces. For Pontenomentana being recouered, which they had taken, and Fracaſſo, ſonne to old Sanſeuerino almoſt ſlaine with a bullet, the whole burthen of the warre fell on Paulo Vrſino, and other of Virginio's kinſmen. For Nomentana being taken by force, was ſackt and ruined. Sanſeuerino marched towards Monterotonda, when Cardinall Baptiſta Vrſino came to the Pope, and aſſured him that himſelfe and friends would be obedient to the holie Sea, by meanes whereof there were none other attempts made neere Rome.

Sanſeuerino recouereth Pontenomentana.

Virginio's troopes of horſe did in the meane time waſte the Roman territorie, till Alphonſo's returne from Tuſcanie, where according to their agreement they receiued a braue cauallery from the Florentines and Milaneſes, with which they made towards Rome: Sanſeuerino with farre fewer number went to incounter him neere Fliſco; there in skirmiſh the enemie loſt certaine horſe; but this notwithſtanding, Alphonſo preſuming on his owne ſtrength did in deſpight of Sanſeuerino make furious incurſions vpon the Romaneſca.

The

The Pope who till then had conſtantly maintained this great warre, though he alreadie before reſolued (as ſome ſay) to craue aide from France, hauing ſent for Renatus Duke of Lorraine to come into Italy againſt Ferdinand; and had likewiſe by his Nuncio Nicolao Franco elect Biſhop of Treuiſo, requeſted the Venetians to aſſociate him in that warre; yet becauſe ſupplies from France are accounted farre off, and tedious, and that the Venetians in reſpect of their league ſworne in Lombardie at the finiſhing of the Ferrarois warre, with Lodouico Sforza, Alphonſo and the Florentines, would not take Armes; hauing thereby loſt all hope of aide from any other place, and fearing to precipitate the State of Rome into greater dangers, he did willingly incline to peace which the enemie offered him on honourable termes. For though he was a great Protector of the papall dignitie, yet he loued peace and quietneſſe, in concluding whereof, he did as much as in him lay, procure the wealth and aduancement of the Church of Rome, together with that of his friends and confederates.

Peace betwixt the Pope and Ferdinand.

Sanſeuerino preſently after peace was made, being caſheerd, and reſoluing to carrie backe his troupes of horſe into Lombardie, did by letters and expreſſe meſſengers craue leaue of the Senate to retire with two thouſand horſe into ſome towne belonging to their territories: But his demand not granted, himſelfe deſtitute of all counſell, as a man forſaken, hauing no ſafe place of retreate, and Alphonſo ſtill at his backe, who had followed him into Flaminia, was enforced to leaue his Cauallerie to his enemie, and himſelfe with a few followers to make a ſpeedie retreat into the frontiers of Rauenna.

Sanſeuerino depriued of his forces.

Such was the end of Sanſeuerino and his ſonnes renowned iourney from Lombardie to the warre of Rome, which we haue not ſo much mentioned for himelfe, as to let the world vnderſtand the Venetians great conſtancie and loyalty. For although an occaſion was offered to ruine king Ferdinand intangled in a domeſticke war, or at leaſt mightily to endanger him if they would haue embraced thoſe offers, promiſes and conditions, yet becauſe they would in no ſort violate the treatie of peace which they had once ſworne to, they ſtopt their eares to theſe motions. Now whileſt theſe things were done neere Rome, newes was brought from France, that Maximilian ſonne to the Emperour Fredericke was choſen King of the Romanes, a name verie hatefull to the Citie of Rome, taking it original in the daies of that Charles who ouerthrew the Lombards greatneſſe in Italy. For many Hiſtorians affirme, That he did afterwards make his ſonne Pipin, King of Italy, himſelfe being Emperour: and by this meanes it came to paſſe in time, that he is not only called king of Italy, but of Romans, which enioyeth the ſame digintie and greatneſſe like him.

The venetians loyaltie.

Maximilian is choſen king of the Romanes.

Maximiliam had maried the daughter and heire of Charles Duke of Burgondie, who died in the war againſt the Suiſſes, and by this marriage purchaſing great and ample Signories, being young, valiant and apt either for warre or peace, had after ſome new troubles and difficult menaces of warre, inforced that ſtirring nation to obey his commandemment: Himſelfe and Fredericke his father, acquainted the Venetians, (as their great friends) with this new election. Dominico Treuiſano, and Hiermolao Barbaro were ſent Ambaſſadors to them both, with commiſſion in the States name to congratulate that royall election: They were both knighted. Another Ambaſſador was likewiſe ſent into Portugall, to thanke that king from the Prince and Senate, for that not long before he had relieued and aſſiſted the Venetians, who by Pyrates had beene robbed and ſpoiled and ſet on ſhore in his countrey. Ieronimo Donato a verie excellent Philoſopher was appointed to goe thither. Toward the Spring, the ſickneſſe leſſened, and before Summer ended, it wholly ceaſſed, ſo as of a long time before, the Citie was not ſeene more healthfull. This proſperitie was accompanied by another, proceeding from Prince Barbadicos care and diligence, which was, great plentie and abundance of all things, for ſuch ſtore of corne, wine, oyle, and all ſorts of meate was brought to the Citie, as in the memorie of man the like had not beene ſeene. This ioy was likewiſe ſeconded ded by another: for the Venetians at that time had peace both by land and ſea, ſo as the Commonwealth was neuer more happie than at that time.

Amba[illegible]

Ambaſſade into Portugall.

Great proſperity of the venetian State.

The Prince was not onely buſied in maintaining the State in this proſperitie, but in augmenting it, when on a ſodaine to all mens griefe, death preuented him. He died in the ninth moneth of his gouernment: and therein perhaps more happie than all his predeceſſors: becauſe, that beſides a goodly race which he left behind him, himſelfe hauing well deſerued of Religion, Countrey, and Citizens, the Citie at his death was cleare from peſtilence, and abounded in plentie. We may moreouer adde this to his good fortune, That vpon his death-bed an Ambaſſador came to him from Baiazet ſonne to Mahomet Emperour of Turks, and brought him rich preſents. It is reported that drawing towards his end, he called for foure of his ſonnes, whom after vertuous inſtructions which he gaue them, he exhorted to loue and honour the State, intreating them often to remember the honour it had done him, for raiſing him from a meane Citizen to the higheſt and ſoueraigne dignitie, the which ought to make them to render that pietie to their countrey which their father by reaſon of his ſhort gouernment could not performe. The whole Citie did infinitely bewaile his death. Euerie one did publikely ſpeake of his meekneſſe towards all men. For beſides other pious examples towards the poore, he did at the beginning of his gouernment, (fearing that by reaſon of multiplicitie of cauſes the poore ſhould haue no free acceſſe to him) make a decree, That the names of thoſe who were deſirous to haue audience of him ſhould from eight to eight daies be drawne by lot: and that their names who were firſt drawne, ſhould be firſt diſpatched. This holy Decree was cauſe that neither ambition, briberie, nor fauour could hinder poore mens ſuits, nor barre them from audience. Great numbers of people followed his funerals to the Church of the Twinnes. But his bodie lies buried in the Church of the Publike charitie.

The Princes inſtruction to his children on his death-bed.

It ſhall not be impertinent to ſet downe briefly in this place, the ceremonie which is at this day vſed at the interment of the Venetian Dukes. After he is dead and bowelled, they embalme the bodie, and lay it vnder a Canopie of Gold, with his guilt ſword and ſpurs reuerſed: he is publikely kept in the Pallace for three whole daies; then all the companies of the Citie which are as many as there bee Trades, doe with their banners, in ſolemne order, goe before the bodie; after them follow the Cleargie, next them the mourners who are many, in ſad and ſorrowfull manner: laſt of all come the Senate clothed in Scarlet and Purple, to demonſtrate, That the Citie which is free, doth neuer in mourning habit follow the funerall of any Prince, how vertuous ſoeuer. In this manner and habite, ſo ſoone as the bodie is brought into the Church, they ſit round about it, whileſt the memorie of the deceaſed Prince (according to the ancient manner) is recommended to the people in a funerall Oration. From thence the Senators returning to the Pallace, doe publiſh the firſt aſſembly for the creation of a new Duke.

The ceremonie at the Princes funerals.

Auguſtino

AVGVSTINO BARBADICO, the 74. Duke of Venice.

Vguſtino Barbadico, brother to the deceaſed Prince, a man of ſingular wiſedome and grauitie, and at that time Procurator of S. Marke, ſucceeded his brother. This election was by ſo much more pleaſing to the Cittie, by how much euery man thought, that they could not haue choſen a man more reſembling the late Prince in all vertuous qualities, than this man. The next day after his creation he made a ſweet and gentle Speech to the people, but his maieſtike and reuerend preſence, with a long white beard hanging downe beneath his girdle, made him more venerable. After his election all things flouriſhing in peace as before, hee beganne his gouernement like to his brother, by repairing the Ducall pallace.

The next Winter, Antonio Ferriere, and within a while after Giouanni Baria were ſent to Conſtantinople to the Turkiſh Emperour. Antonio Lauretano Ambaſſadour at Rome was called home, becauſe the Senate ſuppoſed that hee had not faithfully diſcharged his place; hee was a very wiſe man and excellently learned: he was baniſhed the Cittie for tenne yeeres. Sebaſtiano Badoario and Bernardo Bembo were ſent to Rome in his ſtead, where Antonio Vinciguerra the Secretarie after Lauretans departure, had in the meane time by the Senates commaund treated with his Holineſſe, whereupon at their arriuall, they made a league with him.

A league betwixt the Pope and venetians.

At the ſame time almoſt that this league was publiſhed, Franciſco Priuli was made Admirall of the Sea. Hee at the Spring receiuing the publique enſignes in S. Marks Church from the Princes hand, departed from Venice. Certaine armed Gallies to ſecure the Sea-frontires, were gone before, and ſome others followed them. So great care had the Senate at that time for the guard of the Seas, when an vnlooked for warre from Germanie aſſailed them, about contending for their bounds; the beginning and progreſſion whereof was thus. Sigiſmond, brother to the Emperour Fredericke, was Lord and Soueraigne Prince of the Rhetick and Noricke Common-wealths, and other Countries of Germanie neere adiacent: Hee was a meeke and courteous Prince, but inclining too much to flatterers: Hee had euer beene in league with the Venetians, in which regard, the Almaine Marchants his ſubiects had free trafficke ouer all the Venetians territories, and the Venetian Marchants did the like in his; and eſpecially at a famous Mart which is yearely held for a certaine time at Bolzan, a Citie vnder his obedience.

The originall of the Rhetick warre.

Now

The law of Nations violated.

Now the Venetians comming to this Fayre after their vſuall manner, in the yeare 1487, were by Sigiſmunds commaundement (contrarie to the law of Nations) taken and impriſoned, and their goods ſeized to the Princes vſe. His ſubiects had not long before driuen the Venetians from the ſiluer Mynes in the Alpes, bought by the Seigniorie, and becauſe they were neere to them, they with-held them by force. When they were demaunded why they did ſo, their excuſe was; That Sigiſmonds ſubiects inhabiting vpon the Lake of La Garda, were diſpoſſeſſed of their dwellings, making this a colour to ſhadow their malice: for the ſtrife of thoſe men being referred to arbitrement, was in friendly manner debated by Commiſſioners from both ſides.

And the better to manifeſt that their proiect was not new, after the impriſonment of the Venetian Marchants, they leuied forces from all parts, aſwell of their own, as Swiſſes & Griſons to the number of ten thouſand men. Then at the Spring they came into the field vnder Gaudentius Amaſianus their Generall, and entred furiouſly vpon the Confines of Verona: and from thence running fifteene miles into the Countrey, along the Riuer Adice, they drew neere to Rouero, a Caſtle belonging to the Venetians, ſeated in a ſtreight of the Alpes vpon that Riuer, which they being not able to take as they ſuppoſed to haue done, they waſted the Countrey round about, and then made Sturma their Rendezuous.

The Almaines beſiege Rouero.

Theſe incurſions being knowne at Venice, the Senate commaunded that their ſouldiers which were in the Treuiſan, Friul, and Lombardie, ſhould ſpeedily meet at Verona, and that beſide thoſe, new leuies of ſouldiers ſhould be made. Within a while after, Pietro Diede Gouernour of Verona, and Ieronimo Marcello were made Prouidators, and the Signiorie committed vnto them the command of that warre. The Senate afterwards thought good to make Iulio Cæſare Varrana Count of Cameryna Generall of their Armie, who preſently came to Verona.

Pietro Diede, and Ieronimo Marcello Prouidators.

The Almains in the meane time being prouided of all neceſſaries to beſiege and take that place, approching neere the walls, battred it with their ordnance, whereof they had great ſtore: and the batterie continuing certayne dayes, they did beate downe a great part of the wall; the Captaine of the Caſtle, by reaſon of their great number, being hardly able to repulſe them from the aſſault, howbeit notwithſtanding all his reſiſtance hee was at laſt enforced to yeelde it vpon compoſition. That which did moſt torment the beſieged at the batterie and aſſault, was the enemies artillerie, which was charged with yron bullets, hollow within and filled with wild fire. Theſe bullets ſtriking on the walls, ſcattered the fire vp and downe, with ſuch vehemencie, as it burnt whatſoeuer it met with, ſo as no man durſt come vpon the walles to the aſſault.

Rouero yeelded to the Almaines on compoſition.

The Senate, perceiuing that the warre would continue longer than they had imagined, and in ſome ſort diſtruſting the ſpeedie finiſhing of it by the valour and skill of one Generall, intreated Roberto Sanſeuerino, (who after that Pope Innocent had caſſiered him, retired to his owne houſe neere Padua) to accept the place of Generall of their Armie, together with Iulius Cæſar Varran, and to make all haſte poſſible to the Alpes aboue Verona, with certaine troupes of horſe, together with his ſonnes, two braue young men. Sanſeuerino entertained the offer, and ſpeedily went thither; At his arriuall the armie was filled with hope: he made certaine light skirmiſhes, whoſe euent was ſomewhat doubtfull, and made a bridge ouer the Riuer, that the ſouldiers might paſſe from one ſide to the other, and that by it, victualles might likewiſe be brought to the campe.

The Venetians intreat old Sanſeuerino to be their Generall.

At the ſame time certaine companies of Almaines made incurſions on the Territories of Vincenza, Feltre, and Friul; the feare of their comming doing more hurt than their actions. For Ieronimo Sauorgnano iſſued from a noble and ancient family in Vdina, and a great friend to the Venetians, who had made him a Gentleman of Venice, ſo ſoone as he had notice of the Almaines incurſions, did ſpeedily arme the greateſt forces he could, and together with many Countrey people whom hee aſſembled,

ſembled, marching from the mountaine tops and bad waies which were not vſually paſſed, he came downe vnlooked for vpon the enemies, and aſſailing them on their backs, brake and defeated them, manie of whom periſhed in thoſe deepe and feareſull precipices. The Senate in acknowledgement of this notable ſeruice, gaue him great thankes, and recompenced him with the commaund of three hundred foote men, which himſelfe beſtowed on his brother Giacomo, chooſing rather to liue quietly at home, than to meddle any more in martiall matters.

Sauorgnane defeats the Almaines.

The Almaines puft vp with pride, after they had taken Rouero (as hath beene ſaid) made many incurſions into the Venetians Countrey, who determined to ſurprise them: which they by their ſpies hauing notice of, laid an ambuſh to entrap the Venetians, from which after a fierce fight, Roberto Sanſeuerino by the valour and proweſſe of his ſonne Antonio Maria, hardly eſcaped: Not long after Iulio Cæſare Varano Count of Camerina being afflicted with a feuer, went from the Campe to Verona.

The Venetians are defeated.

The Almaines afterwards, wanting victuals and pay, were readie to mutinie; which the Captaines fearing, craued of Sanſeuerino a ſuſpenſion of Armes for a time, which hee refuſing, they did about midnight ſet fire on the Caſtle, and with their Armes and bagage diſlodged before day. The Venetians wondering in the morning that they heard no noiſe in the enemies Campe, could hardly beleeue that they were wholly gone, but doubted ſome treacherie or ambuſcado: but their ſpies aſſuring them that they were gone farre enough, they recouered the Caſtle.

Sanſeuerino being aſſured of the enemies returne, and ſtrengthened with new ſupplies from Rauenna, La Marca, and Vmbria, reſolued boldly to paſſe on and beſiege Trent, to let the Almaines know that the Venetians could and durſt inuade them likewiſe in their owne Countrey. He imparted his deſſeigne to the Prouidators, whereupon Luca Piſani an ancient man whom the Senate had ſent in Pietro Diede his place, who was gone home to Verona, anſwered;

Sanſeuerino's reſolution.

That hee did not thinke that this enterprize could any way profit the State; becauſe firſt, it was not a thing likely to be true that the enemies, who of late were ſo many, and ſo gallantly armed, were ſo farre gone into Germany, but at their pleaſures they may returne and reunite themſelues, yea and confront vs ere long, ſo readie is that nation to take Armes: and by that meanes, wee ſhall be in danger of looſing this place, ſo commodious for barring ſtrangers forth of Italy: Secondly, if our men haue beene now ſtrong enough to driue the enemies hence, wee will not ſay that they went away of themſelues or vnconſtrained, but that they haue beene enforced ſo to doe: But admit it were ſo, wee are too weake to inuade them, and to enter into their Countrey, there to maintaine a ſiege, if needs were: For wee muſt perſwade our ſelues, that all Germany, with forces infinite, would vnite themſelues and come into the field, rather then endure ſuch diſgrace: Laſtly, if we ſhould enter their Countrey and be there broken and put to rout, what place of retreate haue we, hauing the Alpes on one ſide and our enemies on the other? Beſides, we are to feare the paſſages, which are ſo narrow, as in time of peace they are hardly paſſable. And therefore it is better for the State to protract the warre, rather then on hope of vncertaine victorie to tempt Fortune. Againe, the Citie being much tyred with the Ferrareſe warre, ought to make more account of peace without glorie, than of warre, though honourable, and of an aſſured good euent. This is mine opinion, which peraduenture, in regard of an error, common to thoſe of many yeeres, (feare) I will intreat you, if you ſo pleaſe, to declare your aduiſe, that wee may follow that which is moſt expedient.

Luca Piſani his opinion on Sanſeuerino his deſſigne.

Ieronimo Marcello replied in this manner. I would not doubt but that it were daungerous to enter into the enemies Countrey, and to beſiege Trent, if that were true which my Colleague hath alleadged, Becauſe that the Prouince or Citie which we ſhould take, might animate all Germanie againſt vs. Yet according to his owne opinion the matter is farre otherwiſe, for the enemie is not gone away of his owne accord, but deſperately enforced, as well through want of victuals as pay. Now he that cannot entertaine an Armie alreadie leuied, with with victuals and money, which are the true ſinewes of warre, hardly for want of theſe two will he raiſe a new. For it is much eaſier, to preſerue things alreaaie made, than to renew thoſe which are ouerthrowne and waſted. It is not credible that all Germanie, to aſsiſt Sigiſmund, would take Armes againſt the Venetians, who haue euer beene their good friends and Confederates: For Sigiſmund, vnknowne to all other Germaine Princes, without beeing prouoked, hath inſolently begunne warre. The Emperour Frederick his brother, approues not what he hath done, he would neither aid him with money, men or ought elſe, but ſeemeth to be highly diſpleaſed with this warre. Who will then ſuppoſe that he which is forſaken of his owne friends and countrimen, ſhould euer be relieued by ſtrangers? And if any man ſhall ſay that all the Princes of Germanie will not ſtirre in Sigiſmunds behalfe, but in their owne; fearing that the taking of Trent would open the Venetians a paſſage into their Countrey: and this alone might excite them to vnite their forces to expulſe vs: This obiection is eaſily anſwered, for the Venetian Signorie hath many townes and Caſtles through which they may eaſily paſſe into Germanie. Feltre is not farre off, nor Belluna likewiſe; and leaſt of all Ciuidalla in Friull: Beſides theſe townes, it hath many ſtrong Caſtles towards the Eaſt, as Buerna and Lodron on the Breſſan, and the Fort of the lake Iſea, together with the Topine valley in the Bergamaſco, with all that Countrey which extends it ſelfe from the lake of Coma to the Griſons; And yet the Germaine Princes haue neuer attempted to driue the Venetians thence for feare of the paſſage. And though wee ſhould take Trent, they would not ſtirre, but rather confeſſe and freely ſay, that Sigiſmund deſerued it for vniuſtly prouoking the Venetian Signorie their friend and Confederate. As for the ſtreight and narrow wayes we are to paſſe from hence to Trent, it is nothing; Yet we muſt open them, and foote by foot ſeiſe vpon whatſoeuer we ſhall find by the way doth belong to the Almaines, and leaue nothing at our backes which may proue our enemie: And whereas my fellow hath alleadged that the State wanting money, by reaſon of the Ferrareſe troubles, is wearie of warre; I ſay we neede not care for that. For if we take Trent, all the expence of this warre ſhall be well recompenced with profit and vſurie, and our wrongs iuſtly reuenged, to the honour of our Commonwealth, which ſhall extend her bounds further; The which our anceſtors haue ſo highly eſteemed, as they haue neuer cared for any expence, ſo that they might augment their State. A faire accaſion is now offered to take Trent, aſwell becauſe our valliant ſoldiers will enter it, the Citie being not well fortified, as alſo for that the townesmen fearing the ſacke thereof, will yeeld vpon the firſt ſummons, and therefore our forces are ſufficient to hazard the matter without expecting any further aide: If the enterprize proſper, my Lord Piſani will be the firſt that ſhall commend the Authour thereof. If the Citie ſhall reſiſt, and we cannot take it, yet hauing firſt waſted the Countrey, burnt their Country houſes and villages, and filled all places with feare and amazement, we ſhall bring backe our victorious Armie into theſe parts: And thus being reuenged, we may more eaſily treate of accord, than if we now retire without any further exploit. Wee muſt thinke that opportunitie doth not euery day offer it ſelfe, and therefore we are to take it when it is opportunely offered, and not let it ſlip, leaſt the remembrance of not accepting it, together with repentance, torment thoſe who haue ſo loſt it.

The ſiege of Trent is reſoluced.

Marcello's ſpeech ended, Piſani freely alowed his opinion: The Prouidators thoght it fit that the Generall ſhould execute that which he had propounded, who ſpedily cauſed all things to be made readie: But becauſe that betwixt Rouero and Trent vpon the Riuer towards the left hand, there ſtands a Caſtle called Pietro, ſeated on a little hill, commanding the high way, the Generall determined to take it, from thence to bring victuals to the Campe, and becauſe (according to Marcello's aduice) he would not leaue any enemie place behind him. This thus reſolued, becauſe that on Rouero's ſide they could not march to this Caſtle by reaſon of the difficult hanging of the mountaine, hee cauſed his Armie to croſſe the Riuer at a bridge which he made at his arriuall: then he marched vp againſt the ſtreame of the Riuer, and within an houre and an halfes march, came to Caillan a ſmall towne within a mile of Caſtle Pietro, where on ſmall boates making another bridge, he repaſſed the Riuer, and encamped in a plaine ſixe hundred paces from it, betwixt the mountaine taine and the riuer, and from thence ſent his light horſe to make diſcouerie, who were to aduertize him if they ſhould chance to deſcrie any of the enemies enſignes. Theſe light horſe forgetting the Generals commandement, rode vp and downe waſting and ſpoiling the countrey, onely intending to get bootie. Thoſe of Trent in the meane time aduertized of the making of the bridge, & fearing their owne danger as much as their neighbours, their Armie being far off, and their Citie badly fortified and vnprouided of all neceſſaries, intreated George, Lord of Pietro Plana a Caſtle beyond Trent, to make ſpeedie head againſt the Venetian Armie, with ſuch forces as he had, and the greateſt numbers of Boores he coulde leuie, and with them to amuze the enemie, till Sigiſmond ſhould come to their reſcue. He preſently did what they entreated, and from Beſina and other places neere adioyning had in an inſtant aboue one thouſand men readie to march: Then with many drummes and trumpets he began to come downe from the hilles: The light horſe who romed vp and downe, deſcrying them, and being not able to view their exact number by reaſon of the hill top which ſhadowed them, and perceiuing their file to be verie long in regard of the ſtreight waies, ſuppoſed them to be farre moe then they were, and ſeeing them to approach with ſuch great rumours, turned their backes and fled, and meeting with their fellowes which followed them, cauſed them likewiſe to runne away towards the Campe, the horſe and foote being pell-mell together.

The Venetians in amaze.

The Almaines being more encouraged by the Venetians flight than their owne valour, were preſently at their heeles, and ſo terrified their enemies campe, as euerie man fled and retired to the Generals troupes, who hauing notice of his ſouldiers flight was comming to backe them, where he brauely reſiſting the enemie, and reprehending the baſeneſſe of his owne troupes, fought verie valiantly for a time: Many on both ſides were ſlaine. And noble Sanſeuerino perceiuing the enemies ſquadron to preſſe in vpon him, acted wonders with his ſword, till at laſt being beaten to the verie brinke of the Riuer, ſtill aduancing one of his owne enſignes, and being oppreſſed with multitudes, wrapped himſelfe in his colours, and ſo mortally wounded fell into the water where he died. The reſt of the Armie terrified by their Generals death, fled euerie man toward the bridge. Andrea de Burgo Colonell of the infanterie perceiuing this diſorder, and that no man had any care to reſiſt the enemies, ſuppoſing that if the bridge were broken, the runnawaies would ſtand to it, and be enforced to fight, ranne preſently to cut the ropes which held the boates: But it fell out otherwiſe than he imagined: For feare doth commonly entertaine no counſell; euen ſo thoſe who fled, hoping to eſcape by croſſing the riuer, when they ſaw the bridge broken, did headlong with their horſe and Armes throw themſelues into the riuer, where they all periſhed by the violence of the ſtreame. Few or none eſcaped to the other ſide, ſo, that of the Venetians, accounting as well thoſe that were drowned, as they whom the Almaines ſlew, aboue a thouſand men lay dead on the place. Onely Guido Maria de Roſsis with his troupe of horſe, fighting valiantly, manifeſted the worth of carriage and magnanimitie in warre, who being inuironed by the victorious enemie, made way through the middeſt of them, and came off brauely. Other Captaines and Souldiers that could not croſſe the riuer; ſome by vnknowne waies got vp to the tops of the mountaines, and others, but verie few, entred into boates and eſcaped to Rouero, among whom was De Roſsis and his companie. There died great numbers of the Almaines, who with a bloudie victory returned home.

The death of old Sanſeuerine the noble Venetian Generall.

The Venetians are wholly put to rout.

A generous act of Guido Maria de Roſsis.

A bloudy victory to the Almanes.

The Venetians ſpent ſome time in renewing their Armie, which was almoſt diſbanded. The Almaines in the meane time did not ſtirre, but were glad to doe the like, hauing receiued no leſſe loſſe than their enemies. Neuertheleſſe, there happened at the ſame time diuers skirmiſhes and incounters, with taking of townes vpon the Feltrine and Vincenzan territories, and along the lake of La Garda, with ſuch troupes as each ſide could raiſe, putting all to fire and ſword. The Venetians, among others tooke a Caſtle neere to the lake, called Arques, which by the Senates decree was burnt and ruined, becauſe it had beene the principall motiue of the warre, and had cauſed the ſtriſe concerning their bounds, as alſo becauſe that the Lords of that Caſtle were capitall enemies to the Venetians.

The Caſtle of Arques taken and burnt.

In the meane time Andrea de Burgo accuſed before the Councell of Ten, for that he had treacherouſly, and of malice, broken the bridge at Caillan, was committed to priſon, but vpon report of Marco Beazana Chancellor of the Senate, who had been in that incounter, he was inlarged, and reſtored to his place. Pope Innocent, being diſpleaſed with this warre, at that time diſpatcht the Biſhop of Ozima to Sigiſmond, to intreat him in his name to giue an end to to that warre, and to tell him that the Turk being ſo neere a neighbour, it did not befit two ſuch potent Chriſtian nations to contend with one another, & that if it ſhould pleaſe him to make his Holineſſe vmpier of his controuerſie with the Venetians, he would doe him all right. The Biſhop made ſo ne ſtay with Sigiſmond, till articles of peace were drawne, which he carried with him to Venice, who imparting them to the Senate, they were reiected: In this manner without effecting his legation, he returned to Rome.

The Venetians refuſe th Articles of peace.

The Pope made the ſame motion of peace to the Venetians by Nicolao Franco Biſhop of Treuiſo his Nuncio, who earneſtly entreated the Senate to embrace it, aſſuring them that his Holineſſe would imploy his credit and authoritie to effect it. But all was in vaine, till Sigiſmond, tired with the heauie burthen and expence of warre, being no longer able to entertaine his Armie, did himſelfe ſue to the Venetians for peace, whereupon after ſundrie meſſages from both ſides, peace was concluded in Nouember on theſe conditions: That the townes taken on either part, ſhould be reſtored to the true owners: That the Venetian marchants taken at the Faire of Bolzana, ſhould be ſet at libertie, and their loſſes recompenced. Other matters not heere metioned, were referred to the Pope.

Peace concluded betwixt Sigiſmond and the Venetians.

Such was the end of the Rethicke warre. The Senate recompenced the Captaines and Souldiers according to their merits. Iulius Ceſar Varran was caſſeerd, becauſe he had behaued himſelfe negligently in his place. The two ſonnes of noble Sanſeuerino were ſtill retained in the Signories pay, and each of them made Captaine of ſixe hundred horſe. Sebaſtiano Badoario, and Bernardo Bembo were ſent to the Pope to accompliſh this Treatie. All matters thus concluded, the Senate made decrees concerning the expences of priuate families, womens garments, and generally againſt all ſuperfluities, namely, dice and cards-play, ſauing at weddings, Innes, and vnder the two Columnes in S. Markes place, with this addition: That the ſumme which was plaid for ſhould not exceed the fifth part of an ounce of gold.

There was a rumour at the ſame time, That Baiazet the Turkiſh Emperour made incurſions on the Ægean Sea. The Senate hereupon commanded Franciſco Priuli at that time Generall of the Gallies to be in readineſſe to put to Sea. And becauſe they ſuppoſed that the Turkes had an intent to inuade Cyprus, he was commanded to ſaile thither. Priuli embarking his ſouldiers in Aprill, went to Corfou, and from thence to Modon, accompanied by Coſmo Paſcalis the Prouidator, where Nicolao Capello the other Prouidator met them, augmenting the number of their veſſels; with which, being fiue and twentie Gallies, and tenne Brigandines they ſet ſaile, and the fifth day after arriued in Cyprus.

The venetians ſend a fleet to guard Cyprus.

The report of this Turkiſh fleet conſiſting of many long veſſels which had ſailed by Cyprus through the Gulph of Aiazza, and then returned into the Helleſpont without any exploit, bred a longing in the Senate to impatronize the Realme of Cyprus: As alſo becauſe Ferdinand king of Naples went about to make it his, by means of a marriage which he ſecretly treated betwixt his ſonne and Queene Katherine, borne in Venice, of the illuſtrious family of the Cornares, giuen in marriage by her father Marco Cornari to Iames of Luſignan king of Cyprus, with a dowrie of a thouſand pound of gold.

What moued the Senate to deſire the Realme of Cyprus.

This Queene a little after her husbands death, being a widow, and with child by him, him, was by his laſt will and teſtament left coheire with the childe ſhe ſhould bring foorth, and yet committed to the protection of the Venetian Senate, who at her marriage adopted her their daughter. After the kings death ſhe was deliuered of a ſonne, who died before the yeere was expired: Then did certaine Lords of the Iſland goe about to raiſe commotions, but the Senate ſent forces thither vnder the commaund of a Prouidator together with the Queenes father, who were ſtill to attend vpon her, ſo as theſe ſtirres were on a ſodaine appeaſed.

The Realme then being at quiet, the Queene vnder the Senates protection had for the ſpace of fifteene yeeres peaceably gouerned that kingdome, when Ferdinand vnderhand by two of his familiar friends practiſed the ſaid marriage: Their names were, Riccio Marini of Naples, an inward friend with the late king, and Triſtan Cybelletto of Cyprus, who had a ſiſter attending on the Queene: theſe two comming thither from Ferdinand, were apprehended by the Generall of the fleete, and preſently ſent to Venice: but Triſtan died by the way, hauing ſwallowed a Diamond, and druncke Sea-water after it: for hee knew that if he came to Venice, the Senate would puniſh him according to his deſerts, becauſe after the kings death he had raiſed tumults in the Realme, and ſlaine Andrea Cornari the Queenes vnckle.

The Councell of Tenne, moued by theſe practizes, fearing Ferdinands pollicies, and the Turkiſh preparations, together with the king of Syriaes neere neighbourhood, commaunded Georgio Cornari the Queenes brother, to goe into Cyprus to her, and perſwade her to remit the gouernement of the kingdome to the Venetian Senate and her ſelfe to returne to Venice; where ſhe might ſpend the remainder of her dayes merily in her owne Country among her friends and kinsfolkes, and not truſt her life and meanes among ſtrangers, in a forraine Realme.

The Senate ſend George Cornari into Cyprus.

Georgio Cornari imbarked himſelfe in a ſmall veſſell to make the more haſte, and in the winter time in a ſhort ſpace arriued in Cyprus, where hee preſently acquainted his ſiſter with the cauſe of his comming. The Queene wondred at his demand (as one that had beene wont to liue royally, and knew the ſparing and parcimonious life of the Citizens of Venice) and boldly refuſed it, ſaying: That ſhee would not for the world forſake ſo rich and goodly a Realme; and that the Senate ought to be ſatisfied with enioying it after her death. He, inſiſting on the contrarie, intreated her not to make more account of Cyprus, than of her owne Country; becauſe that worldly affaires being variable and inconſtant, it might in ſhort ſpace come to paſſe that ſhee might bee expulſed her kingdome, it being ſo deſired by many great and potent Lords, and her ſelfe envied by her owne ſubiects, who diſdained to be gouerned by a woman. One onely meanes was left her whereby to preuent all theſe miſchiefes, which was, ſeeing ſhee had no children to referre the gouernement of the Realme to the Venetian State, now in her life time: That the Venetian Common-wealth had beene well pleaſed to ſuffer her to gouerne the Realme, ſo long as the time had beene quiet and voyd of ſuſpitions: But now when all her neighbours wait for occaſions, and lay ſnares to ſurprize it, the Senate hath thought this onely remedy moſt expedient: But if ſhe feared not theſe daungers, he beſought her to conſider the perill ſhe was likely to haue fallen into the precedent Summer; had not the State of Venice reskewed her with their Gallies, the Turkiſh armie would haue taken her kingdome from her, and her ſelfe haue beene enforced to flie, or elſe in daunger to haue beene carried as a captiue to Conſtantinople. It is good to foreſee that which a ſmall accident or ſome errour may cauſe vs fall into, and to preuent it. Fortune is variable, ſodaine and inconſtant, and we cannot euer preuent the enemies deſſeignes, nor can our friends be alwayes ready to help vs when we pleaſe. There is a great diſtance by land, but farre greater by Sea betwixt the fartheſt part of the Adriatticke Gulph, and the Iſle of Cyprus: This ought you (Madame) to remember and eſpecially conſider, that though nothing enforced you thereunto, yet what greater honour, or more laſting praiſe can you leaue behind you, than to haue giuen ſo flouriſhing a kingdome to your Country? and to haue it written in the Annales, That the Venetian State was honored and augmented with the kingdome of Cyprus, by a Ladie her owne Citizen. You ſhall ſtill be a Queene. And if the caſe were mine, I ſhould be deſirous, eſpecially hauing liued ſo long in Cy- prius as you haue done, to beholde my natiue countrey and place of birth, there to ſhew my greatneſſe and magnificence, there to embrace my brethren, ſiſters and kinsfolke. Neuer was the arriuall of any Lord or Lady ſo welcome to Venice as yours will be: And if Venice were a baſe and abiect village; yet in you it would be a pious duety to be willing to reuiew the place where you firſt drew breath, and thoſe who of a long time you haue not long ſeene. But it is certaine that Venice in all mens opinions, is preferred before all other cities vnder heauen, and accounted the goodlieſt of all Italy. What cauſe then is able to moue you after ſo long abſence, eſpecially, your country requeſting you to come home, to refuſe it? You are to thanke the Senate, for being Queene, and for that you haue raigned ſo long in peace, but it ſeemes you haue no deſire to acknowledge it; if otherwiſe, you would not neglect and refuſe their intreaty. In a word, I being your brother, and one who ought to haue ſome intereſt in you, if you deny me this requeſt: all men will thinke that it is not you which haue refuſed to gratifie the State, but that I haue adviſed you to the contrary, whereby I ſhall purchaſe my countries hatred, and blot my children with infamy. And therefore (Madame) I humbly beſeech you to graunt the Senates requeſt, and to reſpect me and mine. There is nothing more worthy commendation, than to know modeſtly how to entertaine Fortune when ſhe ſmiles on vs, and not to deſire to be ſtill on the wheeles toppe. Almightie God doth ſometime by aduerſitie trie thoſe whom he hath a long time fauoured, to make them remember that they are mortall. To conclude, you can offer vp to his diuine Maieſty no prayer more pleaſing, nor ſacrifice more acceptable, than to ſubmit your ſelfe to his will, which you muſt be perſwaded is, that you grant your Countries requeſt.

The Queene refuſeth her brothers requeſt.

Cornari his replie.

Georgio more eloquent by Nature than Art, hauing thus diſcourſed with his ſiſter, preuailed ſo farre with her as melting into teares, ſhee made him this vnwilling anſwer. Brother, if this be your opinion, I will yeelde vnto it, and will ſtriue to ouer-maſter my ſelfe: But our Country ſhall thanke you for my kingdome, and not me. Their departure concluded, and order taken for all things, the Generall and Prouidators commanded a ſolemne Maſſe to be celebrated in the Cathedrall Church of Famagoſta: then by the Queenes commaundement and in her preſence, the Standard of the Venetian Common-wealth was erected in the Citties Market-place, and by this meanes was the kingdome of Cyprus reduced to a Prouince.

The Queenes anſwere.

The Queene and her brother did afterward embarque themſelues, traine, and royall prouiſion in the Venetian Gallies, and in ſhort ſpace in the middeſt of winter arriued in the hauen of Venice. Shee was honourably receiued by Prince Auguſtino Barbadico, and by all the Senate who met her at Saint Nicholas Church with infinite multitudes of people of all ſorts, who entring into their Gondolas, did with great ioy accompany her. Herſelfe in the Bucentauro ſitting in the middeſt of the Senate and illuſtrious Ladies of the Citie, did in that magnificence enter Venice: The like honour was neuer done to any Venetian Ladie, and her arriuall was moſt pleaſing to the people. Not long after, the Councell of Tenne preſented her with the Caſtle of Azzola, ſeated on the Treuiſan hilles, and appoynted fiftie pounds weight of gold for her yeerely expence, with many other rich preſents which they gaue her.

The reception of the Queene of Cyprus at Venice.

Within a while after, the king of Tremiſen in Affricke, did by his Ambaſſadors requeſt the Senate to ſend ſome Venetian Gentleman to do iuſtice to the Venetians that liued in three of his Citties. The Senate to ſatisfie the king, created a new Magiſtrate to goe thither, who for his entertainement ſhould haue the hundred part of all marchandize ſolde by the Venetians. Lodouico Pizamane was the firſt that was appointed to this office. At the ſame time they builded a Fort vpon an hill neere to the Lake Ider not farre from Anfer a ſmall Towne on the Breſſan, which did greatly ſecure the countrey.

A new magiſtrate ſent by the Senate into Affricke.

About the ſame time there aroſe ſome contention betwixt Mathias the valiant king of Hungary, and the Emperor Fredericke: Mathias leuied two armies to inuade his enemie in two ſeuerall places; the one hee ſent into Friull, and the other to the confines of Liburnia. The Senate being troubled with this neighbour warre, diſ-

Contention betwixt the Emperour Fredericke and Mathias king of Hungarie.

patched

patched two Ambaſſadors, Antonio Bolda, to the Emperour, and Dominico Bollano to Mathias, who dealt ſo wiſely with theſe two enemie Princes, as they appeaſed them, and procured truce for a certaine time.

Frederick in the meane time freed from warre, came to Trent, to knowe if the Senate would giue him leaue to paſſe through that part of Italie, which ſtretcheth along the Alpes from the lake of La Garda, as farre as Aquileia. The Senate aduertized of his comming, ſent foure Gentlemen in Ambaſſage to him, Ieronimo Barbaro, Dominico Grimani, who was afterwards Cardinall, Paulo Treuiſano, and Ieronimo Leone, who meeting him neere to Rouero, did in the States name honourably ſalute and receiue him, and accompanied him ſo long as he remained on their territories, taking order that he ſhould want nothing in his iourney. They bringing him as farre as Portonouo, which is not farre from his owne confines, tooke leaue of him: He ſent three Ambaſſadors to Venice, to gratifie the Senate for the honor and courteous entertainment he had receiued in their Countrey, which hee tooke as a demonſtration of their loue towards him: From thence he departed home to his owne kingdome.

Now, although the Citie was peaceable, they did not for all that ceaſe to prouide things neceſſarie for warre. Harquebuſes were at that time much in vſe, an engin which footmen vſed in warre, deuiſed at firſt by the Almains. The State vnwilling to be without ſuch weapons, when need ſhould be, did by a decree of the Councell of Tenne, ſend for the experteſt workmen in that Arte, from all parts of Chriſtendome, and for the skilfulleſt gunners to inſtruct and teach their youth. And becauſe the Countrie people ſhould not be ignorant therein, it was decreed that in euery village vnder their iuriſdiction, two young men ſhould be choſen to practize this exercize, and for recompence, ſhould be freed from all ſubſidies and impoſitions: and that thoſe young men at a certaine day in the yeere ſhould meete at the next Caſtle or Citie to ſhoot at a marke, where his village that ſhould ſhoot beſt, was for one whole yeere freed from all taxe and tribute.

The inuention of Harquebuſes.

A decree for the exerciſe of youth

The enſuing winter was ſo ſharpe and cold by reaſon of ſnow which fell, as all the marſhes round about the Citie was frozen ouer, the Country people comming thither on horſebacke with prouiſion, and the Magiſtrate of Meſtre came in a wagon as farre as S. Secondo's in the middeſt of the lakes. And the horſemen for diſport armed themſelues, and ranne at Tilt vpon the great Chanell: ſo ſharpe and vehement was the froſt.

An extreeme froſt at Venice.

Not long after, Marco Barba Cardinall, and Patriarke of Aquileia died at Rome. Pope Innocent beſtowed the Patriarkſhippe on Hermolao Barbaro the Venetian Ambaſſador then at Rome. This being knowne at Venice, notwithſtanding that Hermolao was a man of great deſert, and had written to the Senate that the Pope had enforced him to forſake his order of Senator, and put on that of Patriarke, yet becauſe there was an expreſſe law, forbidding all Venetian Gentlemen, being Ambaſſadors at Rome, to receiue any Eccleſiaſticall benefice from the Pope, during the time of their Ambaſſage: the Senate tooke the audacious infringing of this law, in bad part. And though he were very rich, well allied, and had great friends, his father being one of the nobleſt men in the Citie, the onely loue and reuerence to law cauſed the Senate to write backe vnto him, that preſently without delay he ſhould redeliuer the Patriarkeſhip to the Pope, and for not ſo doing, they threatned to take from his Father the Procuratorſhip of S. Marke, and to confiſcate all his goods. His father not being able to moderate the ſentence giuen by the Councell of Tenne, fell ſicke with griefe, and within a while after died: The ſonne likewiſe, hauing publiſhed certaine excellent bookes of his owne compoſing, did before the yeeres end die of a Squinancie.

A law carefully obſerued by the Venetians.

Great iuſtice of the Venetians.

The ſame yeere Lorenzo de Medicis died at Florence, a man of a rare and excellent iudgement, gouerning his Countrie in Peace: He left three children liuing, who were afterwards expulſed the gouernment and baniſhed. The ſummer following Pope Innocent died, in whose stead by guifts and briberie, Alexander Borgia a Spaniard, borne in Valentia, was chosen. This Pope made a league offensiue and defensiue for fiue and twentie yeeres with the Venetians and Galeas Sforza Lord of Milan, who was at that time very young and ruled by Lodouico his vncle.

The death of Lorenzo de Medicis.

By this league they were tyed to defend and maintaine one anothers territories, and to destroy their enemies: And because Zemes, brother to Baiazeth the Turkish Emperour, liued at that time in Rome, there was an addition made in the treatie of the league, that if Baiazeth should make warre on the Venetians, the Pope should deliuer him vnto them that they by him might inuade his brother. This Zemes, being by his brother driuen forth of his kingdome, fled to Rhodes. The Rhodians vnwilling to draw warre to their owne Gates, sent him to the French King; he deliuered him to Pope Innocent who had earnestly craued him. Pope Alexander at his election found him at Rome, where hee was carefully guarded, least he should renew warre against his brother, in recompence whereof Baiazeth sent yeerely to Rome to the Pope 400. pounds of gold: Hercules de AEste Duke of Ferrara did afterwards enter into this league.

Charles the eight French king, sends an Ambassadour to Venice.

The Venetian State thus peaceable, Charles the eight French King sent a Gentleman to Venice, who being brought before the Senate, told them, That his King being resolued to come into Italy with a mightie Armie to conquere the kingdome of Naples, which by hereditarie right belonged to him, did desire therein to know the Venetians loue towards him, and to be satisfied whether they intended to keep and obserue the same league and friendship which of old had beene betwixt them. The Senate vpon this newes, which was likely to alter the State of Italy, assembled the great Councell, namely, to debate this businesse, being loth by their answere to prouoke the King against them.

The Venetians answere.

After sundry opinions, the Councell answered the Ambassador, that the Signorie had euer preferred peace before warre, and did now desire it more than euer, therefore they could wish, that his King liuing at peace, would suffer other Princes of Italy to doe the like: yet if hee came thither with an intent to make warre, they would in no sort stirre, nor quit his league and friendshippe.

This Gentleman with their answere left Venice and went to Rome. After him, two others in lesse than two moneths came to Venice one after another from the same King for the same businesse, who receiued the selfe same answere as the first. But Lodouico Sforza was the onely motiue that prouoked this King to the enterprize of Naples. He after the death of his brother Galeas Sforza Duke of Millan, tooke vpon him the gouernment of the State, and expulsed his widow, who would haue managed it in the behalfe of her sonne Iohn Galeas that was very young, when his father died. Then by little and little, he dismissed the ancient Officers, placing others in their roomes, and in this maner had commaunded the Dutchie aboue thirteene yeeres. And though in outward shew he seemed very carefull of his Nephew, yet in his young yeeres he had so carelesly brought him vp, as it seemed that his onely ayme was to make him incapable and vnfit for any honourable exercise, drawing him from all vertuous studies.

Alphonso, sonne to Ferdinand King of Naples, gaue his daughter Isabell in mariage to this young Iohn Galeas: yet though he were maried and had children by his wife, his vncle neuertheless still gouerned the State, meaning to leaue it to his owne children. Ferdinand and Alphonso taking his vsurpation (for it was no better) in bad part, moued by the continuall & lamentable letters of their daughter, did louingly entreat Lodouick (according to equitie and reason) to surrender the gouernment of the State of Milan to his nephew, sonne to his brother, vnto whom it belonged, who was of yeeres to gouerne, maried, and had two children. They hauing often vsed these intreaties proceeded to sharpe and bitter termes, telling him, That they had made alliance with the Duke of Milan, who was his Nephew, whose State hee vsurped, and therefore he should doe well to detaine it no longer.

Lodouico

Lodouico fearing their power and threatning, and hauing intelligence that the French Kngs laid claime to the kingdome of Naples, ſent an honourable Ambaſſade into France, vnder colour to ſalute king Charles, not acquainting Pope Alexander or the Venetians with it, with whom he was in league, and commanded his Ambaſſador, ſecretly to motion the matter, and to aſſure the king, that if he would attempt the recouerie of that Realme, he would aſſiſt him with all his forces and meanes; and that the conqueſt would be eaſie, ſo that he would onely paſſe the Alpes, and ſhew himſelfe in Italy. This aduertiſement comming from ſuch a perſon, did greatly preuaile with the king to cauſe him to vndertake this iourney, being beſides incited thereunto from another place. Antonio Prince of Salern maligned by Ferdinand, and by that meanes enforced to forſake his countrey Italy, had retired himſelfe into France. He in all his diſcourſes with the king, ſpake of no other matter, telling him, That he ſhould doe ill to let ſlip ſo faire an occaſion, offered for the recouerie of his owne right: aſſuring him beſides, that Ferdinand was generally hated for his auarice, crueltie, and treacherie; and therefore it would be an eaſie matter to diſpoſſeſſe him, eſpecially for a king of France, whoſe authoritie and credit in thoſe countries was verie great. Beſides all this, Pope Alexander was no friend to Ferdinand in regard of Virginio Vrſino that ſerued him, whoſe open enemie the Pope had declared himſelfe in regard of the towne of Anguilare.

Lodouico Sforza ſends Ambaſſadors into France to king Charles.

Antonio Prince of Salern incites king Charles to this iourney.

All theſe reaſons were approued by the Lords of France that were in fauour with the king, who deſired nothing more than this iourney. For ſome of them hoped by the Popes meanes to obtaine Eccleſiaſticall dignities, others expected ſome honourable command in the Armie, and to be gouernours of Cities and Townes which the king ſhould conquer, and ſome likewiſe were poſſeſt with a deſire of noueltie.

What moued the French Lords to perſwade the king to this iourney.

King Charles lending a willing eare to this Ambaſſade, and taſting the Prince of Salernes propoſition, a rumour was preſently ſpred, That the French were comming into Italy, to inuade the Realme of Naples. Vpon theſe newes king Ferdinand began to arme by ſea and land, and to inuent meanes to draw Pope Alexander to his ſide. Lodouico foreſeeing, that if they leagued themſelues together, Ferdinand might ioyne his Armie with that of the Pope, and ſend them both into Lombardie, before the kings arriuall, and by the ſame meanes expulſe him from Milan, intreated the Venetians to ſend their horſe and foot troupes to the riuer Oglio in the Breſſian territorie, to diuert king Ferdinand from his deſigne, or elſe to let them croſſe the riuer to defend his State. The Venetians anſwered, that it was needleſſe: for his countrey was out of danger.

Lodouicos feare.

Lodouico perceiuing the French delaies, and fearing that it might breed his ruine, did againe ſend Ambaſſadors to Charles to haſten his iourney, promiſing to aſſiſt him with men and money, and victuals, ſo ſoone as he ſhould ſet foote in Italy. King Charles who had ſpent certaine moneths in the onely conſultation of this buſineſſe, and had not as yet made any certaine reſolution, when this ſecond Ambaſſade arriued, did by theſe continuate purſuites and offers of Lodouico, preſently reſolue vpon it.

He ſends another Ambaſſade into France.

Now becauſe he would not in any ſort be hindred in his conqueſt, he renewed the ancient league with the kings of Caſtill, and ſurrendred to them the countie of Roſſillon, engaged to king Lewis his father for three thouſand crownes by Iohn king of Arragon, father to Ferdinand, on condition that the ſaid kings ſhould in no ſort aide the Arragonois againſt him in his conqueſt of the Realme of Naples. This league ſworne to, the king made all things readie for his iourney. Ferdinand had intelligence heereof one day as he came from hunting, whereupon he fell ſicke, and within two daies after, died of an Apoplexie. Alphonſo his eldeſt ſonne was by his younger brother and all the Princes of the Realme ſaluted king. He intreated the Venetians by their Ambaſſador reſident in his Court to perſwade Lodouico to deſiſt from ſoliciting the French king to come into Italy, and that hee would not be a meanes

The death of Ferdinand king of Naples.

Alphonſos requeſt to the Venetians.

meanes of his ruine, promiſing no more to taxe his vſurpation of the State of Milan, which he ſhould enioy ſo long as he pleaſed. The Senate by letters acquainted Lodouico with Alphonſos requeſt, and intreated him not to draw the French into Italy: But perceiuing that he made no direct anſwere they gaue ouer and ſolicited him no more.

The Senate write to Lodouico in Alphonſos behalfe.

Philip de Comines, Ambaſſador for king Charles at Venice.

King Charles hauing reſolued vpon the enterprize, ſent Philip de Comines Lord of Argenton his Ambaſſador to Venice, who in his kings name made a propoſition to the Senate, That if they would ioyne with him in this warre of Naples, they ſhould haue a great ſhare in the kingdome, and if they would not accept that offer, to intreat them at leaſt to perſeuer in their ancient league and friendſhip with the king his Maſter: heereunto he added that his king had commanded him to remaine at Venice to acquaint them with all his deſignes and enterpriſes. The Senate replied, That the king was ſo potent and ſo well furniſhed with all warlike neceſſaries that he needed not their aide in that warre, and therefore they determined, according to the example of their Anceſtors, not to ſtirre, who neuer made warre but vpon conſtraint, and that they would craue no part in a kingdome whereunto they had no right. For the reſt, they would neuer goe from that which they had promiſed to the kings Ambaſsador; that they would euer make great account of his leage and friendſhip; that they had willingly heard him for his kings ſake, and would ſtill do ſo if he remained among them; that he might at his pleaſure familiarly diſcourſe with them about any matter that concerned his king, as well in regard of their loue towards his father king Lewis, as to himſelfe.

The Venetians anſwere to Philip de Comines.

League betwixt Pope Alexander and Alphonſo king of Naples.

In the meane time Pope Alexander (who repented that he had incited the French king to this warre) and king Alphonſo by the mediation of Virginio Vrſin, comming to Viconare, a Caſtle of his owne, to ſee one another, and to diſcourſe together of their affaires, made a league on this condition: That the Pope ſhould take Alphonſo into the protection of the Romane Church, and with all his power defend him againſt his enemies: and in counterchange, Alphonſo promiſed to pay him downe in readie money a thouſand pounds of gold for the arrerages of the tribute due to the Church of Rome for the Realme of Naples, and to pay him yearely afterwards, foure hundred pounds of gold. And for greater aſſurance of this treatie, Alphonſo promiſed to giue one of his daughters in marriage to Guifredo ſonne to Pope Alexander. This thus concluded, both of them made preparations for warre.

Alphonſo had alreadie armed thirtie Gallies, and eighteene great veſſels to ſcoure along the Riuer of Genoa, and to annoy the enemies fleet which was making readie in the Cities; and he was to make a leauie of horſe and foot in Calabria to ſend them into Lombardie, when newes came that Baiazeth the Turkiſh Emperour made new preparations, whereupon the State of Venice determined likewiſe to arme. Antonio Grimani made Generall of the Gallies, Commanded all Gallies that were readie to be lanched, and with them ſailed into Sclauonia, where commiſſioners from Scardona and Cliſſa came to him, who receiued their oath of alleageance for the Venetian Signorie: from thence he went to Corfou.

The Venetians fleet in Sclauonia.

Alphonſos fleete, whereof his brother Fredericke was Generall, entring the Riuer of Genoa, came to Portouenere, where Obieto de Fieſca, a man highly eſteemed among his countrey men, landed with certaine ſouldiers, but being repulſed by the enemie, he returned to his Gallies, and preſently made towards Liuorne, and from thence held his courſe to Naples. Alphonſo hauing loſt all hope by Sea, ſent his Armie vnited with the Popes, into Romagnia, hauing intelligence that part of the enemies forces had alreadie croſſed the Po.

Ferdinand, ſonne to Alphonſo, a young Prince of great hope, aſſiſted by Nicolao Vrſin, Count Petillan, Virginio Vrſin, and Iohn Iames Triuulce the Milaneſe, commaunded the Arragonoiſe armie, conſiſting of two thouſand fiue hundred horſe, and eight thouſand foote.

Whileſt the Venetian fleete was at ſea, Ambaſſadours from Florence came to Venice,

Venice, to craue the Senates aduiſe how they ſhould anſwere king Charles, who had intreated them to giue his armie paſſage through their territories, and alſo how they ſhould behaue themſelues in thoſe occurrents; for they referred themſelues wholy to them, and determined directly to follow their Councell. The Senate knowing very well, that whatſoeuer they ſhould ſay to the Florentines, would be reported to king Charles and Alphonſo, anſwered; That in ſo difficult a buſineſſe, ſubiect to ſundry accidents, they knew not what was beſt to be done; and though they loued the one better than the other, yet they durſt not deliuer their opinion, becauſe that Fortune is commonly Miſtreſſe in warre, and that it vſually comes to paſſe, that matters done by chance and aduenture, did oftentimes proſper better than thoſe which are premeditated, and debated with long conſultation: and therefore they ought to craue councell of none but Almightie God, who onely knew what was beſt for men to embrace or auoide: and with this anſwere diſmiſſed them.

The Florentines craue councell of the Venetians.

The Senates anſwere.

Now the forces which king Charles and Lodouico had ſent before, beeing come neere the enemies, neither the one or other durſt come to ſtroakes, but marched cloſe together, being ſtill protected by ſome fort or riuer, which was euer betwixt them: yet they made ſundrie light skirmiſhes to ſhew their valour. King Charles had ſent the Duke of Orleans, Iulian the Cardinall nephew to Pope Sixtus, and Antonio Prince of Salerne (of whom we haue heretofore ſpoken) to Genoa, with braue troupes of foote, to man the Gallies which were ready rigd, with them to open a paſſage by Sea into the Realme of Naples, whileſt himſelfe did the like by Land.

The end of the third Booke of the fourth Decad.

THE FOVRTH BOOKE OF THE FOVRTH DECAD

Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the fourth Booke of the fourth Decad.

KING CHARLES departs from Vienna in Daulphine towards Italy. The King by reaſon of his ſickneſſe taries at Aſt. The death of IOHN GALEAS Duke of Milan, whereupon LODOVICO his vncle vſurps the Title and Armes of Duke of Milan. The French take Fiuizana and ſacke it. PIETRO DE MEDICIS grants all King CHARLES demaunds, and for his labour is driuen from Florence, and declared an enemie to the Common wealth. The King reſtoreth the PISANS libertie. The French take Bertinora. King GHARLES his victorious entry into Florence. The King makes an accord with Pope ALEXANDER, and kiſſeth his feet and cheeke. ALPHONSO in loue to his ſonne FERDINAND depoſeth himſelfe from the Kingdome of Naples. FERDINAND retires into the Iſle of Iſchia. King CHARLES entreth Naples, and takes the Cities two Caſtles. A league made at Venice againſt the French betwixt the Pope, Emperour, King of Spaine, Venetians, and Duke of Milan. King CHARLES is crowned in Naples, and departs from thence to returne into France. The preparation of the League to ſtoppe King CHARLES his paſſage. The Duke of Orleance his incurſions on the Leagues territories: he takes Nouara. The battell of Fornouo betwixt King CHARLES and the Confederates. And laſtly, King CHALES his arriuall at Aſt.

SOONE after the departure of the Duke of Orleance and his troopes towards Genoa, King Charles leauing Vienna in Daulphine on the 23. of Auguſt 1493. iourneyed toward Aſt by the mount Genua. Galeas of S. Seuerine met him at Suza, and accompanied him to Aſt: whither Lodouico Sforza came preſently to him, with his wife and many faire and gallant Ladies of the Dutchy of Milan. Hercules Duke of Ferrara came thither likewiſe, where after conſultation of ſundry affaires, it was concluded that the Armie ſhould preſently march. Lodouico in the mean time retired to Num, a Caſtle on the Milanois a mile from Aſt, whither thoſe of the Councell went often to ſee him, whileſt the King tarried at Aſt ſicke of the ſmall pocks, whereupon his Army was quartered in that towne and in other places neere adioyning: the number of it, beſide the 200. Gentlemen of the Kings guard (accounting the Suiſſes that were gone before with the Bayly of Dijon to Genoa, and thoſe troopes in Romagnia vnder the commaund of Aubigni) amounted to King Charles departs toward Italy.

The King by reaſon of his ſickneſſe ſtayed at Aſt.

The number of the Kings Army.

to 1600. men at Armes, 6000. Suiſſe, and 6000. French foot-men: And for the vſe of this Armie they had brought by ſea to Genoa great ſtore of Ordnance both for batterie and the field, with munition, in ſuch abundance, as the like before was neuer ſeene in Italy.

The King, during his aboad at Aſt, had ſent for the Duke of Orleans from Genoa, willing him to attend him there. This towne belonged vnto him by his grandmother, vnto whom it was giuen in dowry by the Duke of Milan her father. Now ſo ſoone as king Charles had recouered his health, hee ſent his Armie into the field, and himſelfe went to Pauia, where being lodged in the Caſtle he went to viſite Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan, his coſin german, (the king and hee were ſons to two ſiſters, daughters to Lewis the ſecond Duke of Sauoy) who lay daungerouſly ſicke in the ſame Caſtle. His talke to him was generall, by reaſon of Lodouico's preſence: he told him that he was extreamely grieued for his ſickneſſe, comforted him, and willed him to be of good cheere, and to vſe all meanes for the recouerie of his health: But the hope thereof being ſmall, the King and as many as beheld him did lament his eſtate, and perceiued that this young Prince, through his vncles treacherie, would not liue long.

The King viſits Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan.

This compaſſion was augmented by the preſence of Princeſſe Iſabell his wife, who languiſhing aſwell for her huſbands ſickneſſe, feare of her young ſonne, as for the daunger whereunto her father and kinsfolke were expoſed, fell downe at the kings feet, recommending vnto him with floods of teares the perſeruation of her father, and familie of Arragon, and though her youth and beautie moued the king to pitie her, yet ſo great an enterprize could not be delayed vpon ſo weake a ground, whereupon he told her, that warre being now begunne, he was enforced to purſue and continue it.

The Dutcheſſe in teares fals down at the Kings feete.

His anſwere to the Dutcheſſe.

From Pauia the king went to Placentia, where, whileſt hee remained, he receiued newes of Iohn Galeas death; whereupon, Lodouico who had followed him, returned in poſt to Milan, where the chiefe of the Dukes Councell, ſuborned by him, prouided in open Councell, that in regard of the States greatneſſe and miſerie of the times, it would be a dangerous matter, to haue Franciſco, ſonne to the late Duke Galeas, who was but fiue yeeres old, to ſucceed his father: but that it behooued them to haue a Duke that was a man of wiſdome and authoritie: and therefore they ought to diſpence with Law, and for the generall good, enforce Lodouico to accept the Ducall dignitie. Vnder this colour, honour giuing way to ambition, he did the next morning (though he ſeemed to bee vnwilling) take vpon him the Title and Armes of Duke of Milan, hauing firſt ſolemnly proteſted that he receiued the Dutchie as belonging vnto him by the inueſtiture of the king of Romans.

The death of John Galeas Duke of Milan.

Lodouico vſurps the title and Armes of Duke of Milan.

The King remaining certaine daies at Placentia, was in a manner willing to returne home into France, as well for want of money, as alſo becauſe no Italian Potentate ſhewed himſelfe on his partie, and beſides, becauſe this new Duke returned no more, thought at his departure he promiſed to come backe againe. Yet at laſt he determined to paſſe on.

The ſame day that the King went from Placentia Lorenzo and Giouan de Medicis ſtole ſecretly from their Countrey houſes whither the Florentine Magiſtrate had confined them at the purſute of Pietro de Medicis their kinſman and mortall enemy. They came to his Maieſtie, & earneſtly entreated him to come neere Florence, and told him that he ſhould be honourably entertained there, as well in regard of the peoples loue to the houſe of France, as for their hatred towards Pietro de Medicis, who commaunded there, and held the Arragonois partie, being by marriage allied to the familie of Vrſini.

Lorenzo and Giouan de Medicis perſwade the French King to go to Florence.

Vpon this propoſition the King changed his purpoſe, for though at his departure from France, it was concluded in his Councell, that hee ſhould rather paſſe through Romagnia and La Marca, than through Tuſcanie and the territorie of Rome; yet, the Pope and Florentines being declared his enemies, his Councell thought thought it a matter vnworthy the greatneſſe of ſuch a King, if for feare of them he ſhould refuſe to paſſe through their territories: As alſo becauſe it was dangerous to inuade the Realme of Naples, and to leaue Tuſcany and the Churches State behinde him as enemies. Therefore it was reſolued, rather to paſſe the Appenines by the hills of Parma, then by the direct way of Bolognia, and to march without delay to Florence.

The firſt reſolution changed.

The vantgard conducted by Guilbert of Burbon, Duke of Monipenſier, a Prince of the bloud, went on to Pontrema, a towne ſeated at the foot of the Appennine vpon the Riuer Magra, the King following with the reſt of the army. The Kings vantgard at Pontrema.

From Pontrema the Duke went into the country of Lunigiana, where hee ioyned with the Swiſſes, who had defended Genoa, together with the ordnance which by ſea was come to Speçia, and drawing neere to Fiuizana belonging to the Florentines, which they tooke it by force and ſack't it, killing all the ſouldiers, and many of the inhabitants, the which did merueilouſly amaze all Italy not accuſtomed to ſuch cruell and bloudy warres. Finizana taken and ſackt by the French.

Serezzana was not farre from thence, where the Florentines determined for to make their chiefe reſiſtance, which they had ſtrongly fortified, but not ſufficiently to hold out ſo mighty an enemy, for it wanted a captaine to command it, and men to defend it. Yet becauſe ſome thought it would not bee eaſily taken, eſpecially the Cittadell, and leaſt of all, Serezanella, a ſtrong Caſtle on the hill aboue Serezzana, they councelled the King to paſſe on and leaue them, but the King diſdayned ſo to doe, and thought that vnleſſe hee tooke the firſt towne that made reſiſtance, it would much blemiſh his reputation, and that they would take example to do the like. Serezzana and Serezanella two ſtrong places.

The Florentines hauing intelligence that the King reſolued for to come to Florence, and that his army had already paſſed the Appenine, and then the cruelty which was vſed at the taking of Fiuizana, did publikely deteſt the raſhneſſe of Pietro de Medicis, who of himſelfe, without any neceſſity had ſo inconſiderately drawne vpon them the army of ſo potent a King, aſſiſted by the Duke of Milan, and this rumour had like to haue raiſed a great tumult in the Citty. The Florentines in alarme.

Pietro terrified herewith, and with the daunger which hee had before raſhly contemned, and perceiuing the aide promiſed by the Pope and Alphonſo to be but a dreame, precipitately reſolued, to goe ſeeke that ſafety amongſt his enemies, which hee could not hope for with his friends. And thereupon, leauing Florence, and not farre on his way from the city, hee heard ſay, that the troupes of horſe and foot ſent by the Florentines to enter Serezzana were defeated by the French, and all of them either ſlaine or taken. This cauſed him to tarry at Pietra-Sancta for a paſſe-port from the King, whether the Biſhop of Saint Malos, and other Lords of the Court went to him to ſafe conduct him to the campe, comming thither the ſame day that the King, with the reſt of his forces, ioyned with his vantgard, which beeing encamped before Serezanella, battered it with the ordnance. Preſenting himſelfe before the King hee was entertained with more ceremony then loue; and perceiuing that the King did not much affect him, by reaſon of his enemies reports, hee reſolued by all meanes to appeaſe and ſatisfie him. The reſolution of Pietro de Medicis.

The next day beeing brought before him, he granted all the kings demands, which were exceſſiue: viz. that the forts and caſtles of Pietra-Sancta, Serezzana and Serezanella, which were the keyes of the Florentine State, and the forts of Piſa, and of the hauen of Liporne ſhould be deliuered to the king, who by a promiſe ſigned with his owne hand, obliged himſelfe to ſurrender them ſo ſoone as he ſhould haue conquered the Realme of Naples: That Pietro ſhould cauſe the Florentines to lend the king 200000 Ducats, and that then hee ſhould receiue them into his protection. The Articles of agreement.

The consignation of the strong places was presently made: for the money, they wrote to Florence. Pietro de Medicis did hereby much assure the State of Tuscany to the King, and remooued all impediments from him on Romagnias side. The Florentines aduertized of these Articles which Pietro de Medicis had agreed to, the whole city was highly discontented with this reprochfull and dangerous wound giuen to their Commonwealth.

Pietro hauing notice of this rumor; the better to prouide for his affaires before any greater troubles did arise, tooke leaue of the King, vnder collour of going to accomplish that which hee had promised. But at his returne to Florence, hee found most of the Magistrates banded against him, and the mindes of his deerest friends greatly troubled, and the next day as hee would haue entred into the councell chamber he was put back.

Pietro de Medicis flies from Florence.

Hee returned home to his owne house, destitute of courage and councell, and presently left Florence, beeing followed by the Cardinals Iohn and Iulian his bretheren, who after their departure were declared enemies to the Commonwealth, their houses ransacked which were very ritch in moouables, and their goods confiscate. Two of them, the eldest and the younger went to Venice, the second which was Cardinall Iohn staied for a time at Bolognia, and then retired himselfe to some of his kinsfolke.

The Medici are declared enemies to their country.

The King went from Serezzana to Luca, and from thence to Pisa, where the cittizens both men and women falling at his feete, beganne to crie out liberty, liberty, infinitely complayning of the wrongs and iniuries done to them daily by the Florentines: The King at the perswasion of some of his Lords, not considering the importancy of the matter, did freely grant their request, wherevpon, the people presently armed themselues, and throwing downe the Florentines armes, that were set vp in the publike places, recouered their so much desired liberty, repealing all those whom the Florentine Magistrates had bannished.

The King giues liberty to the Pisans.

In this confusion of all things the King departed from Pisa, hauing first deliuered the Cittadell to the Pisans, keeping the new one of greater importance, for himselfe, and then went towards Florence. Beeing come to Signa, seuen miles from the city, hee staied there till the Florentines popular tumult were in some sort appeased, who had not yet laied downe armes, taken that day when Pietro de Medicis was expulsed; and also to giue Aubigni time to come and meet him, whom he had sent for.

Aubigni was in Romagnia where hee had remained euer since his comming into Italy, making head against Ferdinand Duke of Calabria Alphonsos sonne, where after sundry retreates on both sides, beeing re-enforced by the arriuall of certaine companies left behinde him, two hundred Launces, and one thousand Swisses, which the King had sent so soone as hee came to Ast, hee remained Master of the field and enforced Ferdinand to retire into the Cerca of Faenza, which is a place betwixt the walles of that Citty, and a great trench some mile behind it, inuironing them both, which doth make it strong. Aubigni then returned into the Country of Imola, where hee tooke certaine strong townes, filling all Romagnia with feare and amazement: so that hauing taken Faenza, after the enemies departure, hee marched directly to Bertinora to passe the Appenine to ioyne with the Kings army: But Bertinora refusing to giue him passage, hee assailed and tooke it by force, and in despite, sack't it.

Aubigni wit's his troupes makes head against Ferdinand.

Bertinora taken.

Ferdinand perceiuing that hee could not by any meanes stoppe the French mens passage, and thinking it dangerous to remaine betwixt Imola and Furli, retired neere vnto the walles of Cesenna, and from thence went to Rome. The Venetians hauing intelligence that King Charles had crossed the Po with a mighty mighty army, the more to honor him, reſolued to ſend him Ambaſſadors, whom they commanded to tarry ſtill with him, and in the meane time armed at all aduentures. The Ambaſſadors were Dominico Treuiſan, and Antonio Loredano, who finding the king at Florence, accompanied him whereſoeuer he went.

The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the King.

Now after ſundry commings too and fro, the king with his army marched towards Florence. There was great magnificence, vſed both by the Courtiers and Citizens: The king entred the city like a conqueror, himſelfe and horſe armed at all points, with his Launce on his thigh. They beganne forthwith to treat of agreement, but not without great difficulties, the which at laſt ended by the valour of Pietro Caponi, one of the foure Commiſſioners appointed to treat with the king, they accorded, and the contract lawfully paſt, it was with great ceremony publiſhed in the Cathedrall Church at diuine ſeruice, where the king in perſon, and the cities Magiſtrates, promiſed by ſollemne oth vpon the high Altar, in preſence of the Court and people of Florence, to obſerue the contents thereof.

Accord ſworne betwixt the King and Florentines.

Two daies after, the King departed from Florence, hauing tarried there tenne daies, and went to Sienna, where making ſhort ſtay, hee left a Garriſon, becauſe hee ſuſpected it to be at the Empires deuotion. Then he iourneyed towards Rome, where not long before Pope Alexander had giuen entrance to Virginio Vrſini, and Count Petillan, captaines to King Alphonſo and his ſonne Ferdinand. So as it ſeemed he ment to haue anticipated the enemies, to fortifie the city, and to repulſe them from it: But doubting King Charles intention, and fearing his forces, he had a wonderfull conflict in his minde. For now hee determined to defend Rome, and to that end ſuffered Ferdinand and his captaines whom he had introduced into the city, to fortifie the weake places; then ſuppoſing that hee ſhould not bee able to defend it, hee determined to leaue Rome; and thus floating betwixt hope and feare, the French in the meane time ſpoiled all the country on the hither ſide Tiber, taking now one towne, then an other, no place beeing ſtrong enough to hold them out, ſo that after diuers parlies, hee reſolued, as it were by force, to grant all King Charles his demands, and to receiue him into Rome, from whence he cauſed Ferdinand and his army to depart, who went to Tiuoli, and from thence into the Realme of Naples, and whileſt he went forth at Saint Sebaſtians Gate, the French King armed at all points, with his launce on thigh, entred with his army at the gate of Sancta Maria del Popolo.

Ferdinand goes fourth of Rome at one gate, and the French King enters at an other.

The Pope many times determined to flie, but at laſt retired into Caſtle Saint Angelo, well prouided of ordnance, munition and victuals. When the King and his army were entred, an accord was propounded by meanes of Cardinall Aſcanio, on very rough conditions, which neuertheleſſe were effected to the Kings content, who thereby made a league with the, Pope ſaluted him, then kiſſed his feet in open Conſiſtory, and afterwards his cheeke: and at an other time was preſent when the Pope ſaid maſſe, and ſate downe next beneath the firſt Cardinall Biſhop, and according to the ancient cuſtome, when the Pope celebrated maſſe, ſerued him with water to waſh his hands. This done, the Pope made the Biſhop of Saint Malo, and the Biſhop of Mans, deſcended from the houſe of Luxembourg, Cardinals.

Accord betwixt the Pope and French King.

Whileſt the King remained at Rome, which was ſome month or thereabout, Alphonſo deſpayring of his owne good fortune, ſent for his ſonne Ferdinand to Naples, and in preſence of his brother Frederick renounced, and made ouer vnto him his Kingly title and Authority: hee did this peraduenture for to leſſen his ſubiects loue towards the French, becauſe this young Prince was of great hope, had neuer offended any of his ſubiects, and was gracious with the people.

Alphonſo in loue to his ſon Ferdinand depoſeth himſelf.

Alphonſo after this voluntary demiſſion, hauing giuen his ſonne a large inſtruction to recommend himſelfe to God, departed from Naples with foure light Gallies, laden with treaſure and ritch ſtuffe, and fled into a towne in Sicily called Mazare, where before the yeere was expired he died.

Ferdinand after his fathers departure, rode in royall habit vp and downe the city, attended by his vncle Frederick and other great Lords of the Kingdome, ſetting open priſons, pardoning all offenders, promiſing to repeale thoſe that had beene baniſhed. Then muſtering his army, hee gaue great guifts to his ſouldiers, and placed new Garriſons in his townes.

The King comes to Velitra

Cardinall Borgia flies from the King by night.

King Charles at the very inſtant of his departure from Rome receiued intelligence of Alphonſos flight, hee went to Velitra, and with him Cæſar Borgia Cardinall, the Popes ſonne, as Legat Apoſtolicall, or rather pawne of his fathers promiſes. This Cardinall fled away ſecretly in the night, and to take away all ſuſpition that he did it not by his fathers conſent, went not to Rome but to Spoleta. And at the ſame time thoſe whom the King ſent to the caſtles of Hoſtia, Ciuita uecchia, and Terracina, to receiue them according to the accord made with the Pope, that they might keepe them ſo long as he remained in Italy, were repulſed by the Popes ſouldiers. For the fort of Hoſtia which Fabricio Colonna held, was recouered by Count Petillan, and re-deliuered to the Pope.

Mont-fortino taken by the Kings army.

From Velitra, the vantgard marched to Monte-fortino, a very ſtrong towne, ſeated in the Churches territories, and ſubiect to Iacomo de Contis a Roman Gentleman, who held for the Arragonois, which being battered by the cannon was in ſhort ſpace taken by the French, notwithſtanding the ſtrength thereof. Ferentino, and Monte Sancto Gionanni, ſeated on the Kingdomes confines, had the like fortune, where after breach made, ſo furious an aſſault was giuen to it in the Kings preſence, who was come thither from Verula, as all difficulties ſurmounted, it was taken the ſame day by force, and great ſlaughter committed there.

From thence the King ſent one of his Gentlemen to the Pope, threatning him that if he did not performe the accord which hee had ſworne to, hee would come backe and make warre vpon him. The Pope vpon receit of the Kings letters preſently commanded thoſe places to be deliuered to the Kings officers.

Ferdinand encampeth at Saint Germains.

In this manner, and without great reſiſtance, did King Charles conquer that noble and magnificent Kingdome, when Ferdinand, by his fathers flight, taking vpon him the title and authority royall, aſſembled his forces, and marched to Saint Germans, where he encamped, thinking to keepe the enemies from paſſing on any farther, by reaſon of the fitneſſe of the place, enuironed on the one ſide with high and ſteepy mountaines, and on the other with a fenny country, and in front with the Riuer Garillan, whereupon, that place is properly called one of the keyes of the kingdome of Naples. But his army, already terrified with the only name of the French, no more ſhewed any ſignes of valour, but all his ſouldiers wauering, in a manner, as much in loyalty as courage, and thinking how to ſaue themſelues and goods, diſpayring of being able to defend the kingdome, ſo ſoone as they had intelligence of the taking of Mont Saint Giouanni, and that three hundred Lances, and two thouſand foot approched, did baſely abandon Saint Germans, and in ſuch amazement retired to Capua, as by the way they left eight great peeces of ordnance behind them.

Baſe retreat of Ferdinands army.

Ferdinand and his army were ſcarce come to Capua, when he receiued newes from the Queene, that ſince the loſſe of Saint Germans, the Neapolitans were riſen, and that vnleſſe he ſpeedily came thither, ſome great tumult was likely to enſue vpon theſe newes, hee preſently went thither with certaine troupes of horſe, by his preſence to preuent ſo great a daunger, promiſing for to returne to Capua the next day following. The Neapolitans would not ſuffer him for to enter with his troupes, but onely gaue entrance to himſelfe and family; where vnderſtanding their reſolution, which was, not to endure a Ferdinand is denied entrance into Naples but with his owne family.

ſeege,

ſeege, for feare leaſt their city ſhould be ſackt, cauſed two of the three greater ſhips in the hauen to bee buried; and gaue the third to Obietto de Fieſca, beſtowing three hundred braue horſe that hee had in his Stables vpon certaine citizens his friends and ſeruants: and hauing victualled the new caſtle and that called Del Ouo, he returned according to his promiſe to prouide for Capua.

But in his abſence the city of Capua, thinking hee had forſaken it, Triulcio the cities Gouernor being gonne to treat with the French King, his owne ſouldiers, breaking open his houſe and ranſaking it, Virginio Vrſin and Count Petillan beeing likewiſe gonne, his whole army in a manner broken, hee was enforced to giue place to the Conqueror. Ferdinand beeing come within two miles of Capua was aduertized of what had paſt, by certaine Lords ſent to tell him that he ſhould come on no farther: whereupon notwithſtanding his intreaties, hee was enforced to returne to Naples, where hauing made ſome bootleſſe ſpeech to the Nobillity, vnto whom the name of his grandfather and father were odious, he withdrew himſelfe into the new caſtle, from whence within a while after hee departed, and embarking himſelfe in the Gallies, which attended him in the hauen, with Frederick his vncle, and the old Queene and her daughter Ioane, ſailed into the Iſle of Iſchia, thirty miles from Naples, where hee was enforced to make triall of his vertue and patience.

Capua yeelded to the French.

Ferdinand flies from Naples.

After his departure from Naples, all places yeelded to the victors fame, ſo as two hundred French horſe comming to Nola, did without any reſiſtance take Virginio Vrſin, and Count Petillan priſoners, who were come thither with foure hundred horſe, they were carried to the fort of Montdragon. King Charles hauing intelligence of Ferdinands flight, drew neere Naples, and came to the city of Auerſa, betwixt Capua and Naples, where the Neapolitan Ambaſſadors met him, and preſented him with their cities keyes, vnto whom hee hauing freely granted ſundry priuiledges and exemptions, the day following hee entred Naples, where with incredible ioy and contentment hee was receiued by the Nobility and people. Hee had ſent his captaines before to reſtraine the inſolency of his ſouldiers: Hee was accompanied to the Cathedrall Church by multitudes of people, and from thence (becauſe Caſtelnouo held ſtill for the enemies) he went to lodge in the Capuan caſtle, which was the antient abode of the Kings of Naples, hauing with an incredible courſe of happy fortune vanquiſhed before he was ſeene.

Virginio Vrſin and Count Petillan taken by the French.

King Charles receiued into Naples.

The King, peaceable poſſeſſor of the city (though not of the caſtles) did by letters, and by their owne Ambaſſadors gratifie the Signory of Venice for that it had kept promiſe with him and continued his friend. The report of King Charles his arriuall and ſucceſſe in the Realme of Naples, was bruted ſo farre, as the very Turke feared him; becauſe that the king had publikely vanted, that after the conqueſt of the kingdome of Naples, hee would turne his forces vpon him, ſo as all the inhabitants on the ſea frontiers of Sclauonia, Albania, and Macedonia, preſently forſooke their dwellings, and retired into the firme land, ſo as if the king had croſſed ouer thither, hee might eaſily haue conquered thoſe Prouinces. And to ſpeake truth, ſo ſoone as Bajazeth vnderſtood that hee was come to Florence, he beganne to trim his old veſſels and to build new.

King Charles writes to the Venetians.

About the ſame time, threeſcore ſhips of warre, wherein were ſixe thouſand foote, and three hundred horſe, arriued at Liuorne, ſent by the kings of Spaine for the gard of Sicily, with Lorenzo Suares, deputed by their Maieſties, for Ambaſſador to the Venetian Senate.

A Nauall army comes from Spaine to Liuorne.

Hee told the Senate, that the cauſe of his arriuall with thoſe forces, was the king his Maſters feare, leaſt after the conqueſt of the Realme of Naples, king Charles would make an attempt vpon Sicily, which in former time had belonged vnto the French kings: That their Maieſties knowing the pride and great power of the French, did ſuppoſe that the Venetians,

The Spaniſh Ambaſſadors ſpeech to the Venetians.

„ mooued with the neereneſſe of the danger to ſee ſo mighty a King in Italy, „ would be poſſeſt with the like feare; and therefore had commanded him in their „ names to ſalute the Prince and Senate, and to aſſure them that if they deſired „ ought of them, they were ready to beare a part in their fortune: for in regard of „ their wiſdome and loyalty there was no Prince or King whatſoeuer with whom „ they more deſired to enter into league then with them: That Pope Alexander „ likewiſe would make one, who deſired nothing more then to bee vnited with „ Spaine and Venice; and if any thing ſhould happen otherwiſe then well, their „ forces thus ioyned together, they might eaſily preuent it.'

This ſpeech of Suares did highly content the Senate, who being already iealous of King Charls his greatneſſe and good fortune, began to looke about them, and to feare other matters not yet thought of. Lodouicos diſtruſt likewiſe of King Charles, as well for that Iohn Iames Triuulce, whom he had driuen forth of Milan, receiued the Kings pay, as becauſe he had commanded the Duke of Orleance to attend him at Aſt: for Lodouico complained thereof to the Venetian Ambaſſador, and told him, that he would gladly leaue the French parts, and make a league with the Venetians. Beſide all this, Maximillians Ambaſſadors (whoſe father the Emperor Frederick died that yeere) did not ceaſe to ſolicit the Senate to league it ſelfe with them againſt the French.

The two Caſtles of Naples yeelded to King Charles.

In the meane time, Caſtelnouo and that Del-Ouo two Cittadels in Naples, which yet held for Ferdinand yeelded to the French. For Caſtelnouo, the abode of Kings, ſeated on the ſhoare, was after ſome ſmall defence yeelded to King Charles, by the cowardize and baſeneſſe of fiue hundred Lanſequenets that lay there in Garriſon. And the caſtle Del Ouo built vpon a Rock in the ſea, beeing continually battered with Ordnance, was content to yeeld, if it were not releeued within eight daies. The fort likewiſe of Gayetta, notwithſtanding that it was prouided of all neceſſaries did after ſome ſleight aſſaults, yeeld: ſo as in a very ſhort ſpace, the whole kingdome, in a manner, was with great facility reduced vnder the Kings obedience, the Iſle of Iſchia excepted, and certaine townes in Puglia and Calabria which ſtill held out for the Arragonois.

The fort of Gayetta yeelded to the King.

King Charles did now no more entertaine the Venetian Ambaſſadors with ſuch cheerefull countenance as hee was wont; but oftentimes ſaid, That thoſe who were not pleaſed with his comming into Italy, for the conqueſt of the Realme of Naples, ſhould repent it.

This being reported at Venice, cauſed them to haſten the concluſion of a new league, to which end, Lodouico had ſent new Ambaſſadors. Lorenzo Suares at his arriuall, told them, that his Kings pleaſure was to haue him in his name to enter into the league, on any conditions pleaſing to the Senate. Pope Alexander likewiſe did daily expect a fit time to ioyne himſelfe with the Venetians and the reſt, hauing openly ſaid, that if the French returned to Rome, hee would goe to Venice, and no more behold them. At laſt, in the month of Aprill, the Ambaſſadours of theſe Princes did in the City of Venice make confederacy, betwixt the Emperour, Kings of Spaine, Venetians, and Duke of Milan: it was onely publiſhed for the defenſe of one an others States, with reſeruation of place for any elſe to enter into it that would. But all of them thinking it more then neceſſary, to draw the French King forth of the Realme of Naples, concluded, in their more ſecret capitulations, that the Spaniſh companies that were in Sicily ſhould aide Ferdinand of Arragon to recouer his Kingdome, who much preſuming of his peoples loue, made meanes to enter into Calabria.

A league made by ſundry great Princes againſt the French.

In this confederacy it was concluded, that the Confederates ſhould make account to entertaine an army of foure and thirty thouſand horſe, and twenty thouſand foot, viz. That the Pope ſhould furniſh foure thouſand horſe, Maximillian 6000. the King of Spaine 8000. the Venetians the like number, and

Lodouico

Lodouico as many. And if any of them by reaſon of the long diſtance of place, could not ſo ſoone as need were, leuy the number of ſoldiers hee was rated at, in ſending to his aſſociates ſix hundred pounds of gold, they ſhould for him furniſh ſuch forces.

Theſe were the conditions of the Confederacie, the which was ſo ſpeedily and ſecretly concluded, as Philip de Comines, Lord of Argenton, Ambaſſador for king Charles at Venice, who went dayly to the Pallace, and conferred with the other Ambaſſadors, had neuer any inckling thereof: and beeing the next day after it was concluded, ſent for into the Senate, and vnderſtanding by the Prince and Senators what had beene done, he was in a manner like a man bereſt of his ſences: and when the Prince told him, that they had not done it to make warre vpon any one, but onely to defend them-ſelues; he recouered his ſpirits, and ſaid, My King then ſhall not returne into France? The Prince anſwered, But hee ſhall, if hee will returne as our friend, and wee will willingly helpe him with whatſoeuer hee ſhall need. After this anſwer, hee went forth of the Senate ſo amazed, as being at the ſtaires foote he turned towards the Chancellor, who accompanied him, and ſaid to him, Good Sir, tell mee what the Prince ſaid, for I haue forgotten it, which he did.

Philip de Comines King Charles his Ambaſſador at Venice, daunted with the newes of the league.

The Princes anſwer to Comines.

Beſide, the inſolency of the French, by reaſon of the facility of their victory was ſo encreaſed, as in reſpect of themſelues they contemned all Italians: for which, the peoples loue towards them was already conuerted into mortall hatred: and on the contrary, their hatred towards the Arragonois into pitty and compaſſion to Ferdinand. Wherevpon, Naples and all the reſt of the kingdome, waited but for a fit occaſion to repeale him.

King Charles had in a manner reſolued, before the concluſion of the league, to returne preſently into France, prouoked therevnto by ſome occaſion vnknowne to mee, notwithſtanding that diuerſe important buſineſſes were not ended in Naples, his victory beeing not fully perfected, by reaſon that the Realme was not yet altogether conquered. But hauing intelligence that ſo many Princes were leagued againſt him, and that the Venetians had called home their Ambaſſadors, reſident with him, his minde was much troubled, and hee conſulted with his Lords what was beſt to bee done in a matter of ſo great importance. His Councellers were of opinion to haſten his departure, fearing that by his longer ſtay, difficulties might increaſe, and the Confederates haue time to make greater preparations. Therevpon, the King reſolued to returne by land, maugre all the Confederates; ſeeing that hee wanted veſſels to tranſport ſo great an Army by ſea: for the fleete which hee had prepared at Genoa, was wrackt by tempeſt, vppon the ſhore of Plombino, the Admirall whereof, and Antonio Prince of Salerno, came to him by land.

King Charles his reſolution.

In the meane time, King Charles perceiuing that Lodouico as well as others had deceiued him, was deſirous to take the Citty of Genoa from him, and to that end ſent Pietro Fregoſa Cardinall, thither, who had beene Duke thereof, and Obietta de Fieſca, with eleuen Galleys, the remainder of his whole fleete. Then deſirous to proſecute his owne returne, he left Guilbert of Bourbon, Duke of Montpenſier, Prince of the bloud, his Lieutenant Generall in the kingdome, with the moyety of the Suiſſe, and part of the French footmen, eight hundred French lances, and fiue hundred Italian men at armes, which were in his pay, part of them vnder the command of the Prouoſt of Rome, and the reſt vnder Proſpero, and Fabricio Colonni, and Antonello Sauello, all three great Captaines, on whom hee had beſtowed many benefits. This done, hee departed from Naples with the reſt of his Armie, on the twentith of May, and marched directly towards Rome. But before his departure hee would bee crowned King of Naples, which was performed with great ſolemnity in the Cathedrall Church of Naples, where with great pompe hee receiued the honors and othes which are vſually made to new Kings. The King carried away with him eight hundred French Lances, the two hundred Gentle-

Guilbert of Bourbon Vice-roy of Naples.

King Charles is crowned King of Naples

Gentlemen of his gard, the Lord Triuulcio with a hundred lances, three thousand Suisse, and two thousand French footmen: and appointed Camillo Vitelli and his bretheren to meete him in Tuscany with two hundred and fifty men at armes.

In this equipage did King Charles march towards Rome: Pope Alexander, although two dayes before he came thither had promised where to attend him, did neuertheless after hee had left a strong garrison in Castle Angelo, retire to Oruietta, accompanied by the whole Colledge of Cardinals, two hundred men at armes, a thousand light horse, and three thousand foote, leauing the Cardinall Santo Anastasio his Legat in Rome, to entertaine and honor the King. The Venetians not long before, had for his better safety sent him fiue hundred Albanese horse.

King Charles sends a messenger to Venice.

The Princes answer to him.

The King beeing come to Rome, refused to lye in the Pallace of the Vatican, which the Pope had appointed for him, and lodged in the suburbes: From thence he sent a Gentleman to the Venetian Senate, to tell them from him, that his King had yet neuer intreated or sued to any; but now hee was onely desirous to know of them, whether their State were his friend or enemy. The Prince answered him. That wise and discreet men were wont sometime to referre themselues to the will and opinion of others, and in time of need to request their ayde: That hee spake this, onely to let him vnderstand, that it lay in his Kings power, to make the Venetians his friends or enemies. With this answer the Gentleman departed from Venice, together with Philip de Comines the Ambassador.

The Popes inconstancie.

The Florentines likewise, so soone as they had intelligence of this new confederacie, and that King Charles was come from Naples, to returne home into France, began to leuy soldiers, and to fortifie their townes, to stoppe the Kings passage, if hee intended to passe thorow their Citty. The King departed from Rome, and though at his approach neere Viterbo, the Pope had againe promised to conferre with him in some fit place, yet hee went from Oruietta to Perousa, meaning if the King directed his course thither, to goe to Ancona. The King neuertheless, though hee were highly incensed against the Pope, did re-deliuer the Castles of Ciuata-uechia and Terracina, reseruing that of Hostia to himselfe, and passed thorow the Churches countrey as a friend, Tuscanella excepted, where the inhabitants refusing to lodge his vantgard in their towne, it entred by force and sackt it, with great slaughter.

The Venetian Senate beeing aduertised that one of their chiefe Confederates territories had beene so spoyled by the French, thought that King Charles had begunne warre against them, fearing that comming vppon theirs, or on those of the Dutchie of Milan, hee would doe the like: Wherevpon they commanded their Generall Antonio Grimani, to saile with their Fleete into Puglia. The King afterwards arriued at Sienna, where hee remained sixe dayes, notwithstanding that euery man aduised him to depart speedily: but there they treated concerning the restitution of the Florentines fortes, promised by the King at his departure towards Naples, wherevnto all his Councellors were induced for sundry reasons, but others crossed it: wherevpon the matter was referred to his comming to Ast.

The King leauing Florence on his right hand, tooke the high way of Pisa, and from thence went to Luca. The Pope perceiuing the King was past, sent backe the Venetians and Lodouicos forces which they had lent him, and returned to Rome.

Great preparations made by the Venetians and Lodouico Sforza.

In the meane time they in Lombardy began to stirre. For the Venetians and Lodouico Sforza made great preparations to hinder the Kings returne into France, or at least, to secure the Dutchie of Milan, thorough which hee was to passe, wherevpon each of them raysed forces, and as well in common as in particular, omitted nothing that might further their deseigne. And Lodouico beeing very desirous to performe that wherevnto hee was tyed by the Confe-

Confederacy, concerning the Citty of Aſt, ſent Galeas of Saint Seuerine to that enterprize with 700. men at armes and three thouſand foot making no other accompt but to take it.

The Duke of Orleance, who remained in it, vppon the firſt intelligence of the new League, had fortified Aſt, and with great earneſtneſſe ſolicited new ſupplies from France to releeue the King. On a ſodaine forces from all parts were aſſembled, who with great ſpeed paſſed the Mounts, ſo that the Duke of Orleance in a ſhort ſpace beeing backt with a mighty power, went forth into the field, and in the Marquiſate of Saluces tooke the towne and Caſtle of Valfenieres, held by Antonio Maria of Saint Seuerin, whereupon Galeas with his army retired into Anon, diſpairing to execute any notable matter. The Duke of Orleance taketh Valfenieres.

The Duke returning to Aſt, an occaſion beeing offered to take Nouara, would not omit it, and hauing concluded with thoſe that offered to giue him entrance he croſſed the Po by night at the bridge of Stura, and with his forces, without any reſiſtance, was receiued into the Citty by them: from thence he ſent part of his Cauallery to make incurſions as farre as Vigeua. The Caſtle of Nouara ſtill held out for Lodouico, but the Duke of Orleance to aſſure his conqueſt, reſolued to take it; whervpon, on the fifth day after, it promiſed to yeeld (which it did) if it were not releeued within 24. houres. The French take the towne and Caſtle of Nouara.

The Venetians hauing intelligence that Lodouico was inuaded, and that the French made incurſions into his Contrey, did freely giue their conſent that he ſhould call back ſome of thoſe companies which he had ſent into the Parmeſan, and beſides that, ſent him foure hundred Stradiots. By theſe new forces neere to Nouara, the Duke of Orleance his farther paſſage was ſtopt, who retired with all his forces thither.

Now after ſome controuerſie with the Florentines concerning the reſtitution of their Forts, the Kings vantgard led by the Marſhall of Gie went to Pontrema. In the meane time the Confederate Army was ſpedily aſſembled neere to Parma in number two thouſand fiue hundred men at armes, 8000. foot and 2000. light horſe called ſtradiots, moſt of whom were Albaneſes, and of the neighbor Prouinces to Grecia, brought by the Venetians into Italy. Franceſco Gonzaga the young Marquis of Mantoa was Generall of the Venetian troopes, whoſe valour ſurmounted his yeares, and with him two principall Senators, Luca Piſani and Melchior Treuiſan, as Prouidators The Count Gaiazza commanded Lodouicos troopes, Franciſco Bernardino Viſcount beeing ioyned in Commiſſion with him. The number of the Confederate Army.

All the Confederate Captaines conſulted whether they ſhould encampe at Fornouo, a ſmall Village at the foot of the hill, and it was concluded becauſe the place was very ſtraight, and peraduenture likewiſe to giue the enemy meanes to deſcend into the plaine, that they would lodge in the Abbey of Guiaruola, three miles from Fornouo, wherby the French Vantgard came thither ſooner then the reſt of the army, which conducted the ordnance, vneaſie to bee brought ouer that ſteepy Appenine hill.

The Marſhall de Gie being come thus foreward, ſent a trumpet to the Confederate Army, in his Kings name to craue paſſage, who without offence to any man, and taking victualls at a reaſonable price, was deſirous to paſſe on and returne into France. The Confederates conſulting vpon an anſwer for the Marſhalls trumpet, the Captaines opinions were different, in the end they concluded to ſend to Milan, where the Duke and Confederate Ambaſſadors lay, to know their pleaſures. But the matter being delayed, the Captaines ſent back the Trumpet without any certain reſolution, determining to aſſaile and charge the French as they paſſed.

The King at laſt ioyning with his Vantgard, did with his whole army the next day following lodge at Fornouo. The French, who till then had marched with great The King lodgeth at Fornouo.

great boldneſſe and aſſurance, making no account of the Italians armes, ſo ſoone as at their going downe the hill they diſcouered the enemies army with infinite numbers of tents and pauilions, and conſidering their reſolution to fight, began alittle to abate their former heate, and would haue beene well pleaſed, ſo that the Italians would haue ſuffered them to paſſe. The King enforced to imbrace new Councell commanded the Lord of Argenton to ſend a trumpet to the Venetian Prouidators, to let them vnderſtand that he deſired to conferre with them for the publique good: They accepted the parley in ſome fit place betwixt both Armies: but the King, altring his purpoſe, would not attend the iſſue of this parley.

The two armies neere to one another.

The two armies were quartered within three miles of one another along the Turo, which is rather a torrent then a riuer, which running betwixt two little hills doth in a manner enuiron them. On one of thoſe hills was the Confederate army lodged on the right hand towards the riuer bankes, they had fortefied themſelues with Dikes and Rampiers well flanked with ordnance, and the French were of neceſſity to go that way to Aſt, nothing but the riuer beeing betwixt the enemies and them.

All that night was very tedious to the French, both in regard of the Stradiots continuall alarmes, as for a ſuddaine ſhower of raine, entermingled with fearefull thunder and lightening, Which they interpreted as a preſage of ſome ſiniſter fortune. In the morning by day breake, the French army began to croſſe the riuer, the ordnance going firſt, followed by the Vantgard, wherin were three hundred and fifty Lances, Iohn Iames Triuulcio with his company of an hundred Lances, and 3000. Suiſſes, to whom the King added three hundred archers and ſome crolbowes on horſe-back of his guards whom he cauſed to march on foot, for hee ſuppoſed that the enemy would turne his cheefe forces vppon it. The battaile followed the vantgard, in middeſt whereof was the Kings perſon, armed at all points, mounted on a gallant courſer, and the Lord Tremouille neere him with his authority and Councell to gouerne that part of the army. Next followed the rere-ward conducted by the Earle of Foix, and behind it the baggage.

The French army croſseth the Turo.

The order of the Kings army.

So ſoone as the two armies began to mooue, the light horſe on both ſides ſkirmiſhed, the ordnance flew from both parts, and the Italians, prepared for the battaile, extended their Squadrons on the riuer bankes. The French marched on notwithſtanding, ſo as their Vantgard was already led to the right ſide of the enemies Campe, when the Marquis of Mantua croſſed the riuer at the back of the French rereward, with a Squadron of 600. men at armes, a great troope of Stradiots, and other light horſe, and 5000. foot, hauing commanded Antonio of Montfeltre to be ready with his troopes when he ſhould be ſent for to refreſh the firſt battaillon, and the light Cauallery to giue in in flanke vpon the enemies ſo ſoone as the fight ſhould bee begun, and the reſt of the Stradiots to croſſe the Riuer and to fall vpon the French bagagge which was left alone. The Count Gaiazza on the other part croſſed the Turo with 400. men at armes, to releeue him when need ſhould be, and for the guard of the Campe, two companies of men at armes and a thouſand foot were left behind.

The Marquis of Mantua his order to aſſaile the King.

But the King perceiuing that contrary to his expectation the whole burthen lighted on the rere-ward, turned his back to the Vantgard, and drew neere to the Rere with the battaile, and came with ſuch ſpeed, one ſquadron before another, as himſelfe was at the front among thoſe that fought braueſt. And though the Marquis aſſault was braue and furious, the French did as brauely anſwer him, throwing themſelues pell mell among the Squadrons. It is certaine that at firſt the Italians valour was very excellent, beeing encouraged by the Marquis, vvho attended by a gallant troope of braue yong Gentlemen, omitted nothing belonging to a valliant Captaine. The French did likewiſe valiantly repulſe this firſt charge, charge,yet being preſſed by multitudes, began to ſtagger, the King himſelfe being in danger,who though hee had not many of his owne ſoldiers about him, did valiantly defend himſelfe, the goodneſſe and fireeneſſe of his horſe dooing him better ſeruice then the ayde of his people, and then hee made a vow to Saint Denis and Saint Martin,that if hee might ſafely paſſe into Piedmont, he would at his returne into France, with great gifts goe and viſit their Churches, the one beeing neere Paris,and the other in the Citty of Tours. Theſe vowes made, hee began to fight with greater courage then before, till his ſoldiers that were next him, beeing incited by his danger,did all of them with their owne liues, runne to ſaue the Kings,and repulſe the Italians, whither the battaile that ſtayed behinde, arriuing in time,and giuing in furiouſly vpon the enemies flanques, ſtayed their furie: in this charge Rodolfo Gonzaga, Vnckle to the Marquis of Mantua, a very famous Captaine,hurt in the face with a ſword as he lifted vp his Beuer, and falling from his horſſe, was miſerably trode to death by the horſe, and could not bee ſaued.

King Charles his valour.

His vow.

The King reſcued by the battaile.

The battaile thus changing by ſundry accidents, and no aduantage on eyther ſide appearing,made all men more and more to wonder vnto whom the victory would incline: The French were enflamed by the preſence and danger of their King,and becauſe they were in a place where they could hope for no ſafety but in victory. The Italians on the other ſide were incited by a couetous deſire of rich booty: ſo that Fortunes power beeing, (as all men know) very great in humaine actions, eſpecially in affaires of warre, where the leaſt error doth often times tranſport the victory to thoſe that were almoſt vanquiſhed, did at that time very cleerly demonſtrate it. For the Stradiots, ſent to aſſaile the French bagage,began to ſpoile,and to driue away the Mules, and other wagons beyond the Riuer. Their fellowes appointed to charge the French in flanke, perceiuing that others returned loden with ſpoile,incited by the ſelfe ſame deſire of gaine, fell vpon the bagage, and by their example, others both horſe and foote left their files, and went from the battaile to doe the like. By this meanes the Italians wanting their lookt for freſh ſupplyes,and the number of thoſe that fought ſtill decreaſing, nothing did ſo much incourage them, as the valor of the Marquis, who fighting valiantly did ſtill abide the enemies furie, incouraging his owne ſoldiers, who much weakned by the departure of their fellowes that went to ſpoile, and their enemies on euery ſide preſſing in vpon them, and no longer able to reſiſt, were enforced to flye,and to attempt to repaſſe the riuer, which beeing ſwelled by the former nights raine, and by a great ſhower of hayle which fell during the fight, they could hardly doe. The French followed them very fiercely euen to the Riuer, killing all thoſe that fled, taking no priſoners at all.

Whileſt they fought ſo valiantly on that ſide of the Army, the French Vantgard,gainſt which Count Gajazza brought part of his Cauallery, preſented it ſelfe in battaile,with ſuch furie,as the Italians,daunted, becauſe they were not ſeconded, did of themſelues fall into diſorder, and fled to the body of their Army which was on the farther ſide of the riuer, whereupon the Marſhall de Gié would not purſue them any farther, ſome afterwards, reputing it to wiſedome and diſcretion,others to cowardize. The Marquis of Mantua paſſed the Riuer in the beſt and cloſeſt order he could,where he found his troopes ſo diſordered,as euery man with his booty thought on nothing but meanes how to eſcape; but his preſence and authority, ſtayed that confuſion.

The French vantgard diſordereth the enemy.

The King with his troopes comming to his Vantgard, which had not ſtird, demanded his Captaines aduiſe, whether hee ſhould ſodainly croſſe the Riuer, and aſſaile the enemies in their Campe, but their opinions beeing various, and alſo the troopes which had fought, wearied, they reſolued to take vp their lodging: and for that night, they lodged on the hill,in the village called Medezana, a mile from the place where they fought.

The King determineth to aſſaile the enemies in their Campe.

Such

Such was the end of the battaile betwixt the French and the Italians neere the River Tarro, where of the French side dyed scarce two hundred, but of Italians more then three hundred men at armes, and as many others as amounted to three thousand men, in regard of which number of dead so disproportionable, the victorie was attributed to the French, though the Venetians challenge to themselues the glory of the day, because that their campe and baggage remained whole and entire, whereas the French on the contrary, lost much of theirs, and among others, some of the Kings rich stuffe: Wherevpon, by publick Decree, ouer all the territories vnder their obedience, and especially at Venice, bonefiers and other signes of ioy were made. The day following, the King remained in the same village, and by means of the Lord of Argenton, who parled with the enemies, truce was granted till night.

The next morning before day, the King with his Army dislodged, sounding neither drum nor trumpet, the better to conceale his departure; and all that day he was not pursued by the Confederate Army, by reason that the Taro was exceedingly swelled, and could not that day be foorded. Sanseuerine whose selfe and soldiers had not fought in that battaile, made an offer to the Marquis and Prouidators, that if they would giue him a troope of light horse to cut off the taile of the Kings army, hee by his incursions would amuze the French, so long, till their Army might ouer-take them. His demand granted, hee departed from the Campe with two thousand fiue hundred horse, and by reason of the swelling of the Riuer, tooke a longer way, so as that day hee did not ouer-take the Kings troopes: but so soone as hee drew neere them, hee serued rather for a guide to conduct them to Ast, then a disturber of their iourney: so, as it seemed that his request to the Marquis and Prouidators, was onely to accompany and safe conduct the King. His intent was afterwards knowne to bee such, by Lodouicos commandement, who when Bernardo Contaren would haue giuen in vpon the Kings reregard, could not bee suffered so to doe.

Sanseuerin his offers.

The small effect thereof.

So soone as the waters were downe, the Marquis pursued the Kings Army, which hee not beeing able to ouer-take, sent sixe hundred horse after it, to cut off the taile and to keepe it in continuall alarum, who returned to him loden with booty. The French at last comming neere to Alexandria, tooke the higher way towards the mounts, where the Riuer Tanare is most shallow, and in eight dayes march, without losse of men or other encombrances, came before the wals of Ast, where after the King was entred hee caused his Armie to bee lodged in the field.

The King arriueth at Ast.

The Campe of the league which had followed him into the Tortonois, beeing no more able to annoy him, ioyned with Lodouicos Sforzas forces before Nouara. The Kings retreat beeing knowne at Venice, the Senate commanded generall Precessions, and publick prayers to bee made, to giue God thankes for that by his retreat the Citty was freed from the danger which threatned it.

The end of the fourth Booke of the fourth Decade.

The

The Contents of the fifth Booke of the fourth Decad.

THe Venetians at Genoa arme by Sea againſt the French, and take Rapalla in the Realme of Naples. Lodouico and the Confederates beſiege Nouara. Peace concluded betwixt King Charles and the Confederates, the King returnes into France. The Neapolitans reuolt from the French, & bring Ferdinand into Naples. A Generall rebellion ouer the whole kingdome againſt the French. The Piſans giue themſelues to the Venetians. The Venetians ayde Ferdinand, hee giuing them three Citties in Puglia. The Venetians reſoluing to defend Piſa againſt the Florentines, ſend ayde thether. King Charles determineth to returne into Italy, and makes great preparation for it. The Duke of Montpenſier, beſieged in Attella, is through want of victuals enforced to Capitulate, and quit the Realme of Naples. The death of Duke Montpenſier and other great Captaines. King Ferdinands death. The purſutes of Lodouico and the other Confederates to haue Piſa reſtored to the Florentines. The death of Charles the eight French King. Lewis Duke of Orleans, French King. Coruin, ſonne to the King of Hungarie, made a Gentleman of Venice. Cæſar Borgia, ſonne to Pope Alexander, quitts his Cardinalls Hatte, and is made by King Lewis Duke of Valentinois. Lodouico procureth the Turkiſh fleete to inuade the Venetians. League betwixt Lewis the French King and the Venetians. The French King ſends an Army into Italy, vnder the command of Iohn Iames Triuulce. And laſtly, the taking of Caruagio by the Venetians.

The fifth Booke of the fourth Decade, of the History of Venice.

The Venetians arme certaine vessels at Genoa against the French.

THE Venetians, aduertised that King Charles at his departure from Naples, had sent diuerse vessels to make incursions into the riuer of Genoa (as hath beene said) sent one of their Cittizens to Genoa with money to rigge certaine great Argozies. Lodouico Sforza had likewise giuen order to arme a certaine number of Galleys, so as together they prepared a fleete, the which departing from Genoa, did by night land seauen hundred footmen, which without any difficulty tooke the towne and castle of Rapalla, seazed on by the French at their arriuall: Then meeting at sea with the French fleet, it assailed and defeated it, the Admirall thereof being taken, and foure French Ensignes, which the Geneuois sent to Lodouico Sforza, who presently gaue two of them to the Venetian Ambassador, resident with him, saying that he did present them to the honor and merit of the Venetian commonwealth. The Marquis of Mantua in the meane time beeing at Clastegia, following King Charles his Army, requested by Lodouico, and commanded by the Senates decree, sent two thousand foote in Garrison to Tortona and Alexandria. Then he intreated the Senate to send two Senators, who as Prouidators should manage the warre with him: wherevpon Luca Zeno, and Andrea Venieri were appointed, who comming to the Army, went all together to the siege of Nouarra, which Lodouico with a mighty Army did streightly besiege. The Venetians sent so great aide, as scarce any enterprize can be remembred, wherein they spent more money, so that in a short space, there were three thousand men at armes, three thousand Almaine horse, fiue thousand Italian foot, and ten thousand Lancequenets, in the confederate campe.

The Venetian fleete takes Rapalla.

The French nauall Army is defeated.

The number of the Army before Nauara.

The Venetian Senate was not onely carefull to send forces to this siege, but the more to incourage their soldiers, had from Lieutenant of the Army made the Marquis of Mantua Captaine Generall thereof, the better to honor his courage and valour manifested at the battaile of Fornouo: and with a very gracious example, had not only augmented their pay who had valiantly behaued themselues, but giuen pensions and sundry recompences to the children of those that were slaine in the battaile, and dowries to their daughters.

The seege still continuing before Nouara, those of the towne were in great want of victualls, by reason of the great number of soldiers and Contrey people that were in it, nor could the King, who lay at Ast, releeue it, for want of men: and though the Duke of Orleance, when hee was made acquainted with the dearth, did put forth all vnprofitable eaters, yet this remedy was to no purpose: The French made many attempts by night to victuall it, but beeing still discouered, they were enforced to retire without effecting it, and often times with great losse of their men.

The King resolues to hearken vnto peace.

The King then, out of hope to raise the siege in any time, and dayly importuned by the Duke of Orleans, who was in great want, determined to hearken vnto peace. But the difficulty to obtaine it was very great, in regard of the iealozie and diſtruſt betwixt the King and Duke of Milan: yet it was motioned by an vnexpected meanes. For the Lady Marques of Mont-ferate beeing dead, the King wiſhing well to that State, ſent the Lord of Argenton to Caſſall, to conſult with her ſubiects concerning the profit and commodity of a young ſonne ſhee had left behind hir. The Marquis of Mantuas Steward came thither likewiſe in his Maiſters name to bewaile her death. They two entred ſo farre into diſcourſe of peace, as the Lord of Argenton, by the perſwaſion of this Steward, did write therof to the Venetian Prouidators, who inclining therevnto, acquainted the Duke of Milans Captaines with it, who with one conſent, ſent to intreate the King which lay at Verſeill, to appoint ſome of his officers to meete them in ſome fit place where they might conferre together. The King allowing it, the Commiſſioners on both ſides met betwixt Bolgare and Camarian, where after ſundry difficulties alleadged on both parts, peace at laſt was concluded and ſigned by the King, which was no ſooner ſworne to by the Duke of Milan, but the King made haſt to returne into France. And in this manner about the end of October 1495. hee repaſſed the mounts.

and

A motion of peace made at Caſall.

The Venetians were diſpleaſed with Lodouico, for that without the aduiſe and conſent of all the Confederates hee had made peace with King Charles, ſeeing that they hauing beene often intreated by the King, and him, to hearken therevnto, had euer anſwered, that they would doe nothing but by the conſent of all the Confederates: ſo that now they perceiued it was a dangerous matter to truſt him, and therefore they would no longer bee in league with ſo perfidious a man.

The Venetians are diſpleaſed with Lodouico.

Lodouico was much troubled with theſe newes, and perceiuing that the Venetians were no more his friends, gaue ſecret commandement to all his Garriſons, by which the Venetian Campe was to paſſe, to guard the paſſages, and eſpecially the Riuers, and to ſhutte vp all the boates, to ſtay their departure againſt his will. This beeing knowne to the Prouidators, they were much amazed, in regard they were to paſſe many great riuers: and conferring heerevpon with Bernardo Contaren, not knowing what to reſolue on, hee offered to poinard Ledouico in open counſell, ſaying, That hee once dead, no man would ſtirre. The Councell of Ten at Venice, beeing acquainted with this propoſition, wrote back, that by no meanes hee ſhould doe ſo, for it would much blemiſh the Venetians reputation; but onely temporize with him till they were forth of his territories, which they did, whervpon, Nouarra ſurrendred, they ledde their army which in a manner they caſſed to Crema, and from thence went to Mantua, and ſo to Venice.

A bold enterprize of Bernardo Contaren.

But to returne to that which was done at the ſame time in the Realme of Naples, where warre was managed as well as in Lombardy. So ſoone as Ferdinand had intelligence of King Charles his departure from Naples, (beeing then in Sicill) attended by the Spaniards who were come thither by Sea, he landed in Calabria, to whom many Contrey people preſently ranne, and within a while after the Citty of Regium yeelded to him, the Caſtle hauing ſtill held out for him. At the ſame time likewiſe the Venetian fleete was deſcried not farre from the ſhore of Puglia, whereof Antonio Grimani, a man of great authority in the State, was Generall, who comming neere to Monopoli a Citty in Puglia, landed the Stradiots and certaine foot companies, then by land and ſea, gaue an aſſault to the Citty, which was taken by force, wherevpon the Caſtle ſoone yeelded: This fleete likewiſe tooke the Citty of Pulignana by compoſition.

The Venetians take Monopoli.

Ferdinand in the meane time with many veſſels, but few ſoldiers, leauing Sicily, hauing beſides the loue and fauour of the people of the Realme of Naples, who longed for him, came to the flattes of Salerno: and on a ſodaine, Salerno, Melphi and la Caua erected his banners. Afterwards hee houered two whole dayes before the Citty of Naples, expecting ſome popular commotion in the Citty (which had been promiſed) but it was in vaine, for the French tooke good order there for that time, ſo that the third day after Ferdinand diſpayring of any good ſucceſſe, made to Sea, determining to returne to Iſchia.

The Neapolitans reuolt in fauour of Ferdinand.

The Cittizens of Naples, who had reſolued to deliuer the towne to Ferdinand, (their plot being halfe diſcouered), determined to make a vertue of neceſſity, and to win or looſe all, according to this reſolution ſecretly ſent a ſmall boate to call back Ferdinand, intreating him to land all, or part of his forces to giue incouragement to thoſe that intended to riſe in his behalfe. Vpon this aduertizement, Ferdinand returned againe before Naples, and then landed, a mile from the Citty; which the Duke Montpenſier perceiuing ſallied forth of Naples with all his forces to hinder his landing. The Neopolitans then taking hold on occaſion, preſently tooke armes, and at the firſt ringing of the Toxin or larum bell, made good the gates, and began euery where to cry Ferdinand, Ferdinand. The French amazed at this ſuddaine tumult, thinking it dangerous to abide betwixt the rebellious Citty and the enemies, determined to returne to Naples, but they were enforced to fetch a great compaſſe, to come to the Gate neere Caſtelnouo, for that through which they came forth was ſeazed on by the Neopolitans. Ferdinand in the meane time entred the Citty on horſeback, where, to the peoples incredible ioy, he rode vp and downe. The French entring at the Gate next the Caſtle, did their beſt to get into the heart of the Citty, but their attempts were vayne, for at euery ſtreetes end they found reſiſtance, and night approaching they retired into the Caſtle, together with the Duke of Montpenſier, Yues of Alegre a famous Captaine, Antonio Prince of Salerne, and many other French and Italian Captaines of note. Thoſe of Capua, Auerſa, the Fort Montdragon, and other townes neere adioyning, and the greateſt part of the Kingdome did the like. Thoſe of Gayetta going about to follow their example were with great ſlaughter preuented by the French Garriſon, who in heate of blood ſackt the Citty. The Venetian Senate hauing intelligence that Ferdinand had recouered the Citty of Naples, wrote to Antonio Grimani that he ſhould no more aſſault any towne of the Kingdome in the Venetians name, but to remaine at Monopoli to know their farther pleaſure. The Pope vnderſtanding that the Venetian fleet was idle, intreated the Senate that it might ſaile to Naples to aid Ferdinand: this was granted, and Antonio Grimani leauing 100. light horſe and two Gallies for the gard of Monopoli, went to Tarentum which held out againſt Ferdinand. But Grimani being there afflicted with a flix, ſent twenty Gallies to Ferdinand, vnder the command of Contaren the Prouidator, and himſelfe, with the reſt of the fleet (for he had in the meane time receiued new ſupplies) directed his courſe to Corfou. At the ſame time, the Florentines being deſirous by all meanes to recouer Piſa, and the Piſans being to weake to reſiſt, ſent ſecret meſſengers to the Venetian Senate, to intreat them to receiue their Citty into their protection, and to hold it for a member of their ſtate. At firſt the Senate found the matter to be of ſuch importance, as they made no great haſt either to refuſe or accept it: yet at laſt ſome Senators beganne to taſt this offer, and to harken vnto it, as they who with the deſeignes and hopes embraced the entire Monarchie of Italy, for obtaining whereof, they ſuppoſed that the Signory of Piſa would greatly auaile them, in regard that their antient vnion with other Potentates was broken, and moſt of thoſe who were wont to reſiſt them, weakened: as alſo, becauſe that Citty would giue them ſure footing in Tuſcany, and extend their bounds as farre as the lower ſea: and therefore concluded to accept it as an offer ſent from God. This opinion being approoued by the greateſt part of the Senate, the buſineſſe was conſulted on by the councell of Tenne, that the reſolution of it might bee kept more ſecret, whoſe opinions being various, the matter was put off till ſome other time.

A Generall reuolt made ouer the whole Kingdome

The Piſans commit themſelues to the Venetians

Lodouico likewiſe was greedy to impatronize this Citty, and thereupon ſeemed very very ready vnder-hand to aid the Pisans againſt the Florentines, whom he entertained with ſundry practiſes.

The Pope mooued by Ferdinands intreaties, wrote at the ſame time to the Venetians, to ſend part of their Army returned from the ſeege of Nouara, to aid Ferdinand to driue the French forth of the Realme of Naples, promiſing that Ferdinand ſhould engage certaine ſea townes to them, till they were ſatisfied for their expence in that warre. The Senate not fully reſolued to ſend the Army to the King, commanded Bernardo Contaren to go before to Rauenna, with 600. light horſe, to the end that if they ſhould determine to ſend it, he might be ſo farre onwards on his way. This beeing vnderſtood at Rome, the buſineſſe was prolonged, for Cardinall Aſcanio, brother to Lodouico, made a propoſition that the Venetians ſhould aſſiſt the King in that warre, and yet haue no townes engaged to them.

Ferdinands Ambaſſadors, that came to Venice to make an accord, following the Cardinalls aduice, demanded the army, but offered no pawne. The Senate knowing that this was Lodouicoes practiſe, who enuied their greatneſſe, did on a ſudaine diſmiſſe the Ambaſſadors, not ſuffering them to remain a moment in the Citty. The Ambaſſadors ſpent many dayes to pacifie the Senate, and notwithſtanding that they promiſed that Ferdinand ſhould deliuer three of his beſt Cities, with their territories, vnto them, namely Trani, Brunduſium and Otranto, they would hardly agree to it, had not the Confederate Ambaſſadors, there preſent, interceded for them, whereuppon a new league was made, by which the Venetians, hauing firſt receiued the three townes, were obliged, ſpeedily to ſend 600. men at armes and 3000. foot to Ferdinand: and the Treaſorer to the State did deliuer to Ferdinands Ambaſſadors. 150. pounds of gold by way of loane, with diuers other conditions, which the Pope approoued and ratified, as one hauing intereſt in the Realme of Naples.

The Venetians make an accord with Ferdinands Ambaſſadors.

The League thus made, Commiſſioners were ſent to Ferdinand to receiue the three townes, and meſſengers to the Marquis of Mantoua, to will him without delay to lead his troopes into the Realme of Naples. Theſe things thus concluded and diuulged, cauſed diuers townes in the Kingdome, which the French held, preſently to yeeld to Ferdinand; the like did the two Caſtles in Naples. King Charles after his returne into France ſent the Lord of Argenton to Venice to tell the Senate, that hee accounted their State to be comprehended in the accord made with Lodouico, becauſe their Generals & Prouidators were preſent at it, in which regard, he intreated the Senate to ſurrender Monopoli to him which their Army had taken from his ſubiects, and that they would no more aſſiſt Ferdinand: The Venetians ſent him back without ſatiſfying his Kings demands. Charles raiſed a new army, determining to ſend it by Sea to the releeſe of Caietta, vnder the Conduct of the Duke of Orleans, who crauing to be excuſed from that iourney, the army was diſſolued, and the determination to releeue thoſe in the Kingdome of Naples, vaniſhed into ayre.

The Venetians ſend aid to Ferdinand.

King Charles ſends an Ambaſſador to Venice.

Lodouico, hauing intelligence of what-ſoeuer was done in France, and now no more fearing the French, was aduertiſed by letters from his frends of the Piſans requeſt made to the Venetians, whervppon hee intreated the Senate to receiue him as an aſſociate in the defenſe and protection of Piſa, becauſe that the Florentines were leagued with King Charles, and him-ſelfe had taken their Ambaſſador in his owne Dominions which was going into France.

This buſineſſe, ſundry times debated in the Senate, it was at laſt concluded by the generall conſent of the Ambaſſadors, that Piſa ſhould bee defended at the common charge of the Pope, Venetians, and Duke of Milan, and that two thouſand foot ſhould bee leuyed at Genoa by the Venetians, to bee ſent to Piſa,

The reſolution for the defence of Piſa.

Hereupon the Florentines raiſed 6000. foot, and with the ordnance ſent them to Piſa before the enemies forces were aſſembled, hoping to take the cittie. But comming neere to the gates, thoſe within the towne made a ſalley, and after a furious charge vpon the enemy, defeated and put them to route, and tooke their ordnance. Not long after, Paulo Vitelli the Romane, a valiant and braue Captaine, forſooke the Piſans, and went to Florence, where beeing honorably entertained and made Generall of their Army, hee marched with 10000. foote againſt the Piſans, and at his arriuall lodged in the Cities ſuburbes, from whence the townesmen did beate and repulſe him: but the Florentines winning them againe, were enforced to quit them, and to giue ouer the ſiege, to defend their owne confines againſt Pietro de Medicis, who was ſaid to be comming with great forces againſt the citty of Florence, accompanied by this kinſmen the Vrſini.

The Venetians and Lodouico ſend ayde to Piſa.

The Venetians in the meane time leuied fiue hundred foote at Genoa, whom they ſent to Piſa, the like did Lodouico: The Florentines hauing vſed all their cunning to take the Cittadell of Piſa, as well by meanes of the King, as money; the gouernour thereof, prouoked by his owne inclination to the French, that were in Piſa, or by ſecret Commiſſions from the Lord of Ligni, whoſe Lieutenant hee was, or elſe beeing enamored on a young maiden of Piſa (for it is not likely that money alone would haue preuailed with him, ſeeing hee might haue receiued a greater ſumme of the Florentines) was very loath to yeeld vp the Caſtle, but in the end beeing enforced by the Kings frequent commandements and threatnings, hee ſurrendred it to the Piſans, hauing firſt receiued twenty thouſand Ducats of them, whereof twelue thouſand fell to his owne ſhare, and eight thouſand for the ſoldiors that were in it.

The Piſans raze their Cittadell.

The Piſans running in heapes to the Cittadell, razed it downe to the ground: But becauſe they found themſelues too weake to reſiſt the Florentines, they ſent to craue ayde at one time of the Pope, Emperor, Venetians, Duke of Milan, Geneuois, Sienois, and Lukeſes: but they were moſt earneſt with the Venetians and Duke of Milan, on whom they relyed more then on any other, becauſe hee had prouoked them to rebell, and had ſpeedily releeued them. But the Duke, though hee extreamly deſired it, did neuerrheleſſe doubt whither hee ſhould accept it or no, fearing leaſt the other confederates ſhould take it ill, by whoſe councell the treaty of the State of Piſa had bin begun, as a matter common to them all, and ſtanding in need of them, hee durſt not openly declare himſelfe vntill the King were wholy forth of Italy: But the Piſans then grew cold, hoping to bee releeued by the Venetians, who without ſparing for any coſt did bountifully ſupply them with all things: wherevpon they betooke themſelues to their protection, and were receiued by the Senate, after long conteſtation among the Senators.

And craue aid of ſundry Princes.

The Venetians protect the Piſans.

The Venetians at the ſame time had taken Aſtor, Lord of Faenza into their pay, and accepted the protection of his ſtate, which was very fit for to bridle the Florentines, Bologneſes, and all the reſt of Romagnia. To theſe particular aides of the Venetians other ſupplies from the Confederates were ioyned, for the Pope, Venetians, and Duke of Milan ſent certaine companies of men at armes, paid in common, to the ayde of Ferdinand. In the meane time Antonio Grimani beeing enforced by his indiſpoſition of body to retire from Corfou to Venice, Melchior Treuiſan was in his ſteed ſent as Generall to the fleet, who going to Corfou with certaine Galleys, did preſently faile into Puglia, and from thence into Calabria, where hee vnited himſelfe with the reſt of the Venetian veſſels, and with them enforced diuerſe townes to yeeld to Ferdinand.

Whileſt the whole kingdome of Naples was filled with warre and troubles, King Charles hauing vnderſtood the loſſe of the two Caſtles in Naples, through want of ſupplies, began a new to bend his thoughts on the affaires of Italy, and to determine to goe thither againe in perſon: This deſire dayly increaſing in him, wherevnto diuers great Lords both French and ſtrangers prouoked him. Therefore his councell concluded, that Triuulcio, who not long before was come forth of Italy to his Court, ſhould returne in poſt to Aſt, as Lieutenant to the King, and with him eight hundred Launces, two thouſand Swiſſes, and two thouſand French foot; that the Duke of Orleance ſhould ere long follow him with greater forces, and the King laſt of all with all prouiſions: moreouer, that thirty ſhips in the hauens of Prouence, where thirty Gallies & Gallions were to be armed, ſhould ſaile through the Ocean with ſupplies of men, victualls, munition and money into the Realme of Naples, and that in the meane time, whileſt the fleet was making ready, certaine veſſels well manned and victualled ſhould bee ſent thither.

Reſolution of the Kings councell for his iourney into Italy.

The rumor of theſe preparations in France diuulged in Italy, did much trouble the Confederates, eſpecially Lodouico Sforza, who was the firſt to be expoſed to the enemies fury, but moſt of all when hee vnderſtood that the King had diſmiſſed his Agents with ſharpe and bitter ſpeeches. He ſent Ambaſſadors to the Emperor, to draw him into Italy, and others to Venice to requeſt the Venetians to contribute towards this expence, to preuent this common danger, and to ſend certaine troupes to Alexandria to make head againſt the French. The Venetians freely offered to ſend forces to Alexandria; but they were not ſo willing to giue their conſent for the Emperors paſſage, who was no great friend to their State, yet fearing leaſt Lodouico, whom they knew to bee fearefull and timorous, ſhould fully reconcile himſelfe to the French King, they agreed to ſend Ambaſſadors to the Emperor to the ſame end. And ſtanding in doubt of the Florentines, they ſent word to Giouan Bentiuole to make warre vpon them with ſuch forces as the Confederates ſhould furniſh him on the frontier towards the Bologneſe; promiſing him that they ſhould bee at the ſame time inuaded by the Sienois, and Piſans: yet though Bentiuole promiſed ſo to doe, his meaning was cleane contrary. But the French affaires beeing prolonged by the Cardinall of Saint Malo, who, beſides the ſuperintendency of the treaſure, managed all matters, did ſo delay the execution of things, already reſolued vpon, as one accident more happened, which had almoſt wholly diuerted them. For when euery man thought that the King would haue gonne into Italy, he determined a iourney to Paris (according to the cuſtome of ancient Kings) before his departure forth of France to take his leaue of Saint Denis, and likewiſe of Saint Martin, paſſing by Tours, promiſing within a month to returne to Lions to purſue his iourney into Italy. The aduiſe of his Lords, nor vrgent intreaties and teares of the Italians, could not alter this determination. The Duke of Orleance, Cardinall of Saint Malo, and the whole councell remained at Lyons to haſten the prouiſions, and the King went to Tours, where the Queene lay.

Lodouico ſends euery where to get force to ſecure himſelfe from the French.

The Venetians ioyne with Lodouico.

The King takes his leaue of the Saints, Denis and Martin.

The affaires of Naples were in the meane time brought to great extremity, where the fortune of the French began openly to decline, being at one time aſſailed with infinite difficulties, want of money, victuals, the peoples hatred, captains diſcord, and ſouldiers diſobedience, many of whom forſooke the campe, ſome willingly, others on neceſſity. On the contrary, Ferdinands army, re-enforced with men, victuals and money, did ſtill attend the French, and were continually at their backes. But that which did moſt ruine them, was the Lord D' Aubignis ſickneſſe, which cauſed diuers to forſake him, and to goe to the Duke Montpenſier his army: Calabria by that meanes being vnfurniſhed of men, ſo as Gonſaluo that was come thither, tooke diuers townes in that Prouince, and obtained a gallant victory there, whereby his forces beeing augmented, hee determined to ioyne with Ferdinands campe before Atella, where Duke Montpenſier lay with diuers other Barons and great Lords, both French and Italians, which followed the French Kings party.

Ferdinand doth ſtreightly beſeege Atella.

By Gonſaluos comming to the campe, the beſeeged were more ſtreightly incloſed, incloſed, the towne being wholly enuironed, both by the Arragoneſes, Venetians and Spaniards, ſo as no victuals could enter into it, eſpetially in regard of the Stradiots and Venetians who ſcoured the country: neither could they goe forth to forrage as they were wont, ſo that beeing depriued of all commodities, they were brought to ſuch extremity, as they could not get water from the Riuer, either for themſelues or horſe.

Atella enforced to capitulate.

Beeing then oppreſſed with ſo many miſeries, they craued a ſafe-conduct, which was granted them, wherevpon, the Lord of Perſi, Barthelmeo Aluiana and a Swiſſe captaine were ſent to capitulate with Ferdinand, with whom they thus agreed. That there ſhould be truce for thirty daies: That in the meane time the ſaid accord ſhould bee ſhewed to King Charles. That none of the beſeeged ſhould goe forth of Atella, and that the Arragonois ſhould daily giue them competent victuals. If they were not releeued in that time, hee ſhould leaue Atella, and whatſoeuer elſe was vnder his command in the Realme of Naples, together with all the ordnance. That the ſouldiers might depart with their liues and baggage, with permiſſion to returne home into France either by ſea or land. That the Vrſini and other Italian ſouldiers might with their companies depart forth of the Realme whither ſoeuer they pleaſed. The truce expired Duke Montpenſier came forth, with all the French, Swiſſe, and the Vrſini, and was conducted by the Marquis of Mantua and his light horſe in ſafety to Baja, where finding no veſſels ready to imbarke themſelues they quartered betwixt Baja, and Pozzuolo, where by reaſon of the bad aire and other diſcommodities, they grew ſicke, and the Duke Montpenſier and great numbers of his people died, ſo that of fiue thouſand, fiue hundred hardly returned into France.

Montpenſier his death.

After the taking of Atella, Ferdinand diuided his army into ſundry parts, for the recouery of the reſt of the kingdome. Hee ſent Don Frederico of Arragon his vncle, and Proſpero Colonna before Caietta: Fabricio Colonna into Abruzzo, and himſelfe went and encamped before Salerno, where he made an accord with the Princes of Beſignano and Salerno. Conſaluo returned into Calabria, which for the moſt part was held by the French, where although the Lord Aubigni made ſome reſiſtance, yet at laſt being coopt vp in Gropoli, hauing loſt Mantredonia and certaine other townes, and deſpayring of all aide, he conſented to leaue Calabria, and was ſuffered to returne by land into France.

Aubigni is enforced to leaue Calabria to returne into France.

Thus, no other townes holding out in the whole Kingdome but Tarentum and Caietta, it ſeemed that Ferdinand had attained the height of his deſires, when comming to Somma a towne ſeated at the foote of Mount Veſuua, to viſit the Queene his wife, he fell grieuouſly ſicke, and was carried to Naples where within a while after he died: but before his death, he commanded the Biſhop of Theanas head, whom he kept in priſon, to be cut off, and fearing that they would not obey him by reaſon of his ſickneſſe, he cauſed the head to bee brought into his Chamber and with beholding it was ſatisfied. His vncle Frederick comming in haſt from Caietta to Naples with Melchior Treniſan, was by the Princes of the Realme ſaluted King, his Nephew dying without children. This Prince beloued of all men for his meekeneſſe labored to reconcile to himſelfe all thoſe who in any ſort had fauored the French, and freely reſtored their caſtles to them. In this manner winning the peoples hearts, the warre againſt the French in the Realme of Naples was almoſt ended, for the city of Tarentum, oppreſſed with famine, did with her caſtles yeeld to the Venetians, which beſeeged it by ſea, who preſently deliuered it to Frederick. Thoſe of Caietta within a while after, did the like; and by this meanes the French loſt the Realme of Naples. But this notwithſtanding, warre was not ended in Italy by reaſon of Piſa, in which the Venetians had placed foure hundred men at armes, ſeuen hundred light horſe, and two thouſand foot, againſt the Florentines. They went moreouer with the Emperour Maximillian to beſeege Liuorne, where their enterpriſe

A great deſire of reuenge.

Tarentum and Caietta yeeld to Frederick.

The Venetians hold Piſa.

ſucceeding

ſucceeding badly, they were enforced to diſcampe, and from thence, the Emperor returned with ſpeed into Germany, with ſmall honour to the Imperiall dignity, wherevpon he was contemned ouer all Italy.

King Charles likewiſe being diſpited with his loſſe and infamy, determined to aſſaile Genoa, preſuming vpon Baptiſta Fregoſa his party. The Pope on the other ſide, deſirous to poſſeſſe the Vrſins States, the chiefe of that family beeing imprisoned at Naples, did in open conſiſtory declare Virginio and the reſt traytors, and confiſcated their lands. This did no whit pleaſe the Venetians, who were very deſirous to winne the loue of that family, and draw them to their ſeruice: yet not daring to contradict the Pope, they were vnwilling at that time to allienate him from them: for notwithſtanding Lodouicos flatteries, hee could not but with griefe endure to let Piſa, which hee had purſued with ſuch labour, fall to their ſhare; wherevpon hee cauſed the Pope, and the Ambaſſadors to the Kings of Spaine (who were iealous of the Venetians greatneſſe) to propound the drawing of the Florentines into the league by reſtoring Piſa vnto them, ſeeing by other meanes they could not bee induced to it. The Venetian Ambaſſador with great earneſtneſſe oppugning this propoſition, the motion was daſht, for feare of looſing the Venetians friendſhip.

King Charles reſolueth to aſſaile Genoa.

Lodouicos practiſes againſt the Venetians.

But the hope of King Charles his returne into Italy beeing wholly loſt, and moſt of the Italians that held his party otherwiſe imployed, Lodouico hereby encouraged, did daily more and more diſcouer his hatred towards the Venetians concerning Piſa, inciting the Pope, and Kings of Spaine with greater efficacy to reuiue the motion of the reſtitution thereof: Herevnto he drew the Florentines, who to that end ſent their Ambaſſadors to Rome.

Lodouicos practiſes againſt the Venetians.

This treaty was continued there many daies where the Pope and Ambaſſadours of the King of Spaine, Duke of Milan, and King of Naples, did openly vrge the Venetian Ambaſſadour to this reſtitution, thereby to ioyne the Florentines to their party againſt the French, to the end that all ſeeds of diſcord being rooted out, no man might againe haue any cauſe to call the French into Italy.

But the Senate contradicting all this, and ſufficiently perceiuing from whom this earneſt motion proceeded, anſwered by the ſame Ambaſſadour, that it was a very daungerous matter to deliuer that City to the Florentines, whoſe mindes were ſtrictly vnited with the French, and that the ſurrendring of Piſa would not diuert their inclination: and alſo that thereby the fidelity of all the Confederates would be called in queſtion, who had taken vpon them to protect the Piſans, eſpecially the Venetians, who when others did ſhut their purſſes had freely opened theirs, and to defend them had ſpared for no coſt or labour, wherevpon it would bee great diſhonour to them to leaue them then and to falſifie their promiſe. Now whileſt this buſineſſe was treated betwixt the Confederates, a ſodaine accident happened in France, begetting ſundry and different effects in mens mindes. It was the death of King Charles, who on the ſeuenth day of Aprill died at Amboiſe, of an Apoplexie as hee ſtood looking on ſome of his Courtiers that plaied at tennis; and becauſe hee died without children, the crowne of France deſcended to Lewis Duke of Orleance, the next Prince of the bloud, as heire male. Italy by King Charles his death was ſomewhat freed from feare: for no man ſuppoſed that King Lewis the twelfth comming newly to the crowne, would at the beginning of his reigne make warre in Italy: But the ſame right to the Realme of Naples (hee being French King) belonged as well to him as to his Predeceſſor, and beſide that, the Dutchy of Milan which was his owne by ſucceſſion from his Grandmother Valentine.

The Senates anſwer to this motion.

The death of Charles the eight, French King.

Lewis Duke of Orleance French King.

After his Coronation, hee deſired nothing ſo much, as to conquer that Dutchy: and though from his infancy hee had euer carried that minde, yet his ſucceſſe at Nouara had much inkindled him, together with his hatred to Lodouico Sforza, by reaſon of his inſolent carriage towards him when hee was at Aſt. And for an introduction to his deſeigne, he did not onely intitle himſelfe King of France, Naples, Ieruſalem, both the Sicilies, but likewiſe Duke of Milan: This was as a ſummons to Frederick and Lodouico. Hee wrote letters full of friendly congratulation to the Pope, Venetians and Florentines concerning his comming to the crowne.

Lodouico

Theſe three ſeemed to bee highly pleaſed with thoſe letters, being deſirous to aduance and reuenge themſelues: Lodouico neuertheleſſe, though he knew that he had to doe with a rougher enemy, feeding himſelfe with hope, as Frederick of Arragon likewiſe did, that the new King would not ſo intend the affaires of Italy, did ſtill oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Venetians concerning Piſa, his hatred to them making him forget his owne future danger.

The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the French King.

The Venetians notwithſtanding his oppoſition choſe three Ambaſſadors to goe and congratulate the King for his comming to the crowne, and by way of excuſe to tell him, that the onely ſuſpition (and not without cauſe) which they had of King Charles, leaſt after the conqueſt of the Realme of Naples, he ſhould haue attempted that of all Italy, had enforced them to take armes againſt him: The Pope for the ſame purpoſe ſent a Nuncio into France, beeing deſirous to inueſt his ſonne Cæſar, then Cardinall, with temporall greatneſſe. The Florentines likewiſe, according vnto their antient cuſtome to the crowne of France, ſent Ambaſſadours thither: Wherevnto they were earneſtly ſolicited by Lodouico, who by their meanes thought to fruſtrate the Venetians practizes for Piſa, and alſo to mediate ſome accord betwixt himſelfe and the King.

The King did very louingly entertaine all theſe Ambaſſadours, and gaue them audience, concluding nothing till hee had firſt ſecured the Realme of France by new leagues with the Princes his neighbours. The Florentines in the meane time ſtill purſuing their deſeigne againſt the Piſans, their forces which lay Pontadera, hauing intelligence that certaine troupes gonne forth of Piſa, returned home-wards with great booty, went to intercept them, and meeting them, did put them to rout: but fifty men at armes of the Piſans comming on a ſodaine to reskew their fellowes, the Florentines were put to flight, many of their footmen ſlaine, many captaines taken priſoners, with the greateſt part of their cauallery.

Incounter betwixt the Florentines and Piſans.

During theſe troubles in Tuſcany, the Venetians reputation was euery where ſo augmented, as Coruin, ſonne to Mathias King of Hungary, ſent an Ambaſſadour to the Senate to certifie it that hee was very deſirous to make a perpetuall league of friendſhip with them, and to bee receiued into the number of the Venetian Gentlemen: This, propounded to the great Councell, was freely graunted.

Lodouico in the meane time fearing that the Venetians by reaſon of that defeate of the Florentines, would grow ſo great as it would bee an hard matter to repulſe them forth of Tuſcany, offered to releeue the Florentines: and to the ſame end was deſirous to know what prouiſions were neceſſary, not onely for defenſe, but to execute the enterprize of Piſa. For though at firſt hee did not determine openly for to releeue the Florentines, but onely to aide and ſuccor them ſecretly with money; yet, beeing tranſported with choller and diſdaine, vſing inſolent and threatning ſpeeches againſt the Venetians; hee reſolued openly for to declare himſelfe their friend: And therefore hauing firſt denied paſſage to their people, which went to Piſa, and enforced them to goe through the Duke of Ferrara's country, hee cauſed the Emperour to declare himſelfe their enemy, and procured the Pope to promiſe the Florentines to ſend them an hundred men at armes, and three Gallies, vnder the commaund of Captaine Villamarini, who ſhould keepe all victuails Lodouico openly declares himſelfe for the Florentines.

His practizes againſt the Venetians.

from

from entring into Piſa by ſea, yet afterwards delaying to ſend them he did at laſt openly refuſe it, fearing by fauoring them, to offend the Venetians, with whom he was deſirous to ioyne.

Moreouer, Lodouico did draw Giouan Bentiuole with the State of Bologna to his part, and cauſed the Florentines to take his ſonne Aleſſandro into their pay, together with Octauiano de Riare Lord of Imola and Furli, with an hundred and fifty men at armes. He did in like manner cauſe the Lukeſes to promiſe, neuer more to fauour the Piſans.

The Florentines hauing in vaine attempted to draw the Geneuois and Sienois to their ſide, went into the field vnder the command of Paulo Vitelli their General. The Piſans vnderſtanding that the Florentines were abroad, raiſed their campe from before Ponte di Succo, and went to Caſcina: where Vitelli placing an Ambuſcado, aſſailed them, and ſlew many Stradiots, and tooke Franco their captaine priſoner with an hundred horſe: In this manner did the Florentines annoy the city of Piſa, hauing taken diuers townes round about it, when they receiued ſome likely aduertizement from the Duke of Ferrara and others, that the Venetians would be content to harken vnto peace, prouided that they would proceed in the treaty, not as with their equals, but ſuperiors. They then ſent Ambaſſadors to Venice, to ſound their meaning. Guido Antonio Veſpuci, and Bernardo Rucelli two of the honorableſt Citizens went thither, who after kinde entertainment, beeing introduced to the Senate, after long diſputation, concerning meanes to ſatisfie both parties, neither the Venetians nor Florentine Ambaſſadors would propound any, referring themſelues to the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, who incited them to this accord: But the Venetians diſtaſting his opinion, the Florentines returned back without any ſatisfaction.

New treatie: on both ſides.

This treaty broken, the Venetians on the one ſide, and Florentines on the other, beganne to ſtrengthen their party with new leagues and treaties, the one with the Sienois, and the other with Pietro de Medicis and the Lord of Faenza, Lodouico ſtill ſhewing himſelfe very much affected to the Florentines.

The Venetians hope from Syenna and Perouſa being by this meanes fruſtrate, did by the aſſiſtance of Pietro de Medicis attempt to releeue Piſa, on Romagnias ſide, but in vaine. In the meane time Paulo Vitelli, Generall to the Florentines, tooke the towne and caſtle of Librafatta: whereat the Venetians being incenſed, ſought againe to draw the Marquis of Mantua to their pay, whom not long before they had diſmiſſed (he leauing them by meanes of Aluiana) the Florentines army being turned from Piſa, but ſo, as the whole burthen of warre fell vpon the Venetians, who wiſely procured meanes of agreement: For although the Florentine Ambaſſadors departed from Venice, hopeleſſe of any accord, yet at Ferrara a new treaty of compoſition was made, propounded by the Duke, at the Venetians intreaty.

The Florentines take Librafatta.

During theſe troubles in Italy by reaſon of Piſa the new French King made preparations againſt the next yeere to inuade the Dutchy of Milan, where he hoped to haue the Venetians on his ſide, who mortally hating Lodouico, did particularly negociate with him; ſo did the Pope, who ſent his ſonne (which had caſt of his Cardinals hat) into France, in ſecular habit, to carry a diſpenſation to the King to repudiate his wife Ioane, and to marry his Predeceſſors widdow. Cæſar Borgia came to the French Court in great pompe, where the King very honorably entertained him, giuing him a company of an hundred men at armes, a yeerely pention of 20000. French pounds, and made him Duke of Valence in Daulphine. Then deſirous to purſue his iourney into Italy, hee made peace with all Princes his neighbours, and eſpecially with the Kings of Spaine, who preſently called home not only all their Ambaſſadors from Italy (hee with the Pope excepted) but Gonſaluo with all his forces: The King likewiſe made an agreement with the Emperor, vnto whom, for his ſonne the Archdukes ſake hee promiſed promiſed to ſurrender the townes in Artois. Hee did moreouer confirme the peace made by his predeceſſor with the King of England.

Cæſar Borgia the Popes ſon is made Duke of Valencia by the French King.

Whileſt the Senate was buſied in prouiding for the releefe of Piſa, newes came to Venice that the Turke prepared a great fleet, which cauſed them to ſend an Ambaſſador to him: for they were afraide that hee was offended with them becauſe that toward the end of the precedent ſummer, Nicolo Priuli, Prouidator of their fleet had on the Ægean Sea ſunke a great ſhip belonging to one of his Baſhas which firſt aſſailed the Prouidator. Zancani, whom the Senate ſent, being come to Conſtantinople, had notice of the great numbers of veſſels which the Turke had cauſed to be armed: The great Lord curteouſly entertained him ſhewing no ſigne of diſcontent: He determined to aſſaile the Venetians whileſt they ſhould be buſied in Lombardy with making head againſt Lodouicos forces, who had promiſed to inuade them in thoſe parts.

Lodouico incites the Turke againſt the Venetians.

Zancani intreating him to renew the league with the Signory, hee the better to deceiue him, granted it, giuing him the Articles of the league written in Latin. Now their law ſaith, that they are not bound to performe any thing vnleſſe it be written in their owne language. Zancani aduertized thereof by Andrè Gritti, a Venetian Gentleman, skilfull in the Turkiſh lawes and cuſtomes, and for his bounty and other good parts beloued of that nation, hauing dwelt a long time at Conſtantinople, was by him in ſome ſort put in hope to haue them written in the Turkiſh tongue, but not obtayning his deſire, Zancani returned with the Articles in Latin, concealing what Gritti had told him, becauſe his iourney ſhould not be thought vaine.

Now the French King ſo ſoone as he had made peace with his neighbour Princes, and in his abſence ſecured his Realme, made a Confederacy with the Venetians (not mentioning Piſa as hee had done at the beginning) wherein it was concluded that at the ſame time as he with a mighty army ſhould inuade the Dutchy of Milan, they on the other ſide from their frontiers ſhould doe the like, and the Dutchy being won, Cremona with the country of Gyradade ſhould remaine to the Venetians, on this condition, that after this conqueſt they ſhould be bound to defend the King for a certaine time, with certaine number of horſe and foot, the King being bound to do the like for Cremona and whatſoeuer they poſſeſſed in Lombardy. This contract was ſo ſecretly made, as Lodouico, nor yet the Pope who was very inward with the King, could (but very late) haue any certaine knowledge thereof.

League betwixt the French and Venetians.

Capitulation of the league.

The King, not mentioning Piſa, did afterwards propound conditions to the Florentines farre different from the former; wherevpon they reſolued to rely on the Duke of Milan, by whoſe aſſiſtance their affaires proſpered in the Caſentine territory, where they were Lords, their enemies hauing beene inforced to abandon the townes by reaſon of great difficulties.

Lodouico who neuer imagined that the Venetians would haue leagued themſelues with the French King, who was greater and more potent then they, and leaſt of all change his neighbourhood for that of the French, was wonderfully danted when he vnderſtood that the league betwixt the King and Venetians was reſolued, hee not knowing the particularities thereof. Hee was then ready to ſend Franceſco of Sanſeuerine with great forces to aide the Florentines, but hee detained them, vpon intelligence that Triuulcio leauied ſouldiers neere Aſt. Hee likewiſe thought that if the accord betwixt the Venetians and Florentines ſhould take effect, they would peraduenture moderate their indignation conceiued againſt him, and forſake the French King. Herein hee imployed Hercules D' Æſte Duke of Ferrara his father in law, and by forcible reaſons enforced the Florentines in ſome ſort to condeſcend to the Venetians deſire, ſending them word that if they did not agree, he ſhould be conſtrained for feare of the French King, to call home thoſe forces he had ſent to aide them.

Lodouico amazed at the league, goes about to diuert the Venetians from it.

Hercules

Hercules the better to effect it came in perſon to Venice, whither Ludouico ſent his Agents, and from the Florentins Giouan Baptiſta Rydolfi, and Paulo Antonio Soderini, two of the wiſeſt and chiefeſt Citizens came thither: all which, after long diſputation concerning the meanes to be obſerued in that accord, made an abſolute compromiſe for eight daies, in the perſon of Hercules Duke of Ferrara, who hauing well conſidered the matter, did on the ſixth of Aprill pronounce his ſentence. But the Venetians, not ſatisfied therewith, in regard of the ſmall conſideration had of their expences in warre; nor yet the Piſans, who obtained nothing but a ſeruile kind of liberty, contrary to the intention of moſt of the Venetian nobility; nor the Florentines, who thought themſelues ouer burthened, for that they were to repay part of their expenſes who had vniuſtly moleſted them, it tooke none effect, notwithſtanding that the Venetians and Florentines had ſigned and ratified it, becauſe that the Piſans determined to endure all extremity rather then to returne vnder the Florentines command; being thereunto ſecretly incited by the Geneuois, Lukeſes, and by Pandolfo Petrucci. And ſo ſoone as they vnderſtood the tenure of the ſentence, being wonderfully incenſed againſt the Venetians, they tooke the gard of the Cities fortes, and gates, from their ſouldiers, and would no longer ſuffer them to lodge in the City. The Florentines, deſpayring by this accord to obtaine Piſa, reſolued to win it by force. King Lewis in the meane time commanded his forces to march into Italy, his army conſiſted of 1600. Launces, 5000. Swiſſes, 4000. Gaſcons, and 4000. out of the other parts of France, whereof Giouan Iacomo Triuulcio was made Generall: This army comming before the fort of Arazza, ſeated on the riuer Tanare, took it in a ſhort ſpace, notwithſtanding that there were fiue hundred footmen in it: from thence it went to Anon, a little towne betwixt Aſt and Alexandria vpon the ſame Riuer, which beeing battered in foure ſeuerall places, was in two daies taken by force, notwithſtanding that the Duke of Milan ſome few monthes before had well fortified it, and placed ſeuen hundred men in Garriſon there. The King came after as farre as Lyons, intending to paſſe the mounts, from whence he ſent an Ambaſſador to Venice, for to accompany the Venetian army whether ſoeuer it marched; to which ſo ſoone as it was ready, Melchior Treuſan, and Marc Antonio Moroſini were ſent as Prouidators: And the Senate preſented this French Ambaſſador, with a gallant horſe ritchly capariſond, a pauilion for the field, and two pounds of gold.

The Florentines reſolution concerning Piſa.

The French King with his army comes into Italy vnder Triuulcio his command.

The Venetians hauing intelligence of Triuulcio his good ſucceſſe, cauſed their army to march, conſiſting of ſeuen thouſand horſe, and as many foot, which vnder the command of Aluiana, hauing croſſed the Oglio, and entred the enemy country, did in a ſhort ſpace take diuers townes and caſtles; and comming before Carauagia, the chiefe City of the country, tooke it by force, with other townes neere the Riuer Adda.

The number of the Venetian army.

The end of the fifth Booke of the fourth Decade.

The Contents of the ſixth Booke of the fourth Decade.

Odouico is troubled with the newes of the league betwixt the French King and Venetians againſt him. Alexandria is taken by the French. The Milaneſes reuolt, and Triuulcio entreth Milan for the King. The Venetians take Cremona. King Lewis comes to Milan. The Venetians fleet againſt Bajazeth. It ſuſtaines great hurt by fire. The Turke takes Lepanto. Lodouico is receiued into Milan by the diſloyalty of the Inhabitants. Lodouico, going forth of Nouara, is taken by the French and ſent priſoner into France. The Venetians great warre with Bajazeth. The Venetians through want of winde at ſea loſe the battaile. The Turke takes Modon. Coron and the fort of Iunca are yeelded to the Turke on compoſition. Naples in Morea, beſeeged by the Turke, is brauely defended. The Iſle of Samothrace yeeldeth to the Venetians. They take the City of Cephalonia. Confederacy betwixt Ladiſlaus King of Hungary and the Venetians againſt the Turke: Peace betwixt the Venetians and Turke: The Portugals traffick to Calicut for ſpices: The caſtles of Moua and Faenza are re-deliuered to the Venetians: The Pope complaines againſt the Venetians in regard of the Cities of Romagnia: And laſtly, are ſet downe the Venetians Ambaſſadors inuectiue to the Emperour Maximillian and French King againſt the Pope.

The ſixth Booke of the fourth Decade, of the Hiſtory of Venice.

THeſe newes did greatly afflict Lodouico Sforza, putting him in feare of his State: who loſt (as it often happeneth in ſodaine Aduerſities) both courage and councell, flying to bootleſſe and vnprofitable remedies.

He ſent an Ambaſſador to Venice to vſe ſome meanes to pacifie the Senate. This Ambaſſador comming firſt to Ferrara, Duke Hercules ſent one of his Gentlemen before to the Senate with Lodouicos letters, intreating them to ſuffer his Ambaſſador to come thither: The contents of his letters were, that himſelfe and his brother Aſcanio ſent an Ambaſſador to them on great and important affaires, requeſting them to giue him audience. The Senate hauing read both their letters, commanded the Ferrarois preſently to leaue the City, and gaue Lodouicos letters to the French Ambaſſador.

The Venetians refuſe to giue audience to Lodouicos Ambaſſador.

At the ſame time Frederick King of Naples did by his Ambaſſador acquaint the Senate with his deſire to ſend fiue hundred horſe to Lodonicos aide. The Senate told the Ambaſſador, that hee ſhould make his King this anſwer; That the Cauallery he intended to ſend to the Duke of Milan would doe him ſmall good, he hauing need of farre greater forces; and that if he ſhould ſend him any, they would take it as a wrong done to themſelues: adding, that there was no man liuing who had receiued more fauors and benefits of them, then hee; which he had requited with ingratefull iniuries: That the time was now come when God was his enemy, whom hee had ſo often offended by his diſloyalty and periury, and that therefore his King ſhould doe much better to leaue him to him ſelfe.

In the end, Lodouico, fruſtrate of all hope, made meanes to the people of Milan, who extreamely hated him for his great exactions: and hauing aſſembled them, he did acquit and releaſe part of his impoſts to them, and thereunto added very earneſt ſpeeches to winne their loues, which were heard with more attention then profit: that done, hee enroled all thoſe in the City that were able to beare armes.

The Venetian army in the meane time ſtill preuailed, and after the taking of the towne and caſtle of Carauagia, croſſed the Riuer Adda, on a bridge of boats, and made incurſions as farre as Lodi. The French army on the other ſide beſeeged Alexandria, where Galleas, Lodouicos ſonne in law, lay with twelue hundred men at armes, twelue hundred light horſe and three thouſand foot, who the third night after the ſeege, acquainting none of his captaines with his intent, but only Maluezza, did ſecretly flie from Alexandria to Milan, with certaine light-horſe. His departure knowne in the city, as many as tarried behind beganne, in tumultuous manner, ſome to flie, others to hide themſelues: wherevpon the French army entring it by day breake, did not only ranſacke the ſouldiers, but ſack't the whole city.

The taking of Alexandria cauſed thoſe of Placentia to ſend their Commiſſioners to Triuulcio with their Cities keyes; the like did thoſe of Pauia, and all other townes round about. There was the like confuſion at Milan as in other places, where the foot companies demanding pay, Lodouico ſent them to his cheefe Treaſurer, who giuing them no ſatisfaction was by them wounded and left for dead.

Lodouico determineth to flie into Germany.

This accident did ſo terrifie Lodouico, as he ſent his children to Coma, together his with miſtris, (for his wife was dead) Cardinall Aſcanio his brother, and Cardinal Sanſeuerine brother to Galeas, and from thence into Germany, himſelfe reſoluing ere long to goe thither. The Milaneſes perceiuing Lodouico to deſtruſt his owne forces, made an aſſembly in their towne-houſe, where they appointed foure of the chiefe among them to take order for their affaires. Theſe comming to Lodouico told him that they were reſolued to yeeld to the French King ſeeing that in diſtruſt he had ſent his children and family forth of the City: So ſoone as he heard this, he cauſed pay to be giuen to fiue hundred light-horſe and with teares in his eyes, departed with them and Galeas of Sanſeuerin his ſonne in law towards Germany. He was ſcarce gonne forth of the caſtle, when Count Gayazza came to him, and the better to collour his diſloyalty told him, that he now thought himſelfe freed from the martiall oth which he had made him, ſeeing that he abandoned his State, and that he was now at liberty to goe whether it pleaſed him; and at the very inſtant not tarrying for an anſwer, went his way to ſerue the French King, with the ſame company which he had leauied and entertained at Lodouicos coſt. Before his departure from Milan, hee left Bernardin de Corte of Pauia, whom he had brought vp of a child, to gard the caſtle, whereof he was then Gouernor, with three thouſand footmen, vnder captaines whom he greatly truſted, with prouiſion of victuals, munition, and money ſufficient to defend it for a long time, preferring this man before his brother Aſcanio, who had offered to take that charge vpon him.

Count Gayazza takes the Kings part.

Milan receiues Triuulcio for the King.

Foure daies after his departure Triuulcio, ſent for by the Milaneſes, entred the City, where he was receiued with great ioy, reſeruing the capitulations till the Kings comming; all other townes of the Dutchy which yet held out, yeelded on a ſodaine. The Venetians comming nere Cremona, the townesmen ſent to entreate them to grant them ſome reſpit to conſider vpon their yeelding. This granted, they ſent to Triuulcio, to requeſt him to receiue them for the King, for they abhorred the Venetians gouernment but anſwered, that by agreement made betwixt the King and them, that city was theirs, the chiefeſt Citizens, with the Biſhop and Clergy, went to the Gates and there receiuing the Prouidators, placed them vnder a Canopy, and in this manner accompanied them through the City to their lodging, where they intreated the Venetians to free them from the taxes and impoſitions wherewith Lodouico had oppreſt them, the which was preſently granted.

Cremona yeeldeth to the Venetians.

There is in that City, a very ſtrong caſtle which being well furniſhed with all neceſſaries, it was a hard matter to take it. Antonio Battaglione was Gouernor there, vnto whom Lodouico had committed the guard of that place. The next day the Prouidators ſent to him, willing him to yeeld vp the caſtle to the Venetian State: at firſt he made refuſall, but after ſundry meſſages too and fro, the Prouidators entred it by meanes of an hundred and fifty pounds of gold, which they paied him, ſome in hand, and the reſt by promiſe, with letters of a Venetian Gentlemans place, and an houſe in Venice, and an other in the country neere to Padua with diuers other lands.

The caſtle of Cremona yeeldeth to the Venetians, vpon recompince.

The ſame day that the Venetians entred the caſtle of Cremona, Triuulcio did the like into that of Milan, which was yeelded vnto him by Berdardino de Corte, with al Lodouicos and Galleas ritch mouables in recompence of a certaine ſumme of money, a company of an hundred Launces, and a perpetuall penſion.

The caſtle of Milan doth the like to Triuulcio for money.

Cremona

Cremona obeying the Venetians, the Senate ſent two Preſidents thither to gouerne it, and to doe iuſtice, Dominico Treuiſan, and Nicola Foſcarini were ſent thither: and beſide theſe, two Ambaſſadors were choſen, and all foure of them appointed to goe to Milan to receiue the King, and in the States name to congratulate his new conqueſt; ſo ſoone as he ſhould ariue there.

The King receiuing newes at Lyons of ſuch fortunate ſucceſſe his expectation, rode preſently in poſt to Milan, where receiued with in credible ioy, hee granted to the people, vnreaſonable in their demands, exemption from diuers taxes, but not from all, as they vainely preſumed, and gaue great rewards to many Milaneſe Gentlemen, and among others to Triuulcio, vnto whom he gaue Vigeua and other townes, in acknowledgement of his deſert. All the Potentates of Italy went thither to him (King Frederick excepted) ſome perſonally and ſome by Ambaſſadors, ſome to congratulate his happy ſucceſſe, and others to cleere themſelues from imputation of inclyning to Lodouico Sforza more then to him, and others likewiſe to ſecure their owne euer after. The King gently receiued them all, and compounded with them all, but after different manner, according to the diuerſity of the conditions, and greatneſſe of the profit he expected from them. But whileſt theſe things were done in Lombardy, the Senate hauing intelligence that Bajazeth armed by ſea and land, made Antonio Grimany Generall of their Naual army, commanding him ſpeedily to depart.

King Lewis comes in poſt to Milan.

All the Princes of Italy come to him to Milan.

He vnwilling to prolong his iourney for want of money, their treaſure beeing much waſted by continuall warre, lent the State foure ſcore pounds of gold to pay the marriners and other officers of the fleet, and promiſed to carry as much with him to Corfou and other places to ſupply the fleets want when need ſhould be.

The Venetians ſend a fleet againſt the Turkes.

Thoſe of Corfou vpon intelligence that the Turkiſh fleet was vnder ſaile, and that the State was not able in a ſhort ſpace to ſet forth a Nauy able to reſiſt it offered men and money to arme three ſcore veſſels, prouided that the Senate would furniſh them with bread and ordnance. The Senate willingly accepted this offer, and command a florin of gold to be giuen to euery man which ſhould enter into thoſe veſſels.

The Gouernor of Zara aduertized the Senate that two thouſand Turkiſh horſe were entred on their confines, and had taken great numbers of the country people, ſtill continuing their incuſions. The arriuall of the Turkiſh cauallery on the Zaratin made the Venetians thinke that they would not at that time beſeege Rhodes. Wherevpon, they forthwith made two Prouidators, namely, Franceſco Cicogna for Morea and Romania, and Andrea Loredano for Corfou: and beſide theſe, Andrea Zancani was with forces ſent into Frioull, becauſe they had intelligence that the Turke determined to come thither.

The Turke on the Zaratin confines.

In the meane time, the Turkiſh fleet came forth of the Streight, conſiſting of more then two hundred three ſcore and tenne ſaile, and beeing come neere Negrepont, directed it courſe towards Romagnia, the great Lord being there in perſon, who before his departure from Andrinople, commanded all the Venetians which were in Conſtantinople to bee impriſoned, and amongſt others Andrè Gritti (before mentioned) who was more ſtreighty looked to then any other, for that in loue to his Country, he had by letters written in caractery aduertized the Gouernor of Lepanto of al the Turks proceedings againſt his country, which had like to haue coſt him his life. Grimani hauing ſpeedily aſſembled all the veſſels which were in the Iſlands neere adioyning, made vp the number of forty ſix Gallies, ſeuenteene great marchant ſhips, and forty other leſſer ones, with as many brigantines and light veſſels, and anchoring at Modon, had an eye on euery ſide vpon the Turke.

Andrea Gritti impriſoned.

The number of the Venetian fleet.

Hauing intelligence that the enemy was comming to ſeeke him, hee ſailed with all his nauy towards the Isle of Sapienza oppoſite to Modon: and there embattailed his fleete, and hauing giuen order for all matters neceſſary for fight himſelfe went ſomewhat forward with foure Gallies, the Turkiſh fleet being not farre from thence, which with the winde hee might haue aſſailed at his pleaſure: yet he deferred the fight and returned backe to Modon: where after that the Turke had in a few daies made two or three ſeuerall brauadoes, Grimani ordered his fleete, reſoluing to fight with him, when at the very inſtant Andrea Loretano with eleauen Brigantines and foure great ſhips arriued; hee came to Grimani and told him that hee was come to doe ſeruice to the State, intreating him to commaund what hee would haue him doe. Hee was a valliant Gentleman, and skilfull marriner, and at his arriuall the whole fleete made great ſignes of ioy. The Generall placed him in one of the great ſhips.

The two fleets nere together.

Albano Armerico commanded an other great ſhippe, who in open Councell was enioyned by the Generall to aſſaile the enemies biggeſt ſhip, which he performed, and Loretan an other, who grapled with it to fight more conueniently: and in the bickering wild fire was throwne into the enemies ſhip which beeing on fire, was by the winde carried amongſt the Venetians and fiered them: This accident did more hurt to the Venetians then Turkes, becauſe that they did eaſily ſaue their men with other ſmall veſſels, but our men could not bee reskewed in time, ſo that they all perriſhed, ſome few excepted with Tomaſo Duodo recouered in his long boate, Albano was ſaued by the Turkes.

The Venetian fleet hurt by fire.

Grimani wonderfully troubled with this loſſe, ſounded the retreate, and without any farther fight retired to the Iſle of Podroma: the Turkiſh fleet for a time remained in the ſelfe ſame place where it had fought. Albano, brought to Conſtantinople was ſolicited by Bajazeth to turne Turke, which he boldly refuſing to doe, was ſawed a ſunder in the middle and ſo conſtantly died.

Turkiſh cruelty.

The French King, ſolicited by the great Maſter of Rhodes (whether it was reported the Turke would come) to releeue him, diſpatched two and twenty Gallies, which beeing rigged in Prouence ſailed towards Rhodes. But that Iſland needing no ſupplies as then, they did by the Kings commaund ioyne with the Venetian fleet. The Venetians and French comming to Zant, reſolued to aſſaile the Turkiſh fleet which lay at Tornes: but drawing neere it, perceiuing that the enemies veſſels lay with their poopes to land ward, and their prowes towards the ſea, filled ſixe ſmall vnſeruiceable veſſels with reedes and other combuſtible matter mingled with wilde fire, and ſent them before the winde vpon the enemies fleet, but it ſucceeded not according to their hope. And Grimani in the meane time omitted a ſecond opportunity to fight with, and vanquiſh the enemy, whereupon, an other being ſent into his place, and himſelfe cited to Venice, he was committed to the examination of the Councell de Pregati. The Turkiſh fleet went forward to Lepanto, whither the Emperour was already come, and by the arriuall of his veſſels hauing beguirt the towne by ſea and land, thoſe within it deſpayring of releeſe, and wanting all neceſſaries, yeelded. Theſe newes did greatly trouble the Venetians, and augmented their hatred toward Grimani, euery man ſaying, if he had done his duty, the enemies fleet would haue beene defeated.

Grimani loſeth his place of Generall.

Lepanto yeeldeth to the Turke.

The Turkiſh Cauallery on the other ſide, ſcouring the confines of Zara, entred Frioull to ſpoile and waſt, and finding the country not defended, ſpoiled and burned all places as farre as Liuenza, where they tooke many priſoners: vpon theſe newes Zancani with great forces was ſent to the frontiers.

Seuen thouſand of the enemies horſe came in troupes through very badde waies into Hiſtria, and then croſſing the Riuer Liuenza, came and encamped nere vnto Gradiſca, where Zancani lay, determining if hee came into the field to fight fight with him. But the enemies Generall perceiuing that he meant not to come forth, ſent two thouſand horſe to waſt and ſpoile the Cuntry, whom hee commanded to make no long ſtay.

Theſe diſperſing themſelues ouer that goodly Contrey, tooke many priſoners burning and waſting many Contrey houſes, both on the Treuiſan and Paduan territories. Three hundred Albaneſe horſe ſallied forth of Vdina, and defeated ſome hundred of the Turkes, if Zancani with his forces had done the like, the Turke would haue receiued a great ouerthrow, but he would not ſuffer any one to goe forth of the Towne: whereof, accuſed at Venice, hee was ſent for thither as a priſoner, and by a Decree of Senate confind for foure yeares to Padua.

Zancani confined to Padua

On ſuch termes ſtood the Venetian State at home and abroad, when Ceſar Borgia with the King and Senates forces, went into Romagnia to beſeege certaine townes which of right did belong to the Church, & being conquered Pope Alexander gaue them to his ſonne.

This Borgia, was a Cardinall (as hath beene ſayd) and caſting off his robe and Hatte of Cardinall, married a wife in France. Hee comming before Imola and Furli, after ſome aſſaults enforced the inhabitants to yeeld; but the Caſtles which were very ſtrong held out longer, eſpecially that of Furli, for the other yeelded ſooner.

The Senate in the meane time to ſecure their owne territories during the warre in Romagnia, ſent three thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe to Rauenna, vnder Aluianaes command, to diſtribute them through the territories of the Confederates neere adioyning, with two prouidators, Franceſco Capello and Chriſtophoro Moro, the one for Arimini, and the other for Faenza: So ſoone as Borgia had taken the Caſtle of Furli, Gionan Sforza Lord of Peſſare, knowing that Borgia hated him, fearing leaſt he would come and aſſaile him, was deſirous to commit himſelfe and State to the Venetians protection. The Senate anſwered that they would neuer defend one that had been ſo great an enemy to them: for he had concealed the Ambaſſador which Lodouico ſent to the Turke againſt the State of Venice, and furthered his paſſage: The like had hee done by the Turkes meſſenger ſent to Lodouico, whom he entertained in his houſe, and cauſed him ſecretly to be conducted to Milan, himſelfe likwiſe hauing often acquainted the Turke with the occurrents in Venice.

Borgia deferred his puniſhment till ſome other time, becauſe Triuulcio was inforced to call back thoſe troopes which hee had lent him, by reaſon of ſome tumults feared in Milan, in regard of Lodouicos arriual, who had brought ſome ſmal aid forth of Germany, with which, and by their aſſiſtance who diſtaſted the French, he hoped to recouer what he had loſt. The Senate preſently commanded their forces, both horſe and foot, to paſſe into the Cremoneſe, leuied three thouſand Suiſſes, and appointed Pietro Marſello and Chriſtophoro Moro prouidators in that warre.

Lodouico re. ſumes armes with forces out of Germany.

Lodouico comming at the ſame time to Coma, tooke it without ſtrokes: for the French within it fearing to be ſhut in betwixt the Inhabitants, and Lodouicos troopes, went their way. Hee ſent his brother Aſcanio before to Milan, from whence the King, not long before, was gone home into France; hauing left a ſtrong Garriſon in the Citty, and Triuulcio his Gouernour Generall in the Dutchy: but the Lombards not ſo well rewarded by the King as they had expected, prooued falſe to him & refuſed to obey Triuulcio, who was cheefe of the Guelph faction, for the Gibeline party was very ſtrong in the Citty: whereupon, the moſt of the Nobility and people, deſirous of innouation, wiſht for Lodouicos returne, and openly proclaimed his name, and ſo ſoone as they heard of the loſſe of Coma, and that Aſcanio was not farre from Milan, the people roſe, and the cheefe of the Gibelline faction, began to tumult: ſo as Triuulcio was glad to retire to the Caſtle: and the night following from thence to Nouara.

Lodouico recouereth Coma

The

Lodonico entreth Milan by the disloialty of the Inhabitants.

The morrow after Cardinall Ascanio entred Milan, Lodouico followed him, who by this meanes recouered it as easily as it was lost; Pauia and Parma presently ecchoed his name: Lodi and Placentia would haue done the like, had not the Venetian companies by their arriuall preuented it. The Senate aduertised of this reuolt, determined to send a man of worth to command the Castle of Cremona. Lodouico in the meane time, desirous to haue the Senate his friend, made sute that Ascanio his brother might send the Bishop of Cremona to Venice, to offer them his seruice: but it was in vaine, for the Senate resolued not to quitte the French Kings confederacy. The Genois refused to obey him, and the Florentines contemned him.

The King sends an army to recouer Milan.

The King in the meane time hauing intelligence of the rebellion of Milan, vsed great speed and sent the Lord Trimouille into Italy with six hundred lances, leuied great numbers of Suisses, and appoynted the Cardinall of Ambois his Lieuetenant Generall beyond the mounts, who comming to Ast, had in short space assembled one thousand fiue hundred lances, ten thousand Suisse, and 6000. French vnder the command of the Lords Trimouille, Trivulcio and Ligni.

Lodouico before these supplies came from France, went and beseeged Nouara, which hee tooke, but not the Castle. The French Army assembled at Mortara drew neere him, and did cut off his victualls: then both sides falling to blowes, Lodouico was enforced to retire into the Citty; where the Suisses mutined for want of pay; hee being not able to pacifie them. They told him that they would sodenly depart home into their country; wherevpon hee earnestly entreated them to safe-conduct him to some secure place, which they denying did at last consent that hee should march amongst them disguised like one of their footmen, and in this maner marching amiddest their troopes was by them discouered to those that sought after him, who presently apprehended him as the Kings prisoner and sent him into France to the tower of Loches,

Lodouico is taken prisoner by the French and sent away into France.

His brother Ascanio followed him, who taken by the Venetians and carried to Venice was deliuered to the King and sent into France, where hee was more honorably and with greater curtesie entertayned then his brother, for hee was sent prisoner to the great tower of Bourges, where the same King had beene imprisoned two whole yeares: yet afterwards hee was enlarged, but this brother dyed in prison.

Now to returne to the Turks. After the taking of Lepanto, the Senate despatcht Lodouico Manenti, Secretary to the Councell of ten, to Bajazeth, to complaine for that hee had without cause inuaded them by sea, and had contrary to the treaty of peace made not long before with him in the Signories name by Andrew Zancani their Ambassador, and to entreate him to enlarge the Venetian Marchants, which by his commandement at the beginning of the warre had beene imprisoned. That it might likewise please him to surrender Lepanto vnto them, which hee vniustly had taken from them. And lastly if hee would grant none of these, yet at least to renue the League with them.

Lodouico Manenti sent to the great Turk

The cause which mooued the Venetians to send Manenti.

Two things moued the Senate to send this Ambassage; the one, because some that were very inward with the great Lord, had written to them, that if they sent an Ambassador to Constantinople, they might be reconciled to his fauour: the second, for that they considered how chargeable it would bee for them, if they should bee enforced to set forth a new Army against him, their treasure both publick and particular beeing exhausted. Whereby all their attempts would proue vaine and vnprofitable against so mighty an enemy.

The Turks answer to Manenti.

Manenti ariuing at Constantinople, all his demandes were crost: for the Turke answered, that if the Venetians were desirous of peace with him, they should deliuer vnto him, Modon, Coron, and Naples, three Cities which they held in Morea, and pay vnto him as his tributaries an hundred pound in gould yearely: otherwise hee protested to make warre vppon them.

With

with this anſwer Manenti returned. But becauſe at Manenti his departure from Venice, there was a report, that great numbers of Turkiſh horſe were come into Albania: the Senate fearing leaſt the deſire to ſpoile the Country of Frioul, might draw them thither, as the precedent yeare, appointed Pietro Doria, and Angelo Barozzi Prouidators, who taking along with them the Gouernor of Vdina and others of the Country ſhould conſult together about repairing and fortifying the townes and wayes neceſſary and fit to repulſe the enemy; giuing them for aſſiſtants Aluiana with his light horſe, and Gurlin of Rauenna with two thouſand foote. Pietro Marcello likewiſe one of the Prouidators of the Army in Lombardy, was commanded to carry forces into Frioul, but the Turkes came not thither at that time, becauſe their Emperour called home their Generall to Conſtantinople.

The Venetians take order for the defence of Frioul.

This report againe reuiued about Midſommer, that the Turkiſh army was in field to waſte the Venetians confines, Count Petillan with a great part of the forces, and Giouan Baptiſta Caracciola Colonell of the States Fantery, did by the Senates command march into Frioull, where all the inhabitants of the plaines retired with their goods to the Caſtles and ſtrong Townes: yet the enemies came not thither, eyther for that they had intelligence, that the townes were fortified, or elſe beeing imployed by their Emperor in the warre of Peloponeſſus.

Manenti was newly returned to Venice, when the Senate fearing to looſe the Iſle of Corfou, ſent Angelo Quirini and Lodouico Canalis, with a hundred foote to gard the two fortes of the Iſland which are ſeated on two Promontaries neere one another, and not farre from the Citty, beeing ſo ſmall, as they needed no greater forces to defend them. Newes was afterwards brought that the Turkiſh fleete which had wintered at Lepanto much increaſed, determined to ſaile into Morea (their Emperor beeing with them in perſon) to take thoſe townes which hee had demanded of Manenti.

Supplies ſent to Corfou.

The deſeigne of the Turkiſh fleete.

Herevpon the Senate commanded ten great Galleys, and foure great ſhips to bee made ready vnder the command of Iacomo Venieri, with a particular Captaine to euery veſſell, whoſe pay was augmented, the better to incite them to goe the voyage. Rowers were ſent for from the firme land, and money giuen to pay the fleete, diuerſe Brigantines and other leſſer veſſels apt for warre, were rig'd to attend vpon the fleete. Melchior Treuiſan which lay not farre from Cephalonia, to keepe out all Turkiſh ayde, beeing aſſured of the enemies deſeigne, made ſpeedy meanes to ſend men, victuals and ordnance from Candy to Naples, becauſe all men thought that the Turke would make his firſt attempt there: hee likewiſe ſent victuals to Modon.

The Modonois hauing waſted the countrey round about their Citty, and burnt the houſes, becauſe the enemy ſhould not make vſe of them, builded a Forte neere to the Hauen, to keepe the enemies veſſels from the walls, leauing but a little ſpace at the entrie of the hauen, for one ſhip to come in at once. Melchior Treuiſan beeing come to Zant, ſent for the whole fleete thither, conſiſting of ſeuenty veſſels, both Galleys and ſhips of burthen: but that of the Turke in number more then two hundred, comming to the confines of Naples, had ſent part of the cauallery before by land to ſcoure as far as the city. The horſe within the town to the number of one thouſand fiue hundred, made a ſally vpon the enemies, and in a manner defeated them all. Therevpon, the enemy leauing Naples went to Modon, from whence hee ſent forces to beſiege Iunca, which is a Caſtle ſeated on a hill with a hauen beneath it ſome ten mile from Modon. Thoſe within it hauing beene newly ſupplyed with men and victuals by Ieronimo Contaren the Prouidator did brauely repulſe the enemies, ſo as deſpairing to take it, they returned to their fleet. In the meane time Melchior Treuiſan fell ſick and dyed neere to Cephalonia, wherevpon by a Generall conſent, Contaren the Prouidator was choſen to command the Army, till the Senate had otherwiſe prouided.

Thoſe of Modon fortifie againſt the Turke.

Melchior Treuiſan his death.

The

The Turke came and aſſailed the Burrow of Modon, and with his Canon did beat downe a great part of the wall, thoſe within it being out of hope to defend the breach carried away all their goods into the Citty, and abandoned it. The enemy entred it, and hoping ere long to become Lord of all, did without intermiſſion batter the walles of the Citty.

Whileſt this ſiege laſted, Contaren left Zant, determining if it were poſſible to releeue Modon, or at leaſt to annoy the enemies fleete, whoſe great ſhips lay neere Sapienza, and the Galleys and other leſſer veſſels in the Hauen of Iunca: So ſoone as the Venetian deſcried them, hee reſolued to fight with them, and ordering his fleete, did brauely ſet forward. The Turke ſeeing them to come on, receiued them with an hundred Galleys, the fight was ſharpe and cruell, victory inclining to the Venetians, ſo as the Turkes were once ready to make towards the ſhore and flie. But the misfortune was, that whileſt they fought the winde ſlackned, whereby the ſhippes of burthen could neither goe backward nor forward, and part of the Galleys durſt not come vp to them: the Turkes ſeeing this, tooke courage and renued the fight for three houres ſpace, till night, one great Venetian Galley was ſunke, and an other taken, but all her men ſlaine, who alone had fought all night with the enemy. Contarens Galley beeing ſhotte thorow both ſides, and a great leake in her, himſelfe leapt into an other and retired to Zant, to trim his veſſels which were much bruzed.

Peſare Generall of the Venetian fleet.

The Senate hauing notice of Treuiſans ſickneſſe and death, choſe Benedetto Peſare to ſucceed him, who receiuing money to pay the Army, departed from Venice three dayes after his election. Contaren hauing trim'd his Galleys, reſolued to releeue Modon, fearing leaſt the beſieged diſpairing of helpe ſhould yeeld to the enemy: Hee choſe fiue Galleys out of the whole fleete, which hee loded with all neceſſaries: yet before their departure, hee thought good to aduertiſe the beſieged thereof, that they might bee ready to receiue ſupplies. To this end hee ſent a valiant and couragious fellow in a Frigate with tenne Oares: Hee at noone dayes paſſed thorow the enemies fleete, euen in their view, and entred Modon, dooing his meſſage.

Supplies enter into Modon.

The next day Contaren with the whole fleete, ſayled towards Modon, and beeing in ſight of the enemy, hee called for the Captaines of thoſe fiue Galleys, intreating them valiantly to releeue the beſieged, foure of them with great difficulty paſſing thorow the middeſt of the enemies, entred the Hauen; the fifth, ſlower then the reſt, perceiuing diuerſe of the enemy Galleys to come vp towards her, returned to the fleet.

The Modonois greatly cheered, ranne preſently to the Hauen to receiue thoſe ſupplies and to carry them into the Citty, and they were ſo earneſt in it, as thoſe on the other ſide of the Citty which were on the walls forſooke their guard, and ranne thither likewiſe, ſo as the walls were bared of defence; which the enemy perceiuing, and loth to let ſlippe ſo faire an occaſion, reared Ladders, and entred the Citty, killing ſome few that reſiſted. This being knowne, the Townesmen and Soldiers ranne vppon them, and fought valiantly with them a long time in the middeſt of the Citty, killing great numbers of them. But the multitude of enemies ſtill increaſing, and all the ſtreetes ſtopt, the Chriſtians were in a manner all cut in peeces. Thoſe which eſcaped the ſlaughter, fired the Citty, and with it burnt themſelues and goods.

The Turke takes Modon.

In this manner was the Citty of Modon taken: The Venetian Magiſtrate beeing tyed in chaines, was by the Turkes command carried to Iunca, to bee ſeene of the Captaine of the Caſtle, and all thoſe within it, who thervpon yeelded, their liues and goods ſaued. As the Venetian fleet returned towards Zant, an horrible tempeſt aroſe, which diſperſed them into ſundry farre Iſlands, euen to Candie, their maſts, rudders and tacklings beeing all broken in peices. Modon taken,

The Caſtle of Iunca yeelded to the Turks.

taken, the Turke ſent one of his Baſchas and part of his fleet to Coron, who told them that if vppon honorable compoſition the would yeeld before he beſeeged them, he would vſe them curteouſly, otherwiſe, if they ſtayed till the Canon were planted, he would put them all to the ſword. They terrified with the deſaſter of the Modonois, without reſpect to the Magiſtrates or Captaines, who had prepared all thinges for defence, did vpon very profitable conditions receiue the Baſcha into their walls.

Coron yeelds to the Turke on compoſition.

The Turke ſuppoſing to take Naples in the ſame manner, and as ſoone as hee had done Coron, ſent part of his army to their Confines, and ſent thither with his Captaines, euen to the Citty gates, Paul Contaren a Venetian Gentleman that was married in Coron, and well knowne in thoſe Cuntryes, who after Coron was taken, the Turke tooke along with him to this end, to perſwade the Neapolitans to yeeld. He conferring with thoſe in the Citty concerning their yeelding, and ſtanding vppon the edge of the Dike right ouer againſt the Gate, did on a ſuddaine and vnperceiued ſpur his horſe, and leaping into the *D*ike preſently entred the Citty. The Neapolitans both by his aduice, and being willing of themſelues, did very valiantly repulſe all the enemies attempts; and did moreouer as occaſion was offerred, make very fortunate ſallies. And the Turke ſending for his whole army thither, thereby thinking to terrifie them, they deſpiſed all his threatenings, and brauely defended themſelues.

A braue and bold deed of Paul Contaren

The Turkiſh army before Naples.

In the meane time, Peſare comming to Corfou, and from thence to Zant, tarried there, till the fleet, diſperſed by tempeſt, was reunited. The Veſſells trimmed and made ready, there were 18. great Gallies and 25. leſſer ones, and 20. ſhipps well rigde and armed; with theſe hee determined to ſeeke the enemies fleet and fight with it. But the Tuke hauing intelligence of his comming to Zant commanded his Baſchas to raiſe the Seege, and to carry back the fleet to Conſtantinople, and himſelfe, with his whole army departed from thence the next day. Peſare at the ſame time ſent a Fregate to Naples to view the enemy fleet: but perceiuing they were gon, he ſailed to Legina, which the Turke had taken during the ſeege of Naples, where landing his ſoldiers, hee tooke the Fort, and ſlew all the Turkes within it, reſeruing the Captaine for his priſoner, and reſtored the Iſland to the Venetian State. From thence he went to Mittilyn, where he did the like, giuing the ſpoile to his ſoldiers and marriners. The next day he ſailed to Tenedos which he burnt downe to the ground. And finding the enemies fleet, which fled at the mouth of the Straight, he gaue in vppon their taile, and tooke diuers veſſells and many priſoners, whom, vpon Gibets ſet vp on the two ſhores that diuide the confines of Europe and Aſia he hanged; and afterwards ſpoiled and waſted the Contrey with fire and ſword.

The Turke diſcampeth from before Naples.

The Venetians take the Iſle of Legina.

They recouer Mitelyn.

Peſare aſſails the enemy fleet

From thence he directed his courſe to the Iſle of Samothrace, where vnderſtanding that the Iſlanders obeyed the Turke on conſtraint, he ſent Lodouico Canalis to them, to know if they would yeeld to the Venetians: they willingly accepted the offer, and he promiſed to giue them a Venetian Gentleman for Gouernour, vnto whom for his entertainment they offered to giue the tenth part of their reuenues.

Then after that he had taken and ſackt Cariſta, hee returned with his fleet to Naples loden with ſpoile: and hauing there made a reuiew of his forces, hee did by his bounty highly pleaſe and content his ſoldiers. And vpon intelligence that the King of Spaines fleet, commanded by Gonſaluo Ferdinandes, came to aid the Venetians and was at Zant, hee ſailed thitherward, and paſſing along by Iunca, he cauſed Charles Contarens head to be cut off vpon the Prow of his Galley, who commanding that Caſtle for the Signory, which was exceeding ſtrong, both by nature and art, had yeelded it to the enemy vppon the firſt ſummons, not beeing enforced by a ſeege.

Samothrace yeelded to the Venetians.

Charles Contaren beheaded.

Beeing

Being come to Zante, hee there found Gonſaluo, with whom and the Spaniſh Captaines that were with him, hauing conſulted vpon the affaires of warre, by their aduiſe and conſent of the Prouidators, hee determined to goe and beſiege Modon: But becauſe they wanted ſtore of veſſels, they ſent all their workemen to Cephalonia (which a bounds in woods and Forreſts,) to cut downe trees.

Ceron yeelds to the Turke on compoſition.

Whileſt ſome were buſied in cutting of wood, becauſe they would not looſe time, they reſolued to beſiege the towne of Cephalonia, becauſe the Turkes ſhould not ſay that two fleetes vnited, durſt not aſſaile them. This thus reſolued, Peſare and Gonſaluo, cauſed Ordnance to bee brought from the ſhippes to batter the walls; and giuing euery man his charge, they were deſirous to make tryall of the valour of thoſe within the tower, who were in number three hundred.

The ſame day as they would haue begun the battery, there fell ſuch ſtore of raine, as they were enforced to deferre it till ſome other time. The weather at laſt beeing faire, the Ordnance was planted againſt the walls, where after a breach made, an aſſault was giuen; but the enemies did with all ſorts of weapons ſo valiantly defend themſelues, as the towne could not bee taken, ſo as our men were enforced to retire, and great numbers of them hurt. The Generalls thus repulſed, raiſed a mount higher then the enemies fortifications, from which they might eaſily ſee whatſoeuer was done in the citty: and then gaue an other furious aſſault, where the Venetians and Spaniards ſo brauely behaued themſelues, as they conſtrained the Turkes to retire into the Forte, who within a while after yeelded to Gonſaluo, fearing the Venetians indignation whom they had ſo often deluded and offended.

Cephalonia yeelds to Gonſaluo.

During the ſiege of Cephalonia, the Caſtle of Iunca returned to the Venetians, by meanes of one called Demetrius of Modon, who practiſed it with an Albaneſe, a friend of his, which was of the garde of the Caſtle: where killing fiftie Turkes that lay there in garriſon, and enforcing the reſt to leape ouer the walles, they became Maiſters of the place, whether Peſare preſently ſent Ieronimo Piſani, the Prouidator with forces, and after him Siluеſtro Troni for Iudge. In this manner in a ſhort ſpace they tooke Cephalonia and Iunca. Gonſaluo who had already made warre at ſea many moneths, perceiuing that Peſare deferred the ſiege of Modon till ſome other fitte time, and that the enemies had ſtrongly fortified it ſince the recouery of Iunca, returned into Sicely. Peſare preſented him with fiue hundred peeces of Malmſey, and ſeuenty thouſand weight of ſweet meates of all ſorts, which the Senate had ſent him from Venice.

Iunca returnes to the Venetians.

Peſare, aduertiſed that the enemy had made certaine Galleys at Preueze, and that ſome of them were already lanched, ſayled thether with foureteene well armed Galleys, and drew them thence, notwithſtanding all the enemies reſiſtance, and directed his courſe to Corfou, there to trimme his veſſels, and to review his fleete. The Senate in the meane time recompenced thoſe who had well deſerued in that warre, as well thoſe that were liuing, as their heires that were dead. The Precedent yeare, the ſtate had ſent an Ambaſſador to Ladiſlaus King of Hungary, to mooue him to warre vpon the Turke, who after a long diſcourſe, did in the Senates name make a league and confederacie with him, by which the King was bound, to make warre on the Turke with his whole force, and the Venetians to giue the King yearely, at three diſtinct times, three thouſand pounds of gold. The Pope would needs make one in this treatie of peace, and ſent a Cardinall thither for his Legate, promiſing for three yeares ſpace, to giue foure hundred pounds of gold yearely to the ſame King. Peſare hauing repaired his fleete, determined to burne the Turkiſh League betwixt the Venetians and King of Hungary againſt the Turke.

Galleys

Galleis at the mouth of the riuer Bojan: but this enterprize tooke none effect becauſe that the Turkes had inteligence of it, who feating the like danger as at Preueſe, with-drew their veſſels fourteene miles vp the riuer from ſea. The Turke at the ſame time recouered the Caſtle of Ionica.

The Turke recouereth Ionica.

Peſari returning to Corfou had inteligence that the enemies Galleis vppon the riuer Bojan would ſhortly come forth, hee ſent certaine of his Galleis thither to keepe them in; himſelfe in the meane time with the reſt of the fleet conſiſting of fiue and twenty Gallies returned into Morea, where from the confines of Coron, hee laded his Gallies with great numbers of men, women and young children, carrying them into Cephalonia deſolute of inhabitants. From thence hee returned to Corfou, expecting the French King, and King of Portugalls fleet.

Whileſt theſe things were done abroade, Prince Auguſtino Barbadico dyed at home, hauiuing gouerned the Common-wealth fifteene yeare: and in his place, according to the vſuall manner, Leonardo Loredano, a man wiſe and noble, was choſen.

LEONARDO LOREDANO the 75. Duke.

AT the firſt great Councell held after he was made Prince, Benedetto Peſare, Captaine General of the fleet, was made Procurator of Saint Maike in ſteed of Philippo Troni, who was newly dead. In his time the French Fleet went to ayde the Venetians againſt the Turke, the like did that of Portugall, according to both thoſe Kings promiſes, but they came not both at one time, nor to one place, for that of Portugall went to Corfou, and the French to Zant, and yet neither the one or other did any great ſeruice to the State, which hauing long time maineained warre againſt the Turke, alone of it ſelfe, and in the company of the King of Hungary, did at laſt make peace when it leaſt thought thereof.

The French & Portugal fleets aid the Venetians againſt the Turke.

For thoſe beeing redeemed, who at the beginning of the warre were impriſoned at Conſtantinople, Andre Gritti was one of the number, who returning to Venice, was by his Contrey-men kindly welcomed home. He brought letters to the Senate from Achmet, one of Baziazets cheefe Captaines, which contained, that if they were desirous to end the warre they should send one to Constantinople to treat of the conditions of peace, and that hee would bee their freind.

The Senate vppon these letters sent word to Pesare to dissolue the fleet, twenty Gallies excepted which he should keepe with him, and wrote to Ladislaus King of Hungary, (sending him Achmets letters) that they determined to send an Agent to Constantinople, intreating him to doe the like, to the end peace might be made with more honor. Laadislaus vnderstanding the Senates determination did highly commend it, and promised to grant what they demanded: But the King prolonged the matter, because if the Senate made peace with the Turke, vnles there were som new agreement betwixt them, he should be depriued of the yearly sum which the Signory gaue him: wherevpon the Venetian Ambassadors that were in Hungary fearing to prolong the treaty with the Turke, granted that the three thousand pounds of gold which they paid him yearely towards the war, should (if peace were made) be reduced to three hundred pounds of gold so long as Baiazet liued.

A new agreement with the King of Hungary.

In the mean time Baiazeth made peace with the Sophi, & therby finding himselfe more fit to continue warre against the Venetians, grew haughty, and told Achmet that he would not haue peace with the Venetians, except they would redeliuer the Isle of Saint Maur which not long before they had taken from him. The Senate aduertized thereof by Achmets letters written to Gritti, and sent by an expresse messenger, vnwilling any longer to consume themselues in expence by continuing the warre, quitted that Island to Baiazeth, and made peace with him, reseruing the Isle of Cephalonia to themselues, in old time called Leucadia.

Peace betwixt the Venetians and Turke.

The Venetians were much troubled for that the King of Portugall forestalling their traffick, had appropriated vnto himselfe the trade for spices, which their vessels and Marchants bringing from Alexandria, did with meruailous profit vent into all places of Christendome: For the Portugalls going by Sea into those remote partes, and in the Indian Sea insinuating themselues into the freindship of the Kings of Calicut, and other lands their neighbors, haue gotten to themselues the Commerce for spices which the Alexandrian Marchants before were wont to haue: and bringing them home into Portugall, send them by sea into those places whether the Venetians vsed to trade.

The Portugals trade for spice.

But to returne to the Peace, the Senate commanded thankes to bee giuen to God: and three pounds of gold to be distributed to the Preists. Baiazeth sent an ambassador vnto whom the Prince should sweare to obserue the peace, as he had done to the Venetian Ambassador.

At the same time Lewis the French King, sent Iohn Lascaris of Constantinople his Ambassador to the Venetians to request them to renew the league and Confederacy betwixt them: for he being inforced to make warre vppon Gonsaluo Lieftenant Generall to the King of Spaine, who had defeated his Army in Calabria, was desirous to haue the Venetians take armes in his behalfe: and to induce them therevnto propounded many faire conditions, but they refused to renew the Confederacy and also his offers, saying that they were satisfied with the old one. Pope Alexander in the meane time supping in a Garden neere to the Vatican with the Duke Valentinois his sonne, was on a sodaine carried thence for dead to his Pallace, whither his sonne was likewise carried sick like the father, and the day following, the Pope dyed, black and swelled and very vgly: very euident signes of poyson, but the Duke his sonne, by reason of his youth, and presently taking diuers counterpoisons escaped, but was aflicted with a long and greeuous disease. At the same time, Benedeto Pesare Generall of the Venetian fleet, beeing ready to returne from Corfou to Venice fell sick of a Quotidian and there dyed.

The Venetians refuse to renew the league with King Lewis.

The death of Pope Alexander.

In

In the place of the deceaſſed Pope, Cardinall Picolhuomini of Syena was choſen, a man Noble and for his other qualities not vnworthy ſuch a dignity, who to reuiue the memory of his Vnckle Pius Secundus, intituled him-ſelfe Pius the third: But the 26. day after his election he died, wherevpon the Cardinall of Saint Peter ad Vincula, mighty in reputation and wealth was choſen in his ſtead, and was called Iulius Secundus; this did highly pleaſe the venetians; They preſently appointed eight Senators to go as Ambaſſadors to him to congratulate his election, Antonio Iuſtiniano being one of them. At their arriuall in Rome, being brought to the Popes preſence, hee louingly entertained, and embraced them, ſaying; that he was much bound to the ſtate of Venice, and that he would deny them nothing in his power: Then entring into diſcourſe concerning Duke Valentinois, Iuſtinian told him, all men thought that his Holineſſe would aide and aſſiſt him: that he was deſirous to haue the Townes and Caſtles which he held in Romagnia to bee taken from him.

Pius Tertius Pope dies.

Iulius Secundus Pope.

The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to Pope Iulius.

This ſaying of his did highly content the Venetian Senate, which aſpired to the peaceable poſſeſſion of the whole dominion of Romagnia, and had preſently after Pope Alexanders death ſent forces to Rauenna, with which the Citty of Ceſenna was on a ſodaine in a night aſſaulted: but the people valliantly defending it, they were enforced to retire to Rauenna, being come thither without ordnance: yet this could not diſcourage them, but they eſpied all occaſions to get footing in that Prouince; not long after a faire occaſion was offered, by meanes of a controuerſie betwixt Dyoniſius the noble, and the Fauentines, who were deſirous to repeale the Manfredi: This did Dyoniſius contradict, and in deſpite ſent for the Venetians, vnto whome hee gaue the Caſtle of Val de Lamone which hee kept, in which the Venetians placed a ſtrong Garriſon, they did the like in the caſtle of Faenza, which the Captaine, corrupted with mony, deliuered vnto them.

The Caſtles of Valdelamond and Faenza, yeelded to the Venetians.

They did like-wiſe hold Forlimpopolj and Rimini by the peoples conſent, recompencing Pandolfo Malateſte in an other Prouince: then they went and beſeeged Faenza, becauſe that the Fauentines, nothing terrified with the loſſe of their Caſtle, which, ſeated in a low place, they had diuided from the Citty by a deepe ditch, made valliant reſiſtance, as well for their loue towards the Manfredi, as prouoked there-vnto by the Florentines, who feared nothing more, then to ſuffer Faenza to be the Venetians: And to theſe ends imployed the aid and credit of Cardinall Franciſco Sonderini their country-man, to make the new Pope grow iealous of the Venetians, who one day talking with his Holineſſe told him that the Venetians did already poſſeſſe the Caſtle of Faenza, and all places neere the Citty, the which they ſhortly hoped to winne; not ſo much to take from the Valentinois that which he vniuſtly poſſeſſed by vſurpation, as to appropriate it to them-ſelues. And that their cuſtome was, neuer to reſtore any thing they held: That Faenza being a territory belonging to the Church, the Pope could doe no leſſe then to take it into his owne Protection.

The Pope againſt the Venetians.

The Popes anſwer to the Venetian Ambaſſadors.

The Venetians being aduertized of this diſcourſe of the Cardinall, Iuſtinian went to the Pope to excuſe the ſtate, and to entreat him not to giue credit to their enemies tales: and after a long diſcourſe there-vpon made, the Pope replied, that hee had neuer beleeued any thing againſt them, being well aſſured of their loue and friendſhip toward him, as they of his: But for that which concerned Valentinois ſtate, he could haue wiſhed that what-ſo-euer did belong to the Church might haue firſt beene ſurrendred vp, with this anſwer the Ambaſſador tooke his leaue.

The Venetians notwithſtanding all this continued the ſeege of Faenza, and beginning their battery, the beſeeged, diſpairing of all aid, yeelded, the venetians hauing agreed to giue Aſtor a ſmall pention to liue by. They could as eaſily haue taken Imola and Furli: but they determined as then to paſſe on no farther, becauſe they would not incenſe the Pope: where-vpon they ſent their forces to Garriſon, hauing beside Faenza and Rimini taken diuers townes in Romagnia. At the same time Andre Gritti returned from his Ambassade of Constantinople, where hee had confirmed certaine Articles of Peace with the Turke, to the profit of the Signory. Not long after, Iustinian acquainted the Senate that the Pope had giuen the Valentinois leaue to goe and recouer his State. These newes caused them to write to the Prouidators that were in Romagnia, to vse meanes to take whatsoeuer might be for the profit of the State, from Duke Valentinois: by meanes whereof Tossignana and Meldola two strong townes, did vpon the first summons yeeld to the Venetians.

Faenza yeelded.

Tossignana and Meldola yelded.

The Pope much incensed against them for this manner of proceeding, sent Angelo Bishop of Tiuoli to Venice, to reprehend them for that they had taken Faenza and Rimini which belonged to the Church, which he craued to haue surrendred to him, intreating them likewise to aid him to recouer the rest, he being resolued to leaue the Valentinois nothing, yet he would haue whatsoeuer should bee taken, to bee restored to the right owners. The Senate, displeased with the Popes demands, answered. that they did neuer expect this from him, in regard of their long friendship confirmed by many reciprocall good offices, especially, because they knew he had no interest therein: that they had imbraced the offered occasion to seaze on Faenza and the rest, those townes being not possest by the Church, which in open Consistory had disclaimed all her right therein and transferred it to Duke Valentinois: As also, for that the precedent Popes did neuer possesse those terrritories, but from time to time, had giuen them to new Tenants without any other acknowledgement of superiority then the rent, which they offered presently to pay. Lastly they besought him, that being Pope he would continew towards the Venetian Signory the same freindship which he had euer born them being Cardinall, and that in so doing he might make vse of their men, force and meanes as themselues.

The Pope rebukes the Venetians.

Their answer

Such was the Senates answer to the Bishop of Triuoli the Popes Nuncio. But the Pope continuing his resolution, and knowing his owne forces to weake to inuade them, sayd, that he would craue the aid and assistance of forraine Princes. Iustinian did put him in mind that the Signory of Venice had done nothing but by his councell and aduice being Cardinall; wherevnto he replied, let them first surrender Tossignan which belongs to the territory of Imola to me, and then afterwards I may chance to do somewhat concerning Faenza and Rimini; heereof Iustinian aduertised the Senate, who whilst they were assembled to determine thereof the Bishop of Triuoli arriued with letters from the Pope, whereby hee tooke from them all hope of agreement with him, vnlesse they did deliuer vnto him those Townes they had taken, saying, that to those ends, hee would implore the aid of God and men, threatening, if they did it not, to doe his worst against them.

The Bishop of Tiuoli comes againe to Venice from the Pope.

The Senators were greatly troubled and incensed with these letters, but more against the Bishop then Pope, whom they thought had incensed his Holinesse against them. This discontent was accompanied by an other: for the Pope had sent an Ambassador to the French King by whom complaining of the Venetians, he craued aid and assistance against them, requesting him to enter into league and Confederacy with himselfe, and Maximilian, called to be a third man) against them. This being knowne at Venice, the Senate presently sent Ambassadors to those two Princes, to let them vnderstand that the Signory had taken nothing from the Pope, but only Faenza and Rimini from a wicked man, fearing least the Florentines, their enemies by reason of Pisa, should seaze on them as they had determined, hauing already sent forces thither: That they had recompenced those that kept them, giuing them other Townes in exchange. That those two Cities with their dependances were wont to bee giuen to new Tenants, before Valentinois had them; and the Senate demanding them in that nature, the Church

The Venetians send Ambassadors to the Emperor Maximilian and the French King.

Church could lay no claime to them, ſo as they payed the vſuall Rent, but on the contrary ought to bee content there-with, becauſe they could not fall into the hands of any, that were better able to defend and keepe them then the Venetians: That the Pope had beene the Author and motiue of the Signories taking of Romagnia from Valentinois, and now changing his opinion did cauſeleſſe ſeeke all meanes to expulſe them thence. And therefore the State of Venice did earneſtly intreat King Lewis, not for that regard to infringe the league made with them; and Maximilian in like manner, that he would rather aide and aſſiſt the Signory, as a good friend and neighbour, in ſo iuſt and reaſonable a matter, then the Pope who craued a thing wholy vnreaſonable.

These remonſtrances being kindly entertained by both theſe Princes, they promiſed to debate the matter with his Holineſſe. This anſwer did in ſome ſort ſatisfie the Senat. Count Petellan at the ſame time, being on great promiſes entreated by diuers Kings and Princes to ſerue them, would neuer for-ſake the Signory. In acknowledgement whereof, the ſtate of Venice made him Generall of their Army for three yeares, with a yearely annuity of fiue hundred pounds of gold.

The end of the ſixth Booke of the fourth Decade of the Hiſtory of Venice.

FINIS.

REPRODUCED FROM THE COPY IN THE

HENRY E. HUNTINGTON LIBRARY

FOR REFERENCE ONLY. NOT FOR REPRODUCTION

THE SECOND VOLVME OF THE GENERALL HISTORY OF VENICE.

The Contents of the ſeuenth Booke of the fourth Decade.

THe Emperor entreateth the Venetians to deliuer the Cities of Faenza and Riminy to the Pope. Lewis the French King maketh the ſame requeſt to them. The Emperor craues leaue of the Venetians to paſſe in armes thorow their ſtate to Rome to his Cornonation, which they deny. Iohn Paul Baillon reſtoreth Perugia with her territory to the Pope. Bologniais yeelded in the ſame manner to the Pope by the Bentiuolies. The King comes into Italy, by reaſon of the reuolt of Genoa. The Pope doth greatly ſuſpect and diſtruſt the French King. Enteruiew of the Kings of France and Arragon at Sauona. The Emperour performeth bad offices in Germany toward the French King. How the report of the Emperours comming downe into Italy did trouble the Venetians. The Emperour commeth into Italy, and returneth ſodainely into Germany. The Almains are defeated in the vale of Cadora. The Venetians take the town of Goritia. The concluſion of the truce betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians did breed ſome diſcontent betwixt the King and them. Confederacy ſworne at Cambray againſt the Venetians, by the Pope, the Emperor Maximillian, and the Kings of France and Arragon. The Venetians make great warlike preparations againſt this confederacy. The Pope caſteth a terrible excommunication on the Venetians. The Kings army and that of the Venetians very neere together. The Venetians are defeated by the French in the Countrey of Giradade. The great progreſſion of the French army ouer Italy after the Battaile. All Romagnia in a manner is yeelded to the Pope. Laſtly the Venetians reſoluing to quit the firme land, doe leaue Padua, Verona, and all the other Cities appointed to the Emperor.

The seuenth Booke of the fourth Decad of the History of Venice.

The Emperor Maximilliam Ambassador come to Venice in the Popes behalfe.

MAXIMILLIAN, forgetting the promise which he first made to the Venetians to debate their cause before the Pope, sent two Ambassadors to Venice to entreate them to yeeld Faenza & Ryminy to him. That it belonged to him to make that request, as Protector of Holy Church and of whatsoeuer apperteined therevnto. If they thought it an vnreasonable matter, they should referre it to arbitrement: That he would labour to cause the Pope to condescend therevnto; and that if they would choose him for their vmpier, he would willingly accept thereof, and would giue sentence according to equity. The Senats answer with that of the Great Coūcel to these Ambassadors was, (hauing reiterated all that which their Ambassadors had first of all declared to the Emperor from the Senate) that their right to those lands being so plaine and euident, they would not put it to compromise. Vpon this answere one of the Ambassadors departed from Venice to Rome, the other stayed there, whose expences were defraied by the State.

The Senates answer to the Ambassadors.

A league betwixt the Emperor Maximillian and Lewis the French King.

In the meane time a league and confederacy was made betweene the Emperor Maximillian and the French King, after long strife and disputation of their Ambassadors. This league being concluded, King Lewis sent againe Iohn Lascaris of Constantinople his Ambassador to Venice, to entreate them to seeke all possible meanes of agreement with the Pope: for that being done, they were determined to ioyne altogether against the Turke. He added that his King had sworn league and friendship with Maximillian, not to hurt any man, but only for the safety and preseruation of each others State.

King Lewis his Ambassador at Venice.

The Senates answer to the Ambassador.

The Senate, who had already decreed that the Ambassadour should haue a pound weight of gold giuen him euery month towards his expences, made answere, that they had omitted nothing, either by entreaty or promises to giue the Pope satisfaction, hauing not long before made him this offer, that al-be-it Pope Alexander had giuen Faenza and the other lands to the Valentinois free from all conditions, they were content neuertheless to hold Faenza and Riminy of the Church, on what conditions and rent it pleased, promising to make true payment euery yeere, but this would not be accepted of: That they were exceeding glad that two such great Princes, had conuerted their hatred and contention into a sound and firme league & friendship. But because it was specified in the contract betwixt King Lewis and them, that neither of them two might make alliance with any other Prince whatsoeuer, without the consent of his fellow, they did willingly desire to know, why his King had not first aduertized them thereof.

At this demand the Ambassador made some little pawse, then he answered that he knew nothing of it: yet neuertheless it was mentioned in the treaty, that each of them might within foure months space name a fellow whom he would, whereupon it was lawfull for his King to name the Signory of Venice.

The Ambassadors answere did not greatly content the Senate, and could not hinder them from ſuſpecting this league contracted without their knowledge. Wherevpon they thought it moſt expedient to trie if they could appeaſe the Pope, vnto whom, certaine months before, they had offered to deliuer vnto him Riminy, and withall that which they had poſſeſſed in Romagnia ſince Pope Alexander his death, prouided that he would be content, that they might ſtill retaine Faenza with her Territory. This was for feare of the French King, and likewiſe becauſe the Emperour, at the Popes requeſt, had ſent an Ambaſſadour vnto them, to will them to make reſtitution of the lands belonging to the Church, as hath beene ſaid.

The Venetians reſolution.

The Popes anſwer to the Venetians offers.

But the Pope hauing giuen them this reſolute anſwere, that he would not in any ſort conſent to the with-holding of one onely towre: and threatning them to recouer yet before he died Rauenna, and Ceruia, which they poſſeſſed as wrongfully as they did Faenza, they paſſed on no farther at that time. But their feare being encreaſed, by reaſon, of this new confederacy betwixt the Emperour and the French King, they offered by the meanes of the Duke of Vrbin, a friend to both ſides, to deliuer vp all that which they poſſeſſed (the appurtenances of Faenza and Riminy excepted) if the Pope would giue admittance to their Ambaſſadors to come and make the oth of obedience, wherevnto in time before he would not conſent. The Pope inclined to this propoſition made by the Duke of Vrbin (though vnwillingly) in regard he had ſo highly threatned them, for hee perceiued the affaires betwixt the Emperor and the French King to be drawne out at length, and that in the meane time thoſe of Furli, Imola, and Ceſenna, did indure many diſcommodities.

Agreement betwixt the Pope and the Venetians.

Vpon this conſent, that which they had offered being re-deliuered, the Senate ſent their Ambaſſadors, who after they had proteſted obedience with the accuſtomed ceremonies, they brought home with them to Venice no ſigne whereby it might be perceiued that he was become any whit the milder. In the meane ſpace the Pope perceiuing well enough that without the French Kings aide he could not hurt the Venetians, and that he could not as yet induce him to make warre vpon them, to the end his Popedome ſhould not be ſpent vnproffitably or without honour, he turned his thoughts elſe-where, and entreated the French King to helpe him to reduce vnder the Churches obedience the Cities of Bolognia and Perugia, the which in all ages did belong to the Sea of Rome, and were poſſeſſed, the one by Iohn Paul Baillon, and the other by Iohn Bentiuogle whoſe predeceſſors hauing vſurped them, were become abſolute Lords thereof.

The Popes requeſt to the French King.

The Popes requeſt was very pleaſing to the King, becauſe thereby hee might finde meanes to keepe his friendſhip, from which he was in ſome ſort eſtranged, in regard of the Kings alliance with the Venetians, which did much trouble him. Wherevpon becauſe he would not diſapoint him, he offered him all aide and ſuccour: and the Pope on the other ſide gaue him the breefes of Cardinalſhip for the Biſhops of Achy, and Bayeux, with authority to diſpoſe of the benifices of the Dutchy of Milan. The execution of this enterpriſe was delaied, by reaſon of the iourney which Maximillian deſired to make into Italy with his army, to receiue his Imperiall crowne at Rome, wherein he being deſirous not to be hindred by the Venetians, hee ſent foure Ambaſſadors to acquaint them with his intent, and to intreate them to grant a paſſage for him and his army likewiſe, aſſuring them that he would paſſe thorough their territories without diſturbing them in any ſort, being deſirous likewiſe to vnite himſelfe with them.

The Emperors requeſt to the Venetians.

The Venetians anſwer to the Emperor.

The Venetians hauing a long time conſulted therevpon, made him a pleaſant anſwere: for after they had giuen him to vnderſtand how much they deſired to conforme themſelues to his will, they councelled him to come into Italy without armes, eſpecially comming for ſo peaceable a matter which was pleaſing to all men, where on the contrary comming in armes, Italy deſparing for ſo many calamities which it had ſuſteined, would riſe, determining to take armes, and not to lay

lay open a way to new troubles: and that the French King might doe the like for aſſurance of the ſtate of Millan.

The determination of Maximillian cauſed the Pope to deferre his enterprize till an other time, being perſwaded therevnto by the King, who was vrged of his promiſe about that buſineſſe, leaſt they by reaſon of that accident of Italy ſhould riſe in armes: as alſo becauſe he feared to prouoke the Venetians, who had ſent him word, that they would take armes for the defence of Bolognia, if the Pope did not firſt giue ouer to them the rights to Faenza which did belong to the Church.

But the Pope being by nature ſodaine and impatient, would not temporize, but ſought all meanes to effect his purpoſe after a furious manner. And without ſtaying for any other reſolution, he departed from Rome with fiue hundred men at armes, where fortune did ſo fauour him, as Iohn Paul Baillon, by the Duke of Vrbins perſwaſion, went to him to Oruietta, where he was receiued into fauour, hauing wholly referred himſelfe to the Popes diſcretion and deliuered into his hands the caſtles of Perugia and the territory therevnto belonging, into which he afterwards entred. Then marching towards Bolognia, being attended on by ſix hundred French Launces, and three thouſand footmen of the Kings forces, he went by the way of the mountaine, becauſe he would not come vpon the territory of Riminy which the Venetians held, and being come to Ceſenna, he commanded Bentiuoli to depart from Bolognia on paine of moſt greeuous cenſures both ſpirituall and temporall.

Iohn Paul Baillan, yeeldeth vp Perugia and her territory to the Pope.

The Pope threatneth the Bentiuoles.

The Bentiuoles had made great preparations for their owne defence, but all their hope was turned to diſpaire, ſo ſoone as they heard of the French-mens arriuall in the Popes army, and much more when the Lord of Chaumont, who conducted them, did tell them the ſame day that he arriued at Caſtel-nouo on the Bolognians territory, that the King being willing to obſerue whatſoeuer he was tied vnto, by the capitulations of the protection, did meane to continue him in the poſſeſſion of his goods, ſo that he would leaue the Gouernment of the City to the Church. At theſe words Bentiuoli and his children, who before, with great threatnings had publiſhed euery where that they would defend themſelues, being wholy diſcouraged made anſwere that they would altogether referre themſelues to his arbitrement, beſeeching him by all meanes to mediate tollerable conditions. Vpon this anſwere the Lord of Chaumont being come within three miles nere to Bolognia, delt ſo with the Pope, as he gaue him leaue ſafely to depart from Bolognia with his wife and children, and to dwel in what place of the Dutchy of Milan he pleaſed, permitting him to ſell and carry away with him all his mouables, and to enioy the immouables which he poſſeſſed with iuſt title.

The Bentiuoles being diſcouraged, ſubmit to the Pope.

The Bentiuoles being departed, the people of Bolognia ſent their Ambaſſadors to the Pope for to giue him the entire gouernment of their City. At the ſame time the King of Arragon being imbarked at Barcelona came along by the coaſt of Prouence to Genoa; and from thence keeping cloſe by the land continuing his iourney he entred into the Hauen of Gayetta. Then being conducted to Naples, he was receiued with great magnificence. Ambaſſadors from all places of Italy came thither with ſpeed, and among others from Venice, whither George Pi-ſani and Marc Dandulo were ſent to congratulate and honour ſo great a Prince.

Bolognia yeelded to the Pope.

The King of Arragon commeth into the Realme of Naples.

The Pope likewiſe, notwithſtanding that he was diſpleaſed for that he had not ſent to offer his obedience as the manner was, ſent a Nuntio to him to incite him againſt the Venetians, thinking that for the recouery of the Hauens of Apuglia, which the Venetians held, he had wiſhed their ouerthrow: And the Venetians on the contrary did ſtill ſtudy to keepe his friendſhip.

Soone after King Lewis came into Italy, by reaſon of the rebellion of Genoa, the Venetians ſent Dominico Trewiſano, and Paul Piſani their Ambaſſadors to him to congratulate his arriuall, who came to Milan, whether the king came ſo ſoone as he had recouered Genoa.

Lewis the French King commeth into Italy.

The great hatred which the Pope did beare to the Venetians.

The Pope being at Bologna, had solicited the King to come into Italy that they might conferre together, wherevnto the King did incline, albeit the Popes intents were against the Venetians, whom he hated in regard of the Cities of Romagnia which they possessed. But when he vnderstood that the King determined to take armes in fauour of the Gentlemen against the people of Genoa (because the strife betwixt the Gentlemen and the Commons had beene cause of the rebellion) he was much discontented thereat, because he had euer fauored the people against the Nobility, and he perswaded the King as much as in him lay to absteine from armes, alleaging that it might kindle some fire in Italy, which would hinder the warre which they had decreed against the Venetians. To the which, perceiuing the King would not agree, being transported with choller, he gaue out on a sodaine 1507. at the beginning of the yeere 1507. contrary to all mens expectation, that he would returne to Rome, saying that the aire of Bologna did not agree with his health: wherevpon the King was troubled, not knowing what to thinke, because he interrupted that which himselfe had craued, and did all he could to alter his determination. But the Kings earnest instance to change his minde did encrease the Popes suspition, which hee had conceiued that the King would keepe him still there, where they might meet together at one selfe same place, which did so much the more confirme him in his determination, wherein being obstinate, he departed from Bologna about the latter end of February, being not able to dissemble the disdaine which he had conceiued of the King.

A strang suspition of the Pope concerning the King.

By this wrath, the hatred which he did beare to the Venetians being in some sort mittigated, hee determined to passe by the City of Faenza, new quarrels arising euery houre betwixt the King and him, in regard of the Bentiuoles, whom he would haue the King to expell from the Dutchy of Milan, albeit by his owne consent they were permitted to abide there, in such sort as nothing could appease him, complayning greeuously of the King: and being thereby prouoked, he did by his Nuntios and by a Breefe, giue the Emperour, and the Electors to the Empire, to vnderstand, that the French Kings preparations for his passage into Italy, with a mighty army, vnder pretence to appease the sedition of Genoa, was in effect to oppresse the state of the Church, and to vsurpe the Imperiall dignity.

The false reports which the Pope threw abroad against the King.

The Venetians likewise fearing the Kings comming into Italy with so great an army, did giue the like aduertizement? Maximillian being desirous of nouelty, hauing receiued these aduertizements, held an Imperiall Diet in the City of Constance where all the Barons, Princes and Common-welaths of Germany being assembled, he did in such sort agrauate the matter against the French King by his oration, as the mindes of all those that were there present, were meruellously mooued, where he exhibited the Popes and Venetians letters of aduertizement.

The French King hauing intelligence of the whole matter, did on a sodaine cassier his army, to take away the cause of such a suspition, and would himselfe haue repassed the mounts, had not the desire which he had to speake with the King of Arragon staied him, who was preparing for his returne into Spaine, and leauing Naples came directly to Sauona, where he had appointed to conferre with the French King, who for that cause was come from Millan to attend him there: where Fernand with the Queene his wife being arriued, all distrusts being laied aside on both parts, with infinite numbers of reciprocall embrasings they had diuers long and secret conferences betwixt themselues, and by that which fell out afterward, it was apparent, that they promised a perpetuall league of friendship one with the other, and that Ferdinand should vse meanes to reconcile the Emperour and the French King, to the end that all of them being vnited together, they might afterward shew themselues open enemies to the Venetians.

Enterview of king of France and Arragon at Sauona.

The two Kings departed from Sauona the fourth day after their arriuall, with the same shewes of loue and friendship. The one went by sea to Barcelona, and the other by land returned into France, leauing the other affaires of Italy at the ſame ſtay. King Lewis in the meane time perceiuing that the Diet of Conſtance continued, where Maximillian had ſo highly animated all the German Princes againſt him, he ſent vnder-hand certaine men of purpoſe to Conſtance, who ſhould not be publikely knowne, but dealing ſecretly, ſhould worke meanes, by the hidden fauour of the Princes his friends, to appeaſe the mindes of the reſt, excuſing thoſe ſlanders which were impoſed vpon him, by the euidence of the effects, ſeeing that after the reduction of Genoa to his obedience, he had on a ſodaine caſſiered his army, and returned with all poſſible ſpeed into France, to take away all ſuſpition that he would attempt nothing againſt the Church, nor againſt the title of the ſacred Empire, and with theſe iuſtifications they wrought meanes to appeaſe the Germans armes, by the force of gold which they ſo highly loue.

the

Aduertizements to the Princes of Germany to cheere the ſuſpition of the French King.

These things did greatly trouble the French Kings minde, who was altogether vncertaine of the Venetians meanings, who would not openly diſcouer themſelues but had euer held matters in ſuſpenſe. The Dyet of Conſtance beeing ended it was there concluded, after ſundry diſputations, that Maximillian ſhould haue for his paſſage into Italy eight thouſand horſe, and two and twenty thouſand footmen, paied by the Country for ſixe monthes, and ſixe ſcore thouſand Florins of the Rhyne for the expence of the Artillery, and other ordinary charges.

What was concluded in the Dyet at Conſtance.

Vpon the report of theſe newes the Venetians were greatly perplexed in their mindes as well as others, becauſe they knew not whereon to reſolue, in regard of the great meanes which euery one of them vſed to winne them to his ſide. The Emperour at the beginning ſent three Ambaſſadors of great place to them, to intreat them to giue him paſſage thorow their territories, and to make a more ſtrict alliance with him, wherein ſhould be mentioned, that they ſhould be participants of the reward of the victory. The French King on the other ſide, did not ceaſe by his Ambaſſadors, and by that of Venice, which was reſident with him, to doe all he might to induce them to oppoſe themſelues by armes againſt the Emperors comming, as hurtfull to either of them, offering them for this purpoſe all his forces, and to continue for euer their confederate.

The Venetians greatly perplexed.

The Venetians, who could haue beene well contented to haue lined at quiet as Newters, perceiued themſelues to be in ſuch ſort preſſed by the Emperor, as they were of neceſſity either to refuſe it, or to grant him paſſage. For they feared, that by their refuſall they ſhould be troubled firſt, and by granting it, they ſhould enfring their confederacy with the King: And yet neuertheleſſe, each of the Senators did affirme that it was neceſſary openly to adhere to one of the ſides, but they knew not to which, and after great diuerſity of opinions, the remembrance at laſt of the Emperors continuall inclination, to recouer the Cities which they poſſeſſed, which he pretended to belong to the Empire, or to the houſe of Auſtria did moſt preuaile.

They made anſwere then to the Ambaſſadors, that their determination was to grant him paſſage comming without an army, and to ſtop it if he came in armes; ſaying that neceſſity enforced them ſo to doe, in regard of their confederacy with the French King, by which they were bound to aſſiſt him in the defence of the Dutchy of Millan, with a certaine number of men ſpecified therein.

The Venetians reſolute anſwer to the Emperors Ambaſſadors.

Maximillian being fruſtrate of his hope to haue the Venetians on his ſide, was incombred with other doubts which did wholy delay the effect of his deſeignes. For firſt of all; That foundation whereon he chiefly builded, that the Cities and Potentates of Italy, fearing his name and army, would come to compoſition, and would furniſh him with ſufficient ſummes of money, did daily decay: Then the concluſions of the Diet of Conſtance vaniſhed into ayre; when they perceiued the great preparations of the French King, and the new reſolution of the Venetians.

The Emperor findeth himſelfe fruſtrate of his hopes.

The Pope likewiſe, who would not ſhew himſelfe more affectionate to the one

ſide

The Pope refuſeth the Emperors requeſt.

ſide then the other, did refuſe the demand he made that it might be lawfull for him to take a hundred thouſand ducats which were leauied in Germany for the warre againſt the Turkes and were kept in the ſame Prouince, and were not to be conuerted to any other vſe without the leaue of the Sea of Rome: Yet neuertheleſſe in the middeſt of all theſe difficulties, he forgate nothing which might nouriſh the report of his comming downe, in ſuch ſort as all thoſe who ſtood in awe of him made mighty prouiſions in diuers places, but they were vncertaine, with what forces, at what time, and from whence he would come.

The great preparations of King Lewis & the Venetians to ſtop the Emperors paſſage.

The French King had prouided for the Dutchy of Milan, and for the frontiers of Burgondy: And had beſides ſent Iohn Iames Triuulce with foure hundred French Launces, and foure thouſand footmen to Verona to the Venetians aide, who had ſent the Earle of Petillan to Rouero, with foure hundred men at armes, and ſtore of foot-forces, to the end there to keepe backe thoſe which ſhould come by Trent, and Bartholmew Aluiana into the Friul with eight hundred men at armes.

The Emperor ſummons thoſe of Verona to giue him paſſage.

The Emperour at the beginning of the yeere 1508. was deſirous to put in execution the reports which had beene ſpred abroad of his comming downe, and ſent an Herald to Verona to ſummon the inhabitants to prouide lodging for himſelfe, and for foure thouſand horſe which he brought with him, going to Rome to take the Imperiall crowne. The Gouernor of the City, by the aduice of the Senate, with whom the matter was communicated at Venice, made him anſwere, that for his coronation which he mentioned he needed not ſo many men at armes and ſuch ſtore of Artillery.

The Emperor commeth towards Vincenza and on a ſodaine returneth into Germany.

Maximillian vpon this anſwer being already come to Trent departed thence in a morning before day with fifteene hundred horſe, and foure thouſand footmen, not of thoſe which had beene graunted him at Conſtance, but of thoſe of his Court, and of his owne ſtate, and tooke the way of the mountaines towards Vincenza. And the Marquis of Brandenbourge marched at the ſame time towards Rouero with fiue hundred horſe and two thouſand foot-men, but he returned the next day, not being able to obtaine any paſſage. The Emperour by the way of the mountaines being come within twelue miles of Vincenza, and hauing taken the territory of the ſeuen Commons, did on a ſodaine returne towards Bolſane which is a towne farther of from the confines of Italy then Trent, whereat all men did greatly wonder.

The Venetians great preparations.

This did awake the Venetians courage, did incite them to leauy diuers foot-troupes, and to make great preparations, vrging the French King to doe the like. They choſe two Prouidatori, Andre Griti & George Cornare, one of whom went towards the Rheticke, and the other into Friull. Aluiana was commanded ſpeedily into Friul where George Cornare the Prouidator already was, beeauſe foure hundred of Maximillians horſe and fiue thouſand of his footmen being come thither and entred into the vale of Cadora, had taken the Burrough and the Caſtle.

The Almains defeated in the vale of Cadora.

Aluiana hauing paſſed the mountaines full of ſnow, came in two daies neere to Cadora, where tarrying for his footmen that came after him; hee ſeized on a paſſage, which was not kept by the Germans, by which men enter into that valley. The comming of Aluiana did encourage thoſe of the Country who did affect the Venetians, who ſodainely did poſſeſſe the other paſſages of the valey, by which the enemies were to retire. The Germans perceiuing themſelues to bee ſhutte in, and that no hope of ſafety was left them but in their armes, they came with great furie to aſſaile Aluiana, who did brauely receiue them, the fight laſted certaine houres with great feruency, but at the laſt the Germans, being not able to reſiſt the numbers nor proweſſe of their enemies, were defeated, and aboue a thouſand of them laie dead on the place, with diuers of them taken priſoners: of the Venetians verie few died.

Before

Before this exploite of warre, the Emperor had ſent Luke de Renaldis his Ambaſſador to Venice, to entreat the Senators to grant him paſſage thorow their territories, as hee had often-times before requeſted them, that hee might goe to Rome, ſaying that his King would come armed for feare of his enemies. Neuertheleſſe hee did aſſure the Signory of Venice, that hee and his would paſſe without doing wrong to any of their ſubiects, or elſe that hee would paſſe without Armes, prouided that the common-wealth would giue him hoſtages for the aſſurance of his paſſage. To that, Prince Loredano anſwered, that Maximillian was not ignorant, how that the Common-wealth had euer beene a friend to him and to his father the Emperor Frederick, and that it was not well done of him in counterchange, to vſe all hoſtile actions againſt them, as to rauage and ſpoile their countrey, to take their townes and caſtles by force, whereof they had iuſt cauſe to complaine, and to call God to witneſſe, whether they had deſerued it at his hands: neuertheleſſe hee would propound the demand to the Senate, and according to the ſame, he would giue him anſwer.

The Emperor reiterateth his Ambaſſade to the Venetians for paſſage.

And becauſe Cornare had written to the Senate, that Aluiana was in great hope, and would, in a manner, bee bound, that the enemies ſhould in ſhort ſpace recompence the wrongs and ſpoiles which they had committed, the Senate was of opinion to deferre the anſwering of Maximillians Ambaſſadors, till ſuch time as they had newes from Friul. And ſo ſoone as they heard from thence, they anſwered the Ambaſſador as they had done in times before, without making any mention of the defeate of the Almains, and cauſed him to bee accompanied thorow the Rhetike countrey, to the end he ſhould receiue no out-rage.

The Senates anſwer to the Emperors Ambaſſador.

Aluiana after the taking of the caſtle of Cadora would not ſtand ſtill in ſo faire away, but purſuing his good fortune, recouered Portonanoue, then Cremouſa ſeated on a high hill, and from thence went and encamped before Gorithia, which is at the foote of the Alpes, ſtrong by ſituation, and well fortified, and which hath a caſtle of difficult acceſſe. But hauing planted his Artillery before the towne, hee tooke it the fourth day after by compoſition, by reaſon that they within wanted Armor, water, and victuals. The Captaine of the caſtle yeelded vp the place in few dayes after, receiuing foure thouſand Ducats. The Venetians made diuerſe fortifications there, to ſerue in time to come againſt the Turkes, to ſtop their paſſage ouer the riuer Liſona.

Aluiana his exploits in Friul.

Aluiana after the taking of Gorithia, went to beſiege Thryeſte, and tooke it with the Caſtle likewiſe, which being ſeated on the Gulphe of Venice, was very commodious to them for their traffick: wherevpon the Venetians beeing puffed vp with their proſperous ſucceſſe, determined to follow the courſe of the victory, and to make warre on Maximillian, by entring farther into his countrey: But Dominico Moroſino, Procurator of Saint Marke, a man of foure-ſcore and ten yeares of age, wiſe and aduiſed, began to ſpeake and to entreate the Senate, not to ſuffer any farther attempts to bee made, ſaying "That Germany was not pleaſed that Maximillian made warre on the common-wealth, when as hee might freely liue at peace: that it was alſo to bee feared, that the ſame Germany would take it in euill part, and would reſent it, if any farther roads were made into their countrey, for they would not ſuffer their Imperiall dignity to be ſo abaſed and contemned. That the offence which he had committed againſt the common-wealth was not great, for which neuertheleſſe thorow the goodneſſe of God, he had made a worthy ſatiſfaction, all his ſouldiers hauing beene cut in peeces in Friul, Cadora, and Portonanoue beeing recouered, and wee haue loſt nothing on the Verona territory, nor receiued any diſgrace. And heerewith beeing ſatisfied without paſſing on any farther, we ſhall receiue great profit by our ceſſation from Armes, and eſpecially the friendſhip and good-will of the whole German Nation, of whom wee receiue infinite commodities, as well for the trade of merchandize, whereby our cuſtomes are encreaſed, as for all other matters concerning prouiſion

An old mans ſpeech to the Senate.

" sion of victuals. That it was indeed a glorious matter to vanquish a mans ene" mies in warre, and to augment their owne bounds and confines: But that it was " more glorious to tame and vanquish a mans owne passions and himselfe: that the " euents of warre depended commonly on fortune, who is variable and inconstant:
" But Councells proceeding from mature deliberation and from wisdome are " firme and stable and do proffit much more then those which issue from furious
" rashnesse.

The good old man hauing vttered this speech, the heate of those who craued warre was in some sort cooled, and therfore they concluded nothing for that present, but said only they would consider of it at more leisure. But Maximilian continuing the warre in the confines beneath Verona, and raising forces in diuers places of the Friuli against them, heerby abusing their loue, warre was resolued against him on the fourth of Aprill. This resolution of the Senate was on a sodain sent not only to Gritti & Cornare Prouidatory, but likewise to Ieronimo Contaren who was Prouidator in Histria with certaine Galleis, to the end that each of them should enuade whatsoeuer they found to belong to Maximilian, either on the firme land or at Sea. According to this commandement Cornare, and Aluiana, pursuing their victory tooke Protonoue, then Fume which is a Citty of Sclauonia, which they burnt: and passing ouer the Alpes they tooke Possonia seated on the marches of Hungary. This was done in the Friul, whilst not farre from Trent the Germaine Army which was come to Calliana did assaile three thousand Venetian footmen, who beeing well fortefied on the hill of Bretonic fled thence neuertheless so soone as they descried the enemies, whervppon the Germans deriding their cowardize, did raze the fortifications which they had made on the hill, burning the houses and then went back to Calliana, warrs resolued against Maximilian.

Flight of the Venetian Garrison

Maximilians Army dissolued for a small occasion.

But this great army of Maximilian, within a short space came to nothing, by reason of a contention of small importance which arose about the paiment of the Grisons, who mutining therefore did spoile the victualls of the Campe: by meanes whereof all things being in disorder, and all the Grisons being departed, the residue of the Army, who were about seuen thousand men, were enforced to retire. The Venetians then made incursions on the neighbor Villages, and came and assailed La Pietra, six miles from Trent: but those of Trent comming to their reskew the Venetian companies retired, and went to assaile the Fort of Creste, which is a place of importance, which yeelded before the supplies from Trent arriued, which caused the Almaines to re-assemble their foot forces, and to returne with a thousand horses and six thousand Lansquenets to Calliana which is distant from La Pietra a crosbow shotte.

The Castle of Creste yeelded to the Venetians.

The Venetians returned to beseege this Castle of La Pietra with foure thousand horse and sixteene thousand foote, determining to batter it with sixteene peices of Ordinance: The two armies were within a mile one of another, each of them hauing the Castle before them. But the Venetians hauing lost diuers of their men there, with two peices of ordinance which the Almaines tooke from them in a salley, thinking it lost time to tarry there any longer, seeing they could not enforce the enemies to fight they went to Rouero, and the Almains to Trent, the most parte of whom within a while after disbanded.

The Venetians retire from before the Fort of la Pietra.

Maximilian, who during these warlike exploits had runne vp and downe from place to place to be releiued with men and money, perceiuing all men to forsake him, after the defeat of his forces at Cadora, sent a Gentleman of his to Venice to craue truce for three monethes: but the Senate contemned it, and would not grant any for lesse then a whole yeare, nor without the knowledge and consent of the French King: Maximilian being the more danted for the losse of Tryeste, and other places of the Sea-coast, did solicite the Bishop of Trent to inuite (as of himselfe) the Venetians to truce, thinking by that meanes the sooner to purchase Peace. The Venetians made answer; That it lay not in their power: but that he ought ought to mooue the French King.

The Venetians refuse to grant Maximilian truce for three yeares.

For this purpoſe Commiſſioners were appointed to meet and conferre together, for Maximilians part, the Biſhop of Trent, and Serentano the Emperors Secretary: for the French King, Trinulce, and Iacomo Galfredo Preſident of Millan, and for the Venetians, Zacharie Contarene, a particular Ambaſſador deputed for that buſineſſe. Conferring together they eaſily condiſcended to all conditions ſauing that the Frenchmen would haue a generall truce, and that all the confederates of either of them, as well out of Italy as within ſhould be therein comprized, and eſpecially the Duke of Guelders, wherevnto Maximilians Agents would not conſent, becauſe their maiſter had determined to ruine that Duke, ſaying that in the treaty there was nothing mentioned but the warres of Italy, and that nothing ought to be entermingled therewith but that which concerned Italy. The Venetians did all they might to content the French King, but perceiuing the Almaines to be obſtinate in that buſineſſe they reſolued for their part to accept of truce in the ſame manner as they had concluded it, beeing deſirous to free themſelues from ſuch a warre, which lighted wholly on their dominions; and notwithſtanding the proteſtation of the French Kings Commiſſioners, that a mutuall enterpriſe ought not to be finiſhed but in common, the Venetians went on, and concluded the truce on the twentith of Aprill, the which was ſpeedily ratified by the Emperour and the Venetians, by meanes whereof the warrs ceaſed betwixt them, and diuers did hope that Italy thereby ſhould for a time enioye Peace and quiet.

Iarring betwixt the Commiſſioners aſſembled about the truce.

Truce betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians.

Armes beeing layd aſide, Alutans and Cornare returned to Venice where they were receiued with great pompe, and in a manner triumphall: The French King hauing intelligence that the truce was concluded and ſigned, ſhewed ſignes of diſcontent, and complained to Antonio Condelmerio Ambaſſador for the Venetians in his Court, ſaying that he had not deſerued of the Seigneiury of Venice that without ſtaying for his anſwer and conſent they had granted truce to Maximilian: That he did not greatly care if the confederates of Italy were comprized therein, prouided that the Duke of Guelders might be aſſured in his ſtate, whom he much affected, and yet neuertheleſſe the Signory had made his deſire fruſtrate, wherein he did hope to be aſſiſted and furthered: And yet he had an hundred thouſand crownes ready to employ in his ayde, and that he would not endure that any wrong ſhould be done to him by the fault of his confederates.

The French King complaineth of the truce.

The King hauing vttered theſe words in choller did repent him of it, and feining to forget all matters, he beganne to entertaine him with more pleaſing diſcourſe; namely when the Ambaſſador had excuſed the common-wealth, and told him that the Senate euer had a principall regard to maintaine him in the Dutchy of Millan, to the end that whileſt the truce laſted hee might not be moleſted in that State. The King gaue him then ſome hope that he would ratifie the truce, but in himſelfe he beganne to thinke on all meanes how to be reuenged.

The French King diſſembleth.

The Emperor on the other ſide not digeſting the brauadoes which the Venetians had offered him, and being deſirous to reſent the wrongs which he had receiued, becauſe he had no hope to draw any more aid from the Germaine Princes, made ſhew that he had a will to vnite himſelfe with the French King againſt the Venetians, as the only remedy to recouer his honor and loſt ſtates. The Pope likewiſe prouoked the King againſt them, becauſe, beſides the old hatred which he did beare to them, he thought that the Bandetti of Furli, who dwelt at Faenza, had by their meanes made ſome attempt on that Citty.

The King calling to minde (beſides his new diſpleaſure for the truce) all the wronges which he thought they had done him in his warres of Naples, and beeing deſirous to ſnatch forth of their handes Cremona and other townes which had beene a long time poſſeſſed by the Dukes of Millan; had the ſame inclination like to the Emperor. wherefore the better to bring it to paſſe, they began betwixt thēſelues to harken to the contentiō betwixt the Arch-duke, & the D. of Geldres, and and for that purpose they chose the Citty of Cambray for their place of conference. Whether from the Emperor came the Lady Marguerit his daughter, Regent of the Low Countreys, and Mathew Langy the Secretary, and for the French King the Cardinall of Amboise, who vnder coulour of treating a peace betwixt the Arch-duke and the Duke of Guelders (as they gaue it forth) to the end that the true cause might not be knowne to the Venetians, they concluded a perpetuall peace and confederacy, betwixt the Pope, the Emperor, the French King, and the King of Arragon, against the Venetians, each of them to recouer those things which they held from them.

What was practiſed vnder hand againſt the Venetians.

Confederacy of the Pope, Emperor, French King, and King of Arragon, against the Venetians.

The new confederacie beeing thus concluded, the Cardinall of Amboise departed from Cambray, the Bishop of Paris, and the Count of Carpy went to the Emperor from the French King, for the ratification of the peace, who did soone ratifie and confirme it by oath, the like did the French King, and when it was afterwards brought to the King of Arragon, albeit he had some doubt in his mind, yet neuertheless he did forth-with ratifie it with the same solemnities: But the Pope made more difficulty in the matter, beeing on the one side swayed by a desire to recouer the citties of Romagnia, and with his hatred to the Venetians, and on the other side, his feare of the French Kings forces did greatly mooue him: As also for that he thought it a dangerous matter for himselfe, if the Emperour by recouering from the Venetians the places which they held, and which did belong to the Empire, should grow too great in Italy. To preuent this inconuenience, hee thought it more commodious to seeke to recouer his townes by a more gentle way then by warre.

The Confederacy ratified by the Emperor and the two Kings.

The difficulty which the Pope made to ratifie the confederacie.

To this purpose then hee laboured by all meanes to induce the Venetians to yeeld vp Riminy and Faenza to him, declaring to them that the great dangers which threatned them by the combination of so many Princes, would bee much greater if hee vnited himselfe with them in this confederacy, For hee could not choose but pursue them both with spirituall and temporall Armes; Hee caused in secret this remonstrance to bee made by a Greeke called Constantine Comniato to Iohn Badoario Ambassador for the Signiory of Venice to the Sea Apostolick, for this confederacie was not yet diuulged. The Ambassador gaue speedy notice thereof to the Senate, who had an ynkling of it from else-where, and were determined by no meanes to quit those townes, as they aduertised the Ambassador according to the discourse made to him by Constantine.

The Popes secret menaces to the Venetians.

Now it was told them that they might easily cause Maximillian to change his minde, and distract him from the alliance with the French King, in regard of the antient enmity betwixt them: they secretly sent Iohn Peter Stella, Secretary to the Senate, to Maximillian, who had often-times beene with him, and was very well knowne to the Emperour, to the end hee might finde meanes to reconcile him to the Senate. This man beeing too hasty in the execution of his desseigne, and not hauing well considered on the meanes, and discouering himselfe to the Emperors domestick seruants, King Lewis his Ambassadors, who were with Maximillian, had knowledge of his comming, whereby hee did no good to the commonwealth. George Pisan likewise comming to Rome, by the Senates commandement, to treate with the Pope, his iourney was to no purpose.

The Venetians secret practises with Maximilian.

The Senate despairing of peace, made leuies of men and horse, and decreed to enrole the greatest number of men at armes and light horse that they could raise, among whom were diuerse Stradiots, and a great number of footmen, they commanded likewise for resistance at Sea, if King Lewis should come to assaile them, fifteene Galleis to bee armed. They likewise dispatched André Badoario to the King of England to purchase him for their friend.

In the meane time Lascaris King Lewis Ambassador at Venice was dismissed, the like was done to Condelmare, who was their Ambassador in France, vnto whom from the King was presented a chaine of gold, the which he refused, saying;

The Venetians great preparations for their defence.

That

That he would not receiue any preſent from a King, that was their enemie and ſo departed. Carſode, in like manner who was Agent at Milan departed thence: within a while after ſupplies came to the Senate, of a thouſand light horſe, and fiue thouſand ſtrangers foote-men, a thouſand Archers from Candy, and another thouſand armed at all ſortes from the Country of Albania. They did after-wards with ſpeed fortifie the Caſtle of Cremona, and furniſht it with all things neceſſary for a long ſeege: As alſo all there Townes, and Caſtles neere thervnto, of which fortifications the Count Petillan had expreſſe charge, who comming one day meanely accompanied to Bergamo, to ſee what was done there, thoſe of Milan hauing notice thereof by their ſpies, two hundred horſe ſallied forth of Milan, in the night, euery horſe-man hauing a huquebuſier behind him, who hauing croſt the riuer Adda, hid themſelues in the wood, to ſurprize him, which they might eaſily haue done, he not miſtruſting it. But the Gouernor of Bergamo, being aduertized by peaſants of the country of the Ambuſcado, ſent ſodainly after the Earle who was already departed, and ſo ſaued him from that danger. The Senate hauing notice of the French-mens Ambuſcado to ſurprize the Earle, accounted the warre to be denounced, where-vpon they choſe Andrew Gritti and George Cornare for Prouidators, who in the time of the Rhetick war, had the ſame command. The Pope who had deferred to ratifie the confederacy, till the very laſt day aſſigned for the ratification, did confirme it, but with expreſſe declaration that hee would not execute any hoſtile act againſt the Venetians, till the French King did begin the warre. This was about the latter end of the yeare 1508. Whereas the league beeing ratified, by all the confederates, the French King beegan to make very great preparations, and beeing come to Lyons, hee cauſed his companies to march towards the Mounts, and ſixe thouſand Swiſſes, whome hee had in a readineſſe, prepared them-ſelues to come downe at the ſame-time into Italy.

Ambuſcado to ſurpriſe the Count Petillan

The Pope ratifieth the treaty of Cambray.

The Venetians on the other ſide with great courage made preparations (as hath beene ſaid:) but conſidering afterward how all Chriſtendome in a manner were in armes againſt them, they deſirous to trie by all meanes poſſible if they could diſſolue that Vnion, repenting for that they had not ſeparated the Pope from the other, the which they might haue done by the onely yeelding vp of Faenza vnto him. They would haue renewed their former treaties, both with the Emperour, and the King of Spaine: but it was in vaine with all three of them: for the Pope could no more accept of that he had deſired: the Catholike King had no meanes to diuert the reſt, and the Emperor did ſo abhorre them, as he would not vouchſafe to looke vpon their Ambaſſador: whereupon they conuerted all their thoughts to defence, and to wage (as hath beene ſaid) great numbers of horſe and foote, and to arme diuers veſſells as well to keepe the ſea, as the Lake of La Garde, the riuer Po, and other Neighbour places.

The Venetians attempt in vaine to be reconciled to the Pope, and the Emperor.

Sondry prodegies which did happen did greatly terrifie them: Firſt they loſt a barke within the which were ten thouſand Ducats, ſent by the Senate to Rauenna, which was drownd: then lightning fell on the Caſtle of Breſſia: after that, the place where the Charters of the Common-wealth were kept, fell wholy downe to the ground, and fier tooke either by chance, or by the ſecret malice of ſome in their Arcenall in the ſame place where their ſalt peeter lay, where it burnt twelue Galleis, and a very great quantity of Munition which did much amaze them, becauſe it preſaged nothing but miſhap. They made preparations then cheefely on that ſide, whereby the French King was to come, which was towards the Giradade, croſſing the riuer Adda, neere to Caſſiana, and therefore they aſſembled their army at Pontuico, on the riuer Oglio: the Earle of Petillan was made Generall thereof, Bartilmeo Aluiana was Gouernor, and George Cornare and Andre Gritti aboue named were prouidatory.

The Venetians are aſſonniſhed at ſondry bad preſages.

Theſe men being aſſembled to determine after what manner the warre ſhould be managed, the opinions were different betwixt the generall and the gouernor: This man was of opinion to make the ſeate of the war in the enemies country, rather then in their owne, and to goe and aſſaill the Dutchy of Milan, before the French King ſhould paſſe the Mounts: The other, who for his long experience, would not heare tell of tempting fortune, was of a contrary opinion, and counſelled, that contemning the loſſe of the countrey of Gyradade, they ſhould encampe neere to the Citty of Orci, as in times paſt other great Captaines had done in the warres betwixt the Venetians and the Milanois. The Senate reiected both theſe counſells; that of Aluiana as to bold, and that of the Generall as ouer fearefull: wherevpon they determined, that the army ſhould draw neare to the riuer Adda, becauſe they would not leaue the Gyradad in prey to the enemies, with the Senates expreſſe commandement, not to fight with the enemy but vpon great hope or vrgent neceſſity.

The Venetians army on the entry of the country of Giradade.

Sondry opinions of the Venetian Captaines.

The Lord of Chaumont General of the Kings army.

The French King hauing paſſed the Mounts with an intent to fight, ſent his Herald to Venice, to denounce warre; and in paſſing by Cremona to doe the like to the Venetian Magiſtrates. The Lord of Chaumont beganne the firſt motion of the warre on the fifteenth of Aprill, croſſing by a foord the riuer Adda, neere to Calciana, with three thouſand horſe; and paſſed ouer by boate ſix thouſand footemen and the Artillery after-wards, marching directly to the towne of Treui, which being beſeeged and battered, yeelded: wherevpon Iuſtinian Moroſin, Viteli de citto de Caſtello, and Vincenzo de Nalde, who were within it, and with them an hundred light horſe, and about a thouſand footemen remained priſoners, the Sradiots ſaued them-ſelues by flight. Vpon report of the taking of this place, diuers neighbour-townes did like-wiſe yeeld. The Lord of Chaumont did ſoone after with all his forces, repaſſe the riuer Adda. The Marquis of Mantua came with his forcas to Caſal-Major, which forthwith yeelded. Rocalatin like-wiſe hauing on a bridge of boates paſſed the riuer Adda, where it entreth into the Po, came and made incurſions on the Cremonois, with an 150. Lances & 3000. footemen, the like alſo did they of the Garriſon of Loda. The peaſants likewiſe of the Mountainy of Briança made incurſions as farre as Bergamo. After theſe firſt attempts of warre, the Pope for his part began by ſpirituall armes, for hee publiſhed a terrible Bull, in forme of a Monitory againſt them, ſpecyfing al the vſurpations made by the Venetians on the Churches lands, and the authority which they attributed to them-ſelues to the preiudice thereof: whereby he admoniſhed them to yeeld vp within foure and twenty daies next following the Churches townes which they poſſeſſed, with the reuenew receiued by them euer ſince they enioyed them, vpon paine, in caſe of diſobedience of incurring cenſures, and interdictions, not onely for the Citty of Venice, but likewiſe for all the townes vnder their obedience: declaring all thoſe to be excõmunicate, who ſhould in any ſort detaine them, guing power to all men in all places, to ſeaze on their goods and to make ſlaues of their perſons. The Senate kept this Monitory cloſe from the people, for feare leaſt they ſhould haue mutined, and threw in an appeall to the next Generall councel, which was carried and fixed on the Churches of Rome, by vnknown perſons. At the very ſame time, in a manner, King Lewis his Herald came to Venice, who in his Kings name in open Senate did denounce the warre already begunne for diuers occaſions which he declared in their preſence. The Duke by the aduice of the Senate, anſwered, ſeeing that the French King did denounce warre, contrary to their aliance with him, the which they had neuer violated, they would with their forces, and with the iuſtice of their cauſe ſeeke to defend them-ſelues.

The French take Treui.

Caſal-Maior yeelded.

The Popes terrible monitory againſt the Venetians,

The Duke of Venice his anſwere to the French Kings Herald.

After this anſwer, they gaue order to their army, the which being aſſembled at Pontuico, to the number of two thouſand men at armes, three thouſand light horſe and ſtradiots, fifteene thouſand footemen choſen forth of all Italy, and fifteene thouſand other choice footemen of their own territories, with great quantity of Artillery, it came to Fontanella, which is within ſixe miles of Loda, a place very very commodious for the reliefe of Cremona, Crema, Carauagia & Bergamo, Cities vnder their obedience. And becauſe they had a fit time to recouer Treui, by reaſon that the Kings Armie was not yet aſſembled, the Senate was of opinion to aſſaile it. The ordnance beeing planted, which made great execution, thoſe within it did yeeld the next day following, on condition that the ſouldiers liues ſhould bee ſaued, who were diſarmed, the Captaines to bee priſoners, and the towne to be vſed at their diſcretion.

The Venetians Armie at Fontanella.

The Venetians recouer Treui.

The King was at Milan, who departed thence ſo ſoone as hee vnderſtood that that towne was battered, for to releeue it, and came and paſſed ouer the riuer of Adda on three bridges made of boates, neere to Caſſiana, with his whole Armie, the enemie nowaye ſtopping him, who hauing entred Treui, buſied themſelues in pillaging the towne, from whence the Captaines could not with-draw their ſouldiers, neither by entreaties nor threatnings, vntill that Aluiana in a rage cauſed the towne to be ſet on fire, to make them to depart thence. But it was too late, for the French were wholy comme ouer the riuer.

The King ſo ſoone as hee had paſſed ouer the Riuer, came and lodged within little more then a mile of the Venetians campe, who beeing encamped in a place ſtrong both by ſite and arte, the King could not aſſaile them but with great diſaduantage. The matter was debated, whete ſome of the Kings councell were of opinion to draw out the warre in length, expecting the Emperors comming downe, for then the Venetians ſhould bee enforced to come to a battle, not being able to looke to ſo many places at once. But the King was of a contrary opinion, as well for feare leaſt the Emperour would come too late, as for the deſire which hee had, being there in perſon with all the forces of his kingdome, that he might without an others helpe finiſh that warre by a glorious victory. The armies in the meane time did not ſtirre, but remained incamped, the one before the other, for the ſpace of a day, with ſundry skirmiſhes betwixt the light horſe on either ſide. The next day the King marched towards Riuolta, to prouoke the enemies to come thether, that hee might fight with them, but they did not ſtirre, ſhewing thereby that they had no meaning to fight; The Artillery being brought before Riuolta, the Fort within a few houres was taken by aſſault, wherein the King with his whole armie lodged the ſame night.

The Kings Armie lodgeth very neer to that of the Venetians.

Sundry opinions in the Kings Armie.

The King wondering at the enemies proceedings, the which to himſelfe he neuertheleſſe commended, reſolued to depart thence, & to come into a place where he might cut off their victuals which came to them from Cremona and Crema, thinking that the want of victuals would breake their determination: wherefore hauing ſtaid one day at Riuolta he diſlodged and burnt it, and tooke the way of Vailla and Paudina, the very next night, becauſe that either of theſe places were in the way by which victuals came to the enemy.

The Kings reſolution to enforce the enemies to fight.

The Venetians did very well perceiue the Kings meaning, and how they were of neceſſity to remooue: but the Count Petillan would haue them to tarry till the next day, and Aluiana would haue them inſtantly to depart, to the end to preuent them; the which was done. There were two waies to go to the places aboue mentioned, the one lower, & farther neer to the riuer, with crooked turnings, by which the kings armie marched, which was ſaid to conſiſt of more then two thouſand lances, ſix thouſand Swiſſes, and twelue thouſand foot, as well French as Italians, with great ſtore of Artillery, and Pioners: the other farther off from the riuer, and the ſhorter way, the which led directly for the paſſage of the Venetiã army, wherein were 2000. men at armes, more then 20000. foot, and great numbers of light horſe, ſome Italians, and ſome Albaneſes: there beeing nothing betwixt the two armies but buſhes & ſhrubs, which hindred either army from ſeeing one another.

The number of the Kings Armie.

The number of the Venetians Army.

The two armies marching in this manner, the French vantgard conducted by Charles of Amboiſe, & the Venetians rereward conducted by Aluiana, encountred one another. Aluiana not thinking to fight that day, did not march in good order.

But perceiuing himſelfe to bee ſo neere the enemy, and in ſuch a place as hee was enforced to fight, aduertiſed the Count Petillan, who went with the Vantgard, of his neceſſity, craning his ayde. The Earle ſent him word to march on ſtill and to eſchew the fight, according to the Senates determination. Aluiana in the meane time placed his footmen with ſixe peeces of Ordinance on a little riſing: and then aſſailed the enemies with ſuch force and fury, as hee enforced them to giue back: but the Armies battaile, wherein the Kings perſon was, comming forward: the chance of the Dice ſoone turned, albeit Aluiana for his luckie beginning had promiſed to him-ſelfe the victory: who running vp and downe, now heere, now there, encouraged his ſoldiers: They fought on all ſides with great fury. The French were on fire by their Kings preſence, who not ſparing himſelfe, was expoſed to all dangers, and did not ceaſe where need was to command and encourage his ſouldiors. The Venetians on the other ſide full of valour, by reaſon of their firſt good ſucceſſe, did fight brauely: But at the laſt, after long fight, and the Venetians looſing rather their ſtrength then their courage, not turning their backs to the enemies, they fell downe in a manner all dead vppon the place, and chiefly the footemen, ſome of whom affirmed that there were eight thouſand of them ſlaine there. Barthelmew Aluiana was taken priſoner, who beeing hurt in the eye, with his face all bloudy, was brought to the Kings Pauillion.

The Kings Armie and that of the Venetians, fight furiouſly one with an other.

The Venetians loſe the battle of Gyradade.

Such end had the battaile of Gyradade, which was fought on the fourteenth of May, in the yeere 1509. The King in memory heereof cauſed a chappell to bee builded on the place of battaile, which hee called Saint Maries of the Victory: then becauſe hee would not looſe his opportunity, hee came to Carauagia, which yeelded vpon compoſition, and foure and twenty-houres after, the Caſtle, on no condition, hauing beene beaten with the Artillery. Bergamo did the like the next day, and the Caſtle a day after. From thence hee marched towards Breſſia, which by the councell of the Gambares, did caſt off the Venetian yoake, and yeelded to the King; and the Caſtle two dayes after did the like, on condition that all that were within it might depart, (the Venetian Gentlemen excepted) becauſe the King would not haue them comprized in the compoſition of townes, not for hatred that he did beare to them, but in hope to draw great ſummes of money from them.

The King taketh Caranagia.

Breſſia yeeldeth to the king.

The newes of the battailes loſſe, and of the kings progreſſion after that, did afflict Venice with ſuch griefe and vniuerſall feare, as it is ſcarce credible, ſo great it was. For from all parts of the citty, people ranne to the publick Pallace with great cryes and pittifull lamentations, where the Senators knew not on what to reſolue, their Councell beeing dulled by diſpaire; ſo weake were their remedies. At the laſt taking courage, they determined to vſe meanes to bee reconciled in any ſort whatſoeuer with the Emperor and the Catholick King, not mentioning the French King, becauſe they did as much diſtruſt his hatred, as they were fearefull of his Armes.

How the Venetians were daunted at the report of the battails loſſe.

The Senate then did write to Dominico Grimani, and to Marco Cornare, ſonne to the Prouidator, both of them beeing Cardinalls at Rome, to promiſe and offer to the Pope, in the Senates name, that the Citties which hee demanded in Romagnia ſhould bee yeelded vnto him, by meanes whereof they beſought him not to abandon the common-wealth to the pleaſure and diſpoſe of barbarous people, ſuch as the French-men were, who if they ſhould once become maiſters of all Lombardy, the Popes them-ſelues ſhould not bee ſafe in Rome.

The Venetians offer to the Pope.

They likewiſe decreed, that Antonio Iuſtiniano (who being choſen Prouidator for Cremona, was ready to go thither) ſhould directly go to the Emperor Maximillian, & conclude a peace with him, if it were poſſible on any terms whatſoeuer. That the Senate was ready to deliuer to him Thryeſte, Portonoue, and the other lands which they had taken from him the yeare before, and that the Signory would acknowledge to hold of him whatſoeuer it poſſeſſed in Frioul, in Lombardy, and in the

The Venetians ſeeke to be reconciled to the Emperor.

the country called old Venice. So weake and vncertaine were their remedies, as if one of theſe two did not helpe to repulſe the audatiouſneſſe of the French, they had not any ſure meanes left to ſtay them.

Neuertheleſſe, makeing a vertue of neceſſity, they conſulted for their defence how to prouide mony to wage new companies, for thoſe which remaind aliue after the defeate were bereft of ſtrength and courage. They determined likewiſe to augment their army by ſea, whereof Andre Treuiſan was Generall with fifty Gallies to oppoſe againſt that of the enemies which was preparing at Genoa. But the French Kings ſodaine ſpeed did preuent al their Councells, vnto whom, ſince the reduction of Breſſia, Cremona was yeelded (the Caſtle expected which the Venetians yet held). Piſquetona did the like: then hee marched towards Piſcara to take the Caſtle, for the towne was yeelded: And as they began to batter it, the Swiſſes and Gaſcons made a furious entry by ſmall ouertures in the walls, and ſlew all thoſe that were within it, except the Captaine and his ſonne who were Venetian Gentlemen, who were both by the Kings commandement hanged on the Caſtles battlements, to the end by that example to moue thoſe of the Caſtle of Cremona, not obſtynately to make defence, nor to hold out till the very laſt.

The great progreſſion of the French army.

The King in this manner, in leſſe then fifteene dayes after the victory, had recouered (the Caſtle of Cremona excepted) all that which did belong to him, according to the diuiſion which had beene made at Cambray. The Pope had enuaded the Citties of Romagnia, with foure hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſe, and eight thouſand foote-men, and with the Duke of Ferrara his ordnance, vnder the command of Franciſco Maria de la Rouera his Nephew, Sonne to his brother Iehn, who with that army ſcoured from Ceſenna to Ceruia, then tooke the towne of Sauarolla, betwixt Imola and Faenza, and that of Bre ſiquella with the Caſtle, and all the other townes of the Faentyne territory.

Al Romagnia yeeldeth to the Pope vpon the fame only of the Kings victory.

The Burrow of Ruſſi, ſtrong both by nature and art, after the Kings victory did yeeld to the Pope on compoſition, the like did the Citty of Faenza, which being vnfurniſhed of Venetian ſoldiars, and at her owne command, did promiſe to acknowledge the Pope for her Lord, if it were not releeued within fifteene daies, which was not done. Rauenna did the like, ſo ſoone as the army of the Church drew neare (the Caſtle excepted.) In ſuch ſort as the Pope conquered more by the fame of the French Kings victory, then by his owne army, the Venetians poſſeſſing no more in Romagnia but the Caſtle of Rauenna, new enemies ſhewing themſelues dayly againſt them, euer ſince the defeate of their army.

The Duke of Ferrara declares himſelfe againſt the Venetians.

The Duke of Ferrara on a ſodayne ſhewed him-ſelfe, who till then had abſtained, and hauing expelled the Viſdoma from Ferrara (a magiſtrate which the Venetians kept there) hee did forcibly without any let at all recouer the Polleſin of Rouigo. The townes of Azole and Lunate yeelded to the Marquis of Mantua, which the Venetians had in former time taken from Iohn Franciſco Gonzaga his great Grand-father. Chriſtofero Frangipane held Piſinia and Diuinia in Hiſtria. The Duke of Brunſwic with his forces, entring Friull by the Emperors command, tooke Feltre and Bellone Thryeſte likewiſe and the other townes vpon his arriuall did returne to the Emperors obedience. The Earles of Sodron ſeazed on certaine Caſtles and Villages which lay neere them: the like did the Biſhop of Trent who tooke Riua di Trente, and Agreſta.

The Marquis of Mantua doth the like.

The Emperors army vnder the Duke of Brunſwic.

The Venetians being brought to all extremity determined to quit the Signory of the firme land, to the end to auoide ſo many enemies, hoping that good fortune one day returning, they might eaſily recouer it. Beeing contented then onely to retaine the ſalt waters, all their care was to fortyfie their Citty with men, victualls, and munition, and they ſent Mandates to the Magistrates and Officers of Padua, Verona, and other Cities allotted to Maximillian, that they should sodenly depart thence, leauing them to the power of the people.

The Venetians quit Padua Verona, and ther places of the firme land.

During these atchiuements, Antonio Iustinian who had beene sent to the Emperor, beeing admitted to his presence in publike audience, did speake with very great submission, but it was in vaine, for hee would doe nothing without the French King. The Venetian Cardinalls likewise, who besought the Pope to absolue the Monitorie, seeing they had offered to make restitution of the townes within the space of foure and twenty dayes, could obteine nothing: For the Pope answered, That they had not obeyed, because they did offer it with limited conditions, not mentioning the profits which they had receiued by them. The Senate sent likewise into Puglia to yeeld vp the hauens to the King of Arragon, who being certaine to obtaine them with ease, had sent a small fleete from Spain, the which had already taken possession of diuerse places belonging to those Cities, and Sea hauens.

The Venetians obtaine nothing of the Pope nor Emperor.

In this manner were the affaires of the Venetian common-wealth throwne head-long downe all hopes failing them. Those of Verona would yeeld to the King, seeing the Venetians had forsaken them, but hee would not receiue them, meaning faithfully and wholy to obserue the capitulations made with the Emperor, seeing hee had conquered all that which did belong to himselfe, and he commanded the Ambassadors of the Veronois to present the Keyes of their Cittie to the Emperours Ambassadors, who were in his Army, the like did they of Padua and Vincenza.

This determination of the French King, not to passe with his Armie beyond his limits, gaue some beginning of hope and safety to the Venetians, concerning whom the mindes of all Italians were diuersly mooued: Some were highly pleased with their misery & calamity, and said, That with great ambition they had sought to subiect all Italy to themselues, by meanes whereof they had made their name very odious. Others considering more iudiciously, how vnseemly a thing it would be for all Italy to be brought vnder the bondage of strangers, did infinitely lament the disaster of that Citty, the antient seat of liberty, and which more then any other had vpheld the common glory and renowne of all Italy.

Hope giuen to the Venetians.

This compassion began to touch the Popes heart, who fearing the power of the Emperor and the French Kinge desired to diuert their thoughtes from any more oppressinge it by intangling them in affaires. Therfore he resolued (but secretly) to hinder as much as hee could, that the miseries of that Signory should goe on no farther, and did willingly receiue the letters with Denis Loredan wrote vnto him, requesting that it might please him, to receiue sixe Ambassadors which the Signory would send vnto him of the principall Senators, most humbly to entreare him to pardon and absolue them. The letters were read in open consistory, where their petition beeing propounded, the Pope consented to admit them, notwithstanding that the Ambassadors of the Emperour, and the French King sought to hinder it, alledging that by the league of Cambray, he was bound to pursue them with spirituall and temporall Armes, vntill that each of the confederates had recouered that which did belong to him, and that the Emperour had not yet recouered all. Hee answered them, That the ancient custome of the Church was not to shew it selfe obdurate to those, who repenting of their faults did craue pardon, but that hee would not absolue them, before they had giuen satisfaction to euery one.

The Pope being mooued with pitty, takes compassion on the Venetians.

This reception of the Pope did encrease their hope, with the newes they heard from Treuiso, which beeing forsaken by the magistrates, and by the Venetian companies, as others were, Leonardo of Dressina banished from Vincenza, beeing come thither without forces to take possession thereof for the Emperor, they in the citty mutined, and began with a generall voyce to cry S. Marke: protesting teſting that they would acknowledge none other Lord, and a fellow that was a ſhomaker named Marke beeing their leader, he carried with great ſhoutes and concourſe of people the Venetians banners into the market place, and hauing driuen thence Dreſſina, they placed ſouldiers in their City, and ſpeedily fortified it with victuals, and all other neceſſaries, the horſ-men which were within it ſcouring the country round about.

Treuiso continueth obedient to the Venetians.

The end of the ſeuenth Booke of the fourth Decade.

The Contents of the eight Booke of the fourth Decade.

WHat mooued the Venetians to hope to raiſe themſelues. An enteruiew reſolued on betwixt the Emperour Maximillian. and Lewis the French King broken on a ſodaine by the Emperor. The Venetians recouer Padua, whereby they become maſters of the Champaine Country. The Marquis of Mantua is taken by the Venetians. The Emperors propoſition to goe and beſeege the City of Venice. Frangipane maketh warre in Hiſtria. The Venetian Ambaſſadours come to Rome by night. The Emperors ſeege before Padua. The King of Hungary refuſeth to make warre on the Venetians during their aduerſity. The Venetians recouer Vincenza and beſeege Verona. The Venetians nauall army on the Po, ſcoureth as farre as Fiquerolla. The Venetians conquer the Polleſin of Rouigo. The Duke of Ferrara defeateth the Venetians nauall army on the Po. The Emperor holdeth a Dyet at Inſpruch. The Pope abſolueth the Venetians, notwithſtanding the oppoſitions of the Ambaſſadors of the Emperour and the French King. The Popes diſpleaſure againſt the French King. The French Kings greeuous diſpleaſure conceiued againſt the Swiſſes. The Pope in hatred to the French King aſſaileth Ferrara. The Vincentines are enforced to craue pardon of the Prince of Anhalt. The French take Legnaga. The Emperor engageth Verona to the French King. Monſeleſia taken by the French. The Popes

Popes deſeignes and propoſitions againſt the French King broken and come to nothing. The King of Hungary ſummons the Venetians Ambaſſador. Laſtly the French King reſolueth to make warre on the Venetians and the Pope.

The eighth Booke of the fourth Decade of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

The Venetians take courage.

He Commotion of Treuiſo and the Emperors careleſneſſe gaue hope to the Venetians to retaine ſome part of their Signory, and to execute diuers great exploits, which afterward they did. For in all this great courſe of victories there was nothing heard of but the Emperors name only, albeit by meanes of the French army, and for feare of it, diuers townes had beene yeelded to him. He had runne to diuers places ſince the confederacy of Cambray to get money by way of loane of the Flemmings and other his ſubiects, the which hee quickly ſpent prodigally after his vſuall manner, beſide a hundred thouſand crownes which he had receiued of the French King, for the inueſtiture of the Dutchy of Milan. Forthwith after the newes of the battaile of Gyradade, he ſent the Duke of Brunſwick to recouer the Country of Friul, but for himſelfe he did not moue at all, for want of money, al-be-it the Pope did greatly ſolicite him thereunto, being afraid of the French forces, and to cauſe him to make haſt, had ſent him fifty thouſand Ducats.

An enteruiew reſolued on betwixt the Emperor and the French King.

At the laſt hee came to Trent, from whence by letters hee thanked the French King, for hauing by his meanes recouered his due. The Cardinall of Amboiſe being come thither from the King to talke with him, they concluded betwixt themſelues that he and the King ſhould ſee one an other and talke together in open field, neere to the towne of La Garde, on the marches of eithers Countrey. The King ſet forward to be there at the day appointed. But the Emperor being come as farre as Riua di Trente for the ſame purpoſe, hauing tarried there two houres, returned on a ſodaine to Trent, ſending the King word that, by reaſon of certaine accidents newly hapned in Friul, he was enforced to returne backe againe, requeſting him to deferre their meering till an other time, and in the meane ſpace to tarry at Cremona.

The Emperour on a ſodaine breaketh the enteruiew.

This alteration of the Emperour, together with his tedious negligence in not prouiding ſufficient garriſons to defend Padua and the other Cities, were cauſes, that the Venetians did help themſelues by this opportunity offered them to recouer Padua, which they knew to be badly man'd with ſouldiers, and the which they had by ouer-haſty counſell too ſoone giuen away. They concluded then that Andrew Gritti, one of the Prouidators, ſhould goe to Nouale on the Paduan territory, and that there he ſhould take part of the footmen (who being followed by diuers of the Country were ſent to the village of Mirana) and ſhould march towards Padua, to aſſault the Gate of Cedalonga, and Chriſtofero de Mora the other ther Prouidator, ſhould follow him at the heeles with the reſidue of the army: This deſeigne being thus decreed fell out better then they thought for: for being early in a morning come to the Gate, they found it halfe open, by reaſon of certaine carts laden with hay, which were a little before entred. So as poſſeſſing it without any difficulty, they tarried there without any noiſe till their fellowes were arriued who were not farre of, then they marched to the market-place, before any one had deſcried them.

But Dreſſina, who was Gouernor of the City for Maximillian being lodged in the Cittadell, hauing heard the noiſe, came forth with three hundred Lanceque-
10 nets which he had only for the gard thereof, with Brunaldo of Saregia with fifty horſe, who perceiuing the townſmen to forſake them, and no man to offer them any helpe made great haſt to enter into their fort, the which being not well fortified they were conſtrained to yeeld certaine houres after. The Venetians by this meanes being maſters of the City, commanded no hurt to be done to it, and that the Iewes houſes only, with certaine Paduans who had ſhewed themſelues their enemies, ſhould be ſpoiled.

The Venetians take Padua.

The French King, who not long before had by compoſition taken the Caſtle of Cremona, knowing the Emperours anſwere, and not ſtaying to doe his bidding, went towards Milan, reſoluing to caſſier his army, for to free himſelfe from 20 ſo great expenſes and to returne into France. But the departure of the Kings perſon and his army did much diminiſh the reputation of the Emperors affaires. For after the Venetians had recouered Padua, they ſoone became maſters of all the Countrey round about, becauſe the Cities and the champaine countrey did fauour them. Vincenza of it ſelfe had done the like, if Conſtantine of Macedonia, who by chance was not farre off, had not ſpeedily entred it with certaine forces. They recouered neuertheleſſe the towne and caſtle of Legnaga, a very commodious place to indomage the countries of Verona, Padua, and Vincenza.

The French Kings reſolution.

The Venetians maſters of the Champaine country.

It was ſuppoſed that the taking of Padua would delay the Kings returne into France: but that, notwithſtanding, he determined to paſſe forward ſo ſoone as 30 hee had made new agreements with the Popes Legat in the City of Biagraſſa whereby the Pope and the King did bind themſelues to protect each other. He left on the frontiers of the Veronois the Lord de la Paliſſe with ſeuen hundred Launces, to doe whatſoeuer ſhould pleaſe the Emperor. But before his departure an other happy euent befell the Venetians, which was, the taking of the Marquis of Mantua, with the defeat of all his ſouldiers, who were ſurprized halfe a ſleepe in the Iſland of Eſcalla: who being brought from thence to Padua, and then to Venice, was impriſoned in the little tower of the publike pallace to the great contentment and wonderfull ioy of the whole City.

New agreements betwixt the Pope and the King.

The Marquis of Mantua taken priſoner and brought to Venice.

The Emperour till now had not hindred nor did hinder the Venetians proceed-40 ings, as well becauſe he had not ſuffitient forces, as alſo for that he was kept backe by the peaſants in the mountaine, and in the planes likewiſe by other companies of peaſants, who waited for him at a very ſtrong paſſage, where he was in danger. But ſurmounting all theſe difficulties, and hauing not as yet forces ſtrong enough, he buſied himſelf in meane enterpriſes, beſeeging now one village, and then an other, ſcouring and ſpoyling the country. The Prince of Anhalt did the like, who by the Emperours command hauing entred Friul with ten thouſand men attempted in vaine to take Monfalcone, but he gaue a furious aſſault on the towne and caſtle of Cadora where he committed great ſlaughter on thoſe that were within it.

Cadora taken and ſackt by the Imperials.

The Venetians in the meane time tooke the towne of Valdeſera by force, and 50 Bellona by compoſition. The Emperour perceiuing that his forces were not worthy the name of Imperiall, propounded to the confederates the vniting of all their forces in one to aſſaile the city of Venice, and to that intent to vſe the helpe of the ſea armies and Galleis of the French King and the Pope. The French King would would willingly haue conſented therevnto if he had ſeene any likelihood of the matter. But the Pope and the Catholike King gainesaid it, as a thing moſt vniuſt and diſhonorable. The Duke of Brunſwicke on the other ſide being ſent by the Emperor could not take Vdina the Capitall city of Friul nor Ciuital-D'Auſtria, which he likewiſe beſeeged. Chriſtoforo Frangipane did the like in Hiſtria where nere to the village of Verme he defeated the Venetian officers, and did greatly burne and ſpoile the whole country.

The Emperour propoundeth to aſſault Venice.

Frangipane makes warre in Hiſtria.

During theſe temporall accidents of armes in diuers places, they diſputed at Rome on ſpirituall armes, whither before the recouery of Padua the ſixe Ambaſſadors from the Senate were arriued; namely Dominico Treuiſan, Leonardo Mocenigo, Paulo Piſani, Ieronimo Donato, Paulo Capello, and Lodouico Maripietro: who entring by night in poore and wretched habite, becauſe the Pope would haue it ſo, who did not ſee them, they went to the pallace of the Cardinall of Naples to conferre with him and the other Commiſſioners: Great were the practiſes of the Ambaſſadors of the Emperour, French King, and the King of Spaine to hinder them from obtayning abſolution: and on the contrary the Archbiſhop of Yorke ſolicited for them in the behalfe of Henry King of England.

The Venetian Ambaſſadors come by night into Rome.

The Emperor in the meane time hauing aſſembled all the forces he was able to make, as well of his owne as of others that aſſiſted him, determined with a mighty army to goe and beſeege Padua.

The Emperor determines to beſeege Padua.

The Venetians weighing how much the preſeruation of that city did import them did not forget to furniſh it with all neceſſaries for defence. Wherevnto Prince Loredan did greatly incite them in an Oration full of mighty perſwaſions by whoſe counſell two hundred young Gentlemen departed from Venice to goe to the releeſe of that city, where they were receiued with incredible ioy of al men. They receiued letters at Venice at the ſame time from Andre Foſcole Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople for the Common-wealth neere to the great Turke: whereby he aſſured the Senate that the Turke was mightily dipleaſed when he vnderſtood of the defeate of their army at Gyradade and for that they had not acquainted him with their enterprizes and requeſted his aide, and that now he freely offered them all aide and fauour, it being his pleaſure that Prince Loredan ſhould bee ſpeedily aduertized of this offer. The Senate by their Ambaſſador did highly thanke him, but would not accept the offer, becauſe it was neither ſeemely nor proffitable.

The great Turkes offer to the Venetian Senate.

But to returne to the Emperours preparations, who whileſt he tarried for forces which came to him from all parts, he came to the bridge of Brente three miles of from Padua where hauing taken Rimini by force, and turned aſide the current of the water, he marched towards the Polleſin of Rouigo keeping alooſe off from Padua to open the paſſage to his victuals, ſtaying for his Artillery which was to come forth of Germany, and tooke the village of Eſte by aſſault which he ſack't, and next he tooke Monſelecia & the caſtle, with the town of Montagnane by compoſition. From thence returning towards Padua, he encamped nere to the bridge of Baſſonella nere to the city, where he attempted, but in vaine, to turne backe the courſe of the Riuer Brento.

The Emperors progreſſion nere to Padua.

To this place came the artillery and the munition which he expected, with the reſidue of his army, wherewith he went forward and encamped nere to the Suburbes of Saint Croſſe, determining to giue an aſſault in that place: but when he vnderſtood that it was the ſtrongeſt part of the city, he changed his purpoſe, and remooued towards the little Gate on the way to Venice, as well for that it was the weakeſt part of the city as alſo to cut off ſupplies that might come thither by land or water: wherein hauing ſpent much time vnproffitably and giuen leiſure to the enemies to fortifie and furniſh themſelues with victuals, He approched neere to the wals with his army, which beſides the French Kings ſeuen hundred Launces, vnder the command of the Lord de la Paliſſe, conſiſted of one thouſand Italian

The Emperour beſeeged Padua.

Italian men at armes, eighteene thouſand Lanſquenets, ſixe thouſand Spaniards, ſix thouſand boot-halers of ſundry nations, & two thouſand Italians. After theſe followed a great traine of all ſorts of peeces of battery, with wonderfull ſtore of munition: ſo as neuer any ſeege in Italy was of the like expectation as well for the importance of the place, whereon depended the good or bad ſucceſſe of the Venetians, as in regard of the greatneſſe and authority of ſuch a leader, which cauſed the number of the army daily to encreaſe, al-be-it the ſouldiers were not paied, who fed themſelues neuertheleſſe with hope of the Cities ſpoile. On the other ſide the army which the Venetians had in Padua for the defence thereof, was little inferior to the Emperors. For there were ſixe hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horſe, fifteene hundred famous and well experienced Stradiots: and beſides the Cauallery, there was twelue thouſand footmen of the beſt ſouldiers of Italy, and tenne thouſand other footmen, as well Sclauonians, as Greeks, and Albanezes drawne from their Galleis, and beſides all theſe, all the Venetian young Gallants were there with their followers, whoſe example did much encourage the reſt. Moreouer it did not want great aboundance of all neceſſary prouiſions, nor great ſtore of artillery, with a merueilous quantity of all kinde of victuals, and a multitude almoſt numberleſſe of peaſants, who without intermiſſion laboured in the Cities fortifications: ſo as within a ſhort ſpace, it was fortified with baſtions, ram piers, caſemates, parapets, and neceſſary trenches. And to the end that the courage of al thoſe within it might be anſwerable to thoſe preparations, the Count Petillan, who was General, cauſed them all to be aſſembled in Saint Anthonies market-place, where hauing encouraged them by graue & valorous ſpeeches, he firſt bound himſelfe by ſollemne oth, and then the captaines; the whole army and the townesmen in like manner, faithfully to employ themſelues in the defence thereof euen to the death.

The number of the Emperors army.

The number of the army in Padua.

The Count Petillan hath the command in Padua.

In the meane time, the Pope, the Emperor, and the French King, did earneſtly ſolicite the King of Hungary to make warre on the Venetians, telling him how eaſily he might recouer all the lands which they held in Hiſtria and Sclauonia, now when as they had in a manner loſt all their forces, and were aſſailed on euery ſide. But the King of Hungary would neuer giue eare therevnto, but continued ſtill their friend. Whereof the Senate being aduertized by Vincentio Guidocho their Secretary and Agent in Hungary: ſent Petro Paſcalio their Ambaſſadors to the ſame King, to entreate him to continue in the alliance which he had ſworne of a long time with them, the which he promiſed to doe.

The King of Hungary will by no meanes make warre on the Venetians, being ſolicited thereunto.

Now the Emperor hauing made his approches neere to the wals of Padua, towards the little Gate, where his army was extended round about the city three miles in length, he beganne to plant his peeces of battery, which could not be done in a long time, by reaſon of the number of them; ſome of them being of a merueilous greatneſſe. Being planted, they would needs ſee how the enemies could defend themſelues, and therefore the French and the Lanſequenets gaue an aſſault on that ſide where the Lord de la Paliſſe had command at a Rauelin of a Gate, but it being valliantly defended, they returned to their quarter. The next day the artillery plaied with great fury, and did beate downe a great part of the wall: the ſhot from the city likewiſe did greatly hurt the whole army and thoſe within the town made many ſallies, eſpecially the Stradiots and the light-horſe.

Aſſault giuen to a Rauelin of the city.

The artillery hauing plaied nine daies together, and made ſo large a breach as all men thought was more then needfull, the whole army made preparation the next day to giue an aſſault: But when they perceiued how that the ſame night they within had filled the dike with water, the Emperour ſent backe his ſouldiers to their quarters. They beganne afterwards to batter the Baſtion which was neere to the Gate of Codalonga, the Emperor determining to doe his vttermoſt to force it, and hauing ouerthrowne a part thereof with the ordnance, he cauſed the Spaniards and Lanſquenets two daies after to giue it an aſſault, who fighting furiouſly furiouſly did mount it,and placed two Enſeignes thereon. But the valour of the defendants was ſuch, and the aboundance of defenſiue engines ſo great,as they were enforced to leape downe in heapes, & many of them were ſlaine and hurt: By meanes whereof thoſe who were already prepared to giue an aſſault to the wal, thinking that the Baſtion was taken,retired and diſarmed themſelues,without attempting any farther

Aſſault giuen to the breach of the Baſtion of Codolonga.

Thoſe that came to the aſſault retire.

Maximillian by this attempt did wholy looſe the hope of victory,wherefore reſoluing to diſlodge, hauing firſt ſent away his artillery to a place of ſafety, he raiſed his campe, and came with his whole army to Limini the ſeuenteenth day of the ſeege, from thence he went to Verona, all men generally blaming him for that by his owne fault he had loſt Padua, and had not taken Treuiſo. And he on the contrary imputing it to other men, complained of the Pope and the French King: of the one, for ſuffering the Venetian Ambaſſadors to goe to Rome,and of the other, becauſe he had delaide to ſend ſupplies of men. But theſe complaints did no whit better his condition: for the Pope cared not greatly for him,and the King was glad to haue his faults and changings knowne. Hauing receiued the oth of fidelity of thoſe of Verona, he departed thence towards Germany, determining (as he ſaid) to returne the next ſpring with greater forces to make warre in Italy, leauing the Marquis of Brandenbourg for the gard of Verona.

There Emperor raiſeth his campe from before Padua.

The Emperours returne into Germany left all that which he poſſeſſed in great hazard,and all Italy in doubt, in regard of ſome contention, ariſing betwixt the Pope and the French King, which being ſoone after appeaſed there remained neuertheleſſe ſome diſcontent in the Popes minde, wherevpon he wiſhed that the King might looſe whatſoeuer he held in Italy, and was willing to imploy himſelfe to effect it: And al-be-it he propounded ſo great a deſigne to himſelfe, yet neuertheleſſe he would not enter into league with any one, but truſting wholy to himſelfe and to the authority which the Papall Sea had ouer all Princes, hee ſhewed both by deed and words that he did not greatly account of any one,and waxing ſtrange to all others he enclined only to the Venetians ſide, whom for the ſafety of all Italy,and for the preſeruation of his greatneſſe, he thought fit to abſolue,and to aſſiſt with all his power.

The Emperour returneth into Germany.

Contention betwixt the Pope and the King.

VVhat the Popes meaning was.

The Emperors and French Kings Ambaſſadors oppoſed it,the like did the Ambaſſador for the King of Arragon,alleadging the confederacy made at Cambray, by which they were not yet fully ſatisfied. The Pope made anſwer thereunto, that it was not the office of Chriſts Vicar to purſue with ſpirituall armes, to the preiudice of the ſaluation of ſo many ſoules,thoſe who repenting had with great humility craued abſolution: eſpetially the cauſe for which they were cenſured ceaſſing. That it was an other matter to purſue them with temporall armes,and therein he was determined to perſeuer, and made offer to conſent with the reſt to obſerue the league of Cambray. Being in theſe termes with the Ambaſſadors,he would willingly haue abſolued them, if the Venetians would haue giuen place and conſented to two conditions. The one, to leaue the nauigation of the Adriattick Sea free to the ſubiects of the Church;the other, that they ſhould keepe no more a Magiſtrate called Viſdomo in Ferrara, which was a City depending on the Church.

The Popes anſwer to thoſe who hindered the Venetians abſolution.

The Venetians in the meane time, vpon this different meaning of Princes, not greatly eſteeming the Emperour, ſent forces vnder the conduct of Andre Gritti the Prouidator to Vincenza, on aſſurance that they were wiſhed for by the people,who at his arriuall tooke the ſuburbes of Poſterla,then being brought into the city by the townesmen, the Prince of Anhalt and Fracaſſo retired into the caſtle, which was yeelded foure daies after. It was verily thought that he might haue taken Verona likewiſe, if he had gone thither on a ſodaine: but whileſt he tarried for the reduction of the caſtle of Vincenza, new companies of the

The Venetians recouer Vincenza.

Emperors

Emperors entred into it, and three hundred Launces of the French Kings, commanded by the Lord D' Aubigni, ſo, as there being in it fiue hundred Launces, and fiue thouſand footmen as well Spaniards as Lanſquenets, it was a hard matter to take it. The Venetian army neuertheleſſe came thither ſoone after, vpon hope, that at their arriuall, they in the city would riſe: but becauſe it being diuided into two parts, did not ſhew it ſelfe before the wals at one time, the buſineſſe fell not out according to their proiect.

The Imperials ſuccor Verona with men and victuals.

The Venetians at their departure thence tooke Baſciana, then Feltre and Ciuitall, with the fort of Eſcalla. At the ſame time Antonio and Ieronimo Sauorgniane, gentlemen of the country followinge the Venetians party in Friull, tooke Caſtel-nouo beyond the riuer of Tailemont, no newes being heard of Maximillian. The Venetian army for the recouery of the Polleſin of Rouigo, marched towards Monſelecia and Montagnane, to the end from thence to enter on the territory of Ferrara. Hauing moreouer, ſent their nauall army, conducted by Angelo Treuiſano, to make warre on the Duke of Ferrara, which entring the Po at the mouth of Fornaces, burnt Corbelo and other villages neere to the Po, not ſparing the whole country as farre as the Lake of Scarra, from whence the light horſe which kept way with it by land ſcoured as farre as Fiquerolles.

The Venetians nauall army ſcoureth the Po as farre as Fiquerolles.

The incredible hatred which they had conceiued againſt the Duke of Ferrara did moue them to doe ſo, who not being content with that which he ſaid did belong vnto him, did detaine that which was none of his owne, hauing receiued of the Emperour for money the village of Eſte in Fee, and that of Montagnane by ingagement, he hauing no title to thoſe places, which from time to time belonged to the Venetians.

The cauſe of the Venetians hatred to the Duke of Ferrara.

The Duke of Ferrara was much amazed at the comming of this army, and at the report that their land-army followed it: for he had no meanes to defend himſelfe, till the ſupplies which he expected from the Pope and the French King were arriued, but only with his artillery planted on the bankes of the Riuer to ſtop the enemies farther paſſage, which was the cauſe that Treniſan lay at Ankor in the middeſt of the Riuer behind a little Iſland, tarrying for the land forces, without which he knew he could not goe forward: And to remaine there at more ſafety til their arriual, he cauſed two Baſtions to bee made on the Riuer Po, the one on Ferraras ſide, and the other on the oppoſite ſhore with a bridge of boats, to the end he might be able to releeue the Baſtions, chiefly that on Ferrara ſide.

The Venetian General builds two Baſtions on the two banks of Po.

The Duke determined to hinder the finiſhing of that worke, whereupon hauing aſſembled the greateſt forces he could, as wel of the City as of ſtrangers, he ſent them before to aſſaile the Baſtion, and he himſelfe followed after with ſtore of horſe.

But thoſe of the Baſtion being releeued by their owne fellowes out of the veſſels did with ſuch fury charge the Ferrarois as they put them to rout, ſo as the Duke, who followed them at the heeles with his cauallery, meeting with them, turned them backe and encouraged them, but it laſted not long. For the enemies fury was ſuch, together with the ſafety of the place well fortified with ſmall peeces of Ordnance, as at the laſt he himſelfe was conſtrained to retire with great loſſe of his people, who were ſlaine and hurt. This mooued the Lord of Chaumont to ſend a hundred and fifty French Launces for the gard of Ferrara: and the Pope being incenſed againſt the Venetians, for that without reſpect to him they had aſſailed the Duke, ſent thither likewiſe the two hundred men at armes which hee had alotted for the Emperor.

The Venetians driue the Ferrarois from the Baſtions.

But this aide would haue come to late, if the Venetians had not beene enforced to call backe their army, the which hauing conquered all the Polleſin, was in readineſſe to goe to the reliefe of their nauall army: for it was enforced to returne backe, hauing left foure hundred light horſe, and as many footmen for the defence of the Polleſin, and for the helpe of their veſſels: becauſe the Lord of

The Venetians recouer the Polleſin.

Chaumont hauing entred Verona with great forces, had lent eight thouſand Ducats to the Emperour who had engaged to the King for the ſame ſum, and for others to be paied afterward the towne of Valeggia, ſixe miles from Breſſia, and a paſſage of the Riuer Mincia of great importance: and made preparations beſide (as it was ſaid) to goe and beſeege Vincenza.

The Venetians prouide for Legnaga, Suaua, and Vincenza.

The Venetians diuided their army into three parts which they placed in Legnaga, Suaua, and Vincenza: then being deſirous to conſerue Vincenza, they beganne to fortifie it with ſtrong rampiers, and with deepe ditches full of water, they like they did afterwards to Suaua and Legnaga; and in this manner ſtanding on their guarde, they aſſured the whole country, eſpecially for that winter. Ferrara by this meanes was in ſome ſort eaſed, but not altogether freed from feare and daunger: For thoſe in the veſſels, ſeconded by the cauallery that was left with them, did daylie ſcoure euen to the Cittie Gates, and other Venetian veſſels comming by an other way to aſſaile the Ferrarois, had taken Comachia. But by the arriuall of the Popes, and French Kings forces, the Duke and the Cardinall of Eſte beganne to take courage, and for to make diuerſe attempts to draw the enemies to fight, they which they refuſed til the return of their army.

The Duke and the Cardinall perceiuing that the ouer-throw of the veſſels would gaine the victory, and that it might eaſily be effected if meanes were made for the ſafe planting of the artillery on the banke of the Riuer, the Cardinal came and aſſailed the Baſtion once againe, and hauing beaten backe the enemies, who were come forth to skirmiſh, hee did take and fortifie the nereſt part of the cauſey, vnknowne to the enemies: then in the night hee brought the artillery to the ſhoare oppoſite to the enemy and planting it with great ſilence, it began in the morning to diſcharge very furiouſly. The veſſels would haue eſcaped by flight, but not being able to make way by reaſon of the ſhot, they were in a manner all ſunke or taken. The General leaping into a Skiffe ſaued himſelfe by flight with the chiefe ſtandard of the common-wealth, fifteene Gallies fell into the Dukes power, certaine great ſhips, diuers Fuſts, with other ſmall boates, almoſt numberleſſe, two thouſand men died there, as well by the ſhot as by fire and water, and threeſcore banners were taken. Many that came on ſhoare were ſaued by the Venetian light horſe men.

The Duke of Ferrara defeateth the Venetians naual army.

The Duke of Ferrara takes Loretta.

The Duke after this defeate, ſent forces of horſe and foote to doe the like to thoſe who had taken Comachia, who recouered Loretta which the Venetians had fortified, and they had defeated the army which was there if it had not retired to Bebies knowing the danger.

Such vnfortunate end had the ſeege of Ferrara which laſted about one month. Their affaires proſpered better on the Paduan territorie: for the Emperour beeing on the Vincentin with foure thouſand footmen, the Venetians, by the aide of the country peaſants, almoſt vnder his noſe and before his face, tooke the Paces of Eſcalla, Cogola, and Baſciana: whereof the Emperour complayning ſaid, That the departure of the Lord of La Paliſſe had bred diuers diſorders: and thereupon hee went to Bolſane, and from thence to Inſpruch to hold the Dyet which hee had appointed, and the Lord of Chaumont following his example retired to Milan, leauing ſtrong garriſons in all places on the frontiers, and eſpeciallie in Verona, which the Emperour could not haue defended alone.

The Emperour goeth to hold a Dyet at Inſpruch.

During this ceſſation of armes, Maximillian ſought to take truce with the Venetians: the Biſhop of Peſcera the Popes Nuntio, practized it by his Maſters commandement; the Ambaſſadors were at Hoſpitaletto, a little aboue Eſcalla, and conferred with Iohn Cornare and Lodouico Mocenigo the Venetian commiſſioners: But the Emperours exceſſiue demands brake off this treaty

A treaty of truce, motioned betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians, broken.

treaty without any concluſion, to the Popes great griefe, who wiſhed that the Venetians might be freed from this warre, that he might ioyne them to himſelfe againſt the French King, whom he more and more hated, thereby to lay foundations of great importance, and to this purpoſe had ſecretly ſent a meſſenger to the King of England.

The Venetian army in the meane time beeing quartered at Saint Boniface on the Veronois, held Verona in a manner beſeeged, al-be-it deeds of armes were coldly performed on either part, according to the ſeaſon which was cold. The Princes mindes neuertheleſſe were greatly troubled, and eſpecially the Emperour, who inuenting all meanes to get the vpper-hand of the Venetians, drew his affaires ſtill out at length, and did publiſh an other Dyet at Ausbourg, where the Electors of the Empire hauing made inſtance to treate of peace with the Venetians, before they mentioned any prouiſions for the warre: he thought that the Biſhop of Peſcera the Popes Nuntio had ſolicited the matter, whereupon hee ſent him away.

The Emperors propoſition to the French King.

And conſidering that the reſolutions of Dyets were long & vncertaine, he reſolued with himſelfe to induce the French King to condeſcend to take Padua, Vincenza and Treuiſo with his owne forces, and to accept of a ſufficient recompence for it. This offer being propounded in the Kings Counſell, was much debated on all ſides, and the King almoſt conſented by the councell of diuers, to accept it, and to returne againe in perſon into Italy with a mighty army: But vpon the difficulties which were made to the contrary, hee delayed the anſwere and reſolued aboue all things, to vſe meanes to appeaſe the Pope and to make him his friend if it were poſſible, at leaſt-wiſe that hee ſhould not bee his enemy: and for this purpoſe ſent poſt to Rome Albert Count of Carpi, a man of excellent wit and iudgement, vnto whom were giuen very ample inſtructions, and commiſſion likewiſe to diſwade the Pope from abſoluing the Venetians: but as hee arriued, the Pope had already concluded and promiſed it: the Venetians hauing after long diſputations for certaine monthes ſpace conſented to thoſe conditions, whereon the difficulty lay: becauſe they ſaw none other remedy for their ſafety, but to be ioyned with him.

The Pope abſolutly the Venetian.

The Ceremonies of the abſolution beeing ended, the Ambaſſadors returned to Venice, leauing at Rome, neere to the Pope, Ieronimo Donato a very learned man, one of their owne number, and very pleaſing to his Holineſſe, who did great good ſeruice to his countrey in matters which he afterwards treated with him. Maximillian and the French King were diſpleaſed for that the Pope had abſolued the Venetians; the one becauſe hee had not yet recouered his owne according to the treaty of Cambray, and the other becauſe he deſired for his owne particular profit that the Venetians might no more recouer themſelues: But neither of them did in any ſort perceiue the Popes meaning, eſpecially the French King whom the Pope fed with vaine hopes.

Maximillian and the French King are diſpleaſed with the Pope for abſoluing the Venetians.

For after the abſolution, contrary to Kings meaning, hee gaue leaue to the Feudataries and Tennants of the Church, to receiue the Venetians pay, and to John Paul Baillon to bee Generall of their army in Count Petillians ſtead, who was newlie dead: Then hee vſed meanes to reconcile the Venetians with the Emperour, to the end that they three beeing ioyned together might make warre on the French King. But they could not agree, for the Emperour would abſolutely haue Verona for his ſhare, and the Venetians ſtoutly craued it for themſelues.

The Popes bad meaning to the French King.

Moreouer, the Pope did ſecretly ſolicite the King of England to make warre on the French King, putting him in minde of the antient quarrelles betwixt thoſe two Kingdomes, and the faire occaſion which offered it ſelfe with fortunate ſucceſſe.

He did beſides continue his practizes begunne with the Swiſſes by means of the Biſhop of Syon whoſe authority was great amongſt that Nation, which fell out in the end as hee deſired.

For they growing proud that all men ſought their friendſhip, the King ſoliciting them to renue the league which was almoſt expired, with great boldneſſe and preſumption they craued the augmentation of their pentions which were threeſcore thouſand pounds a yeere, beſides the ſecret pentions which were giuen to priuate perſons: At which inſolency the King being mooued, he reiected them with haughty ſpeeches, making ſhew that he did not eſteeme them, and flatly denied to augment their pentions, hauing made alliance with the Valeſians, and the Lords of the Griſons.

The Kings anger againſt the Swiſſes.

The Pope being glad of this diſunion, made new confederacy with them, and thought he had done much for the execution of that which he intended, and firſt of all he aſſailed the Duke of Ferrara, for ſpight that hauing receiued ſo many benifits at his hands, he depended more on the French King then on him.

VVhereunto the Popes actions tended.

And he imperiouſly forbad him to cauſe any more ſalt to be made at Comachia. Duke Alphonſo complayning for that he went about to hinder him from receiuing the profit of his owne reuenues, would not obey this commandement, wherevpon he threatned him with greeuous cenſures if he did not deſiſt, his thoughts and actions wholly tending to defend and raiſe the Venetians.

The Emperour and the French King, who deſired nothing ſo much as their downefall, beeing diſpleaſed with the Popes proceedings, did more ſtrictly vnite themſelues together, and reſolued to aſſaile the Venetians that Summer with great forces, and ſummoned the Pope to ioyne with them according to the purport of the confederacy of Cambray; but he anſwered that he was no more tied to that confederacy, which was accompliſhed, it being Maximillians fault that hee had not Treuiſo, or recompence in money for it: In the meane time Verona had like to haue beene taken by the Venetian Garriſon which lay at Saint Boniface, who beeing ſent for by the townesmen, came by night neere to the Cittie, to ſcale the Caſtle of Saint Peter, but in ſetting vppe their Ladders, which were to ſhort, they were diſcouered, wherevpon they returned to their Garriſon, and diuers of the conſpiracy in the city were puniſhed.

The enterprize vpon Verona diſcouered.

About the ſame the Pope hauing notice that peace was newlie concluded betwixt the Kings of France and England, and perceiuing on the other ſide the brauado which Maximillian vſed in his behalfe, in demanding of him the loane of two hundred thouſand Ducats, threating him if hee refuſed it to vnite himſelfe with the French King againſt him, hee was deſirous to reunite himſelfe with the King, and beganne to deale with the Earle of Carpi who was ſtill at Rome.

But on a ſodaine hee changed his minde, ſo ſoone as hee had notice of the ſmall aide which the commiſſioners in the aſſembly of Ausbourg had offered the Emperour, and that the King of England had not made him ſuch an anſwere as hee expected: By meanes whereof taking courage, he beganne a new to aſſaile the Duke of Ferrara, becauſe the ſaid Duke had raiſed ſome new impoſitions on marchandize which was brought to Venice by the Riuer Po, ſaying, That by the law, the vaſſall could not do it without the leaue of the chiefe Lord, and that the ſame did preiudice thoſe of Bolognia his ſubiects, threatning him, if he did not take away thoſe impoſts to make war vpon him.

The Pope in hatred to the King doth aſſaile the Duke of Ferrara a new.

The King heereby found himſelfe greatly perplexed, for on the one ſide it greeued him to make warre on the Pope, and on the other hee would not forſake his friend the Duke of Ferrara, beeing obliged to maintain and defend him: and the more the Pope did vrge him to forſake him, the more conſtant he was in his defence. After diuers reaſons alleaged on either ſide, that the King had propounded conditions, whereby, for the moſt part, he ſhould bee ſatisfied, for

The French King greatly perplexed.

thoſe

thoſe loſſes which hee ſhould pretend to haue ſuſtained by the Duke, hee was moreouer content to bee bound, (according to the Popes requeſt made vnto him) that his army ſhould not paſſe ouer the Riuer Po, vnleſſe it were to protect the Florentines, and to moleſt Pandolpho Petrucci, and Iohn Paul Baillon.

During all theſe differences the Lord of Chaumont had taken without any impediment with fifteene hundred Launces, and tenne thouſand footmen with great ſtore of Ordnance, followed by three thouſand Pioners, the Polleſin of Rouigo which the Venetians had abandoned, and the tower Marquiſana, the Duke of Ferrara beeing ioyned with him with two hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſe and two thouſand footmen. Then he came to Caſtelbaldo, and from thence to Montagnane and Eſte, which he tooke at the firſt ſummons, and gaue them to the Duke. The Lord of Chaumont taketh the Polleſin of Rouigo.

The Prince of Anhalt, the Emperours Lieutenant, came forth of Verona, with three hundred French Launces, two hundred men at armes, and three thouſand Lanſquenets, and following the Lord of Chaumont, they came both together towards the Vincentine territory, where the whole country did forthwith yeeld vnto them, the Venetian army being retired into a place of ſafety: by meanes whereof the Vincentines perceiuing themſelues to be wholy forſaken, hauing of themſelues no meanes of defence, had none other hope left but only in the victors mercy the which they did hope to obtaine by the meanes of the Lord of Chaumont, of whom hauing gotten paſſe-port, they came to the Campe in wretched habit, where one of their number hauing with great humillity declared to the Prince of Anhalt the infinite and intollerable loſſes that they had ſuſteined, and the miſery and calamity whereto they were brought, to the end to mooue him to ſome compaſſion, and to appeaſe his wrath, they receiued but a very vnpleaſing and vngentle anſwere, which in effect was to haue their liues, goods and honours, at his owne diſcretion. The Vincentines being daunted with ſo cruell an anſwere, remained for a certaine ſpace like men without any motion or feeling, and not knowing what to anſwere or thinke, they at laſt, by the Lord of Chaumonts councell, fell downe proſtrate on the earth, and did abſolutely referre themſelues and their city into the conquerors hands. But the Lord of Chaumont making interceſſion for them, with diuers others, the matter was ſo handled as the Prince of Anhalt was content to promiſe them, that their perſons ſhould haue no harme, but the diſpoſing of their goods ſhould be abſolutely referred to his will and pleaſure. The Vincentine commiſſioners craue pardon of the Prince of Anhalt. The Vincentines yeeld themſelues to the victors mercy.

After the taking of Vincenza, al be-it the Emperour did in no ſort ſtirre againſt the Venetians, as hee had promiſed hee would, but on the contrary, his companies decreaſing dayly for want of pay, the Lord of Chaumont neuertheleſſe perceiuing that whatſoeuer had beene done till then, was to no purpoſe, vnleſſe Legnaga were taken, hee determined to goe and encampe before it, where hauing ouercome the difficulties of the waters, which the Venetians had in ſuch ſort let forth, as the whole country was drowned therewith, he wanne Porto, which is a part of Legnaga, and hauing cauſed foure thouſand French foot, and ſixe peeces of ordnance to croſſe ouer to the farther ſide of the Riuer Adicé, hee beganne to batter the Baſtion on both ſides the Riuer, part whereof being beaten downe, the Prouidator who was within it, al-be-it his ſouldiers did what they could to rampire it vp againe, being danted with feare, retired on a ſodaine the night following into the caſtle with certaine Venetian Gentlemen. The French beſiege Legnaga.

This retreat beeing knowne by daie breake, the captaine of the footmen which were in the Baſtion, did yeeld on condition of ſafetie of liues and goods. The Towne was forth-with ſackt, and they who kept the other Baſtion fled Legnaga taken.

fled thorow the Marſhes : The caſtle yeelded ſoone after, on this condition, that the Venetian Gentlemen ſhould remaine priſoners, and the ſouldiers ſhould depart with white wands in their hands. There did the Lord of Chaumont receiue newes of the death of the Cardinall of Amboiſe his vncle, whereat the Pope made great ſhew of contentation, thinking that ſo long as he liued he ſhold euer haue an enemy : And ſo much he told the Venetian Ambaſſador, diſcourſing with him concerning other occurrents.

The death of the Cardinal of Amboyſe.

The Lord of Chaumont hauing left for the gard of Legnaga an hundred Launces with a thouſand footmen, determined to returne into the Dutchy of Milan, according to the Kings command, but by the Emperours entreaty he was countermanded till the month of Iune were ended, by which time the Emperour promiſed to come into Italy : and to the end his comming downe might bee more eaſie, the Almaines deſiring to recouer Maroſtic, Ciuitella, Baſciana, and other places neere about, the Lord of Chaumont came and encamped with his army at Longare, to keepe the Venetians troupes from entring into Vincenza, wher was a weak Garriſon: but the Venetian army was retired to Padua.

The Lord of Chaumont takes diuers places which ſtopped the Emperors comming into Italy.

The Almaines who were ioyned with the Lord of Chaumont went to Torricelles, then to Ciuitella, which ſoone yeelded; the like did Maroſtic, Baſciana and other places not farre from thence, which were abandoned by the Venetians. From thence they marched towards Eſcalla which the Almaines did much deſire to take, becauſe it was a commodious paſſage for thoſe companies which were to come forth of Germany, but they could not paſſe forward : for the peaſants wonderfully affecting the Venetians, had poſſeſſed diuers places in the mountaine: ſo that hauing taken Caſtel-noua by compoſition, which is likewiſe a paſſage in that mountaine, they returned to the Brente, where they had formerly beene quartered.

From thence the Prince of Anhalt did by an other way ſend diuers foot-companies towards Eſcalla, who paſſing by Feltre did ſpoile and burne it : then being come to the place of Eſcalla, they found it wholly abandoned, and Couola likewiſe. The Country of Friul was no leſſe ruined and aſſaulted on euery ſide, now by the Venetians, and then by the Almaines, now defended by ſome, then ſpoiled by others : There was nothing to be ſeene euery where, but dead bodies, and burnt and ſackt places. The time drawing neere that the French army was to depart, the Emperour and the French King made new couenants together, That the army ſhould remaine there the next whole moneth following, and that the King ſhould lend him fiftie thouſand crownes, to defray extraordinarie expences, and for the payment of the foote-men that moneth, and the King ſhould receiue in pawne Verona, with her whole territory, as well for theſe fiftie thouſand crownes, as for the other fifty thouſand which had beene lent him before.

Verona and her territory pawned to the King for a hundred thouſand crownes.

In regard of this agreement, the King ſent to command the Lord of Chaumont to remaine there, who ſoone reſolued to aſſaile Monſeleſia, to pluck forth that thorne from his foote, for which he made preparation ſo ſoone as foure hundred Spaniſh Launces were arriued, ſent by the Catholike King to the Emperours aide. Hauing then together croſſed the Riuer Brente, and that of Baquillon at the village of Purle, they came to Monſeleſia, which is a towne ſeated on the plaine at the foote of the hill which is very high, on the toppe whereof is a caſtle; and on the backe thereof, which as it goeth on waxeth more narrow, there are three encloſures of walles : The towne was on a ſodaine abandoned, and the French men being quartered in it beganne to batter the firſt wall, wherein hauing made a reaſonable breach in diuers places, the French and Spaniards being come to the aſſault, thoſe within it after a ſlight defence beganne to retire in ſuch diſorder, as the French and Spaniards hauing already entred the firſt wall, did in skirmiſhing enter pell-mell with them, into the other two, and then euen to the Caſtle, where the moſt part of them being ſlaine, the others retired into the Dongeon, where yeelding vpon diſcretion they were maſſacred by the Almans, who hauing not men to keepe that place, did race the Caſtle and burne the Towne.

firſt

Monſe'tfit with her Caſtle taken & ruyned

This exploit being executed, the armies retired, albeit the Almains did incite the Lord of Chaumont to goe and beſeege Treuiſo, but he anſwered them, that if the Emperor had come againſt the Venetians, with his promiſed forces, it had beene an eaſie matter to haue done it, but that thoſe who were ioyned with him, were brought to a ſmall number, and not ſufficient for ſuch an enterpriſe, ſeeing that within Treuiſo, there were ſtore of ſouldiors, and beſides, the Venetians had greatly fortified it, and laſt of all, that there was no more victualls to be found, in the country.

During theſe exploits, a new commandement came to the Lord of Chaumont, from France, to retire ſpeedily with his army, into the Dutchy of Milan, leauing foure hundred Lances, and fifteene hundred Spaniſh foote-men, paid by the King to accompany the Almains, the which hee did, vnder command of the Lord of Perſi, and him-ſelfe ſpeedily marched whether hee was ſent for: For the Pope would neuer haue abſolued the Venetians from the cenſures, nor practized the Swiſſes alliance, but onely to bring to paſſe, that which he had determined in his minde, not onely to reintegrate diuers ſtates to the Church, which hee ſayd did belong vnto it, but like-wiſe to driue the French King forth of Italy; who not deſiring to make warre on the Church, and wiſhing by all meanes to auoid the hatred thereof, did agree to make new conuentions with him. But the more that the King drew neere to the Popes demandes, the farther of was the Pope from comming to any agreement, and ſeemed to bee diſpleaſed with nothing, but for that the King had taken the Duke of Ferrara into his protection, whome hee extreamely hated: where-vpon the King propounded diuers Articles to giue him content, but hee would not accept of any one. At the laſt he craued that he would abſolutely quit the Dukes protection. The King replying, That in ſo doing he ſhould incurre great diſhonor, he anſwered, That ſeing the King refuſed it, he would neither bee his friend, nor his enemy.

The Lord of Chaumont with his forces returneth to the Dutchy of Milan.

The Popes diſcontent againſt the King.

Theſe were the outward behauiors of the Pope, but hee beganne ſecretly to treat of greater matters then againſt the Duke of Ferrara, ſeeing that hee had the Swiſſes on his ſide, and that the Venetians were on foote againe, and alſo becauſe the King of Arragon was not ſincerely conioyned with the French Kings: That the Emperors forces were weake, and for that hee was not out of hope to cauſe the King of England to ſtirre. The Pope then working very ſecretly, would haue Genoa to bee beſeeged at one time, by ſea and land; that twelue thouſand Swiſſes ſhould come downe into the Dutchy of Milan; that the Venetians with all their forces ſhould come into the field, to recouer the Citties held by the Emperor; and that his owne army ſhould enter the Ferrarois, meaning afterward to cauſe it to march into the Dutchy of Milan, vpon the good ſucceſſe of the Swiſſes enterpriſe.

The Popes ſecret practiſes.

In the meane time hee cauſed it cunningly to bee giuen forth, that the Swiſſes preparations and his owne, were but onely to aſſaile Ferrara on the ſodaine. But the comming of Lodouico Fieſca to Genoa, for the King, with eight hundred men of the country, did aſſure the Citty, and brake all the Popes deſeignes, with thoſe of the Bandetti. On the other ſide the Popes army had entred Romagnia, vnder the command of the Duke of Vrbin, who hauing taken the townes of Lugo, Bagnacauallo, and diuers other places on the hither ſide the Po, did encampe before the Caſtle of Lugo: but beeing aduertiſed that the Duke of Ferrara was comming thither with great forces, he on a ſodaine raiſed his ſeege and retired retired to Imola, leauing beehind them three peeces of ordnance for a prey to the enemy.

Genoa aſſured for the King.

Alphonſo then recouered all that which had bin taken from him in Romagnia, but he did not long hold it: for the Popes army being increaſed, it recouered with eaſe, the aboue named place, and the Caſtle of Lugo likewiſe, and ſoone after the Citty of Modena, for which Duke Alphonſo could not prouide: but the loſſe of the ſame towne was the cauſe, that hee ſpeedily prouided for Regio, fearing the like miſhap as had fortuned to Modena.

The Popes army taketh Modena.

The Swiſſes on the other ſide, (the confederacy betwixt the French King, and them being expired, certaine Monthes before,) beeing vexed that the King had denied their demands, had determined in an aſſembly held at Lucerna to riſe againſt him. The Lord of Chaumont hauing notice of their determination, and being vncertaine which way they would enter, placed ſtrong Gardes on Coma's ſide, tooke all boates forth of the lake, he brought victualls into ſtrong places, and tooke away the Mil-ſtones from Mills. Beſides, fearing leaſt by Saint Bernards Mount, they might paſſe into Piedmont, hee had procured the Duke of Sauoy to deny them paſſage, and by the ſame Dukes conſent, hee ſent fiue hundred Lances to Yuree for that purpoſe. The Swiſſes being animated (as hath beene ſaid) againſt the King, and paid by the Pope, ſixe thouſand of them without Artillery came by the way of Bellinſona, and hauing taken the bridge of Treſe, which was forſaken by ſixe hundred French foote-men, they came and encamped at Vareſa, waiting for (as they ſaid) the Biſhop of Syon, with new companies.

Six thouſand Swiſſes come to Vareſe againſt the king

The Swiſſes comming did greatly trouble the French, becauſe a great part of their forces was diſtributed for the gard of the ſtrong towne of the Dutchy, and an other part thereof was ioyned with the Almains army againſt the Venetians: Yet neuertheleſſe, the Lord of Chaumont hauing aſſembled, all the power hee could, came with fiue hundred Lances, and foure thouſand foot-men into the plaine of Chaſtillon two Miles from Vareſa. Foure thouſand Swiſſes more came, and ioyned in that place with the former ſix thouſand, and all of them together ſent to the Lord of Chaumont, to demand paſſage, ſaying that they were going for the Churches ſeruice, but it being refuſed them the fourth day after their arriuall, they all marched towards Chaſtillon, and in their march they Valliantly defended them-ſelues againſt the French army, who was ſtill at their ſide, and skirmiſhed with them in front, and in flanke, and they anſwered them in like manner, no diſorder being ſeene among them.

After they had in this manner paſſed along, into diuers places, the Lord of Chaumont ſtill attending on them, they came at laſt to the bridge of Treſe, and from thence in troopes retired home into their country, being brought to the extremity of hunger, and want of mony, which inforced them to retire. If the Popes deſeigne had taken effect, which was to haue aſſailed the French, in diuers and ſundry places at once, their affaires would haue ſucceeded badly, but the enterpriſe of Genoa, was long before the Swiſſes comming.

The ſix thouſand Swiſſes returne home into their country for want of victualls and mony.

The Venetians alſo tarried longer, then they thought to haue done, who comming from Padua, recouered without any difficulty, Eſte, Monſeleſia, Montagnana, Maroſtia, and Baſciana, and paſſing forward, they entred the Vincentine Territory, the Almains being retired to Verona: So as in a very ſhort ſpace they recouered whatſoeuer they had loſt the yeare before (Legnaga excepted,) and not ſatisfied here-with, they came and beſeeged Verona, where lay three hundred Spaniſh Lances, a hundred as well Almains as Italians, and more then foure hundred French Lances, fiue hundred foote-men and foure thouſand Almains, vnder the command of the Prince of Anhalt, who not long before dyed.

The Venetians recouer all the places neere to Padua which had bin taken by the French.

The

The people of Verona not affecting the Almains, had taken armes, and therein conſiſted the Venetians chiefeſt hope, expecting when they within the citty would riſe in their behalfe. The Venetian Army was of eight hundred men at Armes, three thouſand light horſe, the moſt of whom were Stradiots, and ten thouſand foot, with great numbers of husbandmen. They began with great fury to batter the cities walls, (notwithſtanding that the townes artillery did greatly hurt them) and they did beat downe a great part of the wall, euen to the ſcarpe: yet neuertheleſſe, it was more valiantly defended then aſſailed, wherevpon the Venetian Captaines being diſcouraged, perceiuing likewiſe that the people were quiet in the citty, they determined to raiſe their Campe, and made haſt ſo to doe, vpon intelligence, that the Lord of Chaumont, (who after the Suiſſes departure, hauing notice of the danger wherein Verona was) marched thether to their reliefe.

Verona beſieged.

The number of the Venetian Army.

The Venetians being retired to Saint Martins, fiue miles from Verona, marched to Boniface, in regard of the Lord of Chaumonts comming. In the meane time, Vdiſlaus King of Hungary, beeing ſolicited by Maximillian and the French King, did at the ſame time call Petro Paſcalie, Ambaſſador for the Signory in Hungary into his councell chamber, and told him that his meaning was to make warre vpon them, vnleſſe they yeelded vp Slauonia vnto him, which did in times paſt belong vnto his crowne, and that he was reſolued to haue it: That if the commonwealth would freely re-deliuer it, hee would for euer remaine their friend and confederate, otherwiſe hee would let them know how much better it were to yeeld vp in friendſhip, that which they could not keepe by force. The Ambaſſador vpon this demand beginning to excuſe the Senate, was not ſuffered to ſpeake, and all the fauour hee could get was, To ſay that hee would aduertiſe the Senate thereof, crauing time that hee might receiue an anſwer: But at the comming forth of the Councell, certaine of thoſe who had beene there preſent, did in ſecret bid the Ambaſſador not to bee diſcouraged, and told him, that their King for want of meanes could not make warre vpon them, but that thoſe threatnings were onely to content the French King and the Emperor, who requeſted it, and ſome Hungarian Lords, who for their owne particular ambition, incited him thereunto, the which the ſucceſſe of that buſineſſe prooued afterward to be true.

The Venetians raiſe their Campe from before Verona.

The King of Hungary ſummoneth the Venetian Ambaſſador.

Now to returne to the Venetian Armie which was retired to Saint Boniface, thoſe of Treuiſo tooke the towne of Azola by compoſition, whileſt in the Friouli they proceeded with the vſuall cruelties and variations, in deſtroying buildings, and ſpoiling the countrey. The Marquis of Mantua was at the ſame time deliuered from his imprisonment by the Popes meanes, who did greatly affect him, meaning to make vſe of him and his Eſtate in his warre againſt the French King. Others ſay, that it was by the meanes of Bajazet Emperor of Turkes, who was a great friend to the Marquis, who cauſed the Bayliffe of the Venetian Marchants, trading at Pera, to promiſe that the Senate ſhould ſet him at liberty, the which was ſpeedily done, becauſe they would not incenſe ſo mighty a Prince againſt them.

The Venetians take Azola.

The Marquis of Mantua is ſet at liberty.

The Pope was againe deſirous to make an attempt on the Citty of Genoa, promiſing to him ſelfe more then euer the alteration of that State: Wherevpon the Venetians, rather of neceſſity, then for any liking to his furious motions, did augment their ſea Armie which lay at Ciuita-vecchia, with foure great ſhips, the like did the Pope, adding one Galeaſſe, with certaine other veſſels to his owne. This fleet departing thence, wherein were fifteene light Galleys, three great Galleys, one Galeaſſe, and three ſhips of Biſcay, went and ſhewed themſelues before the hauen of Genoa. But the Citty being kept in ſuch manner, as not any of the contrary faction durſt ſtirre, and the Ordnance of the tower of Codifa playing continually vpon them, they were conſtrained to retire: and beeing come to Portouenere, diſpairing likewiſe of dooing any good there, it returned to Ciuita-vecchia, from whence the Venetian veſſells departing home-wards by the Popes conſent, Enterpriſe vpon Genoa.

The Venetian fleet shak'n by a tempest.

conſent, were aſſailed by a terible tempeſt, in which fiue Galleis were caſtaway, the reſidew being driuen vpon the coaſt of Barbary, did in the end come into the Venetians hauens much broken.

In this manner nothing fell out luckily for the Pope of all that he had enterprizzed againſt the French King: for no commotion aroſe in Genoa as hee had confidently promiſed to him-ſelfe; the Venetians alſo attempted in vaine to take Verona, and the Swiſſes, who had rather ſhewed then brandiſhed their armes, returned, and went on no farther: and in Ferrara, by reaſon of the ſpeedy aid of the French who were come thither ther was no likelihood of any danger Modena only taken by ſtealth, remained to him.

Yetneuertheleſſe the Venetians alone tooke his part, becauſe his enterprizes proceeded not from any particular intereſt, but from a ſole and ſincere deſire of the liberty of Italy, but he could not hope much from them, by reaſon their treaſure was exhauſted, and them-ſelues oppreſſed with ſondry difficulties. The French King beeing by ſo many experiences aſſured of the Popes bad meaning towards him, determined to ſtrengthen him-ſelfe as much as he might with the Emperors friendſhip, and to paſſe in perſon the ſpring following into Italy, to make warre on the Venetians, or on the Pope, according as the ſtate of his affaires ſhould petmit.

The end of the eight Booke of the fourth Decade.

The Contents of the ninth Booke of the fourth Decade.

With what boldneſſe and reſolution Pope Iulius marched againſt the Duke of Ferrara, and beeing not able to ouercome him by temporall armes, he vſed ſpirituall; A Generall Councell publiſhed at Lions. A new Confederacy, as well offenſiue as defenſiue, betwixt the Emperor and the French-King. How greatly the marche of the French Army toward Bolognia, did affright the Pope and all his Cardinals. The Lord of Chaumonts retreate into the Dutchy of Milan. The Duke of Ferrara defeateth the Venetians nauall Army. The Popes Army taketh the Citty of Concordia. Mirandolo taken by the Confederates. The King doth wholy reſolue to make warre on the Pope. The Death of the Lord of Chaumont, whereupon Triuulcio is made Generall of the Army. A great Earthquake at Venice, and in the Countrey neere adioyning. The Popes Army is defeated before the Baſtida Geniuola. The French Kings diſcontent for that the Emperor conſenteth to a peace with the Venetians. The King of Arragons ſecret practiſes againſt the French King. The Cardinall of Pauia flyes from Bologna at the arriuall of the French. The flight of the Duke of Vrbin, Generall of the Popes Army. Death of the Cardinall of Pauia, ſlaine by the Duke of Vrbin. The French King greatly deſireth to bee at peace with the Pope. How the Venetians did ſtill maintaine their forces and greatneſſe. A new confederacy betwixt the Pope, the King of Arragon, and the Venetians. The Swiſſes come downe into the Dutchie of Milan. The Army of the Confederates before Bologna, the which is releeued by Gaſton of Foix. And laſtly how the Confederates Army diſlodgeth from before Bologna.

The

The ninth Booke of the fourth Decade of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

The Popes great reſolution against the Duke of Ferrara.

THe Pope continuing his diſpleaſure againſt the Duke of Ferrara, omitted all other deſignes onely to purſue this: and to this end hee came to Bologna, at the later end of September, by his preſence to haſten matters, and to giue the greater authority to his affaires, reſoluing to aſſaill Ferrara both by land and water, with all his owne forces, and thoſe of the Venetians, who at his requeſt ſent two armed fleetes againſt Ferrara, which being entred into the Po by the Fornaces, and by the hauen of Primara made great ſpoile on the Ferrara territory: the like did the Popes forces at the ſame time, and yet they came not neere to Ferrara, where beſides the Dukes forces, were two hundred and fifty French lances, and the Popes army was not ſuffitient to aſſayle the Citty by land. For allbeit the Pope gaue pay for eight hundred men at Armes, ſix hundred light horſe, and ſix thouſand foote; the complete number of ſo many was greately wanting: as alſo for that by his command Marke Anthony Colonna, and Iohn Vittelli were gone with two hundred men at armes, and three hundred foote, for the gard of Modena. In regard whereof he requeſted, (ſeeing that the Venetians had in a manner recouered the country of Friull,) that part of their army might be brought on the Ferrarois. He did more-ouer expect three hundred lances, which the King of Arragon was bound to ſend him, according to the articles of the inueſtiture of the realme of Naples, making account vpon the arriuall of all theſe forces to aſſaile Ferrara for his part, and that the Venetians ſhould doe the like for theirs; hee perſwaded him-ſelfe that the people of the Citty would forth-with take armes in his behalfe againſt the Duke, and hee would not harken to thoſe who told him, That it would not ſo fall out, in regard of the garriſon within it, which was ſufficient to defend the Citty, and to hinder the people (if they were ſo bent) from reuolting.

The Popes preparations against the citty of Ferrara.

The Venetians intelligence vpon Breſſia diſcouered.

About the ſame time an intelligence, which the Venetians had on the Citty of Breſſia was diſcouered, the Author whereof Earle Iohn Maria of Martinenga was beheaded there.

Now the Pope perſeuering in his hope, did promiſe to him-ſelfe though all his other forces ſhould faile, to be able to take Ferrara with his owne, and the Venetian fleets, notwithſtanding al the reaſons giuen by his Captaines to the contrary; but he found himſelfe to be deceiued, For the Duke comming forth of Ferrara, did aſſaill the Venetians fleete, which was entred by Primaria, and comming to Hadria with two Galleis, two Fuſts, and with diuers ſmall boates, hee did eaſily defeate it: then hee went to meet with the other, the which conſiſting onely of fuſtes, and other ſmall veſſells had entred by the fornaces, and was come to Puliſella; which attempting to retire into the riuer Adicé, by a chanell neere at hand, it could not by reaſon of the ſhallowneſſe of the water: where-vpon being aſſailed, and beaten with the enemies ordnance, thoſe of the fleet not beeing able to defend it were enforced to forſake it, and to vſe meanes to ſaue them-ſelues and their ordnance. The Pope perceauing that his temporal armes, were not of force to execute his deſeignes, made vſe of ſpirituall, and did publickly excommunicate Alfonſo of Eſte, and all thoſe who were or ſhould come to his aid, and namely the Lord of Chaumont, and all the cheefe perſons of the French army.

The Ferrarois defeateth two fleetes of the Venetians.

to

The Pope excommunicateth Alfonſo of Eſte and all his adherents.

The French King, who already vpon the Popes behauiour determined to call a generall councell againſt him, and had cauſed all the prelates of his Kingdome, to meete at Orleans and afterwards at Tours, hauing notice of his Eccleſiaſticall cenſure, executed ſo raſhly vpon his ſubiects, was of opinion in this aſſembly where he was preſent diuers times, that before hee would free him-ſelfe from his obedience to ſend Ambaſſadors to him, to aduertiſe him of the articles concluded on by the French Clergy, againſt which if hee thought to except, he ſhould be cited to the generall councell, which all Chriſtian Princes had determined ſhould bee aſſembled by a certaine day. According to this reſolution, the Councell was publiſhed at Lyons, againſt the firſt day of March next enſuing.

A Generall councell publiſhed at Lyons.

Within a while after, the Biſhop of Gurcia, ſent from the Emperor arriued at Tours where his entertainment was ſumptuous, which ſhewed how greatly his comming was deſired: with whome the King continuing, to treat of matters which had already beene handled, at the firſt they ſeemed to bee very eaſie, but they were afterwards drawne forth at length, as well by reaſon that the Emperors anſwers were very ſlow, as for the doubt they made of the King of Arragon: The Emperor and the French King thought it fit to bee aſſured of his intent, as well in regard of the continuation of the League of Cambray, as for that which was to be done with the Pope, if hee perſeuered in the Venetians friendſhip, and in his couetouſneſſe to purchace immediately the demaine of Ferrara to the Church. The Catholike King, hauing anſwered all theſe demandes, and his intent being fully knowne: the Biſhop of Gurcia on the one ſide, in the name of the Emperor, and the French king on the other, did paſſe a new confederacy together, reſeruing place for the Pope to enter into it, within two moneths after, and for the Catholike King, and the King of Hungary within foure. The King promiſed to giue the Emperor a hundred thouſand crownes, the one halfe to bee paid preſently, and the other halfe at a time prefixed: and the Emperor promiſed to paſſe into Italy againſt the Venetians, at the ſpring time, with three thouſand horſe and ten thouſand foote: and that then the King ſhould ſend him, at his owne charge, twelue hundred horſe, and eight thouſand foote, with ſtore of artillery, and certaine ſhipes by ſea.

The Biſhop of Gurcia commeth into France from the Emperor.

New confederacy betwixt the Emperor and the French King.

But during theſe treaties in France with the Biſhoppe of Gurcia, the Lord of Chaumont hauing recouered Carpi, determined by the ſoliciting of the Bentiuoles, on a ſodaine to aſſaile the citty of Bologna, wherein the Pope and his whole Court lay, in regard of the faire occaſion which was preſented, there being in the Citty but a few ſtrange ſouldiours. In this determination hee ſet forward, and hauing taken Spilimberta, and Caſtelfranco hee came and lodged at Creſpolana, ten miles from Bologna, meaning the next day to ſhew himſelfe before the gates. His comming being diuulged through the Citty, and that the Bentiuoles were with him, it was filled with confuſion and tumult. The Cardinalls and Prelats not accuſtomed to the dangers of warre, came to the Pope, complayning for that hee had expoſed the ſea Apoſtolike and themſelues to ſo greate danger, beſeeching him to vſe meanes to appeaſe matters, by the mildeſt compoſition hee could. The Ambaſſadors of the Emperor, the Catholike King, and the King of England made the like requeſt. Him-ſelfe alone in ſo great confuſion and diſorder, vncertaine of the peoples fidelity, and diſcontented for that the Venetians aid was ſo ſlow, did obſtinately reſiſt all their importunities. But beeing at laſt ouer-come by the prayers and entreaties of ſo many, he did conſent to haue a meſſenger ſent to the Lord of Chaumont to know of him whether

The French army marcheth toward Bologna where the Pope lay.

Iohn Francisco Pico Earle of Mirandola, might safely come vnto him from the Pope. The Lord of Chaumont being assured of the King his Maisters minde, who desired nothing more then to be at peace with the Pope, did freely condescend to the Earle of Mirandolas comming to him, who being arriued he gently heard, and sent him backe the same day to Bologna, to signifie to the Pope the conditions, whereon he was contented to make an accord, who soone returned with an answere. The Pope hauing, contrary to his custome, patiently heard the articles propounded by the Lord of Chaumont, together with the entreaties of the Cardinalls who besought him with incredible affection to compound howsoeuer, did greatly complaine, for that they propounded ouer hard conditions to him, and seeming greatly to doubt, hee spent that day without declaring, what his intent was. But the arriuall of Chiapin vitelli at Bologna with six hundred light horse of the Venetians, with a squadron of Turkes whome they kept in pay, did encrease his hope.

The Earle of Mirandola sent from the Pope to the Lord of Chaumont.

The Lord of Chaumont came the day following with his whole army and quartered it at the bridge of Rene, three miles from Bologna, whether the Ambassadors of the Emperor, and the Kings of England, and Arragon, came to see him, who returned diuers times the same day (and with them Albert Pico) toward the Pope and the Lord of Chaumont. But the disposition of either of them was much changed: For the Pope had taken courage, perceiuing the people of Bologna freely to shew themselues in the Churches behalfe, and that besides these companies that were arriued, he expected the same day two hundred Stradiots from the Venetians, Fabricio Colonna with two hundred light horse, and certaine Spanish men at Armes. On the contrary, the Lord of Chaumont beganne to distrust the getting of the victory, perceauing that the people did not rise in fauour of the Bentiuoles, as they had promised him, and that he began to want victualls, the which was likely to grow greater euery day: The Pope by meanes hereof beginning againe his vsuall braues, answered, vpon new conditions of peace which were propounded, That there was no meanes to come to an agreement, vnlesse the French Kinge would be bound wholy to giue ouer the defence of Ferrara; where-vpon the whole businesse remaining imperfect, the Lord of Chaumont departed thence, as wel by reason of the want of victualls which were greatly diminished, as becausse he dispaired of doing any good, either by armes or by treaties of peace, and returned to Castel-Franco, and the next day to Rubiero, making shew that hee did it to giue the Pope time to thinke on what he had propounded, and for him selfe to vnderstand the Kings pleasure. The Pope being extreamely incensed against the king, so soone as the Lord of Chaumont was departed, complained of the king, & told the Ambassadors, that he would no more giue eare to peace, vnlesse Ferrara were first of all yeelded to him, where-vpon he leuied new forces, and incited the Venetians to send part of their forces to Modena, to ioyne with his, & to molest Ferrara with the other part, promising to himselfe in a short space to take Regio, Rubiera and Ferrara. If the forces of the Pope, the Venetians, and the Spanish lances vnited together had forthwith marched against the French, it was certenly thought that the Lord of Chaumont would haue forsaken Regio, but their delay encoraged him, and caused him to leuie new companies of foote in sted of those whome hee had cassed at his discamping from before Bologna. Whilest the Popes army, and that of his associates did temporise neere to Modena, the Duke of Ferrara with the French companies, which were commanded by the Lord Castillon, encamped on the Po, iust opposite to the Venetian companies who lay on the farther side of the riuer; they making a retreate, were assailed by diuers boates of Ferrara and by the Dukes ordnance, which sanke eight of their vessells, and the residew hardly escaped. On the other side, the Popes army, commanded by Fabritio Colonna in the absence of the Marquis of Mantua, did beseege Sassuola the which being beaten with the artillery was taken by assault and

The Pope takes courage, at the comming of supplies.

The Lord of Chaumont distrusts the victory.

The Lord of Chaumont retireth from Bologna.

The Pope returneth to his former wrath.

The Duke of Ferrara assaileth the Venetians naval Army.

The Popes army taketh Sassuola.

and the Caſtle within a while after. Saſſuola beeing taken, the Pope would haue Montechia, a very ſtrong place, to be beſeeged, but Fabricio Collonna would not do it, ſaying; that his King had expreſly forbidden him to meddle with any thing that did belong to the Empire.

The Lord of Chaumont, according to the meaning of the King his maiſter, hauing placed a ſtrong garriſon in Rhegio, went to Parma reſoluing to temporiſe till the ſpring. The Pope beeing impatient to ſee his deſeignes not executed, notwithſtanding the ſharpneſſe of the ſeaſon, ſent for all his Captaines to Bolognia, and propounded to them the ſeege of Ferrara, and notwithſtanding their generall diſlike of the matter (the Venetians excepted) they at laſt reſolued, (to pleaſe him) firſt to aſſaile Mirandola, thereby to take from the French al means of hindering the ſeege of Ferara afterward, and the releeuing thereof: and by the ſame meanes to beſeege as they went along, the Citty of Concorda, which held for the King. This being determined was likewiſe executed: for beeing come before Concorda, they forthwith tooke it by force, and the caſtle by compoſition: then they drew neere to Mirandola, whether the Pope came in perſon, thinking that his ſoldiers went ſlowly to worke, and that his preſence would aduance the buſineſſe, preferring the fury and heate of his ſpirit before all other reſpects: albeit the Cardinalls did earneſtly entreat him not to go thither, and that the Venetians who were his greateſt fauorits, did blame him for it. In regard of his preſence, complaints, promiſes and threatenings, all thinges were ſett foreward more then otherwiſe they would haue beene; and yet neuertheleſſe the ſharpnes of the weather, and many other difficulties oppugning it, no great matter was performed.

The Popes propoſition to the Captains of his Army.

Concorda taken by the Popes Army.

Thoſe within Mirandola did brauely defend it (who were commanded by Alexander Triuulcio ſeconded by foure hundred ſtranger footmen) vpon hope that they ſhould be releeued, but the contention be twixt the Lord of Chaumont, and Iohn Iacamo Triuulcio was cauſe of the loſſe of the place: for the Lord of Chaumont preferring his owne paſſion before the Kings proffit, was glad that the Nephewes of Triuulcio might be depriued of Mirandola: and therefore he excuſed his ſending of releefe by reaſon of the difficulty to bring ordnance thither in ſo cold a ſeaſon, by ſo bad waies, and through ſuch deep ſnow as the like had not beene ſeene of a long time before, which were things greatly to be conſidered.

The Cauſe of the Kings loſſing of Mirandola.

The Pope on the contrary omitted nothing for the obtaining of the victory. whereby thoſe within the towne beeing out of hope to be releeued, and fearing that they ſhould not be able to reſiſt the firſt aſſault, in regard of the great breach which the enemies ordnance had made, ſent meſſengers to the Pope, to certefie him that they would yeeld, ſo their liues and goods might be ſpared: albeit the Pope would not at firſt tye himſelfe to ſaue the ſoldiers liues, yet neuertheleſſe he did at laſt agree to it at the earneſt entreatie of his followers and the inhabitants that redeemed the ſack of their towne which had been promiſed to the ſoldiers the Caſtle in like manner yeelded. The Pope by the taking of Mirandola, hoping as ſodenly to get Ferrara, would no more giue eare to any talke of peace, vnleſſe firſt of all Ferrara were yeelded to him. The French King on the other ſide, hauing notice of the loſſe of Mirandola, and conſidering how greatly it did blemiſh his reputation, perceiuing likewiſe that the Pope continued in his diſpleaſure againſt him, reſolued to aſſaile him: therefore he ſent word to the Lord of Chaumont not only to defend Ferrara, but to offend the Churches lands vpon the firſt occaſion that ſhould be offered: For which, the Lord of Chaumont making preparation, and hauing aſſembled his whole army, he made the Pope to alter his minde, who by the aduice of his Captaines went back to Bolognia, and from thence within a while after to Rauenna.

Thoſe of Mirandola yeeld, vpon ſafety of their liues and goods.

The French Army being ready to march, the Captaines conſulted on what place to make their firſt attempt: ſome were of opinion to goe directly; to assaile the enemies in their trenches, hoping by force of armes and by the fury of the artillery, easily to enforce them to retire, and by that meanes to free Ferrara from all danger. Others were of a contrary opinion, and the cheefe of those was Triuulcio, who was newely come from France, who hauing declared the danger of assailing the enemies army in their fortification, councelled them to march towards Modena, or Bolognia, hoping if the enemies did remooue, for feare of losing any of those townes, to fight with them, and to obtaine the victory: and if they did not remooue, they might then with ease take the one or other of them.

The different opinions of the French Captaines.

This was Triuulcio his opinion, but it was not followed, the better thereby to diminish his authority, in regard of the hatred wich the Lord of Chaumont did beare him: as also becauſe that Alfonſo of Este, did vrge them to follow the former opinion, for feare that if the French should goe farre from thence, the enemies might enter into the Polleſin of Ferrara, a matter which would greatly haue augmented the Cities diſeaſe. But the Lord of Chaumont hauing vnderstood by the way, the great difficulty which was made to come to Finall where the enemies were encamped, by reaſon of the waters which ouer-flowed the country neere adioyning, he beganne greatly to doubt, for the cleering whereof, notwithstanding that Alphonſo did perſwade him to the contrary, he assembled the councell, where Triuulcio being entreated openly to deliuer what he thought thereof, spake in this manner.

Triuulcio his oration in defence of his opinion.

„ I Did yesterday hold my peace, becauſe I haue often-times knowne by experi„ ence, that my councell hath beene lighlty esteemed, the which if it had beene „ followed at the beginning, wee should not at this preſent be where wee are, nor „ haue loſt so many daies vainely, which might haue beene spent with more pro„ fit, and I should now continew in the same opinion to bee silent, if I were not „ spur'de forward by the impotance of the matter, in regard wee now stand on „ termes, to commit to the moſt vncertaine hazard of one day, this army, the state „ of the Duke of Ferrara, and the Dutchy of Milan, which is to great a caſt except „ wee reſerue some-what to play afterwards. Beſides, that which prouoketh mee to „ speake, is, for that as I imagine, the Lord of Chaumont deſireth that I should bee
„ the first to councell that which he already beginneth to taſt and thinke well of:
„ Which is no new thing with me, becauſe I haue heretofore knowne my councels
„ to be leſſe contemned, when it is needfull to retract some-what which peraduen-„ ture hath not beene maturely determined, then when the firſt determinations are
„ to bee made. We treat of going to fight with the enemy, and I haue alwaies „ obſerued that great Captaines, haue held for a firme ground, (the which I haue „ like-wiſe knowne by experience,) that a man neuer ought to hazard the fortune
„ of a battaill, vnleſſe he be inuited therevnto by some great aduantage, or enforced
„ by vrgent neceſſity: for it is according to the reaſon of warre, that it belongeth „ to the enemies who are the aſſaillants, and who are in the field for the conqueſt of „ Ferrara, to seeke to aſſaill vs; and our Captaines whoſe part is to defend, ought „ not to attempt to aſſaill them, contrary to all rules of Martiall diſcipline.
„ But let vs conſider what aduantage wee haue, or what neceſſity inforceth „ vs to it. It seemeth vnto me, and I doe not altogeter deceiue my ſelfe, that it „ is a matter very apparent, that wee cannot do what the Duke of Ferrara pro„ poundeth, but with our great diſaduantage, becauſe we cannot goe to that „ place, but by a cauſey and by a very narrow and bad way, where all our „ forces cannot diſplay them-ſelues, and where the enemies may very well
„ with ſmall forces reſiſt a greater number. Wee muſt march vpon the cauſie „ one horſe after another, and wee muſt bring the artillery, carriage, wagons and „ bridges ouer this narrow cauſie. And who is it that knowes not that in a ſtraight „ and foule way euery peece of ordnance, euery waggon that ſhall ſticke faſt

in

in the mire, will for a large houres ſpace cauſe the whole army to make a ſtand? And that being peſtred with ſo many incombrances euery contrary accident, will eaſily diſorder vs? The enemies are driely lodged, furniſhed with victuals and forage; we ſhal in a manner encampe in the open ayre, forrage is to be brought after vs, and we ſhall not be able but with great labour, to bring the one halfe of that we ſhall need: We muſt not referre our ſelues to that which ingeners ſaie, and to huſbandmen which know the Countrey, Becauſe warres are managed by ſoldiers armes, and by Captaines Councels: They are made by fighting in the field, and not by proiects which thoſe that are ignorant of warres do figure forth in paper, or deſcribe with their fingers, or with a ſtick in the duſt. As for my ſelfe I doe not preſuppoſe that the enemies are ſo weake, nor their affaires in ſuch diſorder; nor that in their lodging and fortification they haue had ſo ſmal ſkill as not to helpe themſelues by the opportunity of the waters, and ſytuations, as I can promiſe to my ſelfe, that ſo ſoone as we ſhal be com to the place whether we make account to go, (albeit we could with eaſe ariue ther) that it lyeth in our power to aſſaile them, Sundry difficulties may enforce vs to tary ther two or thre daies, and if there were none other let, the ſnow and rayne falling in ſo bad a ſeaſon, will ſtay vs. And beſides, how ſhould we prouide victuals and forage, if it ſhould fall out that we were to tarry there? And though it were in our power to aſſaile them, who is he that can ſo eaſily promiſe to himſelfe the victory? Who is it which conſidereth not how dangerous a matter it is to deale with enemies that are ſtrongly encamped, and to haue to doe at one time with them, and with the diſcomodities of the contries ſituation. Vnleſſe we can be able on a ſodaine to to enforce them thence, we our ſelues ſhall be conſtrained to returne back. And how hard a matter will it be, in a country which is wholly our enemie, and where euery ſmall miſhap will prooue very great. Beſides, I ſee ſmall reaſon, to put the Kings whole ſtate in ſuch precipitate danger, ſeeing we are chiefly in action for no other matter but for to releeue the Citty of Ferrara, of which, if we furniſh it with a ſtronger garriſon we may be aſſured (yea although we ſhould breake vp our army); for it is thought to be ſo much conſumed, as if the enemies waight on it a little longer, it is impoſſible but it wil ſhortly fall of it ſelfe. Is it not yet in our power to turne back, a moſt mighty remedy in warre, whereby without hazarding any one horſe, we will enforce them to depart from before Ferrara? I haue euer councelled, and now councell more then euer, to turne towards Modena or Bologna keeping the broad way, and to fortefie Ferrara for a few dayes, (for it will not be long) with all thinges neceſſary. Now in mine opinion it is beſt to go forthwith to Modena, whereynto the Cardinall of Eſte doth prouoke vs, who is a perſonage of great ſtate, in which Towne he doth aſſure vs to haue intelligence, and that we may eaſily take it, For by winning a place of ſo great importance, the enemies ſhal be enforced to retire on a ſodaine towards Bologna. And although we ſhould not take Modena, yet the feare which would poſſeſſe the enemies, as wel for that as for the ſtate of Bologna, will conſtrayne them to doe the like, as without al doubt they would long ere this haue done, if at the firſt this oppinion had beene followed. The great reaſons of this wiſe Captaine was approoued by al men, by meanes wherof the Lord of Chaumont hauing ſtrongly man'd Ferrara with ſoldiers for her ſafety, held on his way towards Carpy, from thence to march to Modena.

The French Army marcheth towards Modena.

But the Pope by the king of Arragons councell hauing reſtored it to the Emperour, to auoid ſo many diſcontents and to quiet his mind which was diſpleaſed for that the Pope had ſeaſed on it, it being euer accounted a Citty of the iuriſdiction of the Empire, was cauſe that the Lord of Chaumont being certefied of this reſtauration, deſiſted from his enterpriſe: who within a while after falling ſick was brought to Corregia, where fifteene dayes after he dyed, hauing before his death very deuoutly adknowledged the faults which he had committed againſt the Church, and beſought the Pope to giue him abſolution, the which hee freely graunted.

By his death Iohn Iames Triuulce, gouerned the Army becauſe hee was one of the foure Marſhalls of France, vnto whome (the Generall of the Army beeing dead,) the gouernment belongeth, by the cuſtomes of France, vntill the King hath other-wiſed diſpoſed thereof.

A great earthquake at Venice.

There happened at the ſame time a great Earth-quake in Venice, whereby part of the walls of the Ducall pallace fel downe, with the Marble ſtatues in Saint Markes Church, which had beene ſet vp for the beautifing of the building, the ſteeples of Churches were ſhaken, and the Bells range of them-ſelues: The waters of the canals did ſwell, diuers houſes and chimneis fell downe, wherewith infinite numbers of people were ſlaine, ſundry women with child dyed; But Gods pleaſure was that it laſted not long, whereupon the Patriarks commanded prayers to be made ouer all the Citty, with faſting for three daies ſpace, with bread and water. The like Earth-quake happened ſoone after at Padua, Treuiſo, Vdina, and in other places and territories belonging to the common wealth.

The Popes forces defeated before the Baſtid Geniuola.

Now Triuulcio commanding the Army, returned with all his forces to Sermidi, to goe to releeue the Baſtid Geniuola, which the Popes Army beſeeged, and whether the Venetian fleete was going. But he went on no farther, hauing notice in that place, that the Duke of Ferrara, with the Lord Chaſtillon, and the French forces, were gone forth with great numbers of ſoldiours, and had defeated the enemies, whome they found in diſorder, and taken their enſeignes and Artillery.

The Emperor Maximillian inclineth to peace.

During theſe warlike exploits, the deſeignes of the Princes were ſundry, and vncertaine, eſpecially thoſe of the Emperor, who being by nature variable, and inconſtant, and ſolicited by the Kings of Arragon, an enemy to the French name, and iealous of the French Kings greatneſſe, determined to liſten to peace, notwithſtanding that he had concluded before with the French King, by meanes of the Biſhoppe of Gurcia, to make warre withall his might on the Venetians, at the ſpring: and to this end wrot at one time to the Pope, and the French King, that he was reſolued to ſend the Biſhop of Gurcia to Mantua, to treate of an vniuerſall peace, requeſting them to ſend their Ambaſſadors thether likewiſe with full and ample power: hee wrot nothing to the Venetians, knowing that they would doe what-ſo-euer pleaſed the Pope, whoſe authority they were enforced to follow.

The King diſpleaſed with this new determination.

This aduice pleaſed the Pope, vpon hope to reconcile the Venetians to him, and to diſunite them from the French King, whereat he cheefely aimed. But the King was not contented with ſuch an vnhoped for determination, as well for feare of the determination of matters concluded with him: as alſo for the doubt he had, that the Pope thorow faire promiſes to aide him in the conqueſt of the Dutchy of Milan, and to giue a Cardialls Hat to the Biſhoppe of Gurcia, might ſeparare him from his party: He was well aſſured, that it was the practiſes of the King of Arragon, and knew very well that his Ambaſſador with the Emperor had labored, and did openly labour, for the agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians; and did vſe diuers other practizes to contradict his deſeignes, and among others, did hotly oppoſe him-ſelfe againſt the conuocation of a generall councell vnder collour of curteſie, and cauſed the King his Maiſter to bee earneſt with him to make peace with the Pope, making in a manner a ſilent proteſtation to take Armes in the Popes behalfe if hee did not agree with him.

The practiſes of the King of Arragons Abaſſador.

The King ſendeth the Biſhop of Paris to Mantua.

The French King diſſembling all theſe dealings, becauſe hee would giue the Emperour no cauſe of diſcontent, reſolued to ſend the Biſhoppe of Paris to Mantua; and in the meane time aduertiſed Iohn Iames Triuulce, that that his pleaſure was to haue him to command the army, but that he ſhould not aſſaile the Churches ſtate, till the Biſhop of Gurcia were arriued. Triuulcio vpon this command turned his forces againſt the Venetians, and came to Stellata; then paſſing on farther, he ſurprized certaine Venetian cauallery, and ſent Gaſton of Foix ſon to a ſiſter of the kings, being yet very yong, with a hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſe, and fiue hundred foot to ſcoure euen to the enemies barriers: who did put thoſe that kept them to flight and made them to retire to a ſtrong place beyond the channel.

Gaſton of Foix his incurſions.

In the meane ſpace the Biſhop of Gurcia came to Mantua, but later then hee was expected, where within a while after the Biſhop of Paris arriued. The Pope entreated the Biſhop of Gurcia to come and viſit him, hoping by his preſence, and authority, and by faire promiſes to winne him. The Biſhop after diuers difficulties propounded and wel debated on, being ſolicited by the king of Arragons Ambaſſadors, conſented therevnto, on condition that the Biſhop of Paris ſhould ſtay at Parma, and expect what would fall out by his iourney.

The Biſhop of Gurcia arriuing at Bologna, whether the Pope was of purpoſe come to receiue him, there was ſo great honour done vnto him, as a King could not be entertained with greater magnificence: the Venetians Ambaſſador neere to the Pope, went to the city gates to meet him, vſing ſignes of very great ſubmiſſion: but the Biſhop turning from him with merueilous pride and diſdaine ſhewed great diſcontent, becauſe that repreſenting the enemies of the Emperour his maſter, he had beene ſo bould as to come before him. That being done, he went with great pompe to the Conſiſtory, where the Pope, accompanied by all the Cardinals, ſtaied for him; And hauing breefly declared the cauſes of his comming into Italy he returned to his lodging. The next day with great arrogancy, he conferred of diuers matters with the Pope, and eſpecially, that if the Venetians did mean to haue peace with the Emperor, it behooued them in any caſe to reſtore whatſoeuer they deteined which did belong to the Empire.

The Popes great entertainment giuen to the Biſhop of Gurcia at Bologna.

Yet neuertheleſſe they beganne after to treat of agreement betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians, where at the firſt diuers difficulties were made on both ſides: at the laſt after long diſputation, each party cutting off ſome peeces of the hard conditions propounded by them, it was thought that by the mediation of the King of Arragons Ambaſſadors, they would come to an agreement. But ſo ſoone as they beganne to ſpeake of reconciling the Pope to the French King, betwixt whom appeared none other contention but concerning the Duke of Ferrara, and that the Biſhop of Gurcia went to the Pope to make an end thereof, (becauſe without that, the Emperour would conclude nothing) the Pope did ſodainely interrupt him, requeſting him to hold on with the Venetians, and not to talke of the affaires of Ferrara, being in a manner deſirous to incite the Emperor againſt the French: whereupon the Biſhop of Gurcia tooke his leaue, and without effecting any thing returned from whence he came.

Speech of agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians.

The Pope breakes off the treaty.

Triuulcio perceiuing the departure of the Biſhop of Gurcia and by that meanes all hope of peace being loſt, came into the field, and beſeeged Concordia which he tooke the ſame day, and then marched towards Bomport a village ſeated on the Riuer Panare, that he might be nere the enemies, to the end that by cutting off their victuals he might enforce them to diſlodge, or to fight forth of their campe. Entring into the country of Modena, he vnderſtood that Iohn Paul Manfron was with three hundred light horſe of the Venetians at Maſſa nere to Finall; he ſent Gaſton de Foix thither with three hundred foot and fiue hundred horſe, who found Iohn Paul Manfron at a bridge in order of battaile, to ſtoppe his paſſage, but being forſaken by his owne ſouldiers hee was taken priſoner by the French, with ſome others.

Triuulcio taketh Concordia.

Iohn Paul Manfron taken priſoner by Gaſton of Foix.

Triuulcio found meanes to paſſe the Channell to aſſaile the enemies who durſt not tarry his comming. The Channell being paſſed, he foorded Panare without impediment impediment in a very broad place, and where the water is not deepe, and marched towards Plumacia, three miles off from the enemies army, which was the cauſe that Caſtel-franco yeelded to him. He was there in great doubt what to doe: for on the one ſide he would willingly haue aſſailed Bologna, if he had beene certaine that the people would haue taken armes in the Bentiuoles behalfe: on the other ſide he feared, if he ſhould come thither, vpon hope only of a popular commotion, to be enforced forth-with to depart thence as the Lord of Chaumont had done to his great diſgrace. At the laſt he determined to tempt Fortune, and to try by drawing neere to Bologna, if the particular intelligences of the Bentiuoles might ſtand him in any ſtead, and came and incamped at the bridge of Laina, fiue miles from Bologna.

Triuulcio draweth neere to Bologna.

The Pope ſo ſoone as the Biſhop of Gurcia was departed, and that he vnderſtood that Triuulcio marched with his army, left Bolonia, determining to goe to his owne army, by his preſence to induce the captaines to fight, wherevnto he could not diſpoſe them neither by letters nor meſſages, but being halfe way on his iourney, he came backe againe the day following, reſoluing to goe to Rauenna. Yet neuertheleſſe before his departure, he was deſirous to make ſome ſmall exhortation to the Bologneſes, whom he ſent for to come and ſpeake with him: and after he had declared vnto them how that by the benefit of the Sea Apoſtolike, & by his means they were freed frō greeuous tirany, he requeſted them with greater ſeruenſie then eloquence to continue faithfull vnto him, and to ſhew their generouſneſſe by valliantly defending themſelues, and by that meanes to oblige to themſelues and the Sea Apoſtolike, both himſelfe, and all the Popes which ſhould ſucceed him.

The Popes exhortation to the Bolognois.

To this exhortation they anſwered: that they were not ignorant how much the city was bound vnto him in particular for hauing driuen thence the tyrants, and therefore they were reſolued to ſpend all their goods, to hazard the honour and ſafety of their wiues and children, and to loſe their owne liues, before they would quit his party or that of the Sea Apoſtolike.

The anſwer of the Bolognois to the Pope.

The Pope on this aſſurance departed from Bologna, leauing the Cardinall of Pauia there, and went to Rauenna: but ſo ſoone as he was on his way and that Triuulcio was come to the bridge of Laina, the Bolognois were troubled with ſundry thoughts: ſome of them deſired the returne of the Bentiuoles, others on the contrary, who ſhewed themſelues their enemies, did fauour the Churches ſignory: ſo as all the people were in armes, ſome for one ſide and ſome for an other. The Cardinall being amazed thereat, did attempt for his owne aſſurance to draw captaine Ramaſſotta into the city with a thouſand foot (for in all that great and populous city there were but two hundred light horſe, and two thouſand foot) but the people would not ſuffer it: wherevpon the Cardinall in deſpaire forſooke the palace by ſtealth in the night, in diſguiſed habit, and came to the Citadell and from thence attended by a hundred horſe, he tooke his way towards Imola.

Sundry thoughts of the Bolognois.

The flight of the Cardinal of Pauia.

The Legats flight being knowne, the whole city begunne to riſe, which the faction of the Bentiuoles perceiuing, they would not looſe ſo faire an occaſion, but ranne forthwith to the gates which were moſt commodious for the French campe, and brake them open, then they ſent for the Bentiuoles, who came forthwith with a troupe of French horſe. The Duke of Vrbin, Generall of the Churches army, hauing had ſome inckling of the Legats flight, did in great haſt diſlodge with his whole army, which was neere him: whereof Triuulcio hauing notice, came to follow the run-awaies, and meeting with Raphael de Paſſi, who for a while made head, he fought with him and tooke him priſoner.

The Bentiuoles with the French, are in Bologna.

The flight of the Duke of Vrbin.

The Venetians companies with thoſe of Ramaſſotta beeing lodged on the moūt, hauing intelligence of the Duke of Vrbins flight did eſcape by the way of the mountaines into Romagnia, not without great loſſe. The French wonne in this victory, obtained without fight, fifteene peeces of great ordnance, with diuers ſmal

ſmall ones as well of the Popes as of the Venetians, with a great part of the Churches bagage, and in a manner all that of the Venetians, and more then a hundred and fifty of their men at armes were ſtripped. There was not any one ſlaine in Bolognia, nor no violence offered, diuers only of the Cardinals followers were taken in the palace, from whom he had concealed his departure, and the Popes ſtatue was dragged by the people in great deriſion thorow the market-place. Triuulcio after the taking of Bolognia came to the Borrough of Saint Peter, to attend there before he went on any further the French Kings pleaſure.

Iniury offered to the Popes ſtatue in Bolognia.

The Senate hauing notice of this rout ſent word to the Prouidator Gritti, who determined to goe and aſſaile Legnaga with his army, to deſiſt from his enterprize, ſeeing their affaires had ſo bad ſucceſſe at Bolognia, and that he ſhould haue a care to bring the artillery from the bankes of the Riuer Po, and to ſend it to Padua, and if that the French made preparation to execute any enterpriſe, that he ſhould alſo retire for feare of being ſurprized.

In what manner the Venetians prouided for their Cities of the firme land.

The officers of Padua and Treuiſo were likewiſe commanded to haſten the fortifications already begunne in their cities. And not ſatisfied therewith, they choſe Criſtofero Mora for ſuperintendent of thoſe fortifications, who ſpeedily went thither and brought with him as many foot-men as could be gathered together in Venice, for feare leaſt the French waxing proud for this victory ſhould croſſe the Po, and make incurſions on the Paduans confines, to the end that if they did ſurprize any place, they might ſpeedily recouer it againe. They wrot likewiſe to Donato, their Ambaſſadour with the Pope, what the Senate had determined, and commanded him to entreat the Pope from them not to trouble himſelfe for the loſſe of his army, for the common-wealth would neuer faile him, but ranne the ſame fortune which he did. Whereunto the Pope anſwering, ſaid, that hee did greatly ioy to ſee the Venetians magnanimous conſtancy, and that it alone had much more encreaſed his courage againſt the French, and had infinitely comforted him.

In this meane time the Cardinall of Pauia arriued at Rauenna, who fled from Bolognia (as hath beene ſaid) & hauing obtained audience of the Pope to purge himſelfe of accuſations made againſt him, laid the whole blame of the loſſe of Bolognia on the Duke of Vrbin, as on a young man inſufficient and ſmall experienced in martiall matters. The Duke hauing notice of the bad offices which the Cardinall performed in his behalfe to the Pope his vncle, was deſirous to come and kiſſe his feete, and to cleere himſelfe of thoſe imputations. But being come into the Popes preſence, he found him ſo tranſported with choller, as he would not ſuffer him to ſpeake, but ſent him away with ſharpe and iniurious ſpeeches. The Duke perceiuing himſelfe to be diſgraced by the Cardinals meanes, reſolued on reuenge. And therevpon going towards his houſe to ſpeake with him hauing no great traine, he met him in the ſtreet riding on his Mule being attended on by the horſemen of his guard, with Guido Vaino his brother in law, riding to the Popes palace, the Duke drew nere vnto him, all men giuing him place in ſigne of reuerence, where with his owne hand hee ſlew him with a poinard, which being done he went to his owne lodging, leapt on horſe-backe, and retired himſelf to Vrbin.

The Cardinall of Pauia performeth bad offices in the duke of Vrbins behalfe.

The Cardinall of Pauia ſlaine by the Duke of Vrbin.

The Pope vpon the brute of the Cardinals death, beganne extreamely to greeue and lament, as well for that he had loſt a Cardinall whom he loued deerely, as alſo becauſe ſo high a dignity had beene violated in a manner before his face and by his owne Nephew, wherevpon he determined to ſtay no longer there, but to returne to Rome. Being departed from Rauenna he vnderſtood by the way that ſundry libels had beene ſet vp on the publike places of Modena and Bolognia, by which notice was giuen him of the conuocation of the Generall Councell in the city of Piſa, whether hee was cited to appeare in perſon, becauſe hee was accounted vnfit to gouerne the Papacy, being Author of all the warres. The Pope being being come to Rome, did forthwith excommunicate the Bolognois, vnleſſe they did returne to the obedience of the Sea Apoſtolike.

Libels ſet vp in diuers places againſt the Pope.

Within a while after, there happened a great tempeſt, with haile of ſuch vnmeaſurable bigneſſe, as the like had neuer beene ſeene at Bolognia, which did ſpoile and beate downe the fruites of the territory neere adioyning, the common people thought that it was a diuine puniſhment, by reaſon of the Popes cenſure. Now al be-it it was in the French Kings power, after this victory to haue taken Rome, the Popes forces being greatly weakened and diſperſed, and thoſe of the Venetians much more, he neuertheleſſe commanded Triuulcio, that leauing Bolognia to the gard of the Bentiuoles, he ſhould with his army returne ſpeedily into the Dutchy of Milan; thinking that the Pope being freed from the ſuſpition which he had cauſeleſſe conceiued of him, would be drawne to deſire peace, the treaty whereof, had neuer yet beene wholy broken off.

The French Kings great deſire to be at peace with the Pope.

But ſo ſoone as the Pope perceiued the army to be re-called into the Dutchy of Milan, he tooke courage, and propounded by the Scottiſh Ambaſſador whom for that purpoſe he had ſent to the French King at his departure from Bolognia very hard and greeuous conditions of peace, the which neuertheleſſe the King, for the great deſire he had to be at peace with him, was content to accept of, if the Pope vpon his returne to Rome had not changed his minde thorow the perſwaſion of the King of Arragon. For then he made anſwere that he would haue no peace, vnleſſe the Venetians would make an accord with the Emperor, adding diuers other exceſſiue demands, which did ſo greatly moue the Kings ſpirit, as he determined to hinder his recouery of Bolognia, the which he tooke into his owne protection with the Bentiuoles likewiſe, and ſent foure hundred Launces thither. Then becauſe he would ſtill continue in his alliance with the Emperor, he commanded that the number of ſouldiers granted to the biſhop of Gurcia ſhould goe from the Dutchy of Milan to the ſuccour of the Emperors lands vnder the command of the Lord de la Paliſſe.

The Emperour had a great deſire to make warre on the Venetians, but conſidering the great preparations which he was to make, eſpecially for the taking of Padua, without which he knew he could doe no great matter, he was in a manner ready to agree with them, ſo as being toſſed vp and downe by diuers thoughts he ſpent the time in vaine, without executing any enterprize, promiſing from day to day to come in perſon into Italy, or to ſend his forces thither.

The Emperors ſúdry thoughts.

The Venetians in the meane time finding themſelues to weake to take Verona, and being encamped betwixt Soaua, and Loniga, they burnt in a night a great part of the Veronois. But hauing intelligence of the comming of the Lord of La Paliſſe with twelue hundred Launces and eight thouſand foot, they retired into a ſtronge place towards Legnaga and Vincenza, from whence likewiſe they diſlodged, and put themſelues into Padua and Treuiſo, for the defence of which cities, diuers Venetian yong gentlemen came thether from Venice.

The Venetian army retireth to Padua and Treuiſo.

The French army tarried diuers daies at the bridge of Barbarana, expecting the Emperours comming or his reſolution, who being come betwixt Trent and Rouero, being irreſolute, after his wonted manner, what to doe, after he had giuen audience to the Venetian Ambaſſadours, with whom he daily conferred, he ſolicited the Lord of La Paliſſe to goe and take the Pace of Caſtel-nouo which is beneath Eſcalla towards the Friul, to make his comming downe more eaſie on that ſide. The which the Lord La Paliſſe did brauely execute, and then retired to Eſcalla. But the Emperor hauing altered his determinatiõ in ſtead of enuading what the Venetians held on the firme land, and going to beſeege Rome, retired to Trent, determining to go no more to the army, & commanded the Aſmains to enter into the Friul, where they took Vdina with the whole Prouince, thẽ they returned to ioyne with the Lord of La Paliſſe, who lay within fiue miles of Treuiſo, the which the Emperor would haue to be aſſaulted, but being well fortified on euery euery ſide, they found it moſt expedient ſpeedily to retire the which they did. Wherevpon the Lord of La Paliſſe did ſoone after returne into the Dutchy of Milan by his Kings command, in regard of the Swiſſes new ſtirres and confederacies which did dayly encreaſe. The Venetian Stradiots did follow him at the heeles, hoping to endamage him at his paſſage ouer the Brente and the Adiſſa, but he found meanes ſafely to croſſe them. His departure was cauſe that Iohn Paul Baillon, Generall to the Venetians, by the death of Luke Malueze did recouer all that they had loſt the ſame Summer, as well nere to Vincenza, as in Friul (Gradiſca excepted.)

The Emperour changing his minde goeth back to Trent.

The Kings forces in the Dutchy of Milan.

In theſe kindes of warlike exploits was that Summer ſpent, to the Emperours great diſgrace, and to the encreaſe of the Venetians reputation, who notwithſtanding the Emperours and the French Kings armies againſt them for the ſpace of two yeeres, did in the end ſtill retaine their owne forces and ſignories, and al-be-it that it was directly againſt the Emperour, it was neuertheleſſe much more hurtfull to the French King. For the Emperour, by reaſon he wanted aide perceiuing himſelfe to weake to obtaine the deſired victory, did willingly harken to thoſe who perſwaded him to be friends with the Venetians, ſo as already men beganne to perceiue, that new deſeignes were begotten in his minde.

The Venetians do ſtil maintaine their forces and greatneſſe.

The Pope in the meane time hauing made ſhew that he would come to an agreement with the French King, did at laſt declare himſelfe openly againſt him, and made a confederacy with the Catholike King and the Venetians to preſerue (as he ſaid) the vnion of the Church, to root out the Conuenticle (for ſo he termed it) of Piſa, and to recouer the city of Bolognia, with all the other townes which mediately or immediatly did belong to the Church, therein comprehending the city of Ferrara: that they would attempt with a mighty army to driue all thoſe out of Italy who ſhould oppugne it; leauing place to the Emperor to enter if he pleaſed into this confederacy, being deſirous to diſunite him from the French King.

Confederacy betwixt the Pope, the King of Aragon, and the Venetians.

Don Raymond de Cardona borne in Cattalognia and at that time viceroy of Naples was made Generall of their army, who by their agreement was to haue two thouſand foure hundred men at armes, two thouſand fiue hundred light horſe, and foure and twenty thouſand foote, namely for the Popes part foure hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſe, and ſixe thouſand foot, from the Senate of Venice, eight hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſe, and eight thouſand foot, and from the King of Arragon, twelue hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſe and tenne thouſand foot. This confederacy was made vnder collour to free Italy from the Barbarians; a very ſpeciall title which all men interpreted according to their iudgement and paſſion.

The number of the confederates army.

Gaſton of Foix was made viceroy in the Dutchy of Milan and in the army, who hauing intelligence of the Swiſſes preparations for their comming downe, by meanes of the Pope and his confederates into the Dutchy of Milan, cauſed all the victuals of the Dutchy to be ſhut vp in the fortes and caſtles, and placed ſtrong Garriſon in the neigbour cities, hoping that the men at armes would be able to make head againſt them in the plaines, and by that meanes ſoone enforce them to returne, if they ſhould come into the field. The Swiſſes neuertheleſſe were not daunted with theſe difficulties. But being come downe to Vareſa, their number did daily increaſe, bringing with them ſeuen field peeces, and diuers great Harquebuzes carried on horſe-backe, with ſome prouiſion of victuals. They ſent a trumpet from Vareſa to defie the Kings Lieutenant, who only to keepe victuals from them, was come to Aſſaron, a place thirteene miles diſtant from Milan. From Vareſa they came to Galera, being tenne thouſand in number, and Gaſton of Foix did put himſelfe into Legnana, foure miles from Galera.

Gaſton of Foix Lieutenant general for the King in the Dutchy of Milan.

The Swiſſes defie Gaſton of Foix.

The Swiſſes come downe into the Dutchy of Milan.

Then being increaſed to the number of ſixteene thouſand, they came to Buſti, where a hundred French men at armes lay in Garriſon, who hardly eſcaped from them, them, looſing their baggage and ſome of their horſes: by meanes whereof the French, which ſtill retired as the Swiſſes aduanced, came and quartered themſelues in the ſuburbes of Milan, within two miles whereof the Swiſſes were come: but wondering that they heard no newes from the Pope nor from the Venetian army (as it was knowne by letters intercepted which they ſent to their Lords) certaine daies after they retired towards Coma, and from thence returned home into their countrey.

The Swiſſes returne home againe.

Whileſt they were retiring two poſts arriued from the Pope and the Venetians: wherevpon it was thought of a certaine that if they had come ſooner, the Swiſſes had not returned. But they being gone (as hath beene ſaid) the Spaniards and the Popes forces entred into Romagnia, where all that which the Duke of Ferrara poſſeſſed did forthwith yeeld vnto them (the Baſtion of La Foſſa, and the foord of Geniuola excepted.)

The Baſtide taken by the Spaniards.

Petro of Nauarre, Colonel of the Spaniſh Infantery, till ſuch time as all their companies were come together, came and beſeeged the Baſtide, and hauing battered it with three peeces of ordnance, and giuen it an aſſault, he tooke it the third day after his arriuall, where al the footmen that were in it were ſlain with Veſtitello their captaine. Pedro of Nauarre leauing two hundred foot there, returned to the vicerois army: but the Duke of Ferrara going thither afterwards with nine great peeces of ordnance, did ſo furiouſly aſſaile it as he recouered it the very ſame day: where all thoſe who were within it with their captaine were ſlaine, in reuenge of the death of his ſouldiers.

The confederates army marcheth towards Bolognia.

The confederates army: namely that of the Pope, and the King of Arragon, to the number of eighteene hundred men at armes, eight hundred Genets, eight hundred light horſe, and ſixteene thouſand foot, as well Spaniards as Italians, aboundantly furniſhed with munition, the moſt of them being come forth of the Realme of Naples, determined to encampe before Bolognia. The Venetian army on the other ſide being come vpon the Marches of Verona, ſeemed to threaten the city of Breſcia.

Now the viceroy, Generall to the Pope and the Spaniards, cauſed his army to march, and came and incamped betwixt the Riuer Adicé and Bolognia, where hauing giuen order for matters neceſſary to beſeege it, he drew nere to the walles, quartering and extending the moſt part of his army betwixt the hill, and the high way which goeth from Bolognia into Romagnia, in regard of the commodity of victuals which came from thence, and ſeized on Saint Michels Monaſtery which is very nere to the city, ſeated on an high place, and which doth in a manner command the towne.

The forces that were in Bolognia.

Within the city, beſide the people which did beare armes and certaine companies of horſe and foot, paied by the Bentiuoles, Gaſton of Foix had ſent thither two thouſand Lanſequenets, and two hundred Launces, commanded by Odet of Foix Lord of Lautrect, and Yues of Alegre, two famous captaines, and with them were the captaines Fayete, and Vincent ſurnamed the great Diuell, who vpon the aſſurance made to them by Gaſton of Foix to releeue them, did freely enter it, in regard of the Cities large circuit. Yet neuertheleſſe they began to be bold, when they perceiued the enemies ſmall progreſſion, who were nine daies before the walles, and enterprized nothing but onely made certaine idle Coluerine ſhot from Saint Michels Monaſtery into the city: but they ſodainely abſtained, perceiuing very well that they ſpent their munition vnproffitably. They were diuers daies determining on what ſide to batter the city, eſpecially to keepe releeſe from it: and after diuers and ſundry opinions, they reſolued to aſſaile it on that ſide nere to Saint Stephens Gate, by which men goe to Florence, and the artillery was planted within thirty fadom of the walles.

The confederates ſmall progreſſion before Bolognia.

Pedro of Nauarre on the other ſide made a mine, drawing towards the gate of Chaſtillon, in a place where within was a little chappel called Baracane. The artillery

Artillery hauing begunne to play, did in foure and twenty houres ſpace beate downe an hundred fathom of the wall, with the tower of the gate, the which was abandoned, by reaſon it could be no longer defended: ſo as the aſſault might be eaſily giuen on that ſide, and in the meane time they cauſed bridges of wood to be made, and filled the dike with fagots to come with more eaſe to the aſſault. The mine being finiſhed they gaue fire to it, which with meruailous force did in ſuch ſort blow vp the wall and the chappell, as in that ſpace, thoſe without the towne did plainely diſcerne thoſe within the city, with the ſouldiers who ſtood ready for defence, but the whole wall falling downe againe on a ſodaine, did light in the very ſelfe ſame place, from whence the violence of the fire had forced it, and was in ſuch ſort reioyned to the ſelfe ſame foundations, as one would haue thought that it had neuer ſtir'd from thence, which was accounted by all the people for a ſtrange miracle.

A breach made at Bologna.

A ſtrange miracle in the mine.

The captaines within the towne perceiuing the enemies preparations, before the mine was fired, fearing leaſt the people through feare might be wonne, did ſpeedily ſend to demand aide of Gaſton of Foix, who the ſelfe ſame day ſent thither a thouſand foot, and the morrow after, a hundred & foure ſcore Launces and then reſolued to goe thither in perſon with the whole army, not-with-ſtanding that in councell all the captaines contradicted it. Therefore hee came forth of Finall, late in the euening, and the next morning he marched towards Bolognia with the whole army in battaile, notwithſtanding the ſnowes and ſharpe windes and entred it by Saint Felix gate, hauing in his company thirteene hundred Lances, ſix thouſand Lanſequenets, & eight thouſand foot both French and Italians.

Aide ſent to the beſieged.

Gaſton of Foix comes to the aide of Bologna.

The enemies had no knowledge of his comming till a day after, that a Stadiot, of the number of thoſe who were come forth among others to skirmiſh, was taken, who being queſtioned what was done in Bolognia, anſwered, That he could not ſay much, becauſe he came thither but the day before with the French army: whereat the enemies wondering did more exactly examine him in what manner and what numbers had entred, and finding him conſtant in his anſweres, they beleeued him, and reſolued to raiſe their campe, in regard it was dangerous to tarry there, as wel in reſpect of the cold ſeaſon which did greatly afflict the ſouldiers, as alſo for the neighbour-hood of the City, ſo great an army being within it. Wherefore the next night following which was the nineteenth day of the ſeege, after they had with great dilligence and ſtilneſſe, retired their ordnance, they diſlodged early in the morning.

The confederates army diſlodgeth from before Bologna.

It was thought of a certaine that if the French army had ſallied forth the next morning after their arriuall, as Gaſton of Foix had propounded it, they had ſurprized the confederats campe, who in no ſort doubted that he was come thither (as hath beene ſaid) but Yues of Alegre councelled to let the companies reſt one day, who were weary with their iourney and the bad way, thinking that the enemy had knowne of their comming, as it was to be preſumed, entring at broad day light, and by the high-way of Rome.

The end of the ninth Booke of the fourth Decad.

The Contents of the tenth Booke of the fourth Decade.

THe City of Breſſia taken by the Venetians is reſcued by Gaſton of Foix, by meanes of the Caſtle which held out ſtill for the French. Bergamo by the example of Breſſia expelleth the French. The defeate of Iohn Paul Baillon and Meleager of Furli by Gaſton of Foix. The impriſonment of Andrew Gritti and Antonio Iuſtiniano. Truce betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians by meanes of the Pope. Rauenna beſeeged by Gaſton of Foix. The Battaile of Rauenna wherein the French were victors. The death of Gaſton of Foix ſlaine by the Spaniards, after the battaile was wonne. In what perplexity the Pope was after the French mens victory. The Swiſſes come downe into the territory of Verona, with their great hate to King Lewis, and vpon what occaſion. The Champaine Country of Milan is forſaken, for to keepe the Cities from the Swiſſes. Milan, with all the Cities, almoſt, of the Dutchy, is redeliuered to the confederates. The City of Genoa reuolteth from the King. League and confederacie betwixt the Pope, and the Emperour. Maximillian Sforza is reſtored to the Dutchy of Milan. The death of Pope Iulius the Second. A league concluded betwixt King Lewis and the Venetians. The Election of Pope Leo the Tenth of the family of Medicis. King Lewis his great preparations for the warre of Italy. The Venetians take Cremona. The whole Dutchy of Milan in trouble and tumult in the behalfe of the French. The French make re-entry into all the ſtate of Milan, two townes excepted. The Swiſſes reſolution to make warre on King Lewis. They come downe to Nouara.

The

The Swiſſes comming forth of Nouara in the night obtaine the victory againſt the French. The French are driuen forth of the whole Dutchy of Milan. And laſtly the taking and diſmantling of Legnaga by the Venetians.

The tenth Booke of the fourth Decad of the Hiſtory of Venice.

THe army being diſlodged from before Bologna, Gaſton of Foix hauing left there three hundred Launces, and foure thouſand foot for the garde thereof, came with great ſpeed to the reliefe of the Caſtle of Breſſia, for the Venetians tooke the City the ſame day that hee entred into Bologna. For Count Lodouico Auogare a Breſſian Gentleman, being wearied with the arrogancy and indiſcretion of the French, hauing written to the councell of the Tenne, That if they would ſend their army to Breſſia, he would finde meanes to raiſe ſome tumult there, during which hee would by night open a gate for them, by which their forces might eaſily enter, and ſeize vpon the city. This matter was for certaine daies debated in the councell of Tenne, and then by them referred to the great councell, to the end it might be maturely determined, whether Count Lodowickes offer ought to be entertained or refuſed. After diuers and ſundry opinions it was concluded to accept it, the matter being commanded to be kept ſecret: then they acquainted the Prouidator Gritti therewith, enioyning him to march ſpeedily with his troupes towards Breſſia, and to march at the very houre, and to the gate which Count Lodowick ſhould ſend him inſtructions for.

Gaſton of Foix releeues the Caſtle of Breſſia.

Gritti vpon this commandment croſſed the Riuer Adicé at Albera, then that of Mincia, at the mill of La Volta, and comming to Monteclaro with three hundred men at armes, thirteene hundred light-horſe, and three thouſand foote, he encamped that night at Caſtagnetta, fiue miles from Breſſia, from whence he on a ſodaine ſent his light-horſe to ſcoure euen to the gates. But the enterpriſe being diſcouered by a wife of one of the complices, who aduertized the Gouer thereof, of whom ſhe was enamored; and by that meanes the towne being carefully guarded, Gritti thought it not fit to paſſe on any farther, wherevpon Count Lodowicke not being ſtaied by the French, came with his ſonne forth of the City. Andre Gritti being returned neere to Montagnane, from whence he firſt came, left a ſufficient gard for the bridge which hee had made ouer the Riuer Adicé, to the end to aſſure the paſſage, if he ſhould happen to returne againe, as it afterwards fell out. For within a while after being recalled, he croſſed the Riuer with two Cannons and foure falconets, and returned to his quarter at Caſtagnetta.

Andre Gritti retireth.

Count Lodowick on the other ſide being accompanied with very great numbers of the people of the valeys of Eutropia & Sabina, whō he had cauſed to riſe, was come within a mile of Breſſia. And al-be-it they within the City did not yet make ſhew of fauouring the enterpriſe, yet neuertheleſſe Gritti perceiuing, that he had greater forces then at the former time, he reſolued to haue it by force: And beeing come with all thoſe peaſants, he aſſailed it in three ſeuerall places, two of which had good ſucceſſe, namely at the Gate of Piles where Auogare fought, & at the gate of La Garzulo, where the ſouldiers entred at the iron grate, by which the riuer of the ſame name entreth into the city, notwithſtanding all the attempts and reſiſtance of the French, who perceiuing the enemies to bee entred, and that the Breſſans did riſe in their behalfe, they retired to the Caſtle, with the Lord of Luda their Gouernour, looſing their horſe and baggage.

The Venetians returning to the aſſault of Breſſia, enter the City.

Breſſia being taken all the townes along the Lake of La Garde, did driue away the French, and yeelded to the Venetians: Bergamo did the like ſoone after (the two caſtles excepted) the one of which ſtandeth in the middeſt of the city, and the other halfe a mile off. It was thought that if at Venice (where the ioy was incredible) they had forth-with prouided that which Andre Gritti did ſodainely write for, namely to ſend ſouldiers, and artillery which he had need of to win the caſtle of Breſſia, they had made greater progreſſion, or at leaſt the victory would haue beene more aſſured.

Bergamo expelleth the French.

But during theſe exploits, Gaſton of Foix being aduertized of what had paſſed at Breſſia, did ſpeedily march thither, who hauing paſſed the Po at Stellata, did ſoone croſſe the riuer Mincia at the bridge of Molino, then he came and lodged at Nogera on the Veronois, and the day following at Pontpeſara, and at Treuilla, where hauing intelligence that John Paul Baillon was come with three hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſe, and twelue hundred foote to lodge at the Iſland of Eſcalla, hee ranne ſpeedily thither with three hundred Launces and ſeuen hundred Archers, the reſidue of the army, who could not march ſo ſpeedily, comming after, and finding him to bee gone, they followed him haſtily and ouertooke him, as he was at the point of the paſſing a foord of the riuer Adicé.

The ſpeed of Gaſton of Foix.

Iohn Paul Baillon is broken and defeated by Gaſton of Foix.

John Paul Baillon hauing deſcried him a farre off, thinking it to be nothing elſe but part of the forces of Verona, did embattaile his ſouldiers and tarried for him. Both ſides ioyning, fought valiantly for more then an houres ſpace: but the Venetians fortune beganne to decline by the arriuall of the reſidue of the army which came in file, and notwithſtanding that they diſordered them, they neuertheleſſe rallied themſelues diuers times, vntill being no longer able to reſiſt the great numbers, they betooke themſelues to flight, whereupon John Paul paſſed the riuer ſafely, but diuers of his people were drowned.

The morrow after, Gaſton of Foix did likewiſe put Meleager of Furli to rout, whom he incountred as he conducted certaine Venetian light horſe, then hee came and encamped in the ſuburbes of Breſſia, and without any delay at all hee ſent to aſſaile the Monaſtery of Saint Fridiana, which ſtood halfe way off from the hill vnder which he was lodged, and hauing aſſaulted it, hee draue thence thoſe which garded it, and turned with his army to the other ſide of the towne, that hee might be the nearer to the caſtle. The next morning by day breake, hauing choſen out of the whole army, foure hundred men at armes well armed, and ſix thouſand foot, and going vp on that ſide nere to the Gate of Piſes, he entred without any reſiſtance into the firſt wall of the caſtle, where after he had for a while cauſed his ſouldiers to reſt and refreſh themſelues, he did incourage them with faire ſpeeches, and promiſes of an ineſtimable booty. That being ſaid, he marched forewarꝺ. But at the comming forth of the Caſtle he found certaine foormen, who with the Artillery thought to haue ſtaied him, but their attempt was Gaſton of Foix defeateth Meleager of Furli.

Gaſton of Foix hauing entred the Caſtle of Breſſia marcheth to the reſcue of the towne.

in

in vaine, for hauing put them to flight, he came downe furiouſly vpon the voide place where captaine Burlettes palace ſtood, where the Venetian forces being cloſe ioyned together, did attend him with great boldneſſe: and there ioyning, they fought furiouſly on either ſide for a long time, the one fighting for their owne ſafety, and the others for glory, and for deſire of the ſpoile and ſack of ſo rich a City.

The Venetians at the laſt, hauing brauely defended themſelues were driuen from the place. For the French being victors, did by force driue their enemies before them in all places, not going to pillage, vntill they were wholy become Maſters of the city, following the command of Gaſton of Foix who had ſo enioyned them before their comming downe. Of the French ſide there died many foot, and ſome number of men at armes, but more then eight thouſand of the enemies were ſlaine, and great numbers of them taken priſoners, amongſt whom were Andre Gritti and Antonio Iuſtiniano with many others. Count Lodowicke Auogare and a ſonne of his being taken among the reſt were beheaded in the publike place of execution.

The French after a long fight become maſters of the City.

Andrè Gritti and Antonio Juſtiniano taken priſoners. Count Lodowick Auogare beheaded.

Gaſton of Foix preſerued the honour of the Nuns, but their goods were pillaged, and thoſe who had retired into their Couents and other Churches, were the captaines booties. In this manner fel the City of Breſſia into extreame miſery, which in dignity and nobility did not giue place to any other of Lombardy, and which did for wealth ſurpaſſe all the reſt, (excepted Milan). It was ſackt ſeuen whole daies together. The newes of this repriſal being come to Venice did greatly trouble the whole City, who thought they ſhould be no more able to enterpriſe any thing, condemning chiefly the ſmall ſpeed that was made to ſend neceſſary forces and munition to the Prouidator Gritti, the which was cauſe of that loſſe. The Senate forthwith conſulted about the repairing of their army, ſent to leauy two thouſand foot in Candy, and a great number of Stradiots in Albania. Two hundred pound weight of gold was ſent to the viceroy of Naples, as had beene promiſed. The foot which were not at Breſſia, and the horſe-men which eſcaped, together with thoſe who were ſtript and diſarmed came to Vincenza. Inſtinian and Gritti were ſent priſoners to Milan.

The loſſe of Briſsia troubleth the Venetians.

The Pope vnderſtanding that the French had recouered Breſſia, councelled and perſwaded, euen with threats, that they ſhould accord with the Emperour. And certaine commiſſioners beeing aſſembled for that purpoſe, perceiuing the great difficulties which were made in the treaty of peace, it was propounded to make truce for a while in the meane time, during which they might with more eaſe deliberate on the Articles of peace and other reaſonable conditions.

According to this aduice, truce was concluded at Rome in the Popes preſence betwixt the commiſſioners, on condition that the Senate ſhould at two paiments giue foure hundred pound of gold to Maximillian, to the which were one hundred pound more added, to cauſe the Emperor to ratifie this agreement, the whole amounting to fiue hundred pounds of gold.

Truce agreed on betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians.

Gaſton of Foix after the recouery of Breſſia, hauing giuen order for his affaires, (for Bergamo which had rebelled, and all the other townes neere adioyning had recalled the French) and refreſhed his army which was wearied with ſo great and long trauaill, determined to goe and incounter with the confederates army, according to the commandement which hee had receiued from the King, which did expreſly import, that with the greateſt ſpeed hee could, hee ſhould march againſt them, whom hee heard to bee verie weake, and therefore he promiſed himſelfe the victory, and being victorious, he ſhould beſeege Rome and the Pope without any reſpect, to the end to free himſelf of ſo many dangers which did threaten him: and for the diminution of his enuy, & encreaſe of his owne iuſtifications, he would haue that enterpriſe to be made in the name of the councel of Pisa, which should depute a Legate to goe to the army.

Gaston of Foix departed from Bressia, and came to Finall, there for to gather together all the companies which were in Italy (those excepted who remained for the gard of the Cities) and from thence he went to Saint Georges on the Bolognois, where there came to him three thousand Gascons, a thousand Pioners, and a thousand Picards which were newly sent him, being al choice soldiers. These being arriued, he found that he had with him fiue thousand Lansequenets, fiue thousand Gascons, and eight thousand, as well Italians as French, with one thousand sixe hundred launces. The Duke of Ferrara was to ioyne with him, with a hundred men at armes, two hundred light horse and a great quantity of excellent munition, because the Generall had left his at Finall, in regard of the bad waies. The Cardinall of Saint Seuerine being deputed Legate by the councell came likewise to the army.

The number of Gaston of Foix his army.

Gaston of Foix marching in this equipage did burne with desire to meete the enemy and to fight with him, as well to satisfie the King as for his owne valour and prowesse: his meaning neuertheless was not to assaile him rashly, but only to trie if by approching nere to him he would cheerefully come to the battaile, in any place where the quallity of the sytuation might make them equall.

Gaston of Foix his great desire to fight.

The enemies had an other intent, who thought it not safe for them to fight in an equall place, at least wise before the six thousand Swisses whom they expected were arriued: as also for that the King of Arragon had commanded them to abstaine as much as they could from fight, for diuers considerations by him alleaged.

The two armies did often change places, marching continually nere together in good order, the artillery going before and their faces turned towards the enemies, as if euery houre they were to beginne the fight. Gaston receiued a new commandment from the King to hasten the battaile. Wherevnto his King was incited so soone as he vnderstood the truce made betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. But Gaston perceiuing that hee did winne nothing by coasting the enemies in this manner, in regard of the commodiousnesse of the Cities of Romagnia, whether they still retired, determined to bescege Rauenna wherein Marke Antony Colonna lay for the Pope with fifteene hundred foot, and fiue hundred horse, thinking that the enemies would not suffer such a city to be lost before their faces, and by that meanes occasion might be offered to fight with them in an equall place. He came and lodged betwixt Contignola, and Granarolla, then at Rassi, hauing driuen them thence who kept it, and from thence the day following he came and encamped nere to the walles of Rauenna betwixt the two Riuers; namely, Ronca, and Montona betwixt which the towne is seated. He possessed the space which is betwixt the one and other riuer.

Gaston of Foix beseegeth Rauenna.

The next day he caused his ordnance to be planted, and by all meanes hasted the battery, that he might come to the assault before the enemies (whom he knew were remooued) should arriue, as well for to get the towne, as in regard of his great want of victuals, by reason of the Venetian vessels which lay at Fiquerolles, and at the mouth of the Channel which falleth into the Po, which stopped those that came both from Lombardy and Ferrara.

This was the reason why he resolued to giue the assault the same day, al-beit he knew that there was no reasonable breach made, and that he could not enter but by ladders: those likewise which were sent thither, being out of hope to force the Citty: and perceiuing themselues to be greatly hindred by a Culuerynes, hauing fought for the space of three houres, retired with the losse of three hundred foote, and of certaine men at armes, and as many in a manner were hurt. But the retreat was no sooner made, but they descried the confederates armie comming to the releefe of the Towne, the which marched along the riuers side.

So

So ſoone as the French had diſcouered them, they aroſe in armes and placed themſelues vnder their enſeignes, hauing in great haſt with-drawne their ordinance from before their walles, the which they turned towards the enemies: who imagining onely by the ſhew of their army, that Rauenna was ſuffitiently releeued, thinking that the French durſt not aſſaile it they being ſo neere, they encamped within three miles of Rauenna, at a place called Moulinachia, which they forth-with fortified, with as deepe a trench as the ſhortneſſe of the time would permit them. The French were long in councell, to know what was to bee done, either to aſſaill the Citty, or the enemies. In the end after diuers and ſundry opinions, they reſolued to goe and aſſaile the enemy, ſo ſoone as it was day. Which Gaſton of Foix gladly approuing, hee cauſed the ſame night a bridge to bee caſt ouer the Ronca, and to liuell the cauſeis on all ſides, to make the waies eaſie. There by day breake, being Eaſter day, hee prepared to march againſt the enemies; and hauing encouraged his ſoldiors, with a more eloquent, then Martiall oration, hee enforced the enemies by the ſhot of his ordnance, to come forth of their trenches, and to ioyne fight with him, where the confederates were ſo delt with, for the ſpace of ſix howers, that the fight laſted, as not being able to make any more reſiſtance, they turned their backes, and among others the Viceroy and Carnagio were the formoſt, carrying away with them, a ſquadron in a manner whole and vnbroken: ſo as the French remained maſters of the field.

The reſolue to aſſaile the enemy and not the citty.

The French are victors in the battaile of Rauenna.

But becauſe the Spaniſh Infantery made a ſoft retreate, and in god order, Gaſton of Foix was deſirous to breake them, and going furiouſly to aſſaill them with a ſquadron of horſe, hee was on a ſodaine enuironed by the enemies, and being beaten from his horſe, was ſlaine by the puſh of a pike, thruſt into his flanke. The Lord of Laurrec lay by him, in a manner dead, being wounded in twenty places, but being brought to Ferrara, he was there healed.

Goſton of Foix is ſlaine by the Spaniards.

The Generalls death cauſed the Spaniards to eſcape without any empediment, the reſidew of their army being diſperſed and put to flight, and their bagage, enſeignes and artillery taken. The priſoners were the Popes Legat, Fabritio Colonna, Pedro of Nauarre, the Marquis of Palu, Biſonto, and Peſcara, with many other Barrons, and great Lords. The brute was that there died on both ſides, eighteene thouſand men, one third part French, and the two thirds of the confederats. But the loſſe of the victorious was greater, without compariſon, by reaſon of the death of the Generall, of Yues of Alegre, diuers French Gentlemen and Almaine Captaines, to whoſe valour the victory was partly aſcribed.

The victors beeing returned to their Campe, thoſe of the Citty ſent word that they would yeeld, but whileſt they capitulated, the Lancequentes, & Gaſcons perceiuing the walls to be careleſſely kept, did enter it at the breach which was made before the bataile, and made cruell ſpoyle, for deſpight of the loſſe which they had ſuſtayned in the battaile: but they could not take the Caſtle, whether Marke Antony Collonna was retyred, which hee afterward yeelded, vpon condition to haue their goods and liues ſaued.

Rauenna taken and ſpoiled by the French.

The Venetians hauing newes of this loſſe, ſent word to Vinternio Nalda whome they kept in pay with a thouſand foote in Flaminia, to gard, and defend the lands of the Church. The Viceroy neuer ſtaid till hee came to Ancona, where hee vſed meanes to renew his army, promiſing to him-ſelfe, that beeing ioyned with the Swiſſes, hee would eaſily driue the French forth of Italy, ſo as euery one would employ him-ſelfe in that buſineſſe. The Venetians beeing aduertiſed of his intent, ſent to comfort him for his loſſe and to offer him al ayde and releeſe by Antonio Dandulo, who brought him a good ſumme of mony from the Senate, the like alſo did King Fernands Ambaſſador which lay at Venice.

The

The French Army being daunted with the death of their Generall, remained within 4. miles of Rauenna, attempting nothing, expecting the kings pleasure. In the meane space newes being brought to Rome, of the losse of the battaile, all the Cardinalls came forth-with to the Pope, earnestly entreating him to accept of peace with the French King, the which they assured him hee might obtaine, on honest conditions, they seeing no other remedy for all these daungers, but peace onely. The Ambassadors of the King of Arragon, and the Signury of Venice insisted on the contrary, giuing him to vnderstand that matters were not so desperate, nor the army so much decayed, but that it might easily bee restored in short space, without any greate expence, with many other very pertinent reasons, to induce the Pope to their opinion. But he continewed in very great doubt; for on the one side, hatred and disdaine against the French did possesse him, and on the other, feare, and danger. Wherevpon hee answered the Cardinalls that he would make peace with the French King, and yet it was not with that resolution, which might giue any certaine hope: and last of all when as Iulius of Medicis a Knight of Malta, who was after-wards pope, came to him from the Cardinall of Medicis, and had fully informed him, how greatly the French were weakened, by their Generalls death, and of diuers other particularities of the French army, which did much recomfort him; And bringing him into the Consistory, he caused him to rehearse the selfe same things to the Cardinalls, who neuertheless did persever in their desire of peace, the which though in words hee made shew (to please them) to accept of, hee had neuertheless resolued not to graunt, but vpon the last extremity, and rather to leaue Rome, hoping that his cause would bee maintayned by the armes of Christian Princes.

What astonishment the losse of the battaile brought to Rome.

The Popes perplexity.

The Pope will by no meanes haue peace with the French.

But so soone as hee vnderstood that the Lord of La Palisse, who commanded the French army, after the death of Gaston of Foix, was called into the Dutchy of Milan by the Generall of Normandy, for feare of the Swisses comming, and that he was with the army departed out of Romagina, he found him-selfe freed of the doubt and feare which hee was in, concerning the affaires of Rome, whereby hee was more then before confirmed in his obstinacy, albeit the Legate of the councell tarried still in Romagnia, with three hundred lances, three hundred light horse, six thousand foote, and eight peeces of ordnance.

Now the Pope beeing greatly confirmed by that which hath beene already said, and by the great hopes which the King of Arragon gaue him, so soone as hee had intelligence of the losse of the battaile of Rauenna, promising to send him Gonsaluo the great Captaine into Italy with new supplies and likewise by the commission which the King of England had sent to the Cardinall of Yorke, to enter into the league, hee did openly reiect peace, and pronounced in open Consistory a Monitory, against the French King, if hee did not release the Cardinall of Medicis, whome hee kept prisoner in Milan, where hee was honorably vsed.

The Cardinall of Medicis prisoner at Milan.

The Swisses in the meane time, who stood badly affected to the French King, and did wonderfully hate him, beeing assembled at Coire, a citty of the Grisons there antient confederats, marched from thence to Trent, (the Emperour to collour the matter with the King, saying that hee could not stoppe their passage, in regard of the antient confederacy which he had with them.)

From Trent they came vpon the Verona Territory, where the Venetians army expected them, who together with the Pope did contribute for their pay. They were in number more then sixe thousand, though no more were demaunded: For the hatred which they did beare to the French King was so greate, as contrary to their custome, they did patiently endure al difficulties, and namely, they came from home hauing receiued only one florin of Ryne a peece: wheras in time before they would not march for the Kings seruice, vnlesse they had had beene promiſed many paies and their Captains preſented with ſondry guifts.

The Swisses hatred to the French King.

La Paliſſe comming firſt of all with the Army to Pontoglio to ſtop their paſſage, thinking that they would come that way into Italy, perceiuing afterward their meaning to be otherwiſe, came and incamped at Chaſtillon of the ſtirrop, not being aſſured whether they would come downe into the Dutchy of Millan or els march towards Ferrara. It was certainely thought that they would haue held on the way towards Ferrara according to the Popes directions, had not a letter which the Lord of La Paliſſe ſent to the General of Normandy, been intercepted by miſhap, the which fell into the hands of the Venetian Stradiots; by which he ſent him word how his affaires ſtood and that it would be a hard matter to reſiſt them, if they ſhould turne towards the Dutchy of Millan. This letter made them change their determination, and cauſed the Cardinall of Syon, the chiefe motiue of this warre, with the Captaines, to reſolue to enterpriſe that which their enemies moſt feared (as was perceiued by that letter). Therefore they came to Villafranca to ioyne with the Venetian army, vnder the command of Iohn Paul Bailon, which was of foure hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſe, and ſixe thouſand foote with peeces of Ordnance, as well for battery, as for the field.

The Suiſſes take the way towards the Dutchy of Millan.

La Paliſſe, who in all had not aboue ſeauen thouſand foote and a thouſand lances, did with the Captaines determine wholy to forſake the field, and to looke to the defence of the townes of moſt importance, till ſuch time as thoſe great nombers of Suiſſes ſhould be waſted, or elſe ſome freſh ſupplies might come to them from France to make head againſt them. Wherevpon he did put into Breſſia two thouſand foote, one hundred and fiftie lances and a hundred men at armes of the Florentines: into Crema fiftie lances and a thouſand foote, and into Bergamo, a thouſand foote, and a hundred Florentine men at armes; he brought the reſidew of the army to Pontuico, which conſiſted of ſix hundred lances, two thouſand French foot, and foure thouſand Lanſquenets. But the next day letters came from the Emperour, who commanded the Lanſquenets forthwith to abandon the French Kings ſeruice: they not daring to diſobey, departed the very ſame day, becauſe they were all his ſubiects.

La Paliſſe forſaketh the field, and gardeth the townes.

The Lanſquenets forſake the French King.

La Paliſſe deſpayring (by reaſon of the Lanſquenets departure) of beeing able any longer to defend the Dutchy of Milan, did in great haſt retire to Piſquetona. The Venetians in the meane time hauing already taken Valegia and Piſcara, did ſtill with that Army winne the Contrey as they went along. Thoſe of Cremona being wholly forſaken did yeeld to the Cardinall of Syon and gaue him a good ſomme of money, to the end that the Suiſſes ſhould not enter into their Citty. The like did Carauagio and Soncino, wherein the Cardinall of Syon placed his owne people in Garriſon, in ſteed of deliuering it to the Venetians, as it was mentioned in the treaty of the League. All other townes neere to the riuer Adda did yeeld to the Venetians, the like did Bergamo with her territory, by reaſon that La Paliſſe, had recalled his companies which lay there to ioyne them to the army.

The Venetians great progreſſion in the company of the Suiſſes.

La Paliſſe forſooke Piſquetona, and went and croſſed the Riuer Adda, hoping to keepe the enemies from paſſing the riuer if the footmen which they made account to leauy had arriued: But through want of money to pay them, none were raiſed, wherevpon he retired to Saint Angello, and the day following to Pauia, determining to ſtay there. But after that Triuulcio came thither to him, and had ſhewed him the vanity of his opinion, and how that it was impoſſible to hould back ſo great a ruine, ſeeing there were no footmen in the Army, nor meanes to wage new, as well for the ſhortneſſe of the time, as for that there was no money to pay them, he went and made a bridge ouer the Po, at a place where it is moſt narrow, to the end that the companies might more commodiouſly paſſe holding on their way towards Aſt.

Triuultio comming to the Army is of opinion to abandon the Dutchy of Milan.

So ſoone as the French had paſſed the Riuer Adda, Loda yeelded to the confederates who being come to Pauia, beganne to batter the Caſtle. The French like-wiſe did ſoone abandon it, and came to the ſtone bridge, which is ouer the riuer Theſin, fearing leaſt it ſhould be ſurpriſed, hauing but that place alone, whereby to eſcape from Pauia. All the French men, with certaine Lancequenets, who were not departed with the reſt, being come forth of Pauia, the Citty promiſed to pay a great ſumme of mony to auoyde the ſack thereof, Milan had already done the like, compounding for a great ſumme, and all other townes, (Breſſia and Coma excepted) did with great deſire doe the ſame.

All matters were gouerned in the name of the holy league (for ſo all men called it,) and all the profit fell to the Swiſſes, which cauſed many more of that nation to come downe into Lombardy, and to vnite themſelues with the firſt. In this change, Parma and Placentia were giuen to the Pope. The Swiſſes ſeazed on Lucarna and the Griſons on Voltolina and Chiauenna, Iano Fregoſſa, by the Venetians aide, in whoſe army he ſerued, went to Genoa, and ſo handled the matter, as the French gouernor being expelled, it reuolted and created him Duke.

Genoa reuolteth from the King.

In the like manner all the townes and Caſtles of Romagnia did rerurne to the Pope. Bologna like-wiſe yeelded to his officers, after the Bentiuoles being depriued of all hope, had forſaken it. The Cardinall of Medicis had already before then eſcaped, by meanes of ſome ſtirre which hapned of purpoſe, as hee entred into a boate at the paſſage of the Po, whereupon hee was taken from the French who kept him, who intended flight rather then reſiſtance. The Senate in the meane time, being deſirous to recouer Breſſia and Coma, ſolicited the Cardinall of Syon to come with his troupes and their army to beſeege thoſe townes, who making no haſt, beeing loth to encreaſe the Venetians greatneſſe, came in the end and encamped before Breſſia, neere to Saint Iohns gate, battering at one time both the towne and Caſtle, whether the Viceroy came to them with the Spaniſh army. The Lord of Aubigni who was within it, perceiuing that in the end he could not chooſe but deliuer it, thought it beſt to yeeld it, together with the Caſtle, rather to the Viceroy then to the Venetians, compounding with him, that all the ſouldiors within ſhould depart with liues and goods. The French that were at Legnaga followed the ſame councell. Crema did other-wiſe which was beſeeged by Ranze de la Cere, with a part of the Venetians forces, vnto whome, Benedict Cribario (being corrupted by guifts, and vpon promiſe to be made a gentleman of Venice) did yeeld the towne by the conſent of the Lord De Duras gouernor of the Caſtle, the which he would not doe to Octauian Sforza, Biſhop of Lodi; for & in the name of the future Duke Maximilian Sforza, being come thither for that purpoſe, with foure thouſand Swiſſes In theſe interims, the Biſhop of Gurcia as Lieutenant to the Emperor went to Rome, who being receiued with all honor they beganne to treat of the eſtabliſhment of the common buſineſſe, and how to root out particular ſtrife and contentions, to the end that Italy being vnited together might reſiſt the French King: and the hardeſt matter of all this was, the agreement ſo often treated of betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians: For the Biſhoppe of Gurcia demanded to haue Verona and Vincenza, to remaine to the Emperor, and the other townes to the Venetians, for which they ſhould preſently pay to Maximilian two hundred thouſand florins of the Rhyne, and thirty thouſand for euer after, yearely, in manner of rent. The Venetians would not pay rent for thoſe townes, which they had enioyed for ſo many yeares, as belonging vnto them, nor conſent to giue mony, and much leſſe to deliuer Vincenza, for diuers reaſons by them alleadged. The Pope did what he could to attone them, now inciting the Venetians, then entreating them, & ſometimes threatning. The King of Arragons Ambaſſadors did all they could; the like alſo did the Swiſſes. In the end the Biſhop of Gurcia perſiſting in his demand, and the Venetians in their refuſall, as well of Vincenza as of the ſumme of mony, the Pope forſooke them, proteſting to their Ambaſſadors that he ſhould be enforced to purſue their Republick with Legnaga yeelded.

The treaty betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians handled.

Difficulties concerning the agreement.

with ſpirituall and temporall armes, and made a league with the Emperor, to the end that he might alow of the Councell of Lateran, and diſallow the Conuenticle of Piſa. The Spaniſh Ambaſſador would not enter into that League, ſaying, that he had no commiſſion ſo to doe from his King.

The confederacy being contracted, the Biſhop of Gurcia at the next Seſſion of the councell of Lateran, did in the Emperours name adhere to the Councel, where he affirmed in the preſence of all men, that the Emperour had neuer conſented to the Conuenticle of Piſa, reiecting all thoſe who had vſed his name. This being doone, the Biſhop of Gurcia tooke his leaue, that he might be with Maximilian Sforza at ſuch time as he ſhould take poſſeſſion of the Dutchy of Millan the which he did After his entry, the Viceroy went and beſeeged the fort of Treſa vpon the riuer Adda, which was yeelded vnto him vpon condition that they within it might depart with their goods.

League betwixt the Pope and the Emperor.

Maximillian Sforza in poſſeſſion of the Dutchy of Milan.

The confederacy made at Rome, had not wholly broken off the hope of agreement betweene the Emperour and the Venetians, and therfore the Pope ſent Iacomo Staſilea Auditor of the Rote to Venice, to entreat the Senate to agree with Maximilian, and to enter into the league, ſaying; That to his great greefe he had forſaken them, the which, many taking in bad part, Said that they were aſſured that it would cauſe them to enter into League with the French, and by that meanes to recall them a new into Italy; but that he for his part did ſo much preſume on them, as he knew they would neuer do it: and in regard of theſe matters beeing troubled with ſondry thoughtes, he fell ſick, and his health dayly empairing, not being able to eate or ſleepe, he deceaſſed the two and twentith day of February in the yeare 1513.

The death of Pope Iulius the ſecond.

Now the Venetians hauing determined before the Popes death to contract League and alliance with the French, according to the motion made by King Lewis to Andrew Gritti, priſoner at that time in France, they reſolued (the matter hauing a long time been debated in councell) to ſend one of purpoſe into France to treat of this buſineſſe with the King: and to this end they named Lodouico Pietro Secretary of the Councell of Tenne.

A motion of agreement betwixt the French King and the Venetians.

Hee beeing departed from Venice, and onward on his way, they had newes of the Popes death: but for all that they did not call him back, not knowing who ſhould be his ſucceſſor, and leaſt of all what his affection towards them might be.

The league concluded betwixt the King and the Venetians.

The Secretary beeing come into France, the King did enlarge Andre Gritti, and did forthwith conclude the league with him on condition that Cremona and the contrey of Giradade ſhould belong to the ſtate of Milan, and that the Venetians ſhould haue Breſſia, Bergamo and Crema, (the King making ouer all his right to them, which he could pretend to thoſe Citties:) That they ſhould be bound to aide one another; and to hazard together one ſelfe ſame fortune, vntill the King ſhould recouer the whole ſtate of Milan: and that likewiſe the Republicke ſhould be reſtored to the entier poſſeſſion of whatſoeuer it did enioy on the firme land: And laſtly that al priſoners on either ſide ſhould be ſet at liberty, and the fugitiues reſtored to their goods and contrey.

The Articles of the League.

In the meane time, after the Popes death, the Cardinalls entred quietly into the Conclaue, and did the ſeauenth day following with a generall conſent chooſe for Pope, Iohn, Cardinall of the title of Saint Mary in Dominica, of the moſt illuſtrious family of Medicis, of ſeauen & thirty years of age, which was a ſtrange matter, and contrary to the cuſtome: He tooke vpon him the name of Leo the tenth. This election was pleaſing to all men, and cheefely to the Venetians, who did euer greatly affect that family: by reaſon whereof, the Senate did hope eaſily to draw him with them into this league, confederacy and alliance. But Leo hauing obtained the Pontificall dignity, found himſelfe to bee aſſailed with ſondry thoughts, reuoluing in his minde diuers matters, as well belonging to warre as to peace.

The election of Pope Leo the tenth.

His

His antient habit and manner of life from his youth, did excite him to embrace peace and quietneſſe, eſpecially now when he ſaw him-ſelfe eſtabliſhed in the ſupreame dignity: ſo as the name of warre, in regard of dangers paſt was diſpleaſing and odious to him: And on the other ſide, hee found no great ſafety in peace, in the middeſt of armes, and confuſion of all things, as alſo, becauſe the memory of his predeceſſor, who by armes had much encreaſed the demaines of the Church, did prouoke him to warre. But by taking armes, hee knew not to which ſide hee ſhould rather incline: For the returne of the French into Italy did not like him, in regard of the wrongs and greeuances which he in particular had receiued by them, and his predeceſſor like-wiſe, and which did ſtill threaten him, in regard of the councell of Piſa; which was transferred to Lyons. On the other ſide, the French confederate with the Venetians, did in ſuch ſort daily encreaſe, in ſtrength and reputation, as hee knew not by what meanes, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt ſuch warlike attempts.

The new Pope is toſſed with ſundry thoughts

Leo then being thus troubled with ſundry thoughts, did oftentimes change his determination. At the beginning of his papacy, he ſent a breefe to all Chriſtian Princes, exhorting them to peace, and vnity: and the more eaſily to induce them there-vnto, hee determined not to ſhew him-ſelfe more affected to one ſide then to another. Yet neuertheleſſe, perceiuing at the ſame-time that there was no greate hope of peace, he beganne to prouoke the Venetians, againſt the French, vſing meanes to perſwade them to league them-ſelues with him ſelfe, the Florentines, the Swiſſes, and the Duke of Milan, for the liberty of Italy. The Venetians would not conſent to his propoſition, thinking it to bee againſt reaſon to abandon for vaine hopes, an alliance already made with the French; and alſo for that conſidering matters more iudiciouſly, they perceaued that at the firſt hee promiſed ſome apparent liberty: but that dangers did ſtill encreaſe, and that they went about to throw all Italy head-long into perpetuall bondage.

The Venetians conſtancy in maintayning their alliance.

With theſe diſcourſes did the Venetians maintayne their opinion, ſoliciting the French King in the meane time to make the greateſt haſt hee could with his army into Italy, to ſurpriſe the townes, before they were man'd with garriſons, putting him in mind, that the victory of an enterpriſe, dependeth cheefely on ſpeed. The French King beeing moued by theſe remonſtrances, did wholy bend his actions to this warre, and to cut off all lets that might hinder him therein, he made truce for one whole yeare with Fernand, King of Arragon, onely for that which concerned matters forth of Italy.

The King prepareth for his returne into Italy.

And as for the Engliſh, whome hee vnderſtood were making great preparations for their comming into France, hee made no great reckoning thereof, hoping in ſhort ſpace to driue Sforza from the ſtate of Milan, and to returne victorious with his Army into France, time enough to reſiſt their attempts.

Now the Rendezuous for all the Kings troupes was at Suza, from thence to march with eaſe into Italy, vnder the conduct of the Lord of La Tremouille, albeit the warre was managed by Iohn Iames Trivulce, a man of great repute, for his excellent skill in martiall diſcipline. The report was that there were twenty thouſand ſoldiours in the Kings Army. The Venetians had for their parts eight thouſand foot-men, twelue hundred men at armes, and fiue hundred light horſe, with greate ſtore of munition and ordnance: Dominico Contaren, and Andre Loredan were prouidators of the army and Bartilmeo Aluiana Generall in the Count Pettillans ſted, who was deceaſed.

The number of the French Army.

The number of the Venetian Army.

Hee beeing come to the Army, which lay on the bankes of Adice, ſent to the Senate to know if hee ſhould paſſe on farther whilſt the enemies were vnprouided of all aide and ſuccour, and their townes without garriſons.

The

The Senate beeing aſſembled therevpon, after ſundry opinions, decreed, that their Armie ſhould not paſſe the Po, nor Adda, referring the reſt to the pleaſure and diſcretion of their General, according as he ſhould think it fit. For the Senate had as yet receiued no certaine newes, whether the French Armie had paſſed the Alpes, wherevpon they thought it not diſcretion to abandon their ſtate to the enemies mercy, or to ſend their Army into any place, from whence, (if matters ſhould fall out vnfortunately) they ſhould not bee able to withdraw it.

But Aluiana beeing full of courage, and deſirous to exploite ſome gallant enterpriſe, if occaſion ſhould fitly ſerue, reſolued without delay to paſſe ouer, and firſt of all tooke his way directly towards Verona, hoping for to winne it. Pandolfo Malateſte commanded for the Emperour in one of the Fortes of the Citty: Hee with certaine of the Townſmen, had practiſed to giue him entrance: But the next day, fiue hundred Lanſquenets entred Verona by the Riuer Adicé, and the matter beeing diſcouered, Aluiana perceiuing that the Citty could not bee eaſily forced, and that it would aske much time to beſiege it, did on a ſodaine march towards Cremona, and by the way made him-ſelfe maiſter of Valegia, and of the Forte of Piſcara two ſtrong and commodious places for the Venetians, in reſpect of their ſituation.

The enterpriſe on Verona diſcouered.

The Venetians take Valegia and Piſcara.

Vpon report of Aluiana his comming, a great tumult was raiſed in Cremona: thoſe which were of the contrary faction, forſooke the towne, and the others without contradiction did receiue Aluiana into the citty, who being entred, he did ſodainly diſarme Cæſar Fieramoſca, who lay there in garriſon with three hundred horſe, and fiue hundred foot of the Duke of Milans. Hee needed not to ſpend any time for the recouery of the caſtle, by reaſon it was euer held for the French King: Wherevpon hee forth with erected the French Kings banner, ſaying; That hee did receiue the Citty, for, and in the name of the French King, for whom Theodore Triuulce his Ambaſſador was there preſent in the Venetian Armie. Hee went afterwards to Piſquetona, Sonzino, Lodi, and other places neere adioyning, hauing already, by the change of Cremona, erected the French Kings Banners.

The Venetians take Cremona.

But on the Verona and Vincentine territories, the Venetians affaires were differently managed. For ſo ſoone as Aluiana was departed with his Armie, Rocandolphe Captaine of the Lanſquenets, and Frederick Gonſaluo of Boſſola comming forth of Verona with ſixe hundred horſe, and two thouſand foote, went to Saint Boniface, where Aluiana had left vnder the command of Sigiſmond Cauallo, and Iohn Fortino, three hundred light horſe, and ſix hundred foote: who beeing ſcattered heere and there, vpon newes of the enemies comming, fled to Colognia, and were ſo neerely purſued by the Lanſquenets, who entered the towne by force, as they were all taken priſoners, and the towne beeing ſacked and burnt, they returned to Verona laden with ſpoile.

The Lanſquenets deſeate ſome of the Venetian forces.

The enemies for this exploit waxing more prowd and inſolent, foure thouſand foote, and fiue hundred horſe, ſallied forth of Verona for to aſſaile Vincenza: whereof Iohn Paull Manfron, the Cities Gouernour, hauing intelligence, hee cauſed great numbers of peaſants on a ſodaine to enter into the Citty, and did ſo carefully prouide for the reſt, as the enemies hope beeing fruſtrate, hauing ſpoyled the countrey round about, they were enforced to returne to Verona.

The Lanſquenets enterpriſe vpon Vincenza broken.

But during theſe exploites on the Veronois and Vincentine territories, the whole Dutchie of Milan was in vprore and Armes: There was no Towne, Village, nor Caſtle, but did riſe and take armes vpon the comming of the Venetian Armie, vpon the report that was ſpredde, that the French had paſſed the Alpes: for albeit that the people of Milan, wearied with the French gouernment; had desired the returne of the Sforzas their antient Lords : yet neuertheleſſe, hauing not by their returne obtained the liberty and freedome which they hoped for, but on the contrary all diſcommodities and charges, they changed their mindes, and desired the returne of the French. Many likewiſe, enemies to the quiet of other poore baniſhed men, or moued by the diuerſity of factions, did fauour the French. In regarde whereof the Earle of Manſoc, ſonne to Iohn Iames Triuulce, riding vp and downe the Champaine countrey of the Dutchy of Milan, to ſtirre them vp to commotions, found it no hard matter to make them to reuolt and to take armes.

All the Dutchy of Milan in vproare.

Maximillian Sfoorza retireth to Nouara.

Maximillian Sforza beeing daunted thereat, not knowing whereon to reſolue, perceiuing all things to tend to his ruine, thought it moſt expedient for his ſafety and eſcape, and for the tryall of his lateſt fortune, to retire with certaine horſe to Nouara, where he vnderſtood ſome Suiſſes were arriued, reſoluing there to tarry for the reſt, who in great numbers were comming down for the defence of his ſtate.

Thoſe of Milan, ſeeing them-ſelues to bee without garriſon, and without a Captaine, that their well fortified Caſtle held for the French, and that the Venetians Army did approach, ſome of them beeing ſtirred vp with hope of better fortune, others with feare and diſtruſt; thought it fit to yeeld to the French, and to that end, to ſend an Ambaſſador to the Venetian Generall; who hauing made a bridge ouer the Adda, threatned that hee would ſhortly bee with them. The French on the other ſide, (with whom Andrè Gritti was in quality of Ambaſſador for the Signory) entred Italy, tooke diuerſe townes and caſtles, ſome by aſſault, and others by a voluntary redition: ſo as the ſtate of Milan beeing enuaded by two mighty armies, French and Venetian, was in ſhort ſpace reduced vnder the French gouernment: Two Cities onely held out for Maximillian, Nouara, and Coma.

Milan reduced to the French gouernment

The Venetians, for theſe ſo fortunate attempts, did promiſe to them-ſelues a glorious end of this warre: for their armie had gotten ſuch reputation by the the taking of Cremona, as Ranze de Cera going with a troope of Soldiers to recouer Breſſia, it was yeelded vnto him vpon the firſt ſummons; by reaſon that the Spaniſh Soldiers, who lay there in garriſon, beeing frighted at his comming, retired into the Caſtle. There was but one onely thing which could cut off the hope which all men had conceiued of the victory, and that was the comming downe of the Suiſſes. For the common report was, that the Suiſſes had with ſuch affection entertained the protection and ſafegard of Duke Maximilians ſtate, as it was certainly thought that they would omit nothing which might further the conſeruation thereof.

Breſſia yeelded.

The Suiſſes Protectors of of the State of Milan.

This Nation was at the ſame time very famous for their exact obſeruation of martiall diſcipline, and they could by no meanes ſwallow the contempt and diſgrace wherein King Lewis held them, at ſuch time as hee ſent to renew the league with them (as hath beene ſaid) hauing more eſteemed a little ouer-plus of money, then their friendſhip; as alſo becauſe the deſire of gaine did prouoke them therevnto, hauing ſeene their fellowes to returne home from other warres victors and loden with wealth.

The Suiſſes diſcontent make warre on the French king.

Now theſe Suiſſes hauing aſſembled their generall Councell, did all with one conſent reſolue to make warre on the French, and they proceeded therein with ſuch earneſtneſſe, as the moſt of them, contrary to their cuſtome, enrolled themſelues for very ſmall pay, diuerſe alſo without any pay at all, and in a ſhort time after, they leuyed a great Army, both of horſe and foote, which beganne to come downe into the Dutchie of Milan, one company after an other.

The newes of their comming downe, did at the firſt amaze the French, in in regard of the recent remembrance of matters brauely executed by them: But when they conſidered that they brought no cauallery with them, nor victualls, artillery, nor ought elſe fit for ſuch an enterpriſe, they thought it beſt not to enforce ſuch enemies, who came rather to ſteale then to fight, being ſo vnprouided of all warlike neceſſaries, as they aſſured themſelues that their Army would ſhortly diſſolue it ſelfe, as it had done at other times, and would returne home againe, by reaſon of the want of all things.

The French therefore contemning them in this manner, hauing left a ſtrong garriſon in Alexandria, came and encamped before Nouara. Their intent was to trye if they could winne thoſe Suiſſes by money, rather then by force, and to practiſe with them for money to deliuer Maximillian Sforza into their hands, as the ſame nation had done by his Father Lodouico Sforza in the ſame place. And if this ſhould not fall out, they thought it no hard matter to take that Towne, the winning whereof, as they thought, would bee the ending of the warre.

But the wiſe and well experienced Captaines did deride theſe deſignes and vaine imaginations, and did blame the French, who inſteed of aſſailing the Spaniſh Armie, and breaking it, which they might eaſily haue done, did buſie themſelues in beſieging Nouara, and employing all their forces there, which was directly againſt Gritti his aduiſe, who did many times put the French Captaines in minde of the fault which they committed, in not firſt of all aſſailing the Spaniards, who ſeemed to bee the enemies chiefe prop. In regarde whereof the Senate thinking it fitte to bee done, had commanded their Generall to make a bridge ouer Adda, cauſing it to bee giuen forth, that hee would preſently with the whole Army paſſe ouer and ioyne with the French, to the end that the Spaniards, beeing mooued by this report, might not alone abſtaine from ayding the Suiſſes, but thinking how to eſcape, might bee enforced to returne to Naples. But the French trifling the time vainely before Nouara, brake all theſe ſound determinations, and found themſelues to bee entangled with many difficulties: becauſe the rumor dayly encreaſed, that of a certaine great ayde was comming to the beſieged, the which did make their enterpriſe more difficult: And as their diſcamping from thence, would greatly blemiſh their reputation, and encreaſe the enemies boldneſſe, euen ſo their long ſtay there was dangerous and vnprofitable. And therefore diuerſe Captaines were of opinion to retire from thoſe boggy places, and to goe into the Champaigne countrey, where their cauallery, wherein their chiefe hope conſiſted, might bee employed and ſhew their valour, councelling to goe and meete the enemies, promiſing vnto themſelues to obtaine the victory with eaſe, they comming ſo vnfurniſhed of all warlike preparations.

The French beſiege Nouara in vaine.

But the authority and opinion of Triuulcio did moſt preuaile, who thought it not fit to hazard the whole, on the vncertaine euent of a battaile, but by altering their forme of warre, to retire two miles off from the Citty, neere to the Riuer Mora, to the end that being ſafely encamped, they might cut off the enemies victuals, and enforce them thereby to yeeld. The Campe being gone thus farre from the citty, certaine troopes of Suiſſes entred it without any empediment, where they were receiued with great ioy: and not looſing one minute of time, Captaine Motir, one of the chiefe of the bands, called them all into the market place of Nouara, where after he had encouraged them with moſt vehement ſpeeches, hee reſolued with them by a generall conſent, to depart about midnight, and on a ſodaine, by the fauour of the night, to goe and aſſaile the French Campe, whereupon hee commanded them to goe to reſt, and to refreſh their bodies, and to bee ready when the drumme ſhould call them.

The French retire from before Nouara.

The reſolution of the Suiſſes.

This nation did neuer make a more bold and braue attempt, being a few againſt many, without horſe and Artillery, againſt an Armie excellently well prouided of all neceſſaries. About midnight then they ſallied with great fury forth of Nouara, on the sixt day of Iune, in the yeare 1513. They were about tenn thousand men, who were disposed and ordered in such manner, as seauen thousand were appointed to assaile the ordnance, about which the Lansquenets were lodged, and the residue should march with their long pikes against the men at armes.

The Suisses sally forth to fight with the French.

The French being come into that place, hauing continued the remainder of the day, and a part of the night in armes, betooke themselues heere and there to sleep (according to the report of the spies at Nouara) not doubting that any such accident would so soone befall them, hauing in no sort fortified their Campe. The tumult and confusion was very great vpon the Sentinels report of the enemies comming. The Artillery began to play with great fury vpon those who came to assayle it, and did greatly hurt them. Triuulcio was lodged in the middest of the battaile, because Trimouille fought in the right wing, and Robert de la Marche on the left, each of them exhorting the Souldiers to doe well. The men at Armes did readily put them-selues in battaile, and the Lansquenets, who were followed by the other footmen, did on a sodaine place themselues in order. The Suisses notwithstanding that many of their fellowes fell downe dead round about them, did neuertheless, with marueilous boldnesse, marche forward vpon the ordnance, not resteeming present death, nor were danted at the death of those that fel downe at their feete, vntill that comming vnto the Artillerie, the Lansquenets and they did charge one another with incredible fury, fighting with great rage, and yet neuer brake their order. All in generall did fight with great courage (the men at armes excepted) who stood still and did nothing, no perswasions, commandements, nor entreaties of the Lords, Triuulce and Trimouille beeing able to preuaile with them: beeing so affrighted, as they had no courage to charge the enemie, who stood before them, and the Suisses were well pleased with their standing still, and for that they came not on to the ayde of the footmen.

The French Campe in feare and confusion at the Suisses comming.

The Suisses great boldnesse

At the last, the great boldnesse and valour of the Suisses, carryed it away, who hauing brauely wonne the ordnance, did turne it vpon the French whom they put to rout, the footmen as well as the men at armes doing nothing worthy of prase. This is the famous battaile of Nouara, where they fought for the space of two houres, with great losse on both sides, but most of all on the French, which did afterward bring great calamity on the Venetians.

The Suisses victory at Nouara.

By this defeate of the French a great alteration followed in Italy, chiefly in those matters which concerned the Venetians. Gritti who was in the French army was likewise one that accompanied them in the flight, who beeing by no reason able to perswade them to tarry at Alexandria or in Piedmont and not blot their reputation with so base and shamefull a flight, perceiuing their Armie to bee wholy broken, and knowing that hee could in so sort aduance the seruice of the Common-wealth, went to Sauona, and from thence to Genoa, then to Luca, and so at last he came to Venice.

This victory caused Milan, with other townes which had openly shewed themselues for the French, to send to begge pardon, which was granted them, on condition to paye the Suisses, vnto whom by right was due, not onely the profit, but the glory of the victory, purchased by their valour and bloud.

The whole Dutchy of Milan yeeldeth to Sforza.

The Viceroy, who till then had still kept the Spaniards in their garrisons, and not shewed himselfe against the French nor Venetians, following the victors fortune, did on a sodaine crosse the Po, and marched towards Cremona (where he knew the Venetian army lay) to assaile it. Wherof Aluiana hauing intelligence and how that in other places the people began to rise against them & the French, in Maximillians behalfe, attempting to cut off victuals and passage from them, determined to leaue those confines, and to draw his Armie in safety from thence; the which the Senate vpon the report of the battailes losse, had commanded him to doe: but yet neuertheleſſe, to retire in such manner, as his retreat might not sauor of a manifest flight, least it should discourage his owne soldiers, and cause the enemies to become more audacious.

deter-

Aluiana being departed, and Cremona left naked of Souldiers, the Spaniard did forth-with seaze on it, and wholy sackt it, because it had giuen entrance to the Venetian Army. Then sending ayde to Maximillian Sforza to Nouara, and to Octauian Fregosa at Genoa, against the Adorni, he brought the residue of his Army towards the Venetians confines, hauing crossed the riuer Adda, where without any difficulty hee tooke the Cities of Brescia and Bergamo. These Cities were taken in the Emperors name, and rated at certaine great summes of money, which being rigourously leuied, were destributed among the Spanish Soldiers.

Cremona taken and sackt by the Spaniards.

Aluiana in the meane time, with all his forces remaining on the Veronois, being much discontented to see the great deseignes which hee had projected to bee snacht forth of his hands, resolued on a great and difficult enterprise: for hauing wonne the towne of Legnaga, he left Iohn Paul Baillon at the siege of the Castle, with twelue hundred foot, and himselfe went speedily with the residue of the Armie to assaile Verona, to trye if hee could take it on the sodaine. Baillon hauing made a breach in the forte of Legnaga, gaue a furious assault to it, and notwithstanding the Spaniards resistance, it was taken by force, for which hee was greatly esteemed by the Senate.

This place beeing taken, was not able to bee kept without a strong garrison, wherefore they resolued to dismantle and forsake it. Aluiana on the other side, being come before Verona, did assaile it on the weakest side neere to Saint Maximus gate, where hauing planted his ordnance, hee did with great fury batter the Tower of the gate, and the wall thereto adioyning, expecting in the meane time when any tumult would be raised in the Citty; and hauing beaten downe to the ground forty fathome of the wall, with the tower which fell downe likewise, hee gaue it a fierce assault. But three hundred horse, and three thousand Lansquenets beeing in Verona, it was valiantly defended, by reason that the breach was very high on the townes side, which made the descent very vneasie. Which Aluiana perceiuing, and that the Veronois did in no sort stirre, contrary to his hope, he did with great speed retire his footmen and artillery from before the walls, as wholy despairing of the Victory, and returned the very same day to his quarter, from whence he came in the morning, hauing in that assault lost aboue two hundred of his soldiers.

Legnaga taken and dismantled by the Venetians.

The Venetians besiege & batter Verona.

In this exploit there was nothing worthy of praise, but his great speed, because he had done that in one day, which other Captains were scarce accustomed to doe in three or foure. After that, hee spoiled the Countrey, trying whether for feare thereof he could enforce the Veronois to come to any agreement.

Aluiana raising his siege, spoileth the Countrey.

The end of the tenth Booke of the fourth Decade.

The Contents of the firſt Booke of the fifth Decade.

THE Spaniards take the Caſtle of Legnaga. Pope Leo reiecteth the treaty of peace betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians. Offers made to the French King by the Venetians. Lewis the French King ſubmitteth himſelfe to the Pope. The Venetians loſe the towne and Caſtle of Peſcara, Padua beſieged by the enemies; they ſoone quit it. The enemies make great ſpoile beeing come within ſight of Venice. Aluiana comming forth of Padua with his Army, oppoſeth himſelfe againſt the enemies paſſage. The enemies are greatly perplexed, by reaſon they could not come to any place of ſafety. The enemies doe defeate, and put the Venetians to rout neere to Vincenza. The admirable conſtancy of the Venetian Senate after the loſſe of the battle. Proſpero Colonna doth ſecretly fauour the Venetians, by diuerting the ſiege from Treuiſo. The Pope in perſon makes a Compromiſe, concerning the ſtrife betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians, which takes none effect. Selim King of Turkes, his warre againſt Acchomat his Brother. The difficulties which held back the Pope from procuring peace betwixt Chriſtian Princes. The Countreys of Padua and Friul wholy ruined. Frangipan taketh Maran, by the treachery of a Prieſt. The Venetians are defeated before Maran. A great fire in the Citty of Venice. A new compromiſe made in the Popes perſon, concerning the ſame differences. Feltre taken and ſpoiled by the Almains, is opportunely releeued by the Venetians: The difficulties which were found a new in the accord betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians, with the Popes arbitratiue ſentence. The Venetians defeate the Almaines in the Countrey of Friul. And laſtly, the meanes which the Venetians vſed to recouer money for the entertainment of their Armie.

The

The First Booke of the fifth Decade of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

WHileſt the Venetians ſpoyled the Countrey about Verona to enforce the Veronois to ſome agreement, the Spaniſh army came forward, the Viceroy fearing, leaſt thorough the bad diſpoſition of thoſe of Legnaga, Verona would open her gates to the Venetians, and therefore hee determined without delay to giue ayde to the Emperors affaires: which made him to croſſe the Po at Stradella,& to encampe before the caſtle of Legnaga, which was guarded by two hundred and fifty foot, the which (notwithſtanding the common opinion that it might well haue held out for certaine dayes longer) he tooke by force, the Venetian Prouidator being taken priſoner, with all the footmen which were not ſlaine at the aſſault. Aluiana hauing intelligence of the Spaniards approach, retired to Albera, on the farther ſide of the riuer Adicé, where he vſed all the meanes hee could to repaire his armie, the which hee afterward diuided for the gard of Treuiſo, and Padua, ſending Iohn Paul Baillon, Malateſta Sogliana, and the Knight de la Volpe to Treuiſo, with two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſe, and two thouſand ſoote, and himſelfe went with the reſidue of the Armie to Padua.

The Caſtle of Legnaga taken by the Spaniards.

The Venetian Armie retireth to Padua and Treuiſo.

During all theſe warlike exploits, and different practiſes, becauſe the treaties of the accord betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians were not wholy broken off, Pope Leo would haue them to be reuiued, thinking it an eaſie matter to obtaine of either of them that which hee pretended. For he ſuppoſed that the Emperor, beeing inuited by his occaſions beyond the Mounts, would bee content to hearken thereunto, that hee might with more eaſe recouer Burgondie for his ſonnes ſonne: and the Venetians much more, as well becauſe they were daunted with the defeat of the French, as for that they knew that the French King (many dangers threatning his kingdome) could not for that yeare thinke on the affaires of Italy: and beſides, he ſaw the Spaniſh Army at their doores, with which the companies that were in Verona went to vnite themſelues: They were more ouer drawne dry of money, vnprouided of Soldiers, and namely of footmen: and they were to make reſiſtance alone, no ſparke of light appearing, nor no ayde neere.

The Pope reuiueth the agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians.

The Senate neuertheleſſe made a moſt conſtant anſwer, That it would not hearken to any agreement, vnleſſe Vincenza and Verona were yeelded to them. And on the other ſide they ſolicited the French King, by their Ambaſſador Dandulo, reſident with him, to renue his army, and not to make ſhew of being danted for one onely loſſe hapned at Nouara: not to ſuffer thoſe mountainer Suiſſes to boaſt for that they had driuen ſo mighty a king from his ſtate, and rob'd him of the fruite of the purchaſed victory: That hee ſhould boldly make choyce of counſell worthy his greatneſſe, that the Venetians would not faile him in any thing: That hee ſhould make vſe for his ſeruice, of their Armes, Soldiers, and meanes: that ſo long as life ſhould remaine in their bodies, they would bee ready to vnder-goe all paine and danger, for the greatneſſe of the Realme of France, and for the defence of their common cauſe.

The Venetians conſtancie.

The Venetians offers to the French King.

King

The French Kings answer to the Venetians.

King Lewis thanked the Venetians for their offers, and with faire words gaue them good hope, manifesting his desire to bee reuenged on his enemies, and to continue his friendship and confederacie with them: that the French Kings custome was not to be chargeable: but to bring all aide, profit, and comfort to their friends and confederates. But because it was certainly thought, that the Realme of France, beeing assailed in sundry places: namely, by the King of England at Calais, and by the Emperor, and the Suisses in another place; it would bee hard for King Lewis, to intend for that whole yeare the affaires of Italy. The Venetians in the meane time did exhort him to free himselfe from all those difficulties which might in time to come hinder him from the conquest, of that which did belong vnto him in Italy, and to purchase friends in the Countrey, especially the Pope.

The Venetians exhort the French King.

The King, who desired nothing more then the vniting of his Realme with the Church, the which was earnestly craued by all his Court and subiects, did willingly hearken to the Venetians intreaties and remonstrances, and resolued for the same purpose to send the Bishop of Marseilles his Ambassador to Rome, and perceiuing that hee could neuer hope for any alliance with the Pope in temporall matters, vnlesse he first of all did compose spirituall dissentions, hee gaue his Ambassador in charge to assure the Pope, that hee had broken and reuoked the Councell which hee had caused first to bee assembled at Lyons, and afterwards at Pisa: and that hee would not allow of any other Councell then that of Lateran, which was then to be held in Rome: that he would euer (like to his Predecessors) greatly honor and reuerence the Popes name, and the sea Apostolick, and would be ready with his whole power to defend the Church of Rome.

The Kings Submission to the Pope.

The Venetians at the same time, sent ten Ambassadors to the Pope; for age and dignity, the chiefest of the Citty, for to giue him sufficient testimony of the good will and affection which they did beare to him: and had besides (the better to please him) enioyned Francisco Foscare their Ambassador resident with him to be present at euery Session of the Councell, in the name of the Republick, so soone as it should be begun at Saint Johns of Lateran. But they found afterward that the Pope did not so greatly affect them as they imagined, because that beeing wholy (since the rout at Nouara) freed from the feare of the French, insteed of dissembling (which before hee had done) he began to discouer himselfe openly. He did aloud rebuke the Venetians and greatly taxe them, for recalling the French into Italy: and that they who ought to haue had most care of the liberty and quiet of the Prouince, were those who had stirred vp more troubles in it, and had reduced it vnder the seruitude of Barbarians. And to make them more odious, hee did accuse them to haue had a desire, if matters had fallen out prosperously, to recouer the Citties and Townes of Romagnia, which they had enioyed. The Pope did often vse these reproachfull speeches.

The Popes reproachfull speeches of the Venetians.

The Emperour in the meane time did solicite him to send him the aide promised in the treaty passed with Iulius his Predecessor, and ratified by himselfe against the Venetians, in which demand the Emperour still persisting with great obstinacy; albeit it was irksome vnto him (fearing least the French King would be displeased therewith) hee sent vnto him, (being not able to delay it any longer), vnder the conduct of Troilo Sauello, Achilles Tourella, Mutio Colonna, the nomber of soldiers which he craued, because he would not (by refusall) giue any signe, that he was not desirous to persever in the confederacy contracted with the late Pope, as also because it seemed vnto him that he had no correspondence with the Venetians, who, besides, that their Army had after a sort behaued it selfe in hostile manner on the Parmesan and Placentine territories, at such time as Aluiana laye neere to Cremona, had not chosen any Ambassador to make the oath of obedience to him, after the ancient custome, vntill the French, beeing vanquished, were gone forth of Italy.

The Pope sendeth forces to the Emperor against the Venetians.

Nothing

Nothing did ſo much aſtoniſh the Venetians, as becauſe the Pope had declared himſelfe their enemie. Yet neuertheleſſe they hauing in his behalfe neuer failed in the reuerence and affection which they were bound to, (as himſelfe did confeſſe it) they were perſwaded that they might yet be receiued into his fauour, and make vſe heereafter of his grace and friendſhip. Neuertheleſſe, they did not alter their former determinations, but reſolued to reſiſt fortune as much as they might, and ſeeing themſelues to be out of hope of peace, and that the nomber of their enemies encreaſed, they ſpeedily beganne to prouide all thinges neceſſary to reſiſt ſo many dangers. They made great leuyes of footmen as wel in Romaignia as elſe where, they armed a great nomber of veſſells, called home all thoſe which they had in Candy and other places, and with the ſame ſpeed, they made great prouiſions of victualls, munition and money. Prouiſions made by the Venetians.

Some of the Senate were of opinion to haue their nauall army to ſaile into Puglia, to aſſaile the ſea townes, or at leaſt to ſeeme to reſent the many wronges which King Ferdinand without cauſe had done them. But hauing maturely conſidered how important a matter it was to prouoke ſo mighty a King, they reiected this propoſition, as more couragious then diſcreet, as well in reſpect of his power, as for that he had alwaies made ſhew to councell the Emperour to peace.

The Venetian Generall in the meane time being encamped on the banks of Adice, his eſpies aduertiſed him that the Spaniards had taken the way of Vincenza, determining to marche towards Padua, and that Cardona, with whom the Popes forces were vnited, came directly towards him with all his forces, he then thought fit to croſſe the Riuer; as well to free himſelfe from danger, as for to aſſure the Citties of Padua and Treuiſo, and came and ſtayed at Montagnane. But ſo ſoone as hee had croſſed the Riuer with his forces, the Venetians affaires, who by reaſon of ſome proſperous and good ſucceſſe, had begunne to bee re-eſtabliſhed, did a new fall into decadence: For the Polleſin of Rouigo, did forth-with yeeld to the enemy, and the other people of the conntrey did likewiſe ſodainly riſe, becauſe thoſe of the Venetian iuriſdiction, perceiuing that the enemies did waxe ſtrong, and did greatly moleſt them, and that the Venetians on the contrary grew weake, and could not releeue them, all men in heapes ranne to the enemies. Rance de Cere alone deſerued great commendation, who remaining euer conſtant in the Venetian ſeruice, did at times ſally forth of Crema, where he lay in garriſon, and made incurſions on the enemies Countrey, ſpoiling and burning whatſoeuer he met with. The Venetian army on the banks of Adice. The incurſions of Rance de Cere, Gouernor of Crema.

The towne of Peſcara, after a ſmall reſiſtance, with the Caſtle likewiſe, albeit it was well fortified, fell into the enemies hands, thorough the ſtrife and diſcention of thoſe within it, Lodouico Contarem the Prouidator, and all the Captaines with the moſt part of the ſoldiers were taken priſoners, the reſt eſcaped by flight. The Venetians loose Peſcara.

The Biſhop of Gurcia, as Lieutenant to the Emperor in Italy, comming to the Armie, was of opinion to goe and beſiege Padua, ſaying; That he had ſo great hope in the Lanſquenets and Spaniards valour againſt the Italians, as in the end they would ſurmount all difficulties. That it was a matter of ſmall labour to take Treuiſo, but that the reward of the victory was different, becauſe that to winne Treuiſo onely, did not import much for the concluſion of the warre, but by the taking of Padua, they ſhould altogether aſſure the Citties of the Emperors obedience, from the dangers of warre, and depriue the Venetians of all hope, of euer beeing able to recouer thoſe places that they had loſt. It is certaine, that the Biſhop of Gurcia did obſtinately maintaine this propoſition againſt the aduiſe of all the Captaines, who were of a contrary opinion, iudging it rather an impoſſible then hard matter to take Padua by force, in regard of his fortifications almoſt incredible: It is not knowne whether the Biſhop of Gurcia propounded it by the Emperors commandement, or elſe of his own motion, hoping Of what importance the taking of Padua was.

hoping thereby of greater praiſe, as for an high and difficult enterpriſe.

At the laſt, notwithſtanding all the Viceroyes reaſons, and thoſe of the contrary opinion, the Biſhop of Gurcia his will was followed, by meanes whereof the Imperiall Armie approching neere to Padua, went and lodged at Baſſanella, on the right ſide of the channell, a mile and a halfe from the citty, in which place being much moleſted by certaine double Canons, planted vpon one of the citties baſtions, it croſſed the channell, and lodged a little farther of.

The Imperials reſolution to beſiege Padua.

Aluiana, who had already ſent his Artillery and baggage to Padua, to bee the lighter to take what way ſhould be moſt expedient, hauing notice of their reſolution, determined to march towards the citty, to keepe and defend it againſt the enemies, Baillon beeing already in Treuiſo (as hath beene ſaid) with ſufficient forces to defend it, whether the Senate ſent Andre, Mari-pietro for Prouidator. And although that Padua ſeemed to bee well furniſhed with men, and all other neceſſaries, the Senate neuertheleſſe would haue certaine leuies of foot companies to bee made, as well of Venetians as Hiſtrians, who ſpeedily marched thither, with all the husbandmen neere about, which were come to Venice for refuge, to the end to vſe thoſe men for neceſſary reparations, in ſteed of Pioners. Diuerſe young Venetian Gentlemen likewiſe went to the defence of the citty: So great was their care and diligence to keepe theſe two citties, as well for the commodity of their ſituation, as for the fertillity of the ſoyle, hauing made the countrey plaine round about, cut downe the trees which were there, and raced all the farmes and houſes of pleaſure, ſo as there was nothing within a mile of the citty, which lay not open to the mercy of the Canon.

Padua furniſhed of all things neceſſary to ſuſteine a ſiege.

The enemies encamping round about padua, ſent the footmen to S. Anthonies Church, which is within halfe a mile of the towne where they beganne, (that they might approach with leſſe danger) to make trenches neere to Saint Antonies gate. But the work being great, and the want of Pioners greater, it went foreward ſlowly and with danger, becauſe the ſoldiers on the ſodaine making many ſallies, as well in the day time as by night, did greatly hinder them that wrought.

The number of the enemies before Padua.

On the other ſide the nomber of the enemies was to ſmal for ſuch an enterpriſe, for they were not aboue eight thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe of all ſortes, ſo as a final quantity of the towne beeing enuironed by the enemies, the Stradiots ſallied forth at other places and did freely ſcoure the whole contrey, intercepting whatſoeuer was brought to the Camp, the like did certaiue armed boates which the Venetians had placed for that purpoſe on the Riuer Adicé ſo as victuals beginning to faile them, they wee euery day to ſeeke new.

They had worthy Captaines in their Campe, but their skill and experience was to no purpoſe in that buſineſſe, in regard of the authority and obſtinacy of the Biſhop of Gurcia. That which did moſt trouble them, was, the bringing of their ordnance neere to the walls, and how to bring the ſouldiers afterward to the aſſault, the which they could not doe without a broad and large trench, to auoid the ſhot of the ordnance which inceſſantly plaid from the towne, and they wanted Pioners to continue it. Theſe difficulties being propounded by the Viceroy in the enemies councell, with the ſickneſſe where-with the ſoldiers were afflicted, by reaſon of the bad aire, the campe being ſeated in a low place, and ſubiect to the ouer flowing of waters, all men were of opinion, that it would be leſſe diſgrace to correct the determination vnwiſely made, by diſcamping, then by perſeuering in that error to be cauſe of ſome great loſſe that might happen, the which would bee followed with greater diſgrace.

The Viceroy acquainting the Biſhoppe of Gurcia with this determination, hee made anſwer in the preſence of diuers Captaines, that martiall diſcipline being none of his vocation, he was not aſhamed to confeſſe, That hee had no vnderſtanding in martiall matters, and if he had councelled to beſiege Padua, it was by the Viceroys aduiſe, who by letters and expreſſe meſſages had councouncelled the Emperour that it might be ſo, and giuen him great hope to be able to take it: and therefore he gaue conſent, (difficulties ſtill continuing) to raiſe the ſeege, the which was done on the ſixteenth day of Auguſt, after they had encamped twenty dayes before the walls of Padua.

The Imperials raiſe their ſiege from before Padua.

The enemy marched directly to Vincenza, the which beeing found, for the moſt part, empty of inhabitants, and abandoned by the Venetian Magiſtrates was foorth with ſeized by them, and made a prey to the enemies, where they commited cruell and foule actions, not ſpoyling alone cittizens houſes, but Churches and ſacred places, not for hatred they did beare to that wretched citty, but becauſe their army was altogether maintained by theft and robbery.

The enemies ſpoile & ruine Vincenza:

The Biſhop of Gurcia and the Viceroy remained certaine dayes at vincenza with bad intertainment, as well in regard of the continuall moleſtation of the ſtradiots who ſcoured the contrey day and night, as ſcarcity and want of victuals, in the Citty. This enforced them to diſlodge: The Biſhop of Gurcia with his Almans went towards Verona, and the Viceroy encamped at Albera on the Adicé, where he tarried certaine dayes, as well to giue meanes to the veronois to gather in their harueſt vintage, and to ſow their grounds, as for to make a bridge ouer the riuer, hauing an intent to bring his troopes to winter on the Breſſan and Bergamaſc territories. But Aluiana perceiuing that the viceroy made no haſt to depart thence, was of opinion to ſally forth of Padua and Treuiſo with their forces and to aſſaile the enemies, who without any ſuſpition thereof, being diſperced heere and there about pillage, gaue occaſion of an aſſured victory: ſhewing, that that Army being defeated, the warre was for a time ended.

The Senate iudging otherwiſe of the matter, ſaid that it was not neceſſary to hazard, on the vncertaine euent of a battaile, that army, wherein conſiſted the chiefe hope of the preſeruation of their State: thinking it likewiſe no diſcretion to vnfurniſh, in ſo dangerous a time, the Cities of Padua and Treuiſo of their garriſons: Neuer-the-leſſe, concealing their intents, they cauſed it to bee giuen out, That their Army ſhould ſhortly come forth into the field, to the end, that the enemies beeing troubled with this newes, ſhould abſtaine from making any more incurſions, and diſlodge foorth of their confines.

The Senates opinion on Aluiana deſire to fight with the enemy.

But the Viceroy making no great account of theſe rumors, in regarde hee ſaw no likelyhood thereof, propounded to him-ſelfe greater deſignes, and changing his former determination, to place his armie in garriſon on the Breſſan and Bergamaſc Countrey, hauing no other meanes to feede his Armie, but by boot-haling, hee ſent for the Almaines, and went to Montagnane and Eſte, and to the village of Bouolente, from whence bringing away great ſtore of Cattle, the Souldiers burned diuerſe goodly houſes neere adioyning: Then being prouoked by the deſire of ſpoyle, and emboldened becauſe the Venetian troopes were diſtributed for the garde of Padua, and Treuiſo, they determined to draw neere to Venice (contrary to the opinion of Proſpero Colonna) and hauing croſſed the Riuer Baquillon, and ſpoiled Pieua di Sac, which is a great Burrow, they went to Meſtre and Marguera, ſeated on the ſalt waters, where the Viceroy commanded his Artillery to ſtay, and ſeeing the Citty of Venice before him, hee cauſed tenne peeces of great ordnance to bee diſcharged vpon it, the bullets whereof fell on the Monaſtery of Saint Secundus, and at the ſame time, his ſouldiers rob'd and ſpoyled the whole countrey, making warre moſt vniuſtly on the very walles, for beeing not ſatisfied with their booty, they cruelly burnt Meſtre, Marguera, and Liſſafuſina, together with other townes and villages.

The incurſions of the Imperial Army.

Now

Now the Viceroy beginning to perceiue his error, and therefore beeing desirous to make hast to gette from thence, could not keepe back his soldiers from pillaging, neither by his authority nor by shewing them the danger they were in if they stayed any longer there, in regard of the ouer-much liberty which they had taken to spoile.

Aluiana his great griefe that he might not come forth

Aluiana being with his army shut vp in Padua, was extreamly greeued to see his reputation so soiled, and that before his face the enemies passing along neere to so strong a Citty, should so vnluckily giue spoile to so great a Contrey. Therfore he aduertised the Senate that his intent was to sally foorth of the Cittry with his forces and to come and meet with the enemies, to stop their passage at their returne, saying that being laden with spoile as they were, they could not choose but march in disorder and by that meanes they might easily be broaken and defeated, That certainly their Republicke was fallen into a wretched condition, farre vnworthy their antient glory, the which they could not shake off, but by some valiant and generous exploite. But the Senate enclining to the contrary, thought that the same did not proceed from a base and abiect mind, but rather from a generous constancy, carefully to prouide for al inconueniences that might happen, and that it was no great wisdome to hazard all on the euent of a battaile, which for the most part is doubtfull and vncertaine: therefore their opinion was, that he should assaile the enemies with the Cauallery only, and leaue the foote-forces for the gard of the citty.

Aluiana his earnestnesse to the Senate that he might fight with the enemies.

But Aluiana being carried away with an extreame desire to obtaine the victory, by which oftentimes he was spurd foreward by vaine glory, as by a certaine dazeling, so as hee did not fore-see dangers, and contemned all councell how wise and proffitable soeuer, did euery day make greater instance, that he might with the Army come forth into the field, the Prouidatory made the same request, being induced as they said by the great affection which they perceiued in the Captaines in the Republicks behalfe.

The Senate permits Aluiana to come forth with his Army.

The Senate at these intreaties, gaue ouer their former opinion, and referred all to Aluianas discretion, if he thought that his comming forth of Padua with the army might turne to the proffit and vtillity of the common wealth; and that to those ends he should assemble all his soldiers, and cause all the peasants, as well of the champaine as hilly countrey to rise, to stoppe if it were possible the enemies returne (as Aluiana promised to him selfe to do) who were so rashly gonne forward, being come betwixt Venice, Treuiso and Padua.

The Viceroy (as hath beene said) hauing acknowledged his error made all the hast he could to march away, and beeing come to Ciuitella, he could not take it, by reason that it was well mand with soldiers. For Aluiana according to the Senates permission being with all his forces come forth of Padua leauing a garrison in Ciuitella, came to Cotincella, where the Riuer Brente might bee foorded. The enemies failed not to come thither, for they could not enter Ciuitella: But perceiuing Aluiana to bee lodged on the other side with the Artillery, they durst not passe ouer: and making shew that they would passe a little beneath, Aluiana turned all his forces thither, wherevpon they passed the night following, without any let, at the passage called the new Crosse, three miles aboue Ciuitella, taking afterwards with great speed, the way towards Vincenza.

Aluiana shewe eth himselfe at the enemies passage.

The Imperiall Army by night passeth the riuer Brenta.

Aluiana hauing notice of their passage, resolued to stoppe them at the Riuer Baquillon: André Gritti, and Iohn Paul Baillon, comming forth of Treuiso, ioyned with him, with two hundred and fiftie men at armes, and two thousand foot, determining not to fight with displayed Ensignes, but onely to garde the strong passages and commodious places to stoppe their way, on what side so euer they should turne, as well on Montescas side, as on that of Barberana, hauing hauing ſent forces thither for that purpoſe, and cauſed the country peaſants to poſeſſe all the paſſages leading into Germany, and to fortifie them with dikes and trenches, Aluiana hauing left Theodore Trivulte in Vincenza, with ſufficient garriſon, came with the reſidew of the Army, and encamped at Olma, which is a place two miles diſtant from Vincenza, on the high way of Verona, which was ſo ſtopped with ditches and trenches, with artillery planted on the waies, as it was almoſt impoſſible to paſſe. Aluiana choſe this place as moſt ſafe and commodious, wher he determined to ſtay for the enemies, (according to the Senates aduiſe) hauing in aboundance all things neceſſary for a campe, and the enemies on the contrary wanted all.

Aluiana encampeth at Olma, determining their to tarry for the enemy.

The Viceroy in the meane time holding on his way was come within foure miles of the Venetian Campe, and ſtayed at a place called by thoſe of the country La Motta, where hee was much troubled in his minde, together with his other Captaines, what way hee were beſt to take, all their opinions were different: For they could not paſſe along by the ſides of the mountaines, by reaſon of the marriſh countrey which was full of water, nor yet by the ſtreight-waies of the mountaine, which was garded by diuers armed men. So as beeing in a manner enuironed on euery ſide by the enemies, in front, on their backs, and in flanke, and continually followed by great multitudes of light-horſe, they could not determine on any thing which was not hard and dangerous. Whereupon after long conſultation, they reſolued at the laſt to open their way by armes, thinking it fit and well beſeeming to ſhew in greate dangers a ſingular and vnuſuall valour. Therefore the viceroy, perceiuing the difficulties that did preſent them-ſelues could no longer bee concealed from the ſoldiours, hee thought good without diſſembling any thing, to let them vnderſtand how their affaires ſtood, and by ſome remonſtrance to exhorte them to doe wel, and to open their way with their ſwords points, putting them in mind, how much hee had euer relied on their valour and proweſſe, the which alone had made them to enter ſo farre into the enemies country, hoping that they would altogether ſtriue to free them-ſelues from danger, if any ſhould bee offered, as then was: for hauing on the one ſide, ſharpe and hight mountaines, poſſeſſed by the enemies, and on the other ſide the Venetian Army ſtopping their returne, they were reſolued them-ſelues by fighting to endure ſondry diſcommodities to winne way, which would neuertheleſſe be great diſgrace to them, who had neuer beene vanquiſhed: And therefore hee thought it much better to come at the firſt to handy-ſtroakes with the enemies, and to paſſe thorow the middeſt of their campe, continuing their iourny: for want of victuall enforced them to depart thence.

The Emperialls braue reſolution.

The ſouldiers being greatly encouraged by this remonſtrance, promiſed the Generall to behaue themſelues brauely in the fight, and in this reſolution they marched the next day by day-breake to Baſſan, turning their backes to the enemies, marching alwaies in order, with ſmall hope neuertheleſſe of eſcape.

Aluiana by reaſon of a thicke miſt, did not very ſoone perceiue that they were diſlodged, which was done without drummes or trumpets: but hauing notice thereof, hee ſpeedily followed them with his forces: ſo that their difficulty in marching, paſſing thorow narrow waies, full of ditches, did ſtill increaſe their danger, and hauing gonne about two miles in ſuch way, not without great trauaile, Aluiana not being able to conteine himſelfe, did aſſaile, not diſorderly, but with his army ordered for the fight, and with the artilery the enemies rereward, conducted by Proſpero Colonna, who hauing brauely receiued them, ſent ſpeedily for the viceroy, who led the battaile, and the Spaniſh foot-men commanded by the Marquis of Peſcara, marching at the ſame time on the one ſide, and the Lanſequenets on the other: The Venetian ſouldiers beeing with great fury charged vpon, not being able to ſuſteine the enemies force, did baſely on a ſodaine betake them-ſelues to flight, flinging their pikes from them vpon the ground.

The foot-men of Romagnia were authors of this flight: the residew of their army did forth-with follow them, so as none in a manner did fight. Aluiana himselfe was so amazed at so sodaine a rout, as without fight hee left the victory to the enemies with all his bagage and artillery, the foot-men dispersed them-selues in diuers places, and as for the men at armes, part of them fled towards the hill, and the other saued themselues in Padua and Treuiso, whether Aluiana and Gritti did like-wise retire: Many Captaines were slaine there, and many were taken prisoners, but the Prouidator Loredan made proofe of them both, by reason that two soldiers striuing who should haue him, the one of the two did most inhumainely kill him. And in this manner at this battaile, as well dead as taken prisoners, foure hundred men at armes, and foure thousand Venetian foot were found by reason the marshes which hindred the escape of many.

The Prouidator Loredan, slaine.

The constancy of the Venetian Senate.

But notwithstanding that the Senate was afflicted with so many miseries, and amased at an accident contrary to their hope, yet neuertheless, the same day that they receaued these lamentable newes, they determined to write to Aluiana, That they could not deny, but that they were in some sort troubled at the report of so strange an accident, but not danted or wholy discouraged, wherevpon they were rather to awake them-selues in such aduersiy, then to lose one iot of their vsuall constancy, Therfore they did with great affection entreate him to take courrage, and not to yeeld to fortune: That they were very carefull of his health, in regard of the great hope they had in his valour, and that they did still hope, if hee recouered his strength and magnanimity, to breake the course of aduerse fortune, to calme her too much rigor, by bringing backe in the end victory from the enemies, albeit they were now victorious: They willed him then speedily to prouide for the defence of Padua and Treuiso, that the Senate would soone furnish him with soldiours, armor, victualls, and mony, and generally with what-soeuer they knew to be necessary for the safety and preseruation of those Cities.

The tenor of the Senates letters sent to Aluiana.

These letters being written, the Senate made prouision of all things needfull. Prince Loredan by a graue remonstrance inciting euery one to employ him-selfe therein, said, That it behoued them-selues to releeue their state, and not to hope for aide from elsewhere, and that each man ought to aide the common-wealth with what hee knew was in his ability. As for him-selfe hee was determined to spare nothing that he knew might serue the Republike: and how for that purpose hee resolued to send his two Sonnes, Lodouico and Bernardo; the one to Treuiso, and the other to Padua, for to expose them to all dangers which should happen, consecrating them to his country.

Prince Loredan his remonstrance.

The Princes speech did greatly moue; but his example much more, by which diuers young Gentlemen of the cheefest families of the Citty, and of great hope being incited did like-wise depart for the gard of those townes; diuers of the common people were like-wise enroled to bee sent to Treuiso, whether the report was, that the enemies would first come. The which vndoubtedly had beene done, had not Prospero Colonna by deferring from day to day, the resolution of that businesse hindred the execution thereof.

Diuers Venetian young gentlemen are sent to Padua & Treuiso.

Hee, as it was after-wards knowne, did sufficiently fauour the Venetians affaires, for the conseruation and defence of the common liberty of Italy: so as after many and sondry determinations, hee caused the councell at last to condescend to deferre the matter till the Bishop of Gurcias comming, saying That there was nothing which did so much wrong their reputation, as to attempt an enteprize, and then to be enforced to giue ouer, without effecting it, as they had done at Padua. And thus the Viceroy, and Prospero concluded together to leaue part of the Army at Vincenza, and to leade the residew to Verona, staying for the Bishop of Gurcia: where hauing delayed the time twenty daies, Colonna tooke vpon him the place of Captaine Generall of Maximilian Sforzas army, and forsooke the Spaniards.

The seege of Treuiso is deferred till another time by Prospero Colonna.

The

The Viceroy being deſirous to renew his Army: ſent for all the Captaines with their Companies which lay on the Breſſan and Bergamask, aſſuring them that vpon their arriuall, he would forthwith goe and beſeege Treuiſo: Gritti was within it, with the Knight La Volpe, Hugo de Pepoli, Iohn Paul Manfron, with diuers other worthy Captaines, great numbers of horſe and foot, and ſtore of victuall. The Viceroy being aduertized thereof, and it being winter, he deferred the matter till ſome other time, and ſent his army to winter on the Paduan territory, ſome to Eſte, and the reſt to Montagnane and Monceleſia.

In the meane time matters were changed from Armes to conſultations of peace, which were treated of in the Popes Court, whether the Biſhop of Gurcia was gone; at whoſe comming a compromiſe was made by him and the Venetian Ambaſſadors in the Popes perſon, concerning all the ſtriſe which was betwixt the Emperour and their common-wealth: but it was a compromiſe in name and ſhew rather then in effect and ſubſtance: the Pope likewiſe left the matter imperfect, albeit hee had declared by a Breefe, that there ſhould bee a ſurceaſe of armes on both ſides: for this was not well obſerued, neither by the Viceroy, whoſe ſoldiers ſince the victory did nothing but robbe and ſpoile euery where, nor by the Germaines, who by meanes of a Preeſt did by ſtealth take Maran which is a Sea towne in the Country of Friul, then they tooke Montfalcon; In the recouery of which townes, Fortune ſhewing her ſelfe no more fauourable to the Venetians, then in other places, they were on both ſides much endamaged.

Compromiſe made by the Pope.

At the ſame time as theſe affaires were thus managed in Italy, there were great ſtirrs in Aſia. Selim ſonne to Baziazet, his father yet liuing, did vſurpe the Ottoman Empire, and hauing in ſondry battailes vanquiſhed Achomat his brother, who likewiſe laid claime therevnto, had enforced him for releeſe, to haue recourſe to his neighbor Kings, and cheefely to Hiſmaell Sophi, King of Perſia. And albeit that Selim in his victories gaue ſufficient teſtimony of his vile and cruell nature, and the deſire he had, (being freed from this warre) to aſſaile the Chriſtians; The Venetians neuertheleſſe beeing elſe where moleſted, and hauing no meanes to reſiſt his greatneſſe, reſolued to purchaſe his frendſhip, and to fit themſelues to the time. Therefore they were of opinion to ſend an Ambaſſador to him, and they appointed for this purpoſe Antonio Iuſtiniano, in the Republicks name to congratulate his comming to the Empire, and to reioyce with him, and to confirme a new the ancient frendſhip and alliance which they had with the Ottoman family.

Troubles in Aſia.

Selims cruelty

A Venetian Ambaſſador ſent to Selim.

This Ambaſſador was honorably receiued by Selim in the citty of Andrinopolis, where he then was with his army, who gaue him great entertainment, knowing very well that without peace he could not aſſure his affaires of Europe, then when he was to paſſe with a great Army into Aſia againſt his brother Achomat, who being backt by the Sophies forces, had already recouered certaine places in Cappadocia, and approached to aſſaile him, whileſt he as yet was not ſtrong enough to reſiſt him; wherevpon Selim (perceiuing that which he had cheefely wiſhed for to be freely offered) did willingly imbrace the Venetians frendſhip, promiſing for euer to obſerue it inuiolably: And in this manner the alliance was renewed betwixt them on the ſame conditions as they had beene before treated of with Baziazet.

This treaty being concluded and effected, Iuſtinian returned to Venice, with whom Selim ſent Alimbei his Ambaſſador, to cauſe the Prince and Senate to ratifie the preſent treaty, vnto whom he likewiſe wrote, exhorting them to entertaine his frendſhip: And that he for his part would neuer faile them. The Turkiſh Ambaſſador being come to Venice, and brought into the Senate, Prince Loredan, ſwore and ratified, as well in his owne name as in the Common wealthes, all that which Iuſtinian, their Ambaſſador, had agreed to, and signed. Selim by this meanes being out of feare of the warrs on Europes side, hauing likewise renewed the truce with the Kings of Poland, and Hungary, hee marched courrageously against Achomat, whome hauing broken and defeated, hee commanded to be slaine, to the end that by his death hee might without contradiction become absolute Lord of Asia the lesse, thereby promising to himselfe, that nothing should bee able to resist him: whereby hee became so proude as hee thought hee was able to conquer the whole world, and cheefely Italy, on which hee began to fixe his thoughts, imagining that he could with ease subiugate it, being weake and molested by the forepassed warres.

Achomat brother to Selim vanquished and slaine.

He was moreouer incited thervnto by the Emperor Maximilian, who thought on no thing more then how to ruinate the Venetians. It is certaine that he sent an Ambassador to Constantinople to aduertise Selim of the great opportunity then offered, to enuade the sea coasts of the Venetians state, whilest hee with his army would assaille them by land: but it was not certainly knowne, on what place he ment first to attempt

The Emperor Maximilian prouoketh Selim against the Venetians.

Selim being thus solicited, caused that winter diuers Vessels to bee armed, and new to be made, and to new builde those that were broken. But at the spring newes was brought to Constantinople, how that Amurath, Sonne to his brother Achomat, (who being not at the battaile where his Father fought, with such bad successe, had escaped into Persia) had on a sodaine entred Cappadocia with great numbers of horse and foote, where afrighting the whole country with great wast, hee was become maister of diuers places of that Prouince.

Amurath Son to Achomat in armes against Selim.

Selim being greatly daunted at these newes, and considering that the Sophi alone was cause, as well of those present troubles, as of those which Achomat his brother had in time before raised, resolued to take reuenge: and to this end determined to send all that great army, as well by land as sea into Asia, the which was leuied for Europe. This Asian warre fell out opportunely for the Christian Princes, whome this most mighty and cruell enemy would haue wholy ruined, and afterward would haue gone on in dispite of all their resistance.

Selim marcheth in to Asia with the army which he had prepared for Europe.

This being considered by Pope Leo, with the great good which this warre of Persia had done, thought it his duty to meditate a firme peace among Christian Princes, to the end that being vnited together, they might with more ease oppose them selues against that Barbarous enemy. The Cardinalls solicited him therevnto, in setting on foot the treaty of peace, and not to leaue till it had taken effect according to their desire. But albeit the Pope did very well know that this was more then reasonable, yet neuer the lesse hee reuolued in his minde, which was troubled with diuers maters, that as the successe of that wholesome councell, did promise a very great and certaine commendations, euen so the diuers respects of warre and peace, and the difficulties which he met with in this treatie did affright him and wholy draw him backe from that enterprise. For his feare least the French should returne againe into Italy, and make head against the Spaniards and Almans, did extreamely trouble him: thinking verily that the same would happen, if the realme of France were not enuaded in some place or other, knowing that King Lewis, by nature, was altogether an enemy to quiet, and that so soone as hee had made peace with the English, hee would turne his thoughts vpon Italy, for the recouery of the Dutchy of Milan, in regard hee had euer reiected all motions of peace wherein was propounded that hee should quit his claime to the state of Milan.

The Pope resolueth on peace.

The difficulty which held backe the Pope from procuring a generall peace.

The Venetians affaires were almost at the same stay, the Pope being not desirous to haue them recouer their former greatnesse, nor yet to be to much deiected in regard of the common reputation of Italy. Whilest the Pope was in this sort afflicted with sundry thoughts, and that at one time hee would fauour the Venetians, and at another shewe them an angry and froward countenance, the warre did ſtill continew, notwithſtanding the ſharpneſſe of the Winter, for Proſpero Collonna with the Duke of Millans forces marching to Crema, ioyned himſelfe to the Spanniſh army, the which did re-enforce the Cities ſeege, and the Paduan territory was daily ſcoured and ſpoiled by the enemies incurſions, the like was done in the Contrey of Friul, where there was no towne or caſtle ſo ſtrong, either by art or nature, which was not enforced to obey that partie who was ſtrongeſt in the field; ſo as the inhabitants of that poore contrey, were wholly ſtript of all.

the

The Paduan territory with the Friul wholly ruined by the enemies incurſions.

And for to diſpatch them at once, Bernardino Frangipan hauing forſaken the Venetians, did by treachery ſeaze on the Fort of Maran (as hath beene ſaid) by meanes of a Preeſt called Bartholomeo, who being a familiar frend to Aleſſandro Marcello Prouidator of the place, got leaue of him on a morning, before day, to haue the Caſtle gates opened for him, vnder couller that he went forth to hunt, ſo as Frangipan, according as it was concluded betwixt himſelfe and the Preiſt, did on a ſodaine ſeaze on the gate, with certaine Almaine foot, and ſome horſe, vntill his troopes were arriued, whereby hee became maiſter of the place. But the traytor within a while after was paied his deſert; for being taken by Nicolo Piſare who commaunded in Gruare, hee was ſent to Venice, where beeing hung vp by one foote, hee was by the people ſtoned to death.

Frangipan taketh Maran by trechery.

The traitor puniſhed.

This place beeing very commodious for the Venetians, the Senate was of opinion to haue it ſpeedily beſeeged, the better afterwards to aſſayle Goritia, which Frangipan had taken in the ſame manner, and held it in the Emperors name. The land Army marched thither vnder the conduct of Balthaſar Scipione of Luca, and the nauall army, commanded by Bartholomeo de Muſt a man well experienced in marine matters. Theſe two Armies being come before Maran, an Herrald was ſent to the inhabitants of the towne, and to the Almaines that were within it, to ſummon them in the name of the common wealth to yeeld vp that place to the Venetians, aduiſing them not to delay till it were taken by force.

The Venetians beſeeged Maran.

Thoſe within it made ſhewes wholy contrary to the ſummons, and vſed many iniurious ſpeeches to the Herrald, whereat thoſe of the Camp being incenſed, determined to giue an aſſault, not tarrying for certaine galleyes which were to ariue, but at the firſt ſhot of ordnance which the beſeeged made vpon the armed boates, which did diſorder them, and ſlew ſome, the ſailers and ſoldiers were ſo danted, as on a ſodaine they retired as far off as they could from the ſhot of the Cannon, whereas at the beginning they craued to be led to the aſſault, ſo as afterward they durſt in no ſort ſtirre, vntill that foure armed galleies arriued to their aid.

The towne-walls next to the Hauen were in ſome ſort lower then other places, where the ſmall towers likewiſe had beene beaten downe by the Canon; the Venetians made account to enter there with eaſe; and to make the matter leſſe difficult, to aſſaile it on a ſodaine in ſondry places, as well on the land ſide, as on the Hauens, to the end that the beſeeged beeing buſied in ſo many places, might be the weaker in all. According then to this reſolution they went to the aſſault, but on a ſodaine there fell ſuch a ſhower of rayne, as thoſe on the land ſide were enforced to retire, not only from the walls, but a great way from the towne, the whole plaine being couered with water, by reaſon of the Marſhes neere adioyning, by meanes where-of the beſeeged being aſſured on that ſide, turned all their forces towards the Hauen, from whence with eaſe they draue the aſſaylants, who already beganne to mount the walles.

The aſſault reſolued on Maran in diuers places at once.

At the ſame time as this happened, the ſoldiers whom Scipio had ſent to garde the paſſages of the mountaines, to ſtoppe all ayd from the beſeeged ſent intelligence to the Campe, that Frangipan approached with great nombers of ſoldiers, requeſting to haue ſupplies ſent vnto them, otherwiſe they Thoſe that garded the mountaines, forſake the paſſages.

ſhould bee enforced to abandon thoſe places, beeing to weake to reſiſt them, Sauorgnane who was in the army, being out of hope to take the towne, vpon theſe news turned his forces towards the Mounts, but he had not marched a mile, ere he met with thoſe that ſent for more aide, who being afrighted at the great numbers of thoſe who were ſaid to be comming, to releeue the towne, had not the courage to attend them, and Sauorgnane vniting them with his forces, went to the horſemens quarter, who were lodged on a little riſing hill, not farre from the campe, and did earneſtly entreate them (hauing acquainted them how their affaires ſtood) to approch neare to Maran, to ioyne them-ſelues with the reſidew of the army, and to keepe backe the aid, that was comming to the towne: they were not aſhamed to refuſe it, where-vpon thoſe of the Campe being affrighted, at the report of the enemies great numbers, did in a manner all disband, vnder collour that they had not their pay.

The Campe before Maran diſtandeth.

Frangipan in the meane time, beeing come with his ſuccors, did without any difficulty enter the towne, finding no where any reſiſtance, where he tooke without delay part of the Almaines, who lay there in garriſon, and ioyning them with his ſoldiers they made a good troope, with which hee went on a ſodaine, and aſſayled the remnant of the Venetians campe, who little expected it, ſo as with eaſe hee did put them to rout, who thinking on nothing but how to eſcape, forſooke their campe and their ordnance, whereby the greateſt part of them were either taken or cut in peeces.

Frangipan entreth Maran with his ſuccors.

The Venetians ouerdefeated before Maran.

Franciſco Tron Captaine of a Gally, did winne that day great reputation; who remembring the Venetian glory, did neuer forſake the place which hee had ſeaſed on with a few ſoldiers, vntill he ſaw the moſt part of them ſlayne, or greeuouſly hurt. Frangipan following the courſe of his victory, went on a ſodaine to Straſoda and Montfalcone, townes of the Friul, which hee finding vnfurniſhed of gariſons, did eaſily take, and committed moſt lamentable ſpoyle.

Straſoda and Montfalcon taken by Frangipan.

During this vnfortunate ſucceſſe of the Venetians warre, and the ſmall hope they had that the French King would that yeare ſend an army into Italy a greeuous fire hapned in Venice in the night, in the beginning of the yeare, 1514. on the bridge of the Rialto, which being driuen forward by the North-windes did ſo runne on, as no dilligence or humaine labour could for a long time quench it: it burned the moſt inhabited and welthieſt part of the Citty.

A great fier in Venice.

The Pope at the ſame time, being deſirous to attone the Emperor and the Venetians, did in his owne perſon cauſe a new compromiſe to bee made, with ample & vnlimited power, whervpon by a breefe he commanded both parties to ſurceaſe their armes, which was not very wel obſerued by the Spaniards and Almans, becauſe the Spaniards in the meane time did ſpoyle the whole country neere to Eſte, and the Viceroy ſent to take Vincenza, becauſe hee would be found to bee poſſeſſed thereof at ſuch time as the ſentence ſhould bee giuen. Frangipan on the other ſide, hauing done great harme in the Friull (as hath beene ſaid) began to ſcoure the whole country, the like did the Almans vnder the command of the Captaines Riſſan, and Calepine: who ſeperating them-ſelues, Calapine came afterwards to Feltre, which he tooke by aſſault, where ſtaying three daies, hee was expulſed by Iohn Brandolino, who marching to the recouery thereof by the commandment of Ieromino Piſare the prouidator, with ſtrong troopes gathered together from Valmarino, and with his light cauallery, enforced the enemies, who were daunted at his ſodaine arriuall, to abandon the Citty, and to ſeeke meanes to eſcape by flight.

A new compromiſe in the Popes perſon concerning the ſtriſe betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians.

The Almans take Feltre.

Calepine with the greateſt part of his ſoldiers retired to Baſſan, where not ſtanding on his garde he was aſſailed a new by Francio Duoda, Gouernor of the country for the Venetians, hauing called to his aide Bernardino Antignole with his light horſe, and Calepine being ſurprized in that place was taken priſoner, and three hundred of his foot were ſlaine. But Riſſan with eight hundred foot and three three hundred horſe, hauing taken the way of Goritia, met with Frangipan as he returned, and hauing vnited their forces together, and by that meanes beeing to the number of fiue thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, they reſolued to aſſaile Vdina. The Senate hauing intelligence thereof, ſent Malateſte Sogliane and Iohn Vitturi thither, the one to cõmand the army, and the other to be Prouidator, with ſixe hundred horſe and two thouſand foot: Icronimo Sauorgnane was there already with two thouſand men of the country, where after long conſultation, whether it were beſt to tarry there for the enemy, or by croſſing the Riuer Liuenſa to goe vnto ſome ſafer place: at the laſt it was concluded vpon the aduice of the inhabitants concerning the commodities and diſcommodities of that place, to quit and abandon it, and to retire elſe-where beyond the Riuer: the which was ſpeedily done, for feare leaſt the enemies preuenting them, their paſſage might be ſtopt: Sauorgnane retired to Oſof, a place of his owne, to keepe and defend it from the enemies.

The City of Vdina abandoned to the enemies.

Vdina being thus abandoned did yeeld at the enemies firſt ſummons their liues and goods being ſaued, on condition to pay a thouſand crownes to the army to auoide the ſack of their City: The like did Ciuidale Port Gruera, and ſome others. But the enemy finding no victuals in that Prouince wherewith to feed the army, after they had waſted and ſpoiled it, were deſirous to march towards Treuiſo, to ioyne with the Spaniſh Infantery, which lay on the Paduan and Vincentyne territories, to the end that being vnited, they might execute ſome notable enterpriſe. But one only matter delayed their deſeigne; which was, not to leaue the fort of Oſof behind them, the which was able to ſtop their victuals, and aide, comming forth of Germany. Therefore they reſolued to aſſaile it before they went on any farther; and that which induced Frangipan to doe ſo, was the hope hee had to take it, as he had done the caſtle of Chiuſe, ſtrong by ſytuation, the which the ſouldiers that kept it, had yeelded vpon the only ſight of the enemies, without feare of reproach, ſo as Oſof being taken, there was nothing that could ſtop their victuals or reliefe from Germany, or hinder them from conquering the whole country of Friul.

But Sauorgnane truſting to the ſytuation of the place, and to the valour and courage of his ſoldiers, al-be-it he had but an hundred foot, and foure ſcore croſbowes on horſe-backe, with ſome few peaſants, did hope to keepe and defend it in deſpight of all the enemies attempts.

Oſof beſeeged by the Almains.

The Almains then comming to encampe before Oſof, ſeated on the top of a ſteepe mountaine, did batter it with their ordnance, and gaue diuers aſſaults to it in vaine, which made them reſolue to winne it by a long ſeege, hauing intelligence that they within it wanted water; but God prouided for them, for at the ſame time there fell great ſtore of raine, wherewith they were aboundantly releeued. In regard whereof the enemies renued the aſſault, but all in vaine, ſo as deſpayring to take it, either by aſſault or by long ſeege, they raiſed their campe.

The enemies diſcampe from before Oſof.

Whileſt theſe things were done in the Friuil, the Venetians affaires, although they were not very peaceable in Lombardy, did neuertheleſſe ſucceed more proſperouſly, where Rance de Cera commanding Crema for the Venetians, did performe ſundry notable exploits, notwithſtanding that the Spaniards and Sforzas forces were encamped before the towne. Theſe things did greatly diſpleaſe the Pope, who as a deputed arbitrator ſought to bring them to accord, but he could find no meanes of agreement, which might content both parties, by reaſon that by the frequent alteration of matters, hopes changing according to the ſucceſſe thereof, it happened that when the Emperour had giuen his conſent to quit Vincenza, reſeruing Verona for himſelfe, the Venetians refuſed it, vnleſſe they might be repoſſeſſed of Verona: and then when the Venetians beeing deiected, were ſatisfied onely with Vincenza, the Emperour would haue both or none.

Rance de Cera his braue exploits.

Difficulties in the agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians.

The

The Pope being wearied with these difficulties, al-be-it he doubted that his declaration would not be accepted, was desirous neuertheless (to shew that it was not his fault) to pronounce his sentence, after this manner: That the Emperour should commit Vincenza into his hands in deposito, and all that which the Spaniards and himselfe did possesse on the Paduan and Treuisan territories: That the Venetians should doe the like by Crema. That as for other matters, each partie should hold those possessions they enioyed, till the declaration which he pretended to make within a yeere, of the conditions of the peace, but that in the meane time, armes should bee laied downe on both sides: That each of them within a month should ratifie that sentence, and that the Venetians in ratifying it, should pay vnto the Emperor fiue and twenty thousand Ducats, and within three months after, other fiue and twenty thousand: And if each of them did not ratifie it, the sentence should be of no validity.

The Popes arbitrative sentence.

After this maner he gaue iudgement, because he would not discontent any of the parties: but this sentence came to nothing, by reason that the Venetians would not ratifie it: for their desire was to haue had the conditions of peace pronounced at the same time. Therefore they returned to armes, and determined to recouer the Friull, whereupon they sent Aluiana thither for that purpose, with two hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horse, and seuen hundred foot, who marching on the high way of Portonone, where part of the Almains lay, his light horse which scoured before, met with captaine Rissan, the Almain, without the towne (of whom wee haue heretofore spoken) with two hundred men at armes and three hundred light horse, and comming to handy-stroakes with them, they had beene repulsed, had not Aluiana arriued with the rest of his forces, whereupon beganne a furious fight, the issue whereof was at the beginning doubtfull, vntill that captaine Rissan being hurt in the face, was taken by Malateste Sogliane: for then his forces being broken, escaped into Portonone, and despayring of being able to hold it, did speedily forsake it, and betooke themselues to flight, whereby the City was wholy spoiled, and diuers people of the country were slaine.

The Venetians refuse to ratifie it.

The Almains defeated by the Venetians.

Aluiana at his departure thence, tooke the way of Osof, which Frangipan had againe beseeged with the other part of the Almaines, who hauing intelligence of Aluianas approach, did soone dislodge, hauing raced the fortes which he had built there abouts, taking his iourney towards Germany, but the Venetian light horse charging him on the taile, he lost his baggage and artillery: By meanes whereof the whole country in a manner returning to the Venetians obedience, Aluiana hauing attempted in vaine to take Goritia, returned forthwith to Padua with his forces.

Frangipan said that the same disorder was no fault of his, but that being ill disposed of his person, by reason of a blow on the head with a stone which hee had receiued at Osof, he could not prouide for that which was necessary for the safe retreate of his army: But being afterwards healed, and running vp & downe the neighbour mountaines to stirre vp new troubles, and to leauy new forces, he fell into an Ambuscado, laied for him by Iohn Vitturi, where he was taken and brought to Venice: A man indeed very haughty and cruell, and a great enemy to the Venetians, and who by his ordinary incursions had for a long time greatly molested the country of Friull. In regard of this fortunate successe, wherein Sauorgnanes aide did greatly preuaile, his fame and reputation was much encreased, whereupon the Senate for his deserts, created him Earle of Belgrado and Osof, for himselfe and his heires, to the end that the memory of his valour might be knowne to posterity, with foure hundred Ducats of yeerely reuenue forth of the publike treasury.

Frangipan is taken by the Venetians.

The Senate recompenceth Sauorgnane.

Now to returne to Aluiana, the number of the Almains being encreased by his departure, they tooke againe Cremona & Montfalcon, & enforced the Venetians to remoue their seege from before Maran, for the Venetians hauing intelligence that that ſupplies arriued, diſlodged thence and retired in great haſt. Such alterations often happened in the country of Friull, in regard of the Almains neighbour-hood, who after they had robbed and ſpoiled, ſo ſoone as they had any notice of the comming on of the Venetians forces (with whom diuers of the country ioyned) they forth with retired home, and then returned, as occaſion was offered.

The meanes which the Senate vſed to get money.

The Venetians in the meane time, perceiuing that all hope of agreement was taken from them, and that the warre was to be continued, beganne to thinke on meanes how to get money, their treaſure being wholy exhauſted. All the magiſtrates were aſſembled to this end, to conſult in what manner they might raiſe money for the expences of the warre. Diuers meanes were propounded in the Senate, and debated with ſundry opinions. At the laſt they reſolued to make a generall taxation, whereof the higheſt ſhould not amount to aboue three hundred crownes: and to this end, three perſons were choſen to make this rate, according to the abillity and authority of euery man, prouided that it did not exceed (as hath beene ſaid) the ſumme of three hundred crownes for one houſe. By meanes whereof in ſhort ſpace great ſummes of money were raiſed to pay the army: For the goods of thoſe men that refuſed to pay what they were rated at, were iudged to be confiſcate to the publike treaſury.

The end of the firſt Booke of the fifth Decade.

The

The Contents of the ſecond Booke of the fifth Decade.

THe Venetians beſeege Maran, and forth-with raiſe their campe. The defeate and taking of Vitturi the Prouidator. Bergamo is taken by Rance de Cera, and ſoone recouered by the Spaniards. The Venetians take Frangipan. The Venetians recouer Vincenza. The victory of Selim againſt Iſmael. Soliman entreth Hungary. The Croiſado publiſhed in Hungary againſt the Turkes. Pope Leo his meanes to ioyne the Venetians with the Emperour and the Spaniards, and to diſunite them from France. The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the French King, and to the King of England. The death of King Lewis the twelfth. Francis the firſt, Duke of Angouleſme, ſucceedeth him. The new King confirmeth the league with the Venetians. The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the Pope to draw him to their ſide. What the Pope did againſt the Venetians. A league contracted betwixt the Emperour, the King of Arragon, the Duke of Milan, and the Swiſſes againſt the French King. The viceroy of Naples his enterprize on Vincenza, and the aide which Aluiana brought thither. The Swiſſes great gard at the foot of the Alpes againſt the French. The French paſſe into Piedmont by the hill of Argentire. Proſpero Colonna is taken by the French. Agreement betwixt the King and the Swiſſes contracted and broken all in one day. The battaile betwixt the King and them at Marignan. The Swiſſes ſoft retreate towards Milan.

The

The Second Booke of the fifth Decade of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

ALVIANA being returned from Friul (as hath beene ſaid) the Venetians were of opinion by the ſoliciting of Sauorgnano, to renue their enterprize vpon Maran, the whole charge thereof was committed vnto him. He according to his commiſſion hauing leauied two thouſand men of the country, and foure hundred of the beſt ſouldiers from Vdina, went with his forces and encamped before Maran. Iohn Vitturi Generall of the light horſe, and Iohn Paul Manfron captaine of the men at armes, did by the Senates appointment meete him there with their Cauallery, to the end that the enterpriſe might be executed with more aſſurance and reputation. Sauorgnane at his arriuall ſeized on a ſtrong place not farre from the walles of the City, and there encamped, cauſing great trenches to bee made, to the end the ſouldiers beeing the better defended, might in more ſafety march to the walles. And becauſe the ſytuation of the place was not commodious for them, by reaſon the ground was very low, and boggy, he by his induſtry and dilligence ouercame the diſcommodity of the place, by making plat-formes and bulwarkes of ſundry ſubſtances, for two purpoſes, the one for that they ſhould ſerue for a ſafe retreat to his ſouldiers, if ſo be the enemy ſhould make any ſodaine ſally; and the other, that his ſouldiers comming to the aſſault, ſhould be as high mounted as the enemies on their walles.

The Venetians beſeege Maran.

All things being in a readineſſe for the aſſault, and ſome ſouldiers being already marched thither, certaine captaines, who at the firſt were not of opinion to giue an aſſault made a ſtand, by reaſon of ſome encomberance of water which they found ſome-what high, which cauſed them for that time to deferre that which had beene determined: In the meane time letters came from the Senate to Sauorgnane and to the chiefe of the army, which imported, that the Senates meaning was, to haue them vſe meanes to take that towne rather by a long ſeege, then by aſſault, becauſe the Senators feared (as the experience of what had formerly happened in the ſelfe ſame enterprife had made them wiſe) that beeing deceiued through the hope of the Authors of the ſeege, the enemies comming on a ſodaine to paſſe thorow their campe, the army might receiue ſome notable loſſe: As alſo, for that to aſſaile that towne ſo often in vaine did greatly diminiſh their reputation. Herevpon, they reſolued, according to the Senates direction, to encampe only before it, and not to aſſaile it, ſetting vp diuers tents and lodging-places, to ſhut in the towne more ſtraightly, and to keepe all victuals from being brought vnto it.

The Senates intent is not to giue an aſſault.

But whileſt they ſpent the time thus vnproffitably, they gaue the enemy leiſure to aſſemble his troupes, and to re-enforce themſelues for the reliefe of the beſeeged. Thoſe of the campe hauing notice that the Alinains had for this purpoſe gathered together great numbers of horſe and foot, and that diuers peaſants of the neighbour villages were gonne to Gradiſca to come ſpeedily to aſſaile them, them, they reſolued preſently to raiſe their ſeege, and to retire to Vdina and Ciuitella.

The enemies ſo ſoone as the Venetians had raiſed their campe, did ſupply Maran with victuals and ſouldiers: by meanes whereof thoſe within it being growne ſtronger and more audacious ſcoured the country round about. The Senate being much diſcontented with theſe incurſions, and fearing if it were not ſpeedily remedied ſome greater harme might enſue thereby, commanded the Knight La Volpe, Generall of the light horſe men, to goe with two hundred horſe into Friul to reſtraine the enemies courſes: Petro Marcello was commanded to doe the like who had beene ſent Prouidator to the campe: But before they could arriue there, the poore country men had endured much miſery.

Vitturi the Prouidator is defeated and taken.

Vitturi the Prouidator retiring with a hundred Albaneſe horſe-men to a place of weake defence, was aſſailed by the enemies, where after he had valiantly defended himſelfe, being hurt, and his ſouldiers forſaking him, he was taken priſoner, all his ſouldiers were either taken or cut in peeces. At the ſame time Rance de Cera, who lay in Crema, diſpayring almoſt of being able to keepe the towne, in regard of the great want of victuals in it, and of the terrible plague, as alſo for that the ſouldiers wanted diuers monthes pay, did (vnlooked for) aſſaile Siluio Sauella, as he came from Milan, who had with him two hundred men at armes, a hundred light horſe, and fifteene hundred foot, whom hee did forth-with put to rout, ſo as Sauello fled to Lodi with fifty men at armes only; whervpon, the Venetians did re-victual Crema the ſecond time, & Count Nicolo Scoto manned it with fifteene hundred foot.

Rance de Cera putteth Siluio Sauello to rout.

Bergamo taken and ſoone loſt.

Rance being encouraged by theſe ſupplies, did within a while after enter into Bergamo, whither thoſe of the City had ſent for him, and the Spaniards that lay there fled to La Chappella. The viceroy and Proſpero Colonna being awakened with the loſſe of Bergamo, aſſembled the Spaniſh companies, with thoſe of the Duke of Milan, and went to encampe before it with fiue thouſand foot ioyned to the Spaniſh and the Duke of Milans forces, where hauing planted the artillery againſt Saint Catherins gate, and made a breach, Rance who was in the city perceiuing that it was impoſſible to keepe it, left it to their diſcretion, and capitulated for himſelfe and his ſouldiers, that they might depart thence with their liues and goods, without ſound of drum or trumpet, and their enſeignes foulded vp.

Whileſt theſe things were done at Crema and Bergamo, Aluiana hauing much importuned the Senate, that he might come forth of Padua with his forces, was permitted to doe ſo, to the end he might reſtraine the Spaniards, who although peace was treated of, did not ceaſe to waſte and ſpoile euery where: wherevpon at his comming forth, hee made a very notable enterprize, full of wonderfull ſpeed and induſtry vpon the City of Rouigo, where lay aboue two hundred Spaniſh men at armes, who thought themſelues ſafe there, becauſe the Riuer Adicé was betwixt them and the Venetian companies: for at ſuch time as they thought not of him, he caſt a bridge neere to the towne of Anguilare, and with one company without baggage, he croſt the Riuer, and being come to the towne, whereof one of the gates was ſeized by a hundred foot, clothed like peaſants, whom he had ſent before vnder collour that it was market-day, he entred it, and tooke all the men at armes priſoners whom he found there.

Aluiana taketh Rouigo.

This exploit cauſed all the other Spaniards that were lodged in the Polleſſin, to abandon it, and Legnaga likewiſe and to retire to Ferrara. Aluiana after the taking of Rouigo being come to Oppian neere to Legnaga, meaning to haue gon to Verona, hauing intelligence that the Spaniſh army had recouered Bergamo, and was returning towards Verona, he reſolued not to tarry there, and therefore he ſent the companies of men at armes by land to Padua, and he went thither by night by the Riuer Adicé, with the Infantery, the baggage, and the ordnance, to auoide the great wet and mire, and not without feare of beeing aſſailed by the enemies, enemies, who were kept backe by the waters which were riſen very high; then comming on ſhoare he ſpeedily went into Padua whether the men at armes were come two daies before. The Senate vpon the report of this braue exploite vpon Rouigo, did receiue great contentation, hoping ſtill for better fortune hereafter, and wrote letters to Aluiana full of congratulation, ſaying that he had truly manifeſted his valour and martiall experience, together with the good will which he did beare to the Republike.

Aluiana retireth to Padua.

The ſame yeere, the country of Friul was in more quiet then of a long time before, by reaſon of the taking of captaine Frangipan, who had moleſted it more then any other: wherevpon, the Venetians knowing how much it did import them ſtill to detaine him, refuſed to exchange him for Iohn Paul Baillon. At the ſame time likewiſe Rance de Cera being returned to Crema, and finding there great want of all things, did of his owne authority without communicating it to the Senate, make truce with the enemy for ſixe monthes: then, leauing Giouan Antonio Vrſin in the City, with fiue hundred foot, and as many horſe for the gard thereof, he went with the reſidue of his forces to Padua, and from thence himſelfe went to Venice, to giue them an account of what had paſt at Bergamo and Crema, and alſo to conſult with them of what was needfull to bee done. Hee was honourably entertained: and becauſe hee had in former time refuſed the place of Generall of their army, no greater honour beeing at that preſent vacant, the Senate gaue him the towne and caſtle of Martinenga with all the reuenue thereof.

The country of Friul at quiet by meanes of the taking of Frangipan.

The Venetians giue great entertainment to Rance de Cera.

The viceroy and Proſpero Colonno being croſſed in their deſeignes, by reaſon of Aluiana his retreat to Padua, hauing ſent their forces into Garriſon in the Polleſin of Rouigo, they went to Iſpruch, to conſult with the Emperour what was to be done.

Whileſt fortune ſhewed her ſelfe ſo variable and inconſtant to the Venetians, the City of Vincenza, which was reduced vnder their gouernment, was kept with a ſmall garriſon, notwithſtanding that diuers of the enemies troupes lay round about it: for it continued ſtill in the fidelity and deuotion of the common-wealth, chiefly by the meanes and dilligence of certaine Citizens, who hauing gathered together great numbers of people of the territory neere adioyning, did keepe it alwaies well furniſhed and prouided of all neceſſaries: ſo as Nicolo Paſcalic the Cities Magiſtrate, reſoluing in regard of the ſmall number of defendants which was in it at the beginning, to abandon it, did take new courage, and did ſo well exhort all the inhabitants to the defenſe thereof, as the enemies durſt neuer come againe to beſeege it.

In theſe petty exploits of warre, and with an vncertaine hope of peace, the Sommer of that yeere was ſpent for the affaires of Italy. But Aſia produced greater enterprizes; for Selim marching into Perſia (as hath beene ſaid) and meeting with Iſmaels army, fought with him, of whom he gate a glorious victory, chiefly by meanes of his artillery, the vſe whereof was then vnknowne to the Perſians. In regard wherof the great dangers were plainly diſcerned which threatned other Realmes and Prouinces, by reaſon of Selims fierce and haughty courage, who for this fortunate ſucceſſe was become more proud and inſolent. And that which did moſt manifeſt it, was, that at the ſame time that hee made warre in Perſia, Soliman his ſonne entring Hungary, did ſpoile the country with great numbers of horſe, and had already taken diuers townes.

Selims victory againſt Iſmael.

Soliman entreth Hungary.

The Pope was deſirous to remedy it, and cauſed great leauies of ſouldiers to be made in Hungary, who tooke for their badge a red croſſe, calling themſelues the Croſſed, taking armes for the defence of Chriſtian religion againſt the Infidels. But this leauy of ſouldiers, which were thought would haue aided and releeued the King of Hungary, did in a manner ruyne him: for, weapons beeing put

A Croizado in Hungary againſt the Turkes.

The great harme with the Croizade did to Hungary.

put into the hands of the peaſants of that country, who are deadly enemies to the Nobility, they committed infinite riots, and threw the Realme head-long into greater dangers: wherewith the Pope beeing troubled, turned all his thoughts to the peace of Italy, and for that purpoſe, he ſent to Venice Petro Bembo, his Secretary, a Venetian Gentleman, who beeing come thither, ſpake to the Senate in this manner.

The Oration of the Popes Nuncio to the Senate

„ That Pope Leo his affection towards the Republike had euer beene ſound:
„ That he was ſtill greeued by their loſſes and afflictions, as the care which he hath „ had of them, might largely witneſſe: Beſides there was nothing more ſure, then „ that his whole deſeignes and ayme did euer tend to peace, and if hee had at any „ time taken armes, it was of neceſſity and by conſtraint. That hee had euer em„ braced their common-wealth with a fatherly loue, and had neuer ceaſſed to ex„ hort, admoniſh and entreat them to fit themſelues to the time: by which offices
„ he thought that he had ſufficiently diſcharged his duty, and perceiuing that all
„ which he had done was to no purpoſe, he had determined to giue ouer the buſi-„ neſſe, and no more to talke of peace, wherein hee had ſo often laboured in vaine.
„ Yet neuertheleſſe hauing of late changed his minde, and compared the time pre„ ſent, with the antient affection which he had borne to the Republike, he had now „ ſent him to them, to exhort them in his name, to reſpect their owne liberty and „ the ſafety of all Italy, and to embrace the beſt and wholeſommeſt councell: They „ ſhould doe well to conſider the manner of the French proceedings, their great „ deſire to command, and their immeaſurable cruelty towards the vanquiſhed.
„ That King Lewis his great deſire to recouer the Dutchy of Milan, was only af„ terward to make himſelfe Maſter of all Italy. For, hauing once ouercome Maxi- „ millian Sforza, and wholy expulſed him from his fathers ſtate, hee beleeued that
„ the way would bee eaſily opened to him for the attayning therevnto, and for a„ buſing, by meanes of other Italians, the Venetians liberty: whereas they had in „ time paſt made alliance with the French, enforced therevnto by great neceſſity, „ they had done well, in reſpect of thoſe times: But now to bee allied with „ them was moſt dangerous, in regard, that thinking to aſſure themſelues, it was to „ be feared, that they would precipitate their common-wealth into ruine, by the „ friendſhip of the French, which is not wont to laſt long, and therefore it were bet„ ter to haue them farre off then nere at hand: That diuers recent examples might „ teach them the fidelity and conſtancy of that Nation, who had forſaken the King
„ of Nauarre, being driuen forth of his Realme for their ſeruice, and becauſe hee
„ would not abandon their friendſhip, with many others likewiſe who had well de„ ſerued of the Realme of France, towards whom they haue vſed the like ingrati„ tude: and therefore they were not to hope, ſince they had beene forgetfull of „ their neighbours, that they would prooue more louing to the Venetians, who are „ ſtrangers: and namely that the French had ſworne the totall ruine of their Re-
„ publike, at ſuch time chiefly as they had receiued infinite benefits of the Veneti-
„ ans, and had beene in no ſort offended by them, and that they might with honour „ haue compounded with the Emperor. They ſhould doe well then to reſolue, to „ keepe the French armies farre from Italy: That it was againſt reaſon to beleeue,
„ that the French hauing conquered the ſtate of Milan, would conteine themſelues
„ within their bounds, & not fly out vpon other mens confines. That the Venetians „ being wearied with ſo many wars, ought henceforth to embrace peace, & quiet, to „ which their was nothing more contrary, thē the comming of the French into Ita„ ly, by which it was ſure to ſuſteine a cruell war: where, on the contrary, if the com„ monwealth would agree with the Almains and Spaniards, & with al the Potentats
„ of Italy, to expel the French; the only report of that alliance would be ſufficient to „ make them to lay down their armes, & to change their preſent purpoſe to repaſſe
„ the mounts and to come into Italy, which by that meanes might become quiet
„ and peaceable. But if yee ſhall contemne this councell, the Pope will take God

and

and men to witneſſe, that he hath in no ſort beene wanting to the common good of Chriſtendome, and to the particular proffit of the Venetian common-wealth. That they were beſides to beleeue, that he could ere then haue embraced thoſe parties which doe now preſently offer themſelues to his aduantage, and perhaps he would accept them, by allying himſelfe with the Emperour and Spaniards, to their hinderance, of whom ſo often he hath had great care, and yet to no purpoſe. They had no need to craue any greater aſſurance of him; for the intereſt of the Sea Apoſtolike, and that of their Republike was all one, ſo as both of them ranne one ſelfe ſame fortune, being in a manner, both the one and other ſubiect to like accidents. That they were likewiſe to remember that men oftentimes are ruled by their owne particular paſſions rather then by reaſon, as then, when to be reuenged on Lewis Sforza, they threw themſelues headlong into manifeſt danger, by aſſociating for their fellow in armes, a forraine King, moſt mighty, who was to be a neighbour to their ſtate, in ſtead of a weake Prince, and their countryman. Therefore they ſhould doe well to aduiſe themſelues how to reape ſome fruit by the Popes fauor and good will, the which til then they had with great care ſought to entertaine.

With theſe or ſuch like ſpeeches Bembo executed the tenor of his commiſſion: but the Senate, (the matter hauing beene determined) thought it neither eaſie nor ſafe to allie themſelues with the Emperor and Spaniards; whereupon with a generall conſent it was concluded, to continue in the friendſhip and alliance of the French, and to make this anſwere to the Popes Ambaſſador.

The Senates' reſolution on Bembo his demand.

That his Ambaſſador was greatly pleaſing to the Senate as well in reſpect of himſelfe, whoſe vertue and particular affection towards their country was ſufficienly knowne to all men, as likewiſe in regard of the Prince that ſent him, ſeeing they had euer borne great honour and reuerence to the ſoueraigne Biſhops of Rome, and were particularly inclined to Pope Leo. That the Senate had euer highly eſteemed his good and wholeſome councell: but the miſchiefe was, that by how much, they, aboue all others, had deſired his friendſhip and alliance, in that vncertainty of all things, by ſo much more were they continually kept from it. And al-be-it their loue was neuer diſioyned from him; yet their forces were euer diuided. As then they did humbly thanke the Pope, and confeſſed themſelues much bound vnto him, in that hee had beene euer ready by diuers good offices to embrace and fauour their cauſe, euen ſo likewiſe they were extreamely grieued that they could not follow his councell, their antient cuſtome not permitting to leaue an old alliance for a new, eſpecially not being prouoked thereunto by ſome wrong, their antient fathers thinking that alone to bee profitable, which was moſt honeſt: and that therefore they could not, without great blemiſh to their reputation, breake and abandon the alliance which they had already contracted with the French. And if the Pope would call to minde the antient benifits of the French Kings, not onely to the Venetian common-wealth, but likewiſe to the Church: and to conſider the wealth and power of that Kingdome, hee would not onely excuſe, but commend the Venetians councell, and bee deſirous himſelfe to follow it, becauſe that beeing backed by the French forces and thoſe of the Venetians, there was likelihood that he ſhould be able to lay ſurer foundations, as well for the ſtate of the Church, as for the greatneſſe and aduancement of his owne houſe.

The Prince his anſwere to the Popes Nuncio.

This ſpeech beeing pronounced by Prince Lauretan, they made priuate remonſtrance to Bembo, how the Senate did greatly ſuſpect, that vnder that treaty of peace ſome deceit might lurke, in regard it was practized by the Emperor & by Ferdinand, being aſſured that vnder collour of agreement, they wold, as at diuers other times, practize ſome dangerous warre on the Venetians: becauſe that at the ſame time as the Spaniſh Ambaſſadour delt with the French King cõcerning the affaires of Italy, Ferdinand had reuiued this treaty of peace, to none other end but to cauſe the French King to ſuſpect the Venetians friendſhip, and thereby to ſeparate himſelfe from them, the better afterwards to enforce them to agree with him, to his owne great aduantage: and that the ſame comming to paſſe, the Venetians being ſo diuided from the French, what ſhould hinder Ferdinand to make himſelfe maſter, and quiet poſſeſſor of all Italy, as long time before then, he had aſpired thereunto.

The Senates ſuſpition priuately declared to Bembo.

To what intent the Spaniard ſpake to the Venetians of peace.

Bembo being returned to Rome, reported all this to the Pope: but before he left Venice, he aſſured the Venetians, that the Pope would neuer ſuffer any man to attempt againſt their State, knowing very well that on them depended the liberty of Italy, and that he was to rely on them for the greatneſſe and maintenance of the houſe of Medicis. The Venetians made declarations that they did not greatly care for that agreement, for thereby they ſhould be depriued of the richeſt and goodlieſt city belonging to their ſtate, which was Verona: and that which maintained them therein was, the hope which they had that the French King would ſhortly come into Italy. For King Lewis being prouoked with a deſire to recouer the Dutchy of Milan, had made peace with Henry King of England, and made preparations to repaſſe the mounts, and to come into Lombardy with a mighty army, whereunto the Venetians being ioyned, they hoped with eaſe to chace their enemies from their bounds and confines.

The Venetians hope on the French King.

This hope cauſed them to ſend Ambaſſadors to the French King, and to the King of England their friends, for to continue them ſtill in their affection towards them, and to this end were appointed Franciſco Donato, and Petro Paſchalic, but in Donato his ſtead, who fell ſicke, Sebaſtian Iuſtinian was ſent thither.

The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the French King and the King of England.

Their chiefe commiſſion was to congratulate both of them for the peace and alliance contracted betwixt them (King Lewis hauing married King Henries ſiſter) and to thanke them, for that in the treaty of agreement made betwixt them, they had therein comprehended the Venetians, by name, as their friends and confederates.

That they ſhould moreouer aſſure the French King that the Senate did beare the ſame loue towards him as it had done in times paſt, determining to preferre his friendſhip before any others, reſoluing to renue the warre, if he ſo pleaſed, and that to that end they ſhould councell him to returne ſpeedily into Italy, where he ſhould find the Venetian forces ready to ioyne with his. Now whileſt theſe Ambaſſadors were on their way, King Lewis, died: for as hee ouer ardently tooke his pleaſure on the excellent beauty of his new wife, who was not aboue eighteene yeeres old, not remembring his age nor the weakeneſſe of his complexion, he was taken with a feuer, beſide which, being troubled with a continuall flixe, hee ſoone departed out of this preſent life, and made the firſt day of the yeere 1515. famous by his death. It was thought that his death would haue bread great alterations. Yet for all that they did not call backe the Ambaſſadours, but commanding them to goe forward on their iourney, they were enioyned to ſtay at a certaine place, to expect a new commiſſion from the Senate. King Lewis was a luſt Prince, and welbeloued of his ſubiects; who neither before that hee was King, nor afterward did euer finde either bad or good fortune firme and conſtant to him.

The death of Lewis the 12. French King.

The ioy which they had of King Lewis his death, who deſired not the returne of the French into Italy, laſted not long. For Francis Duke of Angouleſme ſucceeded Lewis the twelfth, as the next in ligne Maſculine of the Royal bloud, and of the very race of the Dukes of Orleance, whoſe vertues and magnanimity was admired of all men, who with the title of French King did likewiſe take that of Duke of Milan, as belonging vnto him, not only by the antient claime of the Dukes of Orleance, but as being comprized in the inueſtiture which the Emperour made, according to the treaty of Cambray: and beſides, he had the ſame deſire to recouer it, as his predeceſſor had: The which he neuertheleſſe diſſembled bled for the preſent, ſeeking firſt of all to practize the friendſhip of other Princes, diuers of whoſe Ambaſſadors came forth-with to him, whom hee graciouſly receiued, and among others, thoſe of the Venetians hauing had new commiſſions ſent vnto them to Lyons where they ſtaied: with whom he confirmed the league in the ſame forme as it had beene made with his predeceſſor, and he cauſed the Biſhop of Aſt to doe the like in his name, who being ſent to Venice by King Lewis, tarried ſtill there.

Francis Duke of Angouleſme French King.

King Francis confirmeth the league with the Venetians.

The Venetians, who already did make great account of the friendſhip of the French, and had enioyned Marco Dandulo their Ambaſſador to ſound what the new Kings minde was concerning their alliance and confederacy, were exceeding glad when they receiued his letters, and had ſeene the Biſhop of Aſt his commiſſion, praiſing his gentleneſſe, beeing deſirous to ſhew how highly they eſteemed his friendſhip, and therefore they commanded their Ambaſſadors to giue him great thankes, for the loue which he ſeemed to beare to their Republike, and his deſire to aide and ſuccour them, promiſing him to employ themſelues with like affection in ought that ſhould concerne his ſeruice, and would vſe meanes that the French might againe hold ſome dignity in Italy, to the enemies feare and terror, and to the maintenance and ſtay of the Republike their friend and confederate: They ſhould likewiſe perſwade him to haſten his iourney, and aſſure him that the chiefe point of victory conſiſted in ſpeed, and not to giue the enemies leiſure, who were now weake, to ſtrengthen themſelues; as alſo for feare leaſt the City of Crema, which did import much for the recouery of the State of Milan, ſhould incurre ſome danger, in regard it had of a long time endured many diſcommodities of warre, ſo as it was reduced to the laſt extremity, being out of hope of hauing any longer truce with the enemies, it being almoſt expired, expecting euery day when Proſpero Colonna with new forces would come againe to beſeege it. They ſhould likewiſe aſſure him, that the Senate would neuer faile of their duty, hauing already made new prouiſion of ſouldiers for the land army, of armour and munition, and giuen order to arme certaine Gallies to amuze the enemy as well by ſea as land, and that the King ſhould for his part doe the like.

The Venetian Ambaſſadors in England.

The Venetian Ambaſſadors hauing executed their commiſſion with the King in the City of Paris, went into England to finiſh the remainder of their Ambaſſage, where being curteouſly enterteined, they declared at their firſt audience the great ſorrow and griefe that the Venetians had for the death of King Lewis his brother in law, a very mighty Prince and a great friend to the Republike, then they gaue him many thankes for the great correſpondence betwixt them, for that in the concluſions of peace, as well with King Lewis, as ſince then with King Francis, he was euer deſirous that their common-wealth, as his good friend, ſhould be eſpecially named and comprized. And afterward the Ambaſſadours being in priuate with the King, did earneſtly entreate him, that it might pleaſe him by his authority to perſwade the French King, according to the deſire he had to harken to the affaires of Italy, to giue aide and ſuccour to the Venetians, and incite him to put in practize his ſaid deſire. That in the meane time the peace and alliance betwixt them might continue firme and inuiolable, from which would proceed nothing but good to both partes, and bee very commodious for all Chriſtendome.

The Ambaſſadors requeſt to the King of England.

Ambaſſadors ſent to the Archduke.

After both the Ambaſſadors had in this ſort accompliſhed their charge, Iuſtinian remained in England with King Henry, and Paſchalie returned into France to doe the like there, who beeing come to Paris receiued letters from the Senate, whereby he was commanded to goe with ſpeed into the Low countries to the Arch-duke to congratulate him for his marriage and for the peace, whereof the common-wealth was very glad, which they would haue to be ſignified to him by their Ambaſſador.

The Venetians deſirous to draw the Pope to their party.

After this manner did the Venetians ſtriue to entertaine the friendſhip and alliance of forraine Princes, fitting themſelues to the time. But their greateſt care was how to find meanes to draw the Pope to their ſide, and to ioyne him with the French, whereof they had ſome hope by reaſon that Iuliano de Medicis the Popes brother, who could doe much with his Holineſſe, had married Philiberta ſiſter to the Duke of Sauoy, and a very neere kinſewoman to the French King, by which they ſuppoſed that hee would fauour the French: and that the Pope in time to come, would more encline to them then he had hithervnto done, perceiuing that the Realme of France beeing ſtrengthened both by kindred and confederacy with England, and the Arch-duke, nothing was able to hinder King Francis from growing great in Italy, and from being feared there. Yet for all that the Pope being toſſed to and fro with his accuſtomed doubts and difficulties, had no firme or certaine reſolution, for now he tooke part with one, and anon with an other: ſometimes being vanquiſhed with feare he inclined to the friendſhip of the French, but he did oftner and more willingly diſcourſe with the Ambaſſadors of the Emperour and King Fernand, and made anſwere to the Venetians, who ſpake to him about it, that they might draw ſome thing from him, that hee would bee a looker on, and ſee what the iſſue of the warre would bee, intending to ioyne with the Conquerour. But hee did not imagin in his heart that the French King would euer paſſe into Italy, ſo as if King Francis had already paſſed the mounts with his army, yet he would not beleeue it.

The Venetians ſend an Ambaſſador to the Pope.

The Venetians beeing acquainted with his humour, ſent Marin Georgio their Ambaſſador to Rome, with expreſſe commiſſion to tell him, That he was of neceſſity to ſhew himſelfe otherwiſe then hithervnto hee had done, and to doe his beſt to alter his former opinion, and to that end he ſhould make the French Kings forces to bee very great, and giue him to vnderſtand how that ſeeing his Realme was out of daunger of forraine warres, he might without contradiction and on a ſodaine turne towards Italy, wherevnto he was much enclined in regard of his deſire to conquer the State of Milan, that there was nothing ſo hard or difficult that was able to diuert him from this deſeigne: That the Venetians had the ſame will to renue the warre, and to ioyne themſelues with the French: That they euer deſired as well in peace as warre, to be vnited to the Sea Apoſtolike, to runne the ſelfe ſame fortune with it, and had greatly laboured to haue it ſo. But not being able to obtaine it of his Holineſſe, and perceiuing the hope of the victory to be very great on the French ſide, the Venetians were reſolued not to abandon their friendſhip and aliance, thinking that by ſo doing, they had diſcreetly prouided for their affaires: The which he likewiſe ought to doe, hauing firſt maturely conſidered whatſoeuer might hinder or delay the Kings intent; and finding none at all, to preſerue by ſo doing the papall authority and Maieſty, together with the poſſeſſions of the Church: That there was but onely one remedy left in all this, which was, that the Pope would vnite himſelfe with the French and Venetians, becauſe that the Swiſſes being forſaken by his Holineſſe, and by his ſuccors, would of a certaine giue ouer the defence of Maximilian Sforza, and lay downe their armes which they had taken againſt the French, ſo as the confederates being depriued of that aide, ſhould be enforced to change their mindes: the Emperour would no more thinke on the affaires of Italy, and Fernand would ſatisfie himſelfe with his kingdome of Naples; wherevpon, others might recouer what belonged vnto them, namely the French, the State of Milan, and the Venetians thoſe Cities which had beene wrongfully taken from them, and thereby a firme and ſure peace might be eſtabliſhed.

The Ambaſſadors reuocation to the Pope.

The Popes determination againſt the Venetians.

All theſe goodly diſcourſes could ſmally preuaile with the Pope to make him alter his opinion: but on the contrary, continuing firme in his firſt determination, he thought in himſelfe that he might eaſily induce the Venetians to doe what he pleaſed. But perceiuing that to deale with them by faire and gentle meanes, he hee ſhould neuer obtaine his deſire, hee reſolued to vſe ſeuerity and rigor. Hee cauſed to be publiſhed ouer all the Churches territories, that no ſubiects or Vaſſals belonging to the holy ſea, ſhould vpon paine of moſt greeuous cenſures, beare arms vnder the Venetians pay; commanding al Captaines as wel of foot as horſe, to come with al ſpeed to the Spaniſh campe, with their ſoldiors and horſes, going about by that meanes in ſuch ſort to diminiſh the Venetians forces and reputations, as being encompaſſed with ſo many miſcheefes they ſhould be at laſt enforced to haue recourſe vnto him, and to doe his pleaſure: but the Venetians on the contrary continued firme, and conſtant in their alliance, hoping by that meanes of the French, to be able to maintaine and defend their owne ſtate.

The Popes publication againſt the Venetians.

King Francis in the meane time beganne very carefully to gather together very great ſummes of mony, and to encreaſe the ordenance of his men at armes, to the number of foure thouſand, publiſhing abroad that his meaning was not to make warre on any one, for that yeare, but onely to make head againſt the Swiſſes, who threatened to aſſaill Burgondy or Daulphinè, if ſo bee hee ſhould refuſe to fullfill the conuentions made at Dijon in the name of the late King.

King Francis his diſſimulation.

Many beleeued it, inregard of the example of ſome late kings, who would neuer incomber them ſelues with new wars the firſt yeare of their reignes: But the Emperor and the King of Arragon were of another opinion, in regard of the Kings youth, and the greate preparations of warre which King Lewis had left behinde; where-vpon becauſe they would not be taken vnprouided, they made meanes to confederate them ſelues with the Pope and the Swiſſes.

The Pope delayed it as much as he could: The Swiſſes on the contrary, whoſe heate againſt the French did not onely continue ſtill, but dayly more and more encreaſe, did ally them-ſelues with the Emperor, the King of Arragon, and the Duke of Milan for the defence of Italy, reſeruing place for the Pope to enter; wherein was concluded that the Swiſſes ſhould enuade, either Burgondy or Dauphinè, and the Catholike King with a mighty army ſhould come in by Fontaraby or Perpignan, to the end that the French King beeing aſſayled at one time, in diuers and ſundry places, might not bee able though hee would to trouble the Dutchy of Milan, but ſhould bee enforced to defend his owne countrv.

League betwixt the Emperor, the king of Arragon, the Duke of Milan and the Swiſſes.

The French Kings intent was for a time kept cloſe, vntill the greateneſſe of his preparations could by no meanes bee any longer concealed, in regard of his huge prouiſions of mony, with which hee waged very great numbers of Lancequenets; hee cauſed ſtore of Artillery to bee carried towards Lyons, and had a while before ſent Pedro of Nauarre, who was newly come to his ſeruice into Guyen to leuy ten thouſand foot on the marches of Nauarre.

The French Kings great preparation.

It being then apparant to all men, that warre was prepared for the Dutchy of Milan, and that the King determined to goe thether in perſon, he openly craued to haue the Pope to ioyne with him, as well by the meanes of Iuliano his brother who was (as hath beene already ſaid) allied to the King, as by his Ambaſſadors, to the end to be aſſured of his entent.

But the King ſoone beganne to bee out of hope, as well becauſe the Pope had graunted to the King of Arragon the Croizads of Spaine for two yeares, whereby it was thought that hee would raiſe aboue a Million of gold, as by the faire and goodly promiſes, which hee made to thoſe who pleaded for him, and yet without any reſolution at all; beſides it was wholy in vayne, for hee had already before made a very ſecret conuention with the others for the defence of the ſtrate of Milan, the which neuertheleſſe hee would not haue yet to be knowne, till ſuch time as he had found out ſome more apparant pretence, whereby he might ſay that hee had beene enforced therevnto, becauſe the King would not graunt him what hee demanded, but the King condeſcended to all his requeſt,

VVhat ſhifts the Pope vſed to declare himſelfe openly againſt the king requeſts, and notwithſtanding all this hee made diuers doubtfull and irreſolute anſwers.

Charls of Burbon conſtable of France.

The King not tarying any longer for his replies, being come to Lyons, accompanied with all the French nobillity, made Charles of Burbon Conſtable of France his Liuetenant Generall to command in the warre, if him-ſelfe went not thither in perſon, whereof hee yet doubted, promiſing to him-ſelfe the certainety of the victory by reaſon of his great forces, for hee had in his Army two thouſand Lancequenets, conducted by the Duke of Guelders, ten thouſand Baſques or Gaſcons, eight thouſand French, and three thouſand Caſtadours. For of all the enemies army there was none to bee feared but the Swiſſes, who continually came downe into the Dutchy of Milan, ſo as already more then twenty thouſand of them were there arriued, tenne thouſand of whome, being come neere to the mountaines, did vndertake to gard the ſtreight paſſages of thoſe valies againſt the French.

The number of the Kings army.

The Swiſſes determination in the ſtreights of the mountaines.

This determination of the Swiſſes did greately trouble the Kings mind, becauſe it was an hard matter, in regard of the valour of that nation, to driue them from thoſe ſtrong and narrow paſſages. The reſt of the confederates hauing left ſufficient garriſon for the defence of thoſe townes which they had fnatcht from the Venetians, were not able to leuy the one halfe of a ſtronge Army.

The Viceroy his enterpize on Vincenza.

Whileſt France made theſe preparations, vpon the report of the Kings comming into Italy, the Viceroy of Naples, who for a time had beene at truce with the Venetians in the Vincentine territory, made ſhew to bring backe his army to Verona, (as hee ſaid) to the ayd of the Duke of Milan, but it was to ſeaze on Vincenza, in regard of the fit ſeaſon that then was to make ſilke, wherewith the country doth greatly abound, hoping from thence eaſily to draw meanes to pay his army. But Aluiana being aduertized of this deſeigne, left Padua, where hee then lay, and paſſing ſpeedily on the Vincentine Territory, leading along with him ſufficient troupes to gard the Citty, and to breake the enemies enterpriſe, whereby the inhabitants had leaſure to gather their ſilkes, and to tranſport them to a place of ſafety.

Aluiana releeueth Vincenza.

That done, Aluiana, retyred towards Padua, (the Spaniſh forces dayly encreaſing,) and encamped with Rance de Cera at Brentelles, two miles diſtant from Padua, where hee taried many dayes, becauſe the Senate had willed him not to ſtirre from thence with the army before hee were certaine of the enemies purpoſe, to the end not to goe into any place, where hee might bee enforced to come to handy ſtroakes, and to tempt fortune, fearing if hee ſhould receaue any loſſe, it might happen to keepe backe King Francis, who affirmed that the cheefe hope of his deſignes depended on the Venetians, and therefore diſcourſing with their Ambaſſador reſident with him, hee did councell him that his country-men ſhould not hazard ought, before his arriuall in Italy it beeing indiſcretion to hazard the ſucceſſe of that warre on a ſmall part of thoſe forces which hee hoped would be great, being vnited together, Yet notwithſtanding, the Venetian ſoldiors made often incurſions, cheefely the light horſe, vnder the command of the Captains Mercurio Buono, and Giouan de Nalda, who did greatly moleſt the enemies, taking great Booties from them, as well from Rouigo, as on the Veronois.

The Venetians incurſion on the enemies.

In this ſort did the two Armies, Venetian and Spaniſh, behaue them-ſelues for a certaine time, without any other attempts, ſtill expecting newes of the French army, who leauing the realme freed from the feare of warre, were ready to paſſe the mounts.

The paſſages of Suza, Pegnerolles, and Saluſſes garded by the Swiſſes.

For neither the Spaniards nor Swiſſes, did euer goe according to their treaty of Confederacy, the one to enuade Burgondy, and the other the confines neere to Spaine, but the Swiſſes went and encamped at Suze, Pigneroll and Saluſſes, to ſtop the entry of the French into Piedmont, and the Spaniards kept kept himſelfe in Lombardy with the Popes troopes, of whom Iuliano de medicis, his brother, was Generall.

The French then marched forewards on the fifteenth day of Iuly towards the Alpes, and being come to Grenoble they were enforced to make ſome ſtay there to reſolue vpon their way they were to hold, for all the waies were ſo difficult, as well in regard of the nature of the places, as for the gard in them, that it was impoſſible to paſſe without danger if they would goe the ordinary high way which leadeth into Italy by Piedmont, the Suiſſes keeping the narrow paſſages of the mountaines, but there was another way betwixt the ſea and Coctian Alpes, deſcending towards the Marquiſate of Saluſſes, by which they might carry their ordnance beyond the mounts, not without wonderfull difficulty, becauſe they could not do it but by the ſtrength of men and engins.

The King reſoluing wholly to paſſe on howſoeuer, would needs goe directly ouer the Alpes, whereby the French in three dayes came to the hill of Argentire, where taking the way on the left hand, and ouercomming all the bad wayes, they came on the fourth day vpon the confines of the Marquiſate of Saluſſes, without any ſtop at all, becauſe no man would euer haue thought that it had beene poſſible to bring the Artillery ouer ſuch ſteepe and ſharpe mountaines, and the Suiſſes being lodged at Suza were ready to gard the waies by which they muſt paſſe which commeth downe by mount Senis, or mont Geneura, or the hills neere thereunto. But they hauing intelligence that the French had paſſed by an other way, being amazed thereat, forſooke thoſe paſſages and retired to Nouara: which gaue hope to the French to be ſoone able to end that warre, and without any great bloodſhed to conquer the State of Milan, knowing that the Suiſſes are by nature light-headed, ſeditious, mutenous, and deſirous of nouelty, and aboue all thinges, very couetous to get money: by which meanes the King thought ſodainly to winne them.

The French paſſe into Piedmont by Argentire.

The Suiſſes retire to Nouara.

Great promiſes of ſommes of money were made to diuers of the cheefeſt of them if they would preferre the certaine offer that was made them before their firſt heate of warre, and not hazard the vncertainty of a Battaile. Wherevpon they were deſirous to returne home, and in a brauery demanding their pay, they forſooke their Enſignes, and refuſed to obey the commandements of their Generall and other their Captaines, alledging for excuſe of their alteration, that the affaires of the French at their entry into Italy, had proſperouſly ſucceeded: and how on the contrary, whatſoeuer the Suiſſes had vndertaken, had redounded to their ſhame and loſſe, and therefore they were minded to depart, and no longer to draw out the warre at length.

The French in the meane time hauing paſſed the mounts, the Lord La Paliſſe came ſpeedily with foure Cornets of light horſe, beeing lead by people of the Countrey to Villa Franca, (a towne ſeauen miles diſtant from Saluſſes, where Proſpero Colonna with his company was lodged, not doubting any thing, by reaſon of the great diſtance of the enemies,) from whence ſome ſaid, that he would depart the ſame day, to ioyne with the Suiſſes. It is neuertheleſſe certaine that he ſate at meate, and dined at ſuch time as La Paliſſe his ſouldiers arriued, who were not deſcryed by any before they came neere the houſe, becauſe thoſe of the towne, with whom La Paliſſe had intelligence, concerning that great booty, had already ſecretly agreed to keepe themſelues very quiet, and had ſeazed on the ſcoutes and Sentinels. Proſpero Colonna that famous Captaine was thus taken priſoner, and Petro Margare the Romaine with him, others at the firſt noyce ſaued themſelues and eſcaped by flight.

Proſpero Colonna taken priſoner by the lord La Paliſſe.

The paſſage of the French, and the taking of Proſpero Colonna, did change all mens mindes, and altogether the whole ſtate of the affaires, cauſing new alteration in the mindes of the Pope, the viceroy of Naples and the Suiſſes. For the Pope perceiuing that the King had paſſed contrary to his hope, and that Proſpero Colonna

The Pope amazed at the Kings paſſage and the taking of Proſpero Colonna.

Colonna was taken priſoner, in whome hee cheefely truſted, hee commanded his Nephew Lorenzo, Generall to the Florentines in ſted of his brother Iulian, who lay ſicke at Florence, to proceed ſlowly: then hee ſecretly diſpatcht Cintio his familliar friend to the French King, to excuſe him for what had paſſed, and to begin to treate with him, if ſo bee it ſhould fall out badly for the Dutchy of Milan.

The Viceroy of Naples likewiſe carried him-ſelſe other-wiſe then he had done. For remayning ſtill at Verona, expecting meanes to cauſe his ſoldiours to march, and new companies promiſed by the Emperor to leaue in Verona and Breſſia, he with theſe excuſes began to deferre his departure, becauſe he would firſt ſee what would become of the Dutchy of Milan.

The Swiſſes begin to treate of agreement with the King.

The Swiſſes in like manner beeing amazed at the Kings paſſage came on a ſodaine to Pignarol and from thence to Nouara (as hath beene ſaid) where they beganne to treate of agreement with the King. In the meane time all the French troopes being reunited at Thurin, the King went to Verceill, where he ſtayed many daies, expecting what would become of the treaty with the Swiſſes, who ſhewed them-ſelues full of variety and confuſion. For they beganne to mutine in Nouara, where they lay, becauſe they had not yet receaued the mony which the King of Arragon had promiſed them, and they did perforce take the mony from the commiſſaries which the Pope had ſent them. And in this fury they departed from Nouara to returne home into their country, the which many of them did greatly deſire to doe: but they were ſcarce gon from Nouara, ere the King of Arragons mony was brought thither, whereupon being better aduiſed, they redeliuered the Popes mony, that they might receaue both the one, and the other, according to the vſuall manner, by the hands of the commiſſaries. The King perceiuing his hope of agreement with the Swiſſes to decay, by meanes of theſe Variations, and by the comming of other new companies forth of Swiſſerland, departed from Verceill intending to goe and beſeege Milan, leauing at Verceill with the Duke of Sauoy, the Dukes baſtard brother, the Lord of Lautrec, & the General of Milan to continew the treaty begun with the Swiſſes. Diuers armies were in the field, as well for defence as to aſſail, but in ſuch manner, as they were ſeperated in ſoundry places, not being able to ioyne together, becauſe the enemies lay betweene them and home: by meanes whereof the King being deſirous to ioyne with Aluiana, departed from Bufalore, and being come with his army to Biagraſſa, whileſt hee ſtayed there the Duke of Sauoy, with the other commiſſioners, whome the King had left at Verceill, had made peace with the Swiſſes in the Kings name. But this peace was almoſt in one day concluded and broken, by the arriuall of new Swiſſes, who being proud for their forepaſſed victories, hoping to carry home with them as great wealth, as they ſaw their fellowes laden with, they would not heare tell of peace, refuſing to yeeld vp the valleis mentioned in the agreement: ſo as by this breach of peace, matters returned to their former difficulties, and to much greater, in regard of the Swiſſes new forces, as alſo of thoſe of the Viceroy and Lorenzo de Medicis who approched Milan. Aluiana in the meane time ſent word to the French King, that he would ſo amuſe the Spaniſh army, as it ſhould haue no meanes to hurt him: and therefore ſo ſoone as hee vnderſtood that the Viceroy was gone from Verona, he left the Polleſin of Rouigo, and hauing croſſed the Adice, he ſpeedily came along the riuer Po, with nine hundred men at armes, foureteene hundred light horſe, and nine thouſand foot, with greate ſtore of artillery neere to the walls of Cremona. The King according to Aluianas letters, came to Marignan, to giue him more eaſie meanes to ioyne with the royall army, and to ſtop the companies of the Church, and Spaniards, from doing the like with the enemies. For it did greately import the king to haue the enemies force diuided in ſundry places.

Agreement contracted with the Swiſſes, and broken the ſame day.

The number of the Venetian army conducted by Aluiana.

The King commeth to Marignan.

The King being come to Marignan ſtayed there, and wrot to the Venetian Senate, giuing them notice of his arriuall in Italy, and of the fortunate ſucceſſe of his affaires till then, together with the hope hee had that his deſeignes would proſper, in regard that both their affaires were managed by one ſelfe-ſame Vnion and concord.

of

But in theſe interims, Rance de Cera who had well demeaned him-ſelfe againſt the enemies, being mooued with iealozy againſt Aluiana, for that hee would not bee enforced to obey him as Generall if the armies ſhould come to ioyne together, craued leaue of the Venetians to depart, who being not able to make them friends, did freely graunt it. Hee was a braue Captaine, and could not abide any ſuperior, and Aluiana could not endure an equall, by meanes whereof they could not agree together, whereupon, hauing taken his leaue hee put him ſelfe into the Popes pay with two hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horſe.

Rance de Cera leaues the Venetian party.

Marke Antonio Colonna in the meane time, who remayned for the gard of Verona, made a ſodaine ſally with three thouſand foot-men and about ſeauen hundred horſe of all ſorts, and went and ſcoured the Vincentine Territory, ſpoyling and waſting what-ſo-euer he met with. Albeit this did trouble the Venetians, yet could it not diuert them from their former determination, which was that Aluiana ſhould ioyne with the French army, knowing well that if the French Kings affaires did proſper, this could not doe amiſſe.

Marke Antonio Colonna gards Verona.

Foure armies were at one time in one country, very neere to one another. The French army was of forty thouſand men, among whome were fiue hundred men at armes, choſen out of the French Nobillity, excellently well armed and mounted, who after they had ſeazed on Nouara and Pauia, were come to Marignan, not farre from them lay the Venetian army, of twelue thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, which ſtayed at Lodi, both armies being well ſtored with artillery. Againſt theſe two were two other armies of the enemies, who for the ſame reaſons were enforced to remaine deuided one from another. That of the Pope and the Florentines ioyned with the Spaniards, was more eſteemed for the old ſoldiers then for the great number, and it was lodged neere to the Citty of Placentia, on the banke of the riuer Po. The other was of Swiſſes which was ſaid to bee forty thouſand men who at the purſute and perſwaſion of the Cardinall of Syon, kept the Citty of Milan, which was well furniſhed with all neceſſaries.

Foure armies at one time in Italy.

The number of Swiſſes.

This Cardinall returning from Placentia, whither he was fled, wondering that his country-men practized with the French king, relying on great numbers of ſoldiers newly come, which did fauor his party, he came among them who were al in a manner diuided, ſome of them not enduring to heare tell of war, and others not of peace. And cauſing them al to come together on a day, he beganne with a very vehement and affectionate ſpeech to incite them, without any more delay to go forth the ſame day and aſſaill the French King, and not to ſet ſo much before their eyes the number the enemies horſe and artillery, as to let it make them to forget the valour of the Swiſſes, and the victories obtained by them againſt the French. That it was not the artillery which gaue the victory, but onely the proweſſe and valour of the ſoldier. And that beſides the giuing of the victory, which he aſſured them of, they ſhould conſider the great wealth they were to get, as well by the ſpoyle of the French army, as by that of the whole ſtate of Milan. And therefore hee willed them to aduance their pikes, with their vſuall courage, and ſound their drums, and without delaying one houre of time to goe and vſe their armes effectually, and to glut them-ſelues with the bloud of thoſe, who by their pride would moleſt the whole world, and by their baſeneſſe doe euer become a prey to all men.

The Cardinal of Syons oration to the Swiſſes.

The Swiſſes beeing incited by theſe or ſuch like ſpeeches did furiouſly on a ſodaine put on their armes, and going forth of the Citty did put themſelues in order of battaile, and albeit it was neere night, they marched towards towards the French Army with ſuch courage, as if they had already obtayned the victory, notwithſtanding that diuerſe of their Captaines thought it great raſhneſſe and a very dangerous matter to aſſaile the enemy in his camp, who was reſolued for battaile. But the Cardinall of Sion fearing leaſt delay might produce ſomthing contrary to his deſeignes, and that as the deſire of fight had eaſily enflamed their courages, it might as eaſily be quenched by the remonſtrance of their Captaines of the contrary part, he gaue forth a falſe rumor among them that the French gathered togeather their baggage and prepared for their departure, and that their vantgard was already forth of their Camp, to goe and ioyne with the Venetian army, to retire afterwards to beſeege Milan, wherevpon he exhorted them to make haſt to ſurprize the enemy in diſorder who little doubted thereof. This exhortation was ſeconded by diuers Captaines of his faction who did greatly praiſe his councell, and incited them to battaile, going vp and downe the rankes, making the like remonſtrances, wherewith the ſoldiers being encouraged marched on with a ſpeedy pace towards the enemies.

How greatly the Swiſſes were incited by this ſpeech.

The Cardinal makes vſe of falſe rumors.

Now the French being aduertized of the Suiſſes comming towards them, albeit they were at the firſt greatly amazed, (as it happeneth in matters not foreſeene nor premeditated) they did neuertheleſſe forthwith put on their Armor, made ready their horſes and all other things needfull for a battaile, then hauing taken courage, they placed themſelues vnder their enſeignes and opened them-ſelues more at large. Their whole Army was deuided into three parts.

The Duke of Bourbon lead the Vant-gard, accompanied by the Lord of Talamont, ſonne to Trimouille, Iohn Iacomo Triuulcio, Pedro of Nauarre, and other famous Captaines, with all the Almaines, Gaſcons, and French. In the battaile was the King, about whom were the greateſt part of the men at armes, and a choyce troope of Almaine ſouldiers, with the Dukes of Lorraine and Albany, the Lord Trimouille, Francis of Bourbon Count of Saint Paul, Odet of Foix, Lord of Lautrech, and diuerſe others. The Duke of Alançon conducted the rere-ward, with the Lords La Paliſſe, and Aubigni, and the reſidue of the Cauallery.

The order of the French army in battaile.

The Suiſſes in the meane time hauing left certaine companies of Soldiers vpon the rere-ward, had made of their whole Army but one body, which was very ſtrong, and beeing well cloſed together, they went on furiouſly (that they might the better ſeaze on the Artillery) and gaue in vpon the Lanſqnenets, who were at the front of the French Armie. Theſe men ſuſpecting that the French, according to the common report, were agreed with the Suiſſes, and that they came only to aſſaile them, in regard of the deadly hatred betwixt theſe two Nations, opened them-ſelues, and ſuffered the firſt charge of the Suiſſes, who came furiouſly vpon them to paſſe on, where-vpon, they went directly towards the Artillery, which beeing perceiued by Pedro of Nauarre, hee on a ſodaine called vp his troopes, and cauſed them to keepe the place appointed to the Lanſquenets, whereby the enemies paſſage was ſoone cloſed.

Fight betwixt the French and Suiſſes.

The Lanceque-nets open their rankes.

The Cauallery on the other ſide, and the King himſelfe who was enuironed with a valiant troope of Gentlemen, comming againſt them, their great fury was in ſome ſort cooled, and a very cruell battaile beganne, the which with diuers euents continewed till fower howers within night, certaine French Captaines being already ſlaine, and the King himſelfe ſtricken with diuers puſhes of Pikes: at the laſt both ſides being ſo weary as they were able to doe no more did ſeperate themſelues and retired forth of the throng, without any commandement or ſound of drumme or trompet. The Suiſſes lodged in the very ſame place expecting day, and they ſuffered one an other, on both ſides, to reſt that night, as if they had taken truce.

The battaile continueth till foure howers within night.

The King in the meane time did not ſpend the remainder of the night vnproffitably, but aſſembled his councell to determine what was to be done the day following following, hee cauſed the Artillery to be drawne backe, and planted in more commodious places, hee did reordaine the battaillons of the Lancequenets, who promiſed to amend their former daies fault, and to giue ſufficient proofe of their faith and loyalty: and ſent word to Aluiana, ſpeedily to come and bring his forces to the battaill. So ſoone as it was day the Swiſſes went and aſſailed the French with the ſelfe ſame fury of the day before, who valliantly receuied them, but with more diſcretion and better order, where-vpon the Swiſſes were beaten, partly with the artillery, and partly with the Gaſcon Crosbowes, and by the horſemen, ſo as they were beaten in Front and in Flanke, at ſuch time as Aluiana who was ſent for (as hath beene ſayd) arriued with his light horſe and with part of his army in the greateſt haſt he could.

How the King ordaineth his Army that night.

The battaill is renewed by breake of day.

Aluiana commeth opportunly to the battail

Hee arriued at ſuch time as the battaile was moſt cloſed and moſt fierce, and when matters were in greateſt hazard and danger. Hee gaue in with great fury vpon the Swiſſes backes, who neuer-the-leſſe did ſtill fight valliantly.

But at laſt diſpairing of the victory, as well in regard of the great reſiſtance made againſt them, as by the arriuall of the Venetian army, they ſounded the retreat, and retired with a ſoft pace towards Milan, keeping ſtill their vſuall order, with ſuch an amazement to the French army, as there was neither horſe nor foote-troupes that had the courage to follow them, by reaſon they were much tyred in the battayle, hauing fought without intermiſſion from day-breake till none.

The Swiſſes retire with ſoft pace towards Milan.

The end of the ſecond Booke of the fifth Decade.

The Contents of the third Booke of the fifth Decade.

CONtention among the Swisses, being retired to Milan after the battaill. Milan, and the whole Dutchy is reduced vnder the French obedience. The French Kings entry into Milan. Aluiana his enterprise on the Citty of Bressia, with the Venetian army alone. The death of Aluiana, and the establishment of Iohn Iames Triuulce in his place. The Venetians take Pescara. The French are present at the seege of Bressia. The Pope maketh motion of peace. Parma and Placencia are by the Pope yeelded vp to the French King. The enteruiew of the Pope and the French King at Bolognia. The Campe dislodgeth from before Bressia. Triuulcio giues ouer his charge. The Duke of Bourbon Viceroy in the Dutchy of Milan. The Lord of Lautrec with the Venetian army comes againe before Bressia. The Popes practises to breake the seege of Bressia. The Emperor, the King of England and the Pope band themselues against the French King. Manfron and de Bue are defeated by the Imperialls. The Lancequenets are defeated by Fregosa at the Castle of Ansa. The Emperor commeth with great forces into Italy, and beseegeth Asola. The French and Venetian armies retyre to Milan. The arriuall of the Swisses at Milan for the King. The Emperors shamefull retreate into Almaine, and the abandoning of his army. King Francis his complaints against the Pope. The Lord of Lautrec Gouernor of the Dutchy of Milan beseegeth Bressia the third time. Bressia yeeldeth vpon composition, Verona after diuers determinations being beseeged in two seuerall places is by the Almains freed from the seege. The contents of the treaty of Noyon. Verona by the same treaty is yeelded to the Venetians. The great ioy of the Venetians, together with the Veronois for that redition.

The

The Contents of the third Booke of the fifth Decade.

THE Swiſſes after the bataill being retired to Mylan, a very great contention aroſe amongſt them, ſome of them being deſirous to make an agreement with the French King, and others to continue ſtill for the defence of Milan. Thoſe who demanded the acord, making another pretence, craued mony of Maximilian Sforza, the which they very well knew hee had no meanes to pay; but it was onely by that refuſall to take an occaſion to leaue him, the which they did by perſwaſion of Roſt their Colonell, leauing fifteene hundred of their countrymen, with fiue hundred Italians, for the gard of the Caſtle, promiſing Maximillian neuertheleſſe to returne to the aide of their fellowes, whome they left behind. Vpon which promiſe Maximillian Sforza, accompanied by Iohn of Gonzaga, and Ieronimo Morone, and by other Gentlemen of Milan, ſhut himſelfe vp in the Caſtle.

Diſcention amongſt the Swiſſes in Milan after the Battaill.

The French after the Victory remaining maiſters of the field, did with eaſe reduce vnder their power all the townes of the Dutchy of Milan. The Viceroy of Naples who all this while had not ſtird forth of the Placentyne Territory, being out of hope to bee able any longer to gard and defend the ſtate of Milan, and fearing beſides that the Pope had abandoned the league, hee retired into Romagnia, and from thence ſoone after brought backe his army into the realme of Naples. The Cardinall of Syon perceiuing himſelfe to bee diſgraced among his country-men, for the bad ſucceſſe of the battaill, went to the Emperour to ſolicite aide, the like did Francis Duke of Barri brother to Maximillian Sforza.

The Viceroy retireth to Naples.

The Citty of Milan being thus abandoned, gaue it ſelfe to the French King; with entreaties that hee would forget what was paſt, promiſing to bee euer after more loyall and obedient, graunting to pay vnto him a very great ſumme of mony. The King refuſed to enter into it ſo long as the enemies held the Caſtle: but the Duke of Burbon came thither to receiue the Citty, in the Kings name, and gaue ſpeedy charge to Pedro of Nauarre to attempt the taking of the Caſtle, who promiſed, contrary to the opinion of all men, to winne it within a moneth, where-vpon hee beganne to batter it with the Canon certaine daies together; then according to the vſuall manner, hee made mines, whereby hee blew vp the walls and towers which were of a wonderfull height.

Milan yeldeth to the French King.

Sforza being daunted when hee ſaw a Caſe-mate and a part of the wall flying in the aire, and being beſides ill diſpoſed of his perſon, making vſe of the counceil of ſome of his truſtieſt ſeruants, hee determined to receiue into the Vpon what Artickles Sforza yeelded the Caſtle of Milan.

Caſtle Antonio Bratan Doctor of the lawes, to make a draught of the agreement and redition of that place, which he was reſolued to yeeld vp to the French King, which imported, that Maximilian Sforza ſhould preſently conſigne to the French King, the Caſtles of Milan and Cremona. That he ſhould giue ouer vnto him all his claime to that ſtate, and ſhould receiue of the King a certaine ſomme of money for the paiment of his debts; and that he ſhould goe into France where the King ſhould giue him a yeerely penſion of thirty thouſand Ducats, or elſe ſhould cauſe him to be made a Cardinall with the like reuenew. There were beſides, diuers Suiſſes that were in the Caſtle, who were all of them well ſatiſfied and pleaſed.

The French Kings entry into Milan.

Theſe Articles being accompliſhed, the King entred in great magnificence into the Citty of Milan, enuironed with the greateſt part of his cauallery. Foure Ambaſſadors of the chiefeſt Senators of Venice came thither to him, namely Vntonio Grimani, Dominico Treuiſan, George Cornare, and Andrew Gritti, as well to congratulate him for his victory, as to entreat him, as hee was tyed by the capitulations of the confederacy, to helpe them to recouer their Citties.

The King promiſeth ayd to the Venetians.

The King after that he had gratiouſly receiued and entertained them, commanded ſpeedily the baſtard of Sauoy and Theodore Triuulcio to aid them with ſix hundred lances and ſeauen thouſand Lancequenets: But becauſe they delayed their departure, vntill they had ſeene what would become of the Caſtle of Milan, or elſe becauſe the King would ſend the ſame companies, before that of Cremona. Aluiana (whom the Venetians would not ſuffer to follow the viceroy) marched with his army towards Breſſia, to trie if he could take it by force, according to the Senates direction, who deſired (that all matters being laid aſide) he ſhould ſeeke to recouer Breſſia and Verona: in regard whereof Aluiana hauing paſſed ouer the riuer Adda, marched directly to Breſſia, the Citty of Bergamo beeing yeelded vnto him preſently after the rout of the Suiſſes.

Aluiana his enterpriſe vpon Breſſia.

Now in the Venetians Campe there was diuerſity of opinions among the Captaines, ſome of them thinking it much better to goe firſt and beſeege Verona for diuerſe important reaſons, and cheefely becauſe that beeing taken, all the Townes and Caſtles of the Veronois would ſoone yeeld, the which would not ſo fall out by the taking of Breſſia. The Senate at firſt was of this opinion, but becauſe they would not ſpend the time vainely in that determination, they referred that buſineſſe to Aluiana his diſcretion, who becauſe Breſſia was neerer to the French Campe, hee marched thither, hoping to take it with eaſe; for hee thought that Breſſia had not ſo ſtrong a garriſon as Verona.

The Seege of Breſſia reſolued on.

But Icaro the Spaniſh Captaine beeing wiſe and ſubtill, who commanded Breſſia, hauing intelligence of Aluiana his deſeigne, had ſpeedily cauſed a thouſand footmen to come thither from Verona, with ſtore of victualls and other neceſſaries to ſuſtaine a ſeege; and had handled it ſo cunningly, as Aluiana had no knowledge thereof, who made account ſo ſoone as hee ſhould approach the walles to giue an aſſault in diuers and ſundry places: But by the ſodaine and vnexpected arriuall of the new ayde, hee found more reſiſtance there then hee look't for, and hauing greatly laboured in his approaches, a greeuous feeuer ſeazed on him, which enforced him to leaue the Campe, and to retire to Gueda, in the Breſſan Countrey, where hee departed out of this world about the beginning of October, in the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand, fiue hundred, and fifteene, not beeing fully three ſcore yeares of age; wherewith the Venetians were greatly greeued, but the ſouldiours much more, who kept his body fiue and twenty dayes togeather in the army,

New ſuccors enter into Breſſia vnknowne to Aluiana.

Aluianas death.

Army, carrying it with them when they marched in very great ſolemnity, then it was brought to Venice, where by a publique decree, it was very honorably buried in Saint Steeuens Church, where at this day his toombe is to be ſeene: And becauſe he had euer made more eſteeme of honor and reputation then of wealth, hauing left his wife and children poore, the Senate in acknowledgement of his good ſeruice, decreed, that euery moneth three ſcore Ducats ſhould be paid to his widdow, and as much to a ſonne of his foorth of the publicke treaſury ſo long as they ſhould liue, hauing giuen them a goodly houſe in the Citty, with exemption from all taxes, and impoſitions, and that to euery of his three daughters ſhould be giuen the ſomme of three thouſand Ducats for their Dowry when time ſhould ſerue.

The Senates recompence to the widdow and children of Aluiana.

After Aluiana his death, George Eme the prouidator did for a while command the army. The Venetians in the meane time entreated the King to giue them Iohn Iames Triuulce to be Generall of their forces, as well in regard of his experience, as for his renowne in martiall diſcipline, as alſo becauſe for the common inclination towards the Guelphe faction, there had euer beene good wil and frendſhip betwixt them and the ſame Republick. Whileſt he prepared for his going to the army, the Venetian companies tooke Peſcara hauing not long before defeated certaine troopes of horſe and three hundred Spaniſh footmen that went to releeue it; then they recouered Aſola and Lona which the Marquis of Mantua had abandoned.

Iohn Iames Triuulce Generall of the Venetian army.

Peſcara taken by the Venetians.

Aſola & Lona taken by the Venetians.

Triuulce being arriued at the Venetian Army receiued letters from the Senate full of congratulations and entreaties that he would carry himſelfe in that place, ſo as he had euer doone in all imployments: he did likewiſe receiue the army at the hands of George Eme the Prouidator, where he beganne to beare himſelfe with great wiſdome, and diſcretion and according to the Senates deſire he beſeeged Breſſia, albeit it ſeemed very hard vnto him to take it without the French army, by reaſon that the Citty was ſtrong, and that there were within it two thouſand foot as wel Lancequenets as Spaniards, as alſo becauſe winter aproached, and the weather was much diſpoſed to raine, as the euent did not deceaue his iudgement. For as they battered it with the Artillery which was planted vppon the very brinke of the dike, thoſe within made a ſally with fifteene hundred as wel Spaniards as Laucequenets, who giuing in vpon the guard of the Artilery which were a hundred men at armes and ſix hundred foot, they eaſily put them to rout, albeit that Iohn Paul Manfron did in ſome ſort ſtay their fury with thirty men at armes.

Breſſia beſeeged by the Venetians.

Thoſe of Breſſia make a ſally on the Venetians Campe.

They ſlew about two hundred foot, burnt the pouders and drew tenne peices of ordinance into Breſſia; ſo as the Venetians were like that day to haue receiued a far greater loſſe, had not Triuulce come ſpeedily thither with certaine foot companies and Cauallery, who enforced the enemies to retire, and recouered from them certaine peeces of ordnance which they were carrying away beſide.

This diſorder cauſed Triuulce to with-draw his armie, and to lodge it more at large, euen as farre at Coccai, ten miles diſtant from Breſſia, expecting the comming of the French, at whoſe arriuall, ſo ſoone as Triuulce had made new prouiſions of artillery and munition, hee returned againe, and encamped before it: The French ſupplyes beeing conducted by the Baſtard of Sauoy, which conſiſted of fiue thouſand Lanſquenets, eight hundred men at armes, and certaine peeces of ordnance, with all manner of prouiſion in aboundance, beeing ioyned with the Venetians, the Citty was by a generall conſent beſeeged, hoping with thoſe forces, and by the Soldiers diligence, eaſily to finiſh their enterpriſe.

The retreat of the Venetian army.

Breſſia againe beſeeged by the French.

Yet neuertheleſſe it fell out otherwiſe then they thought, for the Lanquenets refu-refuſed to march againſt the cities of the Emperors obedience, where-vpon beeing diſmiſſed the Venetians craued Pedro of Nauar of the King, who came thither in their ſted, with fiue thouſand Gaſcons and French: Theſe being encamped on the one ſide of the towne, and Triuulce on the other with the Venetian ſoldiers, the battery beganne in diuers places, the cheefe command of all matters, remayning in a manner to Triuulce, by reaſon that the baſtard of Sauoy being ſicke, was gone from the army.

The Lance-quenets refu-ſal.

After a long battery, no aſſault was giuen, beeauſe thoſe within had made diuers rampiers, and very carefully prouided for all things neceſſary for defence, ſo as Pedro of Nauarre had recourſe to his ordinary remedies, whereof hee had not as yet made vſe in that ſeege, by reaſon it was very painefull and laborious, and for that he likewiſe feared, leaſt by meanes of the continuall rayne that had fallen of a long time, his deſeigne might not fall out as hee deſired. He beganne then to mine and ſap the walls, but thoſe within the towne ſuſpecting the matter, becauſe thoſe of the Campe had giuen ouer their battery, hauing dilligently ſearched all ouer the Citty, if they could heare any noice of the miners, at laſt it was diſcouered, wherevpon they made a counter-mine, which being filled with powder and fired, they ouerthrew all that Pedro of Nauarre had done, and ſlew his people that wrought in it, ſo as in a moment all that was loſt which had beene ſet forward in many daies.

Pedro of Nauarre makes vſe of the mine at the ſeege of Breſſia.

Pedro of Nauar his mine blowne vp.

The Venetians neuer-the-leſſe did not diſpaire of taking the Citty, but by ſtreightly ſhutting them vp to ſtop al ſuccors from comming to them, they hoped to win it, hauing had intelligence of the great want of all neceſſaries where-with the beſeeged were afflicted, which at laſt would enforce them to yeeld, eſpecially the Almaines, who are impatient of long ſuffering: as alſo for that they had not receiued any pay of a long time from the Emperor, by meanes whereof they refuſed all military obſeruation, and prepared them-ſelues to mutiny and rebellion. This being reported to Triuulce, he ſuppoſed that a faire occaſion was offered to conquer the citty, where-vpon hee reſolued not to ſtirre from thence, notwithſtanding the ſharpneſſe of the winter, the deepe ſnowes, and the long time that hee had layne before it, knowing how much it concerned his reputation, if that which hee had begunne ſhould not ſuccede fortunately.

Great dearth in Breſſia.

Hee beganne then ſtraightly to ſhutte it vp on euery ſide, to the end that no victualls might enter it, nor no ſoldier of the towne might come forth, and for this purpoſe hee ſtill entertayned them with light skirmiſhes. And becauſe thoſe of Verona did in the meane ſpace ſcoure the Breſſan Territory, and moleſt the Venetian Army, hee placed ſtrong Garriſons in Peſcara and Valegia to ſtoppe their incurſions, and to ſhutte them more ſtreightly vppe.

The Pope motioneth a peace

At the ſame time that Breſſia was beſeeged, there was ſome motion of peace, the Pope ſeeking to accord the Emperor and the Venetians, hoping afterwards to bee better able to conclude peace with the French. But the Venetians being ſo often beaten with hope of thoſe matters, without giuing any truſt to the Popes words, did not aſſure their State on many, but onely on the friendſhip and alliance with the French, and to the end that their intent might bee knowne to all men, they refuſed all conditions propounded to them, whereof they were deſirous to aduertize the French Ambaſſador reſident at Venice, and that in like caſe, their Ambaſſadors which were at the court, ſhould acquaint his Maieſty with the whole buſineſſe, that hee might ſee how they accounted onely of his friendſhippe, as the King did the like by theirs. The which hee made ſhew of to the Emperors Ambaſſadors, who came to him to talke of agreement from their Maiſter, whome hauing diſmiſſed without any reſolution, he did ſpeedily aduertize the Venetians thereof.

As

As concerning the Pope, the King had ſundry thoughts. For al be-it his Holineſſe had forſaken him, at ſuch time as hee thought him one of his greateſt friends, he neuertheleſſe did greatly deſire his friendſhip, the which he had not left but by conſtraint. Therefore the Pope hauing ſent his Nuntio to the King, vnknowne to the other confederates, he was curteouſly entertained by him, the King manifeſting his hearty deſire to enter into his Holineſſe fauour: Yet neuertheleſſe reſoluing not to buy that at a deere rate which was offered, the Nuntio could obtaine nothing of his Maieſty, till the Pope had quitted and yeelded vnto him Parma and Placentia which he held.

The King deſirous of the Popes friendſhip.

The Pope yeelded Parma & Placentia to the King.

The Pope could hardly be induced to quit thoſe two Cities. At laſt, fearing that by delaying the matter, ſome miſchiefe might ariſe, he ſatisfied the Kings deſire, referring the accompliſhing of the reſt till their enteruiew, which by their mutuall conſent was concluded to bee at Bolognia. The Pope for that purpoſe departed from Rome, and the King from the City of Milan, the Venetians Ambaſſadors did accompany his Maieſty, all Italy receiued great contentation by that aſſembly, hoping that it would produce an aſſured peace to the whole Prouince. A legat was ſent to the Emperour to treat of agreement betwixt him and the Venetians, and to haue him to remit Breſſia and Verona to them for a pecuniary recompence.

The Pope likewiſe ſent a briefe to the Venetians, exhorting them vnto peace. The Pope and the King being come to Bolognia, they couenanted together, That the King ſhould take vpon him the protection of the Popes perſon, and the Churches State, of Iuliano and Lorenzo de Medicis, and the State of Florence. That the Pope ſhould cauſe his forces to leaue Verona, and countermand thoſe companies ſent to the Emperors aide againſt the Venetians. Diuers other Articles were concluded, concerning onely the proffit of either of them: In the which treaty hauing continued ſixe daies together, both of them departed from Bolognia: the King thinking that he had done a great matter, to haue drawne the Pope to his ſide, and to haue diſioyned him from his enemies.

Enteruiew betwixt the Pope and French King at Bolognia.

The Articles concluded betwixt the Pope and King.

The King being come to Milan, beganne to thinke on his returne to France, hauing nothing to detaine him but the deſire he had to ſee the Venetians re-eſtabliſhed in their Cities. Therefore he commanded to re-enforce the Venetians army which lay before Breſſia, and had reduced the beſeeged to that extremity, as all men thought that they would ſoone yeeld; for the Almaines and Spaniards that lay within it, had reſolued together, that if within twenty daies they were not releeued, they would yeeld vp the City to the Venetians, on theſe conditions neuertheleſſe, to depart with diſplayed Enſeignes, the drumme beating, with the artillery and all their baggage, which was the ſelfe ſame compoſition which they had concluded with the Venetians Generall. But the Almain ſuccors came and entred the towne before the time agreed vpon was expired.

The compoſition of thoſe of Breſſia.

The report of the comming of this aide had cauſed ſundry opinions in the army, ſome of thē being of opinion to continue the ſeege; others, to lead the army elſewhere, but the report of the number of the Almaines being greater then the effect, and for that they had notice by their ſpies that Marke Antonio Colonna, who was come forth of Verona, & entred the Mantuā territory, made preparations to come and aſſaile them, cauſed the Venetian captaines, who feared that by ſtaying there, the enemies might come and encloſe them, to determine wholy to diſlodge, and to bring the artillery to Crema and Cremona, and the reſt of the army to Caſtlenedulla ſix miles off from Breſſia.

The arriuall of ſuccors to Breſſia, cauſeth the Venetians to raiſe their campe.

Theſe newes being brought to Venice did greatly amaze the whole City, becauſe they expected rather to haue heard of the taking of the City, then of any thing elſe. The Generall and the Prouidatory had written, that there was ſuch ſtrong Garriſon at all paſſages, as it was impoſſible that any aide could enter into it, which might keepe them backe from obſeruing the agreement which they had had made,and that which cauſed them moſt to beleeue it,was that the French ſupplies which were to come to the campe, being three thouſand Almains and 400. horſe,were departed from Milan and were on their way towards their campe.

The raiſing of the campe amazeth the City of Venice.

Triuulce leaueth his charge.

This did much blemiſh Triuulcio his reputation, whereof he hauing notice, craued leaue of the Signory, That he might depart, ſaying that the affaires of his owne houſe called him thence,and that he could tarry no longer in their army. But the Senate knowing that this mans experience was much important for their affaires, vſed meanes to appeaſe him by letters, and did entreate the King to cauſe him to take that charge vpon him, but he would by no meanes conſent therevnto,but returned to Milan. Theodore Triuulcio tooke charge of the Venetian army,and of the whole mannaging of the warre,holding the ſame authority in the army as Iohn Iames Triuulcio had done,al-be-it he had not the name nor degree of captaine Generall.

The Duke of Bourbon viceroy in the Dutchy of Milan.

The King in the meane time hauing giuen order for his returne into France, left the Duke of Burbon for viceroy in the Dutchy of Milan, and before his departure he commanded Odet of Foix Lord of Lautrec, to carry ſpeedily greater aide to the Venetians, and generally to doe all matters for them, as if it were for his owne ſeruice,ſhewing thereby his great affection to the Republike, as in all other his ſpeeches and diſcourſes, not letting to ſay, that if the Venetians were not wholy reſtored to their Cities he would returne into Italy with greater forces then before.

The Kings affection towards the Venetians.

The King being gonne forth of Italy, and the Duke of Bourbon tarrying there to command the Dutchy of Milan, the Venetians ſtill kept an Ambaſſador nere to him, to ſollicite whatſoeuer was needfull for their affaires, Andrew Treuiſan was ſent thither,who being come to Milan, Andrè Gritti who had remained there after the Kings departure to haſten the ſupplies,went to the army to be Prouidator there,in ſtead of Dominico Contaren, that fell ſicke, and was brought home to Venice. At the very ſame time,the Lord of Lautrec came to the army with great forces which did much encreaſe it, ſo as it ſeemed that there was no doubt but that Breſſia would be taken.

The Lord of Lautrec commeth to the Venetian army before Breſſia.

Now the Pope ſuppoſing that this ſucceſſe did greatly croſſe his deſeignes, ſought all meanes to hinder it. He propounded truce to draw the matter forth at length, hoping to cauſe the Venetians to condeſcend to ſome agreement, though it were to their diſaduantage, by reaſon of the difficulty to take that City. And becauſe he knew that himſelfe could doe no good in that buſineſſe, for the ſmall credit which the Venetians did giue to his words,he determined to make vſe of the King of Polands authority,whoſe Ambaſſador (hauing intelligences likewiſe at Venice)he perſwaded to reuiue the treaty of peace, and to propound to the Venetians, that if they would diſioyne themſelues from the French, and allie themſelues to the Emperor,they might add two goodly Cities to their State,Lodi,and Cremona, becauſe that with the Popes armes, the Emperours and their owne,being vnited together,they might eaſily expell the French, and afterwards by the King of Polands authority obtaine them of the Emperour in guift,ſo as being thus ſeparated from the State of Milan, they might for euer after be incorporated to the Venetians demaines.

The Pope practiſes to breake the ſeege.

Beſides this propoſition the Pope,hoping that by the Generals abſence the ſeege of Breſſia might be prolonged, wrote to King Francis that it might pleaſe him to command the Lord of Lautrec to goe to Rome, being deſirous to confer with ſuch a man about diuers matters concerning the affaires of Naples, to which he knew the King enclined, wherevpon he exhorted him to make haſt to beginne the warre on that ſide,ſeeing that the King of Arragon was dead,and that Charles Duke of Burgondy hauing taken vpon him the name of Prince of Caſtile, made himſelfe terrible to all thoſe who held any States in Italy,and chiefly to himſelfe.

But the Popes cunning being already knowne of a long time, cauſed no great regard regard to be giuen to his ſpeech. The Venetians thus continuing the ſeege of Breſſia without harkening to any truce reſolued not to ſtirre from thence till it was either yeelded vp, or taken by force. The Emperour, who had made warre but ſlowly the yeere before by his Lieutenants, determined to goe thither in perſon, ſought all meanes to make new ſtirres in Italy, aſſembled diuers Diets, craued aide, made great leauies of ſouldiers, and aboue all, prouoked the Swiſſes to take armes to reuenge the death of ſo many braue men their companions, offering to be their captaine and not to abandon them in any trauaile or danger whatſoeuer. The King of England made the ſame requeſt, being iealous of the glory and reputation of the French, and for that the French King alſo had taken vpon him the protection of the King of Scots. The Pope did no leſſe, but in more ſecret manner. And all three of them promiſed good pay to thoſe Swiſſes that would come, ſhewing them moreouer that the profit which would redound to them by that warre of Italy and by their alliance, would bee much greater then their hire.

The Venetians reſolue to continue the ſeege.

The practiſes of the Emperor, king of England, and the Pope againſt the French.

The Venetian captaines in the meane time, after the arriuall of the Lord of Lautrec, did often ſit in councel, where their opinions were very different, ſaying, That there was no great garriſon within the towne, and that it was beſides deſtitute of all prouiſion, making but ſmall doubt of the ſeege. But this opinion was not receiued, by reaſon of the vnfitneſſe of the time, which was in the middeſt of winter when it is not good to diſcampe and to lead the ſouldiers to a new faction: As alſo becauſe they thought it meere follie to quit a certenty, ſuch as was the taking of Breſſia, for the vncertaine ſucceſſe of that which would happen before Verona. For they certainely knew that there was in Breſſia ſuch want of money, corne and al other kind of victuals, as it was of neceſſity ſoone to be theirs, either by agreement or by force, and this being verified by diuers, it was concluded by a generall conſent not to ſtirre from thence, and that the City ſhould be more ſtreightly looked to. In the campe there was plenty of all things, for the Senate was carefull to furniſh it with all neceſſaries, notwithſtanding all the impediments which the enemies vſed againſt the purueyors which prooued vaine & to none effect. Marke Antonio Colonna, was the man, who being lodged at Verona, vſed all meanes to cut off victuals from the army, and to that end kept great numbers of Spaniards and horſe-men at Legnaga, which they then poſſeſſed, ſo as by little and little, the enemies waxed ſo bold, as they came and ſcoured as farre as the Venetians campe whileſt they were buſied at their ſeege.

Sundry opinions in the Venetians campe.

The Generall and the Prouidatori, thinking if they ſhould endure that indignity, it would greatly blemiſh their reputation, ſent Iohn Paul Manfron and Marke Antonio Bue with foure hundred men at armes, and foure hundred light horſe to ſurprize them, but the deſigne ſucceeded badly: for Colonna being by his ſpies aduertized of their comming, came forth of Verona with ſix hundred horſe and fiue hundred foot, and went ſpeedily towards Valegia and met them in the field, and comming to handy-ſtroakes, he defeated them. At this incounter Iulio, ſon to Iohn Paul Manfron his horſe being ſlaine vnder him in the fight was taken, & his father fled to Gueda. A more proſperous iſſue had the enterpriſe of Iano Fregoſa, & Iohn Corardo Vrſin, marching with certaine companies as well of the one as other army to the caſtle of Anſe to ſtoppe the paſſage of 3000. Lanſequenets: for they ſlue 800. of them, and the reſidew eſcaped with the mony which they carried into Lodron. All theſe exploits were great; but not of any great conſequence in comriſon of the totall of the warre, and of that which happened on report of the Emperors comming into Italy which dayly encreaſed, whereby both the aſſailants and the beſeeged were ſhaken with diuers hopes and feare. The Emperor hauing aſſembled diuers foot and horſe companies, & prouoked great numbers of Swiſſes to take armes, was on his way to come into Italy, intending to enter by the mountaines of Trent, and to goe directly towards Verona, then to Breſſia, and leauing Manfron, and de Bue, are defeated by the Imperials.

The Lanſequenets defeated at Anſe by Fregoſa.

The Emperors comming into Italy.

leauing ſtrong garriſon in both thoſe Cities, to paſſe on into the Dutchy of Milan to expell the French.

The Pope hauing notice of the Emperours entry into Italy, the better to honour him, and to acquaint him particularly with his loue towards him, created Bernardo de Bibiena Cardinall of Saint Mary in Porticu, Legat, and ſent him to him, for that he was euer wont to ſhew himſelfe on the Popes behalfe againſt the French, and to hinder their proceedings. But the Venetians, beleeuing verily that the Emperour would come into Italy, exhorted the French King to prouide for their common affaires, and not to ſuffer the Emperour and the Swiſſes, who enuyed his glory and greatneſſe, to enioy the fruit of his labour and trauaile; and that therefore he ſhould either in perſon returne againe into Italy with a mighty army, or elſe augment that which he had here already, according to the worthineſſe of the cauſe, promiſing for their parts to ſpare nothing that might auaile him.

The Pope ſendeth the Cardinall Bibiena Legat to the Emperor.

The Venetians exhort the French King.

The King knowing that what they ſaid was moſt true, tooke great care, not only for the danger wherein he ſaw the Dutchy of Milan, but becauſe he ſhould be enforced to put off his enterprize of Naples till ſome other time, wherevnto he greatly inclined. Reſoluing neuertheleſſe firſt of all to defend his owne Eſtates and thoſe of his allies, he propounded to the Venetians to wage, at their common charge eight thouſand Swiſſes: becauſe that he hauing at the ſame time very opportunely renued his alliance with them, it was expreſly agreed vpon that it ſhould bee lawfull for the King to draw what number of ſouldiers he pleaſed forth of their country.

The Venetians ſoone agreed to giue pay to two thouſand foot of that Nation, and readily to furniſh money neceſſary for other expences of warre. And notwithſtanding that the publike treaſury was much exhauſted, and the whole City greatly afflicted with ſo long a warre, Yet neuertheleſſe there was no want ſeene in any prouiſion for the army, nor in ought elſe that concerned the continuance of the warre. They made a leauy of foure thouſand Italian foot, they did encreaſe their garriſons in the Cities, and created two Prouidatori, Paul Gradonico and Lodouico Barbaro. In the Venetians campe were foure thouſand Gaſcons and fiue hundred men at armes, commanded by French captaines: but amongſt thoſe ſouldiers, who were particularly vnder the command of Triuulce, were ſeuen thouſand foot, and about fiue and twenty hundred horſe, as well men at armes as light horſe-men, and there ſtaied with the Duke of Bourbon after the Kings departure foure thouſand Gaſcon and Italian foot-men, and ſeuen hundred men at armes.

The Venetians offer to the King.

The number of the French & Italian forces.

Now all theſe forces being vnited together, with the Swiſſes who were already ſaid to be arriued at Iuree to the number of ſixe thouſand, ſeemed to be ſufficient to defend the State of Milan, and to make all the Emperours attempts vaine and vnprofitable, al-be it the report was that his army conſiſted of fiue and twenty thouſand, which were no great good ſouldiers, eſpecially the Almaine foot who had beene leauied forth of his countries in haſt, and his Cauallery was well worſe, ſo as his beſt forces were Swiſſes, whom the Emperour did well not to truſt ouer much, as well in regard of the Nature of that Nation, which is variable and inconſtant, as for the ſmall loue they beare to the houſe of Auſtria: ſo as the Emperours forces being ſuch, the common opinion was to march againſt them as they approched, neuertheleſſe they reſolued on the contrary, and the whole army departing from the Breſſan Territory, came vpon that of Cremona, whither the Duke of Bourbon a while before was come with all his Cauallery and foot, intending there to ſtay for the Swiſſes, who were not yet arriued, and likewiſe to ſtop the enemies from paſſing on any farther.

The number of the Imperiall army.

The Swiſſes nature.

The Emperour being come by Trent to Verona, went and encamped before Aſola, which was garded by an hundred men at armes, and foure hundred Venetian

Venetian foot-men,where hauing ſpent diuers daies to no purpoſe,he was enforced to depart thence and croſſed the Riuer Oglio at Orcinouo, whereupon the French and Venetians determined to raiſe their campe,and hauing left three hundred Launces and three thouſand foot-men in Cremona, they retired on the farther ſide of the Riuer Adicé, reſoluing to ſtop his paſſage. But the French and Venetians were ſcarce gonne from thence, but the whole country,which lieth betwixt the Riuers,Oglio, Po, and Adda,were at the Emperours deuotion (Cremona and Crema excepted) the one garded by French,and the other by Venetians.

The whole country betwixt Oglio, Po and Adda yeeld to the Emperor.

After that the Emperour had croſſed Oglio, he drew nere to the riuer Adda to paſſe it at Piſquetona,and finding the paſſage there to be very difficult, he came to Riuolta, the French lying at Caſſiana on the other ſide of the Riuer: who by reaſon that the Swiſſes were not yet arriued, and that the Adda might be foorded in many places, they marched away the next day to Milan, whereby the Lord of Lautrec purchaced ſmall honour,who had publiſhed and written to the King,that he would with eaſe ſtop the Emperors paſſage ouer that Riuer.

The French & Venetian army retire to Milan.

Maximillian being mooued at this retreat croſſed the Adda, then he purſued his iourney,and being come within ſixe miles nere to Milan, he ſent an Herald to ſummon thoſe of the City,threatning the Milanois, that if within three daies,they did not chace thence the French army,he would handle them in worſe manner, then Frederike Barbaroſſa his predeceſſor had done, ſaying that he was come into Italy,to receiue,according to the cuſtome of his Anceſtors,one of the markés of the Empire in the City of Milan, and to driue thence, and forth of all the confines of that State, the French, as vniuſt and vnlawfull poſſeſſors thereof. They anſwered the Herald according to the pleaſure of the French. That the State of Milan being in times paſt a member of the Empire, was by the conſent of Emperors cut off from it,for a ſumme of money giuen vnto them; in regard whereof Emperors, could no more lay any claime to it, the which was lawfully poſſeſſed by Francis the French King, as well for that it was his owne inheritance,as being likewiſe wonne by right of armes: and therefore that the Milanois would keepe that City for their lawfull Lord,vnto whom they had ſworne homage and fealty.

The Emperor ſummoneth the City of Milan.

Notwithſtanding this braue anſwere the whole City was filled with great amazement, and their determinations were different. Some were of opinion to abandon the City, deſpayring of being able to reſiſt the enemies, others on the contrary reiecting that councell as too baſe, would not depart, but perſwaded to tarry ſtill and defend the City,and the better to doe it, they reſolued to retaine all the foot-men in Milan,with eight hundred Launces, and to diſtribute the reſidue for the gard of the neighbour townes.

The diuerſity of opinions in the City.

Neuertheleſſe the firſt councell had beene followed, had not André Gritti and André Treuiſan,the Prouidators,diſſwaded it, who by meanes of their authority procured them not to make ſo much haſte: ſo that as they were ready to depart, certaine newes arriued, that the day following Albert Peter would be at Milan, with ten thouſand Swiſſes and Griſons. Theſe newes did encourage the Citizens and ſouldiers. The Emperour in the meane time came and encamped at Lambre two miles from Milan, whether he was no ſooner come but the Swiſſes arriued at the City. This comming gaue ſpirit to the French, but greater terror to the Emperor. For, ſeeing the City to be ſtrengthened with ſuch a garriſon, he doubted not but that the ſeege would be long and painefull: whereunto he himſelfe had no meanes to tarry there long,for want of money,victuals,and all other neceſſaries for a ſeege: as alſo, for that he did greatly ſuſpect the fidelity of that Nation,by reaſon of matters paſt, and for that the French might eaſily winne them,for ſome great ſumme of money, the which himſelfe could not doe in regard of his pouerty: calling to minde beſide,what had befalne Lodouico Sforza at Nouara, there hauing beene Swiſſes in his army, and in that of the French his enemies, enemies, he feared leaſt they ſhould play him the ſelfe ſame tricke as they had don to Sforza, becauſe he could not pay them. The Emperour beeing troubled with theſe and other ſuch like cogitations, feare hauing mightily poſſeſſed him, determined to leaue his army, and to returne into Germany, hauing cauſed it to be giuen forth that his departure was only to prouide money to pay his ſouldiers, and that he would ſoone returne againe. And in this reſolution, he went on his way with two hundred horſe onely.

The arriuall of the Swiſſes at Milan for the Kings ſeruice.

The Emperor diſtruſteth the Swiſſes.

Now the ſouldiers of the campe, perceiuing themſelues to be forſaken of their captaine, beganne to take a new party, as their particular profit vrged them. The Swiſſes went to Lodi, which had yeelded to the Emperour when hee croſſed the Adda, where hauing waſted the country round about, they ſpoiled the towne, and had continued their rauaging, had not the other Swiſſes that lay in Milan proteſted againſt them, that if they did not abſtaine from ſo doing, that they, with the French and Venetians would come and aſſaile them. Vpon theſe threatnings they ceaſſed from ſpoyling, and hauing remained peaceably there for certaine daies, they returned home into their country, (ſome excepted) who with Marke Setio their captaine went to gard Verona, the like did Marke Antonio Colonna with his cauallery, and Spaniſh and Almaine foot.

The Marquis of Brandenbourg commeth to the Emperours army.

Soone after the Emperours departure the Marquis of Brandenbourg came to the campe with certaine ſummes of money, who although he vſed all meanes to ſtay the ſouldiers, who were already disbanded, all things being in confuſion, and the money likewiſe not being ſufficient for the payment of the whole army, hee loſt but his labour.

The French Kings complaints againſt the Pope.

Amideſt theſe troubles, the ſmall loue and affection betwixt the Pope and the French King, began to ſhew it ſelfe, the which till then lay hidden. The King complained for that the Pope being mooued with a bad intent, had made ſo long delay to ſend that aide to the campe which he was tied to by their agreement; That he had ſecretly ſtirred vp the Swiſſes againſt him, and had in diuers other matters manifeſted his ſmall affection towards him. The Pope on the other ſide alleadged diuers cauſes which had mooued him to ſuſpect the Kings friendſhip. The Venetians did all they might at ſundry times to accord theſe Princes, and to take away al ſuſpition from them, knowing very well how important a matter it was, for the Pope, the French King, and their Republike to be vnited together.

The Emperors deſeignes come to nothing.

Whileſt this agreement was handled by Ambaſſadors, all the enemies deſeignes turned into ſmoake. For beſides the Swiſſes, who were gonne home into their country (as hath beene ſaid) three thouſand Spaniſh and Almain foot, came to the French and Venetian campes, who hauing croſſed the Riuer Adda, had for certaine daies mightily moleſted the enemies, by diuers and ſundry accidents, the French now hauing the worſe, and anon the enemies.

Lautrec beſeegeth Breſſia.

The Duke of Burbon being at the ſame time departed forth of Italy, the Lord Lautrec remained Gouernor for the King in the Dutchy of Milan, who marched ſpeedily with all the French and Venetian forces on the Breſſan territory, where with the ordnance he began to batter Breſſia in foure ſeuerall places, to the end the beſeeged might not be able to make reſiſtance in ſo many places at once, who held out ſo long as they had any hope of aide, which they expected out of the country of Tirol, it being promiſed them, but it came to nothing, by reaſon that the Venetians did ſhut vp the caſtle of Anſe and other paſſages, ſo as the townesmen being not willing to endure an aſſault, becauſe of the great breach that was made, couenanted to leaue the city and caſtle (their gods and liues being ſaued) if they were not releeued within three daies, on condition that the ſouldiers might goe any whether ſauing to Verona. Icaro, the Cities captaine, came forth of the towne, and the Lord Lautrec with the Venetian Prouidators entred it at the ſame time, where they were ioyfully receiued by all the inhabitants, who by their cries and ſalutations did manifeſt their great content, for that the City was reduced Breſſia yeeldeth on compoſition.

vnder

vnder the power of the common-wealth. Lautrec at his entry, tooke poſſeſſion of the towne, and afterwards redeliuered it to the Venetian Prouidators, who ſoone erected the Republikes ſtandard. In this manner did this famous City, after many thwarts and accidents of fortune, returne to the obedience of her lawfull Lords.

Lautrec being maſter of Breſſa doth furniſh, & reſtore it to the Venetians.

The newes of the reddition of Breſſia being brought to Venice, did greatly reioyce the whole City, all men hoping that this happy ſucceſſe would be followed with more fortunate euents which would giue end to the warres. The Senate did particularly thanke the French King, for that by meanes of his aide they had preuailed: They likewiſe wrote to the Lord of Lautrec, infinitely commending his ſpeed and loyalty, exhorting him not to let ſlip the occaſion which offered it ſelfe of other moſt fortunate exploits, as was that of Verona, if without delay the army might be brought before it, by the taking of which City, the warre with wonderfull ſpeed would be ended.

Lautrec being mooued by theſe words reſolued ſodainely to diſcampe, and with Triuulcio to march towards Verona. But being come to Peſcara he had intelligence that thoſe fiue Cantons of Swiſſes with whom the King was not in league made preparations to come and aſſaile the Dutchy of Milan, Hee then told the Prouidators that in regard of his Kings ſeruice he could not be abſent ſo farre from the State of Milan.

Lautrec marcheth to beſiege Verona.

This buſineſſe beeing debated in councell, all men were of opinion to remaine in the ſame place where they were, and there to expect more certaine newes of thoſe ſtirres, the report whereof was yet vncertaine. But the rumor of the Swiſſes comming, ſtill encreaſing, Lautrec was deſirous to bring backe his army into the Dutchy of Milan, notwithſtanding that all the other captaines were of a contrary opinion, ſhewing how the ſytuation of the place was very ſtrong and moſt commodious, where they might reſolue on whatſoeuer ſhould bee needfull, and prouide for all things neceſſary to ſtoppe the enemies paſſage, of whoſe comming they were yet vncertaine. Hee on the contrary remayning firme in his reſolution to diſcampe, propounded that he would goe and encampe on the Breſſan territory neere to Aſola, alleadging for his reaſons, that Verona being well manned with ſouldiers as well Swiſſes as Almaines who had retired thither after the rout of the Emperours army, that it would bee labour loſt to beſeege it, ſo as to attempt a difficult enterprize without great hope to effect it, would hinder their other affaires, and confound all order of warre.

Sundry opinions in Lautrecs campe.

Beſides, hee made vſe of other excuſes, namely, how that the Venetians had conferred with the King of Polands Ambaſſador who ſpake to them of peace, and that the money promiſed to pay the Almaines, was not yet ſent to the campe. Gritti the Prouidator oppoſing himſelfe to what Lautrec had ſpoken, ſaid, That he knew of a certaine, that there was great ſcarcity of all things in Verona, and chiefly of corne, whereby the ſouldiers that were come thither, did more hurt then good to the city, that they ought not to giue them time to make prouiſion, leaſt that afterwards the enterprize would prooue more difficult: That hee had intelligence by the ſouldiers that were come to their campe, that the townesmen and ſouldiers were at diſſenſion among themſelues, that all things were in confuſion, by meanes whereof the affaires of warre was managed more ſlowly, and with great ſuſpition: ſo as if the army were but before it, the people beeing partly prouoked by their owne intereſt, and partly likewiſe by their loue which they did beare to the Venetians, might raiſe ſome tumult, and giue them meanes for to enter the City: As for the Ambaſſador of Poland, that the Senate had not treated with him of peace without the knowledge of the French King, whom they did ſo honour and reuerence, as they had refuſed ſundry and honeſt conditions of agreement, becauſe that they would not diſunite themſelues from him: As for the payment of Excuſes alleadged by Lautrec, that he might diſcampe.

Gritti the Prouidator, his anſwer to Lautrec.

the Almaines, the money was ready long before, and ſhould be brought to the campe ſo ſoone as any ſafe meanes of ſending it ſhould be preſented. But when I conſider that you meane to depart hence, to goe and encampe on the Breſſan country, I am greatly troubled thereat, as are all thoſe of ouncity, becauſe the people of that country, who are very louing and loyall to our Republike, and by warre haue endured infinite miſeries, ſhould be againe tormented by the arriuall of the army, now when they beganne to recouer themſelues and to breath, ſo as by this meanes, we ſhall charge and oppreſſe our friends, to eaſe our enemies.

The Venetians reſolution.

Gritti hauing vttered this ſpeech, added, that if Lautrec would not follow them, he was reſolued to paſſe with the Venetian army vpon the Verona territory, wherevnto the Generall and all the Venetian captaines gaue their conſent. But hauing afterwards, maturely conſidered the miſchiefe which that diuiding of the army might procure to the Common-wealth, they did ſolicite and entreat Lautrec, to paſſe on, but he would by no meanes harken therevnto, and all that they could obtaine of him, was, that he would a while longer ſtay in that place, and expect (as he ſaid) money from France, and that the Venetians in the meane time ſhould make greater prouiſions of money, artillery and munition; but the chiefe cauſe of his abode there was, to heare what end the treaty of Noyon would come to betwixt his King, and the King of Spaine: employing in the meane ſpace his armes vpon the poore country men. For Lautrec hauing made a bridge at the village of Monzarban, was ready to reape downe all the corne of the Veronois, and to waſte the champian country by his light horſe, hauing to theſe ends ſent part of his army to lodge on the Mantuan territory, where it grieuouſly ſpoiled and waſted that country.

The cauſe which moued Lautrec to ſtay ſtill where he was.

The Lord of Lautrec being afterwards moued by the Venetians great complaints, croſſed the Adicé, at Gothalonga, where after that his ſouldiers had taken great booties, he drew neere to Verona, but it was after that the Venetians had proteſted not to giue him the money which was come to the campe for to pay the Almaines, vnleſſe he would march to Verona. Lautrec with his army hauing croſſed (as hath beene ſaid) the Adicé, his captaines did firſt of all ſeize on all the ſtreight paſſages of the mountaines, thorow which the Almaines were wont to come forth of Germany to Verona, to the end that they being ſhut vp and ſtopt, no ſuccor might come to the City. The Swiſſes on the other ſide hauing all of them in a manner left Verona, deteſting the ſeege, were gon home into their country.

The number of the Venetians army.

The Venetians army, with the French aide, conſiſted of eight thouſand Italian foot and of ſixe thouſand Almaines paied by King Francis, of a thouſand men at armes, and two thouſand light horſe, with diuers great captaines well experienced in the art military. Theſe forces being come before Verona, they were diuided into two campes, to batter the City at one time in two ſeuerall places, thereby the more to moleſt the beſeeged, who were already reduced to a very ſmall number.

The Lanſquenets refuſe to beſeege a City belonging to the Emperour.

The French comming to execute what had beene determined, the Lanſequenets although they had receiued three monthes pay of the Venetian Prouidators, either of their owne proper motion, or elſe being ſuborned by the Emperour, proteſted that they would not come to the ſeege of a City which was belonging to the Emperours poſſeſſions, to which the French King had no particular claime, and ſo by no meanes would paſſe on any further: wherevpon Lautrec repaſſing the Adicé, lay a mile off from the walles of Verona, and the Venetian army where the Lanſquenets remained (fiue hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſe and foure thouſand foot beeing gonne away) not thinking it a ſafe matter to remaine beyond the Riuer, went and ioyned with him.

The army diſlodgeth by reaſon of the Lanſquenets refuſall.

In the meane time the Cities forces did dayly decreaſe, by reaſon that diuers

Almain

Almaine companies returned home into their country, and others went to the Venetians campe, where they reſolued to entertaine no more of them, by reaſon that they did ſome-what diſtruſt them. Wee muſt thinke that the number of thoſe who at the beginning were in Verona, was very great, for albeit many of them were gone from thence, it was neuer-the-leſſe ſufficiently well mand with ſoldiers: in regard wherof the Lord Lautrec, meaning not to hazard any thing, but vpon a certaine hope of good ſucceſſe, demanded greater aide of the Venetians, if they would haue the army to march before Verona. The Venetians albeit they found it very difficult, in reſpect of the quality of the matter and the time, yet neuertheleſſe becauſe they would not foreſlow an enterprize, which did ſo much import them, hauing ſpeedily gathered together foure thouſand foot out of their owne ſtate, they ſent them to the campe, with greate ſtore of artillery, pouder, and victualls, by the riuer Adicé, to the end that the campe ſhould want nothing.

The Venetians ſend ſupplies to the army.

Within Verona, which was ſtrong by ſytuation and art, and wel furniſhed with all kinds of artillery, were, beſides the cauallery, ſixe thouſand foot, as well Spaniards and Almans, as Suiſſes, commanded by Mark Antonio Colonna their General, who was no more in the Popes pay but in the Emperors, a man excellently experienced in martiall matters.

What forces were in Verona.

This man had diligently prouided for whatſoener was neceſſary for the Cities defence.

Lautrec approching the walls, diuided his army into two parts, He went and encamped with his infantery and cauallery on that ſide which looketh towards Mantua: And Triuulcio hauing croſſed the Adicé with the Venetian forces, ſeated his campe againſt the wals towards Vincenza. The battery began at one time in both thoſe places, but with ſundry intents, becauſe that Lautrec did batter it furiouſly in one only place, to open away into the City, and to take from the enemies the meanes to repaire it: But Triuulcio being encamped more at large did batter a great ſpace of the wall, hoping that it being beaten to the ground, he might with more aduantage come to the aſſault.

Verona beſeeged in two ſeuerall places.

Lautrec hauing eſpied a place neere to the gate Calcina, which was not very ſtrong, being rampierd only with a weake old tower, he planted his ordnance againſt it, which being throwne downe, he commanded the ſouldiers to goe to the aſſault, who vpon hope of the ſacke of that ritch City, went to it valliantly, and came without feare of the ordnance or Harquebuze ſhot vpon the breach; fighting with the enemies hand to hand, where the French did brauely behaue themſelues: but the enemies hauing brought certaine peeces of ordnance to play in flanke vpon the breach, the French were enforced with great loſſe of their people to retire to the campe. But Triuulce notwithſtanding that the breach was very great, did neuertheleſſe delay to giue the aſſault, knowing very well that the beſeeged, hauing well fortified the place where the firſt aſſault was giuen, were gonne to the other breach to the aide of their fellowes, whereof Triuulcio haning acquainted Lautrec, entreated him to ſend him more aide, that he might the ſafelier goe to the aſſault.

Aſſault giuen to Verona.

The aſſailants retire with loſſe.

Now al-be-it Lautrec had meanes to doe it, for the commodiouſneſſe of going from one army to an other, vpon a very ſtrong bridge ouer the Adicé, and that he did often promiſe to do it, did neuertheleſſe delay the matter. And the campe had already laine fifteene daies before the towne, the enemies were reduced to extremity, the cannon had beaten downe a great ſpace of the wall, the ſouldiers within the City were wearied with continuall factions, they wanted powder, the captains and the townesmen did not agree together, and yet for all that, none of theſe matters could mooue him to make haſt to force the City.

Lautrec delayeth.

Newes in the meane time came to the campe, how that great numbers of Almaine foot-men were comming to releeue the beſeeged. Theſe newes did amaze Lautrec more then there was cauſe, and diſtaſted him of continuing the ſeege, ſo as hee thought on nothing more then how to retire his army into ſome place of ſafety. The Venetian Prouidators being aduertized of this ſodaine reſolution, came vnto him, where after diuers remonſtrances of the great blemiſh he ſhould doe to his honour and reputation to raiſe his campe, they infinitely entreated him with great earneſtneſſe to temporize for a while longer, and not to depart till the enemies were arriued, that they might ſee what they were: But all their entreaties could not diuert him from his firſt reſolution. Whereupon he commanded on a ſodaine to diſcampe, ſo as all his troupes went to Albareda. Paul Gradonic the Prouidator, and Iohn Paul Manfron remained for the gard of the bridge, with eight hundred horſe, as well men at armes as light horſe-men, and two thouſand foot, fearing if the ſame were broken their army might want victuals, but they tarried not long there, for they forth-with went on to Villa Franca, where they fortified their campe.

The Venetians remonſtrance to Lautrec.

The Venetians ſtay to gard the bridge.

In the meane time Rocandolf Colonel of the Almaine foot (the French and Venetian army being retired) entred Verona without any empediment, and hauing releeued it with victuals and new ſouldiers in their ſtead that were hurt, returned into Germany: whereupon the Prouidators, did againe ſolicite the Lord of Lautrec to returne to the ſeege of Verona, and not to ſpend time ſo vnprofitably. But Lautrec comforting them vſed diuers excuſes for his ſlowneſſe, aſſuring them that the City of Verona ſhould ſhortly be reduced vnder the Venetians power.

Rocandolf the Almain victuall. th Verona.

The Prouidator having ſeriouſly ruminated theſe words in his minde, beganne to doubt of ſome treaty which did not appeare; and namely becauſe that at the ſame time as the campe diſlodged from before Verona, the report was that a meſſenger came from France to Lautrec, who had ſecret conference with him, and entreated him to keepe cloſe his comming. Therefore the Prouidators did earneſtly entreat Lautrec to diſcouer vnto them what hee knew thereof, to the end they might be no longer enforced to entertaine ſo great an army, which charged the Republike with a merueilous expence: the Senate likewiſe being aduertized by the Prouidators of what had paſt, had the ſame thoughts, at ſuch time as they had newes from their Ambaſſador in the French Kings Court of that which had paſſed at Noyon: Becauſe that King Francis beeing deſirous that the Venetians ſhould haue time to conſult of their affaires, would forthwith haue them to be acquainted with the treaty of Noyon betwixt him and the Arch-duke Charles, to the end that the Commiſſioners of both Princes comming to Bruſſels, ſhould find all difficulties to be taken away and reſolued on.

The Prouidators and Venetian Senate in great care.

For what cauſe the French king would haue the Venetians to be aduertized of the treaty.

The ſumme of the treaty concluded at Noyon, was thus: That there ſhould be a perpetuall peace betwixt the French King and the King of Spaine, and a confederacy for the defence of their States againſt all men, in the which were comprehended all other Princes, friends or allies, of either of them. That King Francis ſhould giue the Lady Renè, daughter to the late King Lewis, in marriage to the King of Spaine. That the ſaid King ſhould within a certaine time re-deliuer the Kingdome of Nauarre to her antient King. That the Emperour might within two monthes enter into that peace, and though he ſhould enter into the league, the French King might helpe the Venetians to recouer Verona: the which if the Emperour would within ſixe weekes commit to the King of Spaine, with power to giue it freely to the French King, to diſpoſe thereof as hee ſhould thinke fit, the King ſhould pay vnto him a hundred thouſand crownes, and the Venetians an other hundred thouſand, part whereof ſhould bee paied at the conſignation thereof, and the reſt within ſixe monthes after, and that he ſhould likewiſe be acquitted of three hundred thouſand crownes which he had receiued of King Lewis whileſt they were confederates.

The ſum of the treaty of Noyon.

The Venetians doubting whether the Emperour would accept of peace on theſe conditions, did not ceaſe to ſolicite the Lord of Lautrec to beſeege Verona;

and

and alſo in regard of the ſumme of money they were to pay, which they deſired rather to recouer by armes. But peace was more agreeable to the French King then force, being deſirous of accord with the Emperour: yet neuertheleſſe Lautrec not knowing how to excuſe himſelfe to the Venetians, who had made what prouiſions ſoeuer hee craued, as alſo becauſe the Lanſequenets did no more refuſe to goe to the ſeege, he condeſcended to their requeſt and went againe and encamped before Verona.

Verona againe beſeeged.

Now whileſt the French on the one ſide, and the Venetians on the other were buſied in the battery, nine thouſand Lanſquenets arriued, who were ſent by the Emperour to releeue it. For the Emperor, being ſolicited by the Cardinall of Syon, and by the King of England, would not harken to a peace, ſo as his commiſſioners were ready to depart from Bruxels, without any concluſion, when the Emperour vnderſtood that the French King had made a league with all the Swiſſes by meanes of a great ſumme of money: for then he ſeemed to be very deſirous of peace with the French and Venetians, al-be-it that at the arriuall of theſe nine thouſand Lanſquenets, the campe did riſe from before Verona, and was retired to Villa-franca.

The Emperor wholy enclineth peace.

The matter then was concluded at Bruxels as well with the King of Spaine as with the Emperor, in the manner aboue ſaid, the which going ſlowly on, was haſtned by King Francis, on condition that there ſhould be truce with the Venetians. The whole buſineſſe being thus ended, the Biſhop of Trent was ſent to the Lord of Lautrec, to conſigne the City of Verona, in the King of Spaines name, to the French King within the ſpace of ſixe weekes, according to the contents of the Capitulation, the which was done on the fifteenth day of Ianuary 1517. after the Venetians had paied the firſt fifty thouſand crownes, and fifteene thouſand to the foot-men that were in the City: whereupon at the very inſtant the Lord of Lautrec, in the name of the ſaid King, gaue it to the Senate of Venice, and for the ſaid Senate, to André Gritti and Iohn Paul Gradonic the Prouidators, to the great contentment of the Nobility, and the whole people of Venice, who did highly reioyce, for that after infinite expences and labors, they had made a fortunate end of ſo long and dangerous a warre.

Verona conſigned to the Lord Lautrec for the French King, is preſently deliuered to the Venetians.

But if they reioyced in Venice, they did no leſſe in Verona, and in all the towns round about, hoping that by meanes of that peace they ſhould be freed from all thoſe troubles and miſeries which they had ſo long a time endured. After all theſe demonſtrations of ioy, the Senate acknowledging the Lord of Lautrec for a wiſe and valliant captaine, after they had preſented him with great guifts, they commanded the Prouidator Gritti, to accompany him to Milan. But being come as farre as Lodi, he found Iohn Iames Triuulce there, who came to meet and to bring him from the King the order of Saint Michel. Gritti hauing orderly performed his commiſſion, tooke his leaue of him, and returned, according as the Senate had commanded him, to the country newly reconquered.

The great ioy of the Veronois for that they were reduced vnder the ſubiection of the Venetians.

The Senates acknowledgement to the Lord Lautrec.

The end of the third Booke of the fifth Decade.

The Contents of the fourth Booke of the fifth Decade.

He Impoſitions and taxes laied vpon the people during the warre, are in time of peace reuoked. The vniuerſity of Padua, re-eſtabliſhed. The Senate ſend two Ambaſſadors to Selim Emperor of Turkes. The great victories obtained by Selim. He granteth the Venetians demands. The Venetians ſend an Ambaſſade to Charles King of Spaine concerning trafficke. Truce prolonged betwixt the Emperour Maximillian and the Venetians. The Emperour Maximillians death. The French and Spaniſh Kings aſpire to the Empire. Charles King of Spaine is choſen Emperour. Soliman, by the death of Selim, his father, obteineth the Empire of the Turkes. Lewis King of Hungary hath recourſe to the Princes of Chriſtendome. The Venetians in league with Soliman. The French King diſtruſteth the new choſen Emperor. The Emperor elect ſeeketh the friendſhip of the Venetians. The comming of Soliman into the Realme of Hungary enforceth King Lewis to implore the Venetians aide, who lend him thirty thouſand Ducats. The Turke taketh Belgrade, the chiefe City of Hungary. The King of England is choſen vmpire and mediator for the ſtrife betwixt the Emperour and the French King. The French King & the King of England talke together. Why the league that was determined betwixt the Pope, the French King, and the Venetians, was not concluded and ſigned. A ſecret agreement made betwixt the Pope and the Emperour. The Imperialls practizes on the Dutchy of Milan. The Pope inuenteth matter of diſcontent, that hee might leaue the French King. The ſecret intelligences that the Pope and Emperour had with the Bandetti of Milan. The Venetians refuſe to giue paſſage to the Emperours army thorow their territory. In what manner the Venetians did releeue the State of Milan. Parma beſeeged by the Imperialls, and ſodainely recouered by the Lord of Lautrec. The army of the league paſſeth the Adda, and commeth to Milan.

The

The Swiſſes forſake the French for want of pay. Proſpero by the aduertice-ment of a Traytor marcheth directly to Milan. The ſuburbs of Milan and the Roman gate taken by the league. The Lord of Lautrec with his Cauallery re-tireth to Coma. Milan is taken and ſackt. The Imperialls take Coma, with diuers other townes. The ſodaine death of Pope Leo. Laſtly the reſolu-tion and preparations of the Lord of Lautrec and the Venetians to beſeege Milan.

10

The Fourth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

ARmes being laid a ſide by the meanes aboue-ſaid betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians, the Republike was three yeares at peace, which began at the entring of the yeare, 1517. Wherevpon all the cities of the firme land, which were by the laſt agreement reduced vnder the Venetians gouernment, ſent their deputies to Venice to reioyce with the Senate, for that to their honor, armes being laid downe, they had recouered al their ſtate, and to offer like-wiſe all their meanes and forces to the common-wealth.

30

The Senates cheefe care was to diſcharge the citty of Venice and all other townes and Villages of the firme land from diuers taxes and impoſitions laid vpon them during the warre, by reaſon of the ſmall meanes of the publike treaſury: to the end that particular men, encreaſing their meanes by peace, if afterward any need ſhould be, they might bee more ready to releeue the publike with their wealth. It was decreed like-wiſe that all thoſe who ſerued the common wealth in any place whatſoeuer, ſhould euer after bee wholy paid their wages, which had not bin done during the warre. In a word they omitted nothing which they knew to bee commodious or honorable for the Signory.

The Senate diſ-burdeneth the commonwealth in time of peace.

40

They did like-wiſe re-eſtabliſh the Vniuerſity of Padua, which had beene vnfre-quented for the ſpace of eight yeares. Then becauſe they would no more fall in-to thoſe inconueniences, as they had done for want of prouiding fortifications ne-ceſſary for their Cities, they began to fortifie them, and cheefely the two famous cities, Padua and Verona, the two cheefeſt of their ſtate on the firme land: and for that purpoſe Andre Gritte, and George Cornare were appointed, who going to thoſe places ſhould reſolue by the aduice and councell of Triuulcio, and the other experienced Captaines of the Venetian army, on that which was to be done, By which meanes, diuers places being ruined in time of warre, were by them re-eſtabliſhed, and many others newly built.

The Vniuerſity of Padua reeſ-tabliſhed by th. Senate.

50

But becauſe the friendſhip of the Ottomans was very neceſſary for them, as well for the conſeruation of peace, as for the cities trafficke, they decreed to ſend two Ambaſſadors to Selim Emperor of Turkes: Ledouico Moncenigo, and Bartholomeo Contaren

The Venetians ſend two Am-baſſadors to the great Turke.

Contaren were choſen for that purpoſe to goe and congratulate him in the name of the Republike, for all the goodly victories that hee had obtayned. For Selim in an incounter hauing vanquiſhed his brother Achomat, and put him publikely to death, did like-wiſe ouer-come the Adulians, who are a very valiant people of the mountaines: then going into Perſia againſt the Sophi, hee defeated him in ſet battaille, and tooke the citty of Tauris, the cheefe ſeate of that Empire, with the greateſt part of Perſia, the which he was enforced to abandon, for want of victuallls, becauſe that yeare had beene very ſcarce. Returning aftetwards to Conſtantinople, hauing refreſhed and re-enforced his army, hee turned his forces vpon the Soldan of Suria and Ægypt, who was a Prince alwaies highly eſteemed by thoſe of that Religion, and like-wiſe very potent, as well for the extent of his dominions, as for the eperience and military diſcipline of the Mamalukes, for by their armes they had poſſeſſed the ſame Empire, with great reputatiõ for the ſpace of 300. yeares. Selim then being come with his army againſt this kinde of people, defeated them ſoundry times in field, ſo as the Soldan was ſlaine, and an other Soldan his ſucceſſor was taken in battaill, whome ignominiouſly he put to death openly: hee made beſide, a great ſlaughter of thoſe Mamaluks, and thereby in a manner did wholy root out their name: hee tooke Cairo, which is a populous citty, and the Soldans ordinary reſidence, and in a ſhort-time ſeaſed on all Suria and Ægypt. Al theſe great victories and encreaſes of his Empire, had not without cauſe giuen occaſion to all Chriſtian Princes to ſtand in awe of him, and cheefely the Venetians, of whome hee pretended to demand a yeerely tribute, of 8000. Ducats, which the Kings of Cyprus were wont to pay to the Soldans of Ægipt in times before. Now the Venetian Ambaſſadors being embarked at Venice, did firſt touch at Cyprus, and from thence they went to Damaſco, where Selim returning from his victories had wintered with al his army. The Senate had expreſly enioyned them to procure, that the Venetian marchants who dwelt at Tripoli, Alexandria, Barath, Damaſco, and other marchant places of thoſe Prouinces, might be maintayned there in the ſelfe ſame priuiledges, which they were wont to enioy in former times, graunted vnto them by the former Kings of Suria and Ægypt: That it might like-wiſe bee lawfull for the Signory, to haue their Magiſtrates in thoſe places with the ſame authority they were wont to haue, to doe iuſtice to their Cittizens in their ſtrife about marchandize, and other ſuch like buſineſſe. Selim ayming at other ends did eaſily graunt it, as wel for the deſire he had to entertaine the Venetians friendſhip, as to reſtore trafick to his new conquered Prouinces, whereby great profit and commodity might redound to him. At the ſame time for the ſame purpoſe an Ambaſſador was appointed to goe to Charles King of Spaine, to the end that it might be lawfull for the Venetians to traffick thorow all the lands and ſignories newly fallen to him, as they were wont to doe in the life time of King Fernand in Spaine, becauſe that his officers did ſeeme to make ſome difficulty in it, in regard of the trade with Africke, whereof it ſhall not not be impertinent to ſay ſome thing by the way. The antient founders of the citty had ſpeciall care, that the cittizens of their new citty ſhould exercize them-ſelues in voyages and ſea-traffick, to bee able by their vertuous induſtry to encreaſe their domeſticke meanes and faculties, and make themſelues knowne to forraine nations. The ſituation of their citty inuited them there-vnto becauſe the Inhabitants had not they any inheritãces wheron to buſie themſelues. Whervpon they decreed diuers ſhips ſhould traficke into ſondry places of Chriſtendome, and of the Infidells, in which they ſent diuers gentlemen, to learne them nauigation, and other matters belonging to the ſea: ſome of whome remained for a time among thoſe forraine nations, and cheefely wher there was greateſt trading, negotiating for themſelues and others, whereby, beſides the greate wealth which they purchaſed, they made themſelues fit by experience for great maters, ſo as returning afterwards to Venice they readyly executed all matters, committed to them.

Selims victories.

The Mamalukes vanquiſhed by Selim.

Selim takes Cairo.

Selim granteth the Venetians demands.

The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to Charles King of Spaine concerning trafick

Now

Now the places whether theſe veſſels, (which were commonly called ſhippes of traffick) vſed to goe at their departure from Venice, was firſt into Sicily to the Citty of Saragoſſa, from thence to Tripoli in Barbary, and hauing coaſted the Iland of Gerbes, they paſſed on to Tunis: from thence they directed their courſe to the realme of Tremiſen, ſtaying cheefely at Tuſen and at Mega, two excellent Marchant townes, called at this day Ona and Orana. Then they went to diuers places of the Kingdome of Marocco, and touching at all the hauens of Barbery, which were antiently comprized vnder the Prouinces of Mauritania and Numidia, they ſailed into Spaine.

The vſuall trade of the Venetian veſſels.

But their traffick was very different, for at their departure from Venice, they carried to the Affrican Moores ſondry kindes of mettalls, and woollen cloathes which they ſould there: then comming into Spaine they bought ſondry kinds of merchandize as ſilk, wool, graine, and other things which they found in the contrey, with which being laden they returned to Venice. This traffick then being interrupted by the difficulties which the agents of the new King of Spaine did ſet abroach, and by reaſon of other accidents that did happen is wholly loſt.

But to returne to our diſcourſe, the Venetians perceiuing that a great part of the time of truce betwixt the Emperour and them was ſpent, they thought it neceſſary to come to ſome new agreement with him; the which the Pope deſired, and that it might be by his meanes at Rome. But the Venetians truſting more to the moſt Chriſtian King, referred the whole matter to him, and made means that the Emperour ſhould to that end ſend his Ambaſſadors into France, who comming thither, and concluding no peace the truce by the Kings meanes was prolonged betwixt them for fiue yeares, on condition that for euery of the fiue yeares they ſhould pay twenty thouſand crownes to the Emperour. The occaſion of this truce, was, becauſe that the Pope being mooued by the Turkes fortunate ſucceſſe, beganne to thinke on other milder matters; he ſent Breefs to all Chriſtian Princes putting them in mind of the danger which threatened them, requeſting them that all diſcords and contentions being layd aſide, they would ſpeedily prouide for the defence of Chriſtian religion, and for their common ſafety, the which was expoſed to very great dangers, vnleſſe that they being vnited together did tranſport the warre into Turky, in regard of the encreaſe of Selims Empire, and his great deſire of rule and ſoueraignty, which would prouoke him at laſt to oppreſſe all other Princes, as he had done by the Souldan of Egipt and the Mamalucks.

Truce renewed betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians.

The Pope exhorteth chriſtian Princes to take armes againſt the Turkes.

Theſe things being by the Pope repreſented to the Venetians as well as to other Chriſtian Princes, were cauſe that the Venetians conſented to the truce (as hath beene ſaid) made by the French King betwixt the Emperour and them, ſeeing that peace could be hardly concluded on: to the end they would not ſeeme by their refuſall to turne away ſo great a good from all Chriſtendome. But as for the popes propoſition, made particularly vnto them to take Armes againſt Selim, they anſwered that when they ſhould ſee matters ſet foreward, and earneſtly purſued, the Venetian Senat would be more ready for that enterprize then any elſe, and would neuer faile of their duty, knowing very well how much it did import them, not only in regard of the common intereſt of all Chriſtendome, and for the Popes entreaties and exhortation, as becauſe their Sea-ſtate did border vpon that mighty enemy, the which he would in a moment aſſaile, and moleſt with all outrages, before the Confederates Army would be ready to enter into his Contrey.

The Venetians anſwere to the Popes exhortation.

Soone after this treaty of truce the Emperour Maximilian fell ſick and dyed at Lynx in the beginning of the yeare. 1519. which is a towne ſeated on the marches of Auſtria, his death being knowne to the ſoldiers that lay in Garriſon at Gradiſca and Maran, they ſallied foorth vppon the lands belonging to the common

The Emperor Maximilians death.

Common-wealth, robbing and ſpoyling the Venetians ſubiects, executing diuers other hoſtile actions. The Senate wrote to the Lieutenants of the Empire, ſaying That for their partes they would keepe, and obſerue the truce, and not make any innouation becauſe of the Emperors death: but that they like-wiſe ſhould doo well, to containe, their ſoldiers in peaceable manner, and keepe them from making any more incurſions vpon their Territories: The Lieutenants thinking this to bee iuſt and reſonable, the truce was inuiolably obſerued euery where.

The French and Spaniſh King aſpire to the Emperor.

In the meane time, preparation was made for the election of a new Emperor: The French King and the King of Spaine, two great and excellent Princes, began openly to aſpire therevnto: And albeit the practize was of great importance betwixt two ſuch mighty Ptinces, yet neuer-the-leſſe they handled the matter on both ſides very modeſtly, without any iniurious ſpeeches or warlik menaces, each of them ſeeking by his owne authority, and meanes, to draw the Electors on his ſide: But the Italians did ſtand in awe of either of their powers, fearing that which of them two ſhould attaine that dignity, would by the aide of the Almains enuade all Italy, and ioyne it to the Empire, as it had beene in times before: ſo that either of their elections could not but bee very much diſtaſtfull, and greeuous to the Italians: and yet for al that they inclined more to the French King, then to the Catholik Maieſty, for diuers cauſes, and cheefely becauſe the French, as a ſtranger ſhould not beare ſuch authority in Germany as the King of Spaine, who was deſcended from thence, and by that meanes might turne them at his pleaſure: So as the Pope and the Venetians did rather fauour the French Kings party then the Spaniards, and the French ſending his Ambaſſador for the ſame purpoſe to Rome and Venice, they were honorably entertayned, and freely audienced.

The French Kings requeſt to the Venetians.

Now beſides theſe Ambaſſadors the French King ſent the Lord of Teligni to Venice, as well for this purpoſe as for diuers and ſundry other negotiations, and among others to entreate them to lend him ſome good ſtore of mony, to ſupply his great expence hee was to make, if hee ſhould bee choſen Emperor, and alſo that they would ſend forces into Germanie, to aſſiſt the Electors, to the end they might not be enforced in their election, and to aske them what they would haue him to doe if Charles ſhould enter with an army into Italy, to enforce the Pope to free him from the oath made to Pope Iulius the ſecond, concerning the inueſtiture of the Realme of Naples.

The Venetians anſwer to the French King.

The Senate made anſwer to the Ambaſſadors demands, That in regard of their great obligation to the French King, albeit their treaſour was much exhauſted by the late warres, they would neuer-the-leſſe ſtriue to ayde him with an hundred thouſand Ducats: But for to ſend forces into Germany, it would ſmalely avayle the King, and greatly hurt them, Beſides, the Almains would neuer ſuffer their ſoldiers to paſſe, the paſſages being very ſtreight and wel garded. As for Charles his paſſage, if without being prouoked there-vnto he would enter armed into Italy againſt the moſt Holy Father of Rome, that the Venetians would no leſſe ſhew them-ſelues defenders, and protectors of the liberty and dignity Eccleſiaſticall, then their Anceſtors had done, preferring the greatneſſe therof before that of the Empire.

Charles king of Spaine choſen Emperor.

During theſe treaties of King Francis by his Ambaſſadors, Charles King of Spaine, being more apt to leuy ſolders with mony, then to giue it to the Electors, ſent an army into the field, vnder collour of keeping the election from beeing forced, the which drawing neere to Franckfort, did encourrage thoſe Electors that fauored his cauſe, and made thoſe which wandred to encline to him, ſo as Charles of Auſtria, King of Spaine, was choſen Emperor the eight and twentith day of Iune, which was at the very ſelfe ſame time that Soliman the ſonne of Selim did peaceably obtaine, without any contradiction, the Ottaman Empire by the

the death of his father Selim : There was but one onely Captaine named Agazzell Gouernor of Suria, that did oppoſe it and make him-ſelfe maiſter of the Prouinces of his gouernment, who taking armes for that purpoſe, his rebellion was ſoone appeaſed, and all the other Prouinces reduced vnder Solymans obedience, remained peaceable.

He was noted to be of a haughty courage, and fit for high enterprizes, and a great enemy to Chriſtendome: yet notwithſtanding Chriſtian Princes, not conſidering the perills and dangers which followed them at the heeles, ſuffered this young Prince, their naturall enemy, to grow great, whilſt they had time to abate his power, by buſying him in the defence of his owne lands and Seignories, and meanes to keepe him from enuading thoſe of their neighbors.

Lewis King of Hungary prepareth for defence against the Turke.

Lewis King of Hungary alone, leuied ſoldiers, and made great preparations of warre, imploying all mens ayde and ſuccor, as one that feared this barbarous enemy, by reaſon that Solyman would not renew the truce which this King had made with his father Selim, whereupon he ſent his Ambaſſadors to the Chriſtian Princes, and cheefely to Rome and Venice, entreating, exhorting, and admoniſhing them of other mens ruine and loſſe by the example of his owne neere at hand.

The Venetians anſwered him that the power and greatneſſe of the Ottomans was ſo mightely encreaſed, as all Princes and Potentates ſtood in awe thereof, and cheefely themſelues, by reaſon their State was to neere a neighbor to them: that they had neuer refuſed ſuch offers, but that they on the contrary had ſolicited other Princes, to oppoſe themſelues againſt the mightineſſe of their Empire, which they ſaw did daily encreaſe: but that they of them-ſelues alone and with their owne forces could doe no great matter. Not long after, they ſent Marco Minio their Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople, who with their vſuall preſents was to procure the articles of peace to be confirmed in the ſame manner as ſome few yeares before Antonio Inſtiniano had done with Selim, and with the ſame authority, immunity and franchize.

The alliance is renewed betwixt Seliman and the Venetians.

Soliman ſhewed himſelfe very ready to graunt their demands, as beeing deſirous of their frendſhip and aliance, and for a demonſtration of his good will towards them, at the ſame time as Minio departed from Venice, Acmat Ferrat ſet foreward from the Port of the great Turke towards Venice, to giue them notice from him of his ſucceſſion in the Orientall Empires, and to renew their alliance begun with his father Selim. Beſides he was deſirous, (for that the Venetians trafficke into his Contries might be more free and ſafe,) with his owne forces to chaſe the Pirats that ſcoured the Leuant Seas, entreating the Venetians for their part to doe the like, to the end the nauigation might be aſſured.

The Venetians arme against the Pirats.

This renewing of their league with the Turke, did greatly proffit them, in regard their ſtate in Italy was not very firme, and by reaſon that the alarmes and ſuſpitions which they had conceiued at the beginning of the yeare, becauſe it was reported that the Turke armed, was by that meanes cleered: ſo as one part of the nauall Army that they had prepared vpon that rumor, ſailed into Barbary againſt the Pirats, of whom, many being taken, the paſſages were freed from danger. In this manner did the Venetians temporiſe with the Turke, vſing all means to keepe his friendſhip, deſpayring of being able to hurt him, ſo long as the Chriſtian Princes careleſſe of the common danger, were at ſtrife among themſelues.

VVhy the French King did diſtruſt the Elect Emperor.

Now the moſt Chriſtian King being ſom-what troubled with this election, and feating leaſt Charles of Auſtria, would turne his deſeignes vpon Italy to expulſe him from the ſtate of Milan, acquainted the Pope and the Venetians with the great danger that threatned them if they ſuffred the electedEmperor to paſſe with an army into Italy, and therefore he councelled them to enter into a threefold league league together, against those that would attempt to inuade any of their states, and specially to oppose themselues against the Emperors passage comming in armes to goe to Rome (as he said) to receiue the Imperiall Crowne, because he could not enter in that manner but to the great danger of all those who possessed any states in Italy.

After what manner the Pope would consent to the Kings proposition.

The Venetians soone consented to the French Kings proposition for the safety of their states. But the Pope being resolued what to doe, and ruminating sundry matters fed the King and the Venetians with faire hope: but when it came to the conclusion, he would not consent to haue any thing set downe in writing, saying, That in such a case the onely words of Princes did suffice, with their true meaning to execute what had beene concluded. In this manner the businesse being delayed, the French Kings heate in time beganne to coole.

The Venetians suspect the French King.

The Venetians had some suspition, that the King did secretly treat with the Emperor, and that the same might bee the cause why the Pope doubted, and prolonged the affaires that were concluded on. And that which did increase their suspition, was, for that they had certaine notice, that Artur Gouffier Lord of Boyssy, great maister of France, and the Lord de Cheures, met at Montpellier; the one from the elect Emperor, and the other from the King, to consult of a finall peace betwixt both their Maiesties, and to decide all controuersies betwixt them and their allies. The Venetians neuer-the-lesse still continuing their former resolution and firme desire, not to separate them-selues in any sort from the alliance of the French, made no shew that they suspected the King, (albeit his Maiesty was sufficiently aduertised of their suspition;) but held it for certaine, that if the King were desirous of agreement with the Emperor, they especially should be named and comprised therin, and all their contention with the Emperor should be wholy composed. Charles so soone as hee was chosen Emperor hauing turned his deseignes vpon Italy, knowing how much it did import him to haue the Venetians friendship, did shew him-selfe desirous to compose all the differences, which had beene betwixt the Emperor Maximilian his predecessor and them: and to effect this good desire, hee sent his commissioners to Verona, according as it was concluded in Maximillians life time, with ample power and authority, to conclude and decide, not onely the businesse of the truce for fiue yeares, but like-wise to end all other matters, which were yet vndecided two yeares before betwixt them. Francisco Pesare a long time before chosen by the Senate, for that purpose went to Verona, whither for the Emperors part came foure of the cheefe of the councell of Inspruch, who had ample power to negociate that businesse. Iohn Pin, the French Ambassador, came thither in his Kings name, who at the last truce was chosen Vmpier and Iudge of all their controuersies.

The demands of the Venetian commissioners.

The Venetians craued possession of all the places taken from them in the last warre, and that all things should remaine as they were before the warre, saying, That it was the surest meanes to end all their controuersies, and to establish a firme and assured peace. But the Imperialls alleadging now one thing, and then an other, did still delay the businesse, and would conclude on nothing, so as hauing spent certaine monthes there in vaine, and being recalled by the councel of Inspruch, they returned home.

The assembly is broken of without any conclusion, and the Venetians are put in hope of a prosperus end.

Yet neuertheless the Venetians hauing at the same time their Ambassadours in the Emperours Court, they were put in hope of a prosperous end of that businesse, and that the Emperour would speedily appoint Commissioners to intend it, beeing very desirous by meanes of a sure peace to become their good neighbour and perpetuall friend, his officers thereby shewing how much hee desired the Venetians friendship, who for their partes did in like manner declare, how they desired nothing more then peace: but that they could not (their faith kept inuiolate) doe any thing contrary to their alliance with the French King.

The Emperor seeketh the Venetians friendship.

The commissioners of the Emperor and the Venetians meet at Verona

After

After this manner did theſe two Princes at one time purſue the Venetians friendſhip and alliance, but by different waies, each of them ſeeking to make vſe of them in their enterprize of Italy: ſo as in theſe practizes and negotiations all that yeare paſſed on without any certaine reſolution. The yeare following which was 1520. Italy did ſtill continue peaceable, but Chriſtendome was threatened by Soliman, who perceauing his Empire to be at quiet, and all things to fall out as hee wiſhed, would not bee idle, but following rather the generouſneſſe of his Anceſtors, hee determined to take armes, and to warre vpon the Chriſtians. An. 1520.

Soliman reſolueth to enuade the Realme of Hungary.

This was a long time before foreſeene of many, but remedied by none. Following then this determination hee reſolued to enuade the realme of Hungary, hoping to reape great glory thereby, by reaſon that the Hungarians were reputed valliant and great ſoldiers. Therefore ſo ſoone as all things were ready hee departed from Conſtantinople, about the beginning of the yeare 1521. with a mighty army, and marched into Hungary. An. 1521.

King Lewis being amazed at the comming of ſo mighty an army, and diſtruſting his owne forces, did againe ſend new Ambaſſadors, to ſolicite and entreate Chriſtian Princes to aid him, it being the common cauſe of all Chriſtendome, Philippo Moro Biſhop of Agria was ſent to the Venetians, who being brought into the Senate, ſpake in this manner. My King, (moſt excellent Prince, and yee moſt noble Lords) hath ſuch confidence in your ſelues, in your fidelity, curtezie, and power, in reſpect of the ſtrict alliance which of a long time hath beene betwixt this Republike, and the crowne of Hungary, of the Common intereſt of both your ſtates, of the iuſtice of his cauſe, and your owne antient cuſtome, with that of your anceſtors, who euer fauored iuſt and reſonable actions, and releeued thoſe that ſtood in need, as hee is deſirous in this eminent perill of the Turkiſh warre, cheefely to haue recourſe vnto you, my Lords, and vnto you to communicate his deſeins and neceſſity, hoping to finde from you, not onely a ſpeedy ayde, as much as in you lieth for the defence of his Kingdome, but like-wiſe all fauour and furtherance to forraine Princes, thereby the more eaſily to obtaine of them ſome ſuccor and releefe. It ſeemeth indeed, and not without cauſe, that the firſt addreſſe belongeth to this Republike, when any queſtion is of oppoſing the Ottamans greatneſſe, becauſe that as well in regard of your power at ſea, as for your neere neighbour-hood to them, yee haue excellent meanes to moleſt that enemy, and to hinder him from growing great at other mens coſts. Therefore, my Lords, yee ſhall purchace great glory, and ſhall eſtabliſh a greater ſafety, to your ſtate, if yee will be Authors to moue other Princes to protect and defend the realme of Hungary, againſt this new furious enemy to Chriſtians. Conſider, my Lords, to what greatneſſe the Ottaman family hath in ſhort ſpace attayned, and wholy (if I may ſo ſay) by the careleſeneſſe of Chriſtian Princes, that haue not oppoſed them-ſelues againſt it. Hee marcheth forward with a ſwift pace to a ſoueraigne Monarchy: If the cries, prayers and proteſtations of Conſtantine, had beene heard, when the warlike and cruell Mahomet did aſſaile Conſtantinople the Greekes Empire ſhould not now bee ruyned, nor that of the Mamalukes bee wholy extinct. For both the one and other gaue ſuch counterpoyſe to the Turkiſh forces, as if they now weare in force, they might with eaſe aſſure, not onely the Kingdome of Hungary, but like-wiſe all the reſidue of Chriſtendome. Who-ſoeuer ſhall conſider the progreſſion of the antient Monarchies, will find that their difficulty was not great to attayne to a ſoueraigne degree, when there was none of power ſufficient to oppoſe their greatneſſe, and to counterpoiſe their pride, whereby the conqueſts which after-wards enſued proued very eaſie. The Romaines ſpent much time in ſubduing Italy, but beeing once Maiſters thereof, and by that meanes moſt mighty, they in few yeares ſubiected vnder their power and dominion many forraine Kings and Prouinces.

The oration of the Hungarian Ambaſſador.

" Therefore it is certaine that by how much we ſhall delay to cut off the greatneſſe " of this cruel enemy, by ſo much more wil dangers encreaſe, and remedies become " more difficult. I will not ſay that to take armes for the defence of the Kingdome
" of Hungary, is a matter onely honorable for Chriſtian Princes, as well in reſ-
" pect of the duty of their religion, as for their profeſſion, nor alſo that it is profita" ble for them, for any particular intereſt, but I will ſay, that of a certaine it is moſt
" neceſſary for the conſeruation of their ſtates. For that Kingdome being loſt,
" which hath already of a long time oppoſed it ſelfe againſt the Turkes attempts,
" and hath interrupted the courſe of their victories: who is it that is able to hin-
" der him, from entring into Auſtria, from moleſting Germany, and from ma" king incurſions on the very confines of your ſtate? This ſame Kingdome,
" which ſtill hath beene the Bullwarke to ſtoppe his progreſſions, being ruined,
" (which God forbid) and taken by the enemy, who doubteth but that it wilbee
" very commodious for him, to ſubdue other nations, to enuade other King-
" domes, and generally to execute all his enterprizes? But as this defenſe is ſayd to " bee neceſſary, wee muſt not like-wiſe iudge it impoſſible, and leaſt of all dif" ficult, prouided that Princes will no more want will and deſire, then they doe
" meanes and power. Our Hungarian nation hath beene war-like, and our " Kings haue purchaced great glory by warre. Our King at this day, my Lords,
" and his ſubiects, doe not degenerate from their Anceſtors, they want not " courrage nor ought elſe that men are to haue for their defence. But what can " one Kingdome alone doe againſt ſuch numbers of enemies, gathered to ge-
" ther out of ſo many Prouinces? againſt the war-like preparation of the richeſt
" and mightieſt enemy in the world? And yet, this our Kingdome is not very " great or rich, to furniſh ſtore of ſoldiers, armor, mony, munition and ſo
" many other neceſſaries for any long continuance againſt ſuch war-like enter-
" prizes: but if it bee aided by other Princes, her forces will not onely encreaſe,
" but like-wiſe her reputation and valour, ſo as wee doe not doubt but to " make all the enemies attempts, and deſignes vnproffitable: and if occaſion ſerue,
" wee will not refuſe to fight with him in the field, to aſſure for a long time, at " our owne perills, and by the hazard of our owne fortune (if God doe fauour,
" as wee are to hope, our holy and valorous enterprizes) with our owne coun" try, other Kingdomes and Prouinces of Chriſtendome. But I ſee that perhaps " I haue paſſed my bounds by my long oration. The ſumme of all is, Our King-
" dome is the Bulwarke and defenſe of all Chriſtendome againſt the fury of the " Turkiſh armes: now the common defence ought to bee mannaged by com" mon forces, your wiſdome and piety makes yee to fore-ſee and eſteeme of dan" gers, and your authority and power giues yee meanes of ſpeedy remedy.

VVhat the Senate concluded after the Ambaſſadors oration.

The Ambaſſador was heard with great attention, and as they were before already well diſpoſed to this buſſineſſe, hee like-wiſe left a very great impreſſion in their mindes. Therefore they concluded to ſolicite other Chriſtian Princes, by their Ambaſſadors that were reſident with them, to the end that they might with a mutuall conſent releeue the Realme of Hungary, and prouide for future dangers: where-vnto they freely offered all the meanes of the Common-wealth.
But this negotiation had no better iſſue then the former: where-vpon, daungers dayly encreaſing, and King Lewis ſuppoſing that to free Belgrade from the ſeege, which was a very ſtrong Citty, and of great importance, and which had euer beene the Rampier of the whole Kingdome, that hee muſt fight with the Turke, did after that ſend Iohn Statilius his Ambaſſador to Venice, to obtaine of the Senate certaine ſummes of mony, thereby to encreaſe his forces, to the end that being ſtrengthened with meanes hee might attempt, on hope of happy ſuc-ceſſe, the hazard of a battaill.

Another Ambaſſador from the King of Hungary at Venice.

The Republike had often in times paſt ayded with mony, and other meanes the Kings of Hungary againſt the power of the Turkes, but it thought it ſelfe at that that time more bound then euer before to doe it, as well in reſpect of the ſtrict alliance and friendſhip with King Lewis, as for their feare of the Ottaman greatneſſe, who dayly grew more potent and redoubted, by reaſon wherof the Venetians ſent the King thirty thouſand Ducats, with promiſe of greater offers, and for a teſtimony of their friendſhip to King Lewis, they ſent word to Lorenzo Doria, their Ambaſſador reſident with his Maieſty, that he ſhould ordinarily folow the Kings army.

The Venetians ſend the King of Hungary thirty thouſand Ducats

But the Kings deſeigns and enterpriſes had a diſaſtrous ſucceſſe, for Belgrade was loſt, all the other Citties of the Kingdome continuing ſtill feareſull of the force and violence of the Turkes, who after the taking of this towne, returned to Conſtantinople, hauing left his Artillery and munition in Hungary, intending to returne thither againe at the ſpring, as him-ſelfe aduertized the Senate of Venice by one of his ſeruants, acquainting them with what hee had done in Hungary.

Belgrade taken by the Turkes.

About the ſame time, Prince Loretan deceaſed, to the great greeſe of the whole Citty, who with ſingular wiſdome had fortunately gouerned the Republike the ſpace of twenty yeares, hauing ſtill retayned to the very laſt gaſpe his vſuall quickneſſe of wit, where-with hee was adorned, hee was buried in the Church of the Twins.

ANTONIO GRIMANI
the 76. Duke.

ANtonio Grimani, Father to Cardinall Dominico, was choſen in his ſted, a man very famous, as well for his great wealth, as for the noble offices which hee had borne in the Common-wealth, hauing often times taſted proſperous and aduerſe fortune, and who not long before was called home from a tedious baniſhment to which hee was condemned, becauſe hee being Generall of the Galleis had let ſlippe the occaſion of fighting with and vanquiſhing the Turkiſh army neere to Lepanto.

He then entring into the gouernment of the Common wealth, found it in peace (as hath beene ſaid) but in ſo many different rumors of diſcontent betwixt Princes, as it was to be feared that the Republick would therby be drawne into new troubles, and into a neceſſity of taking armes, becauſe that the Emperour, (who being already come into Germany, had receiued his firſt Imperiall Coronation at Aix La Chappelle) had a great deſire to come into Italy, in regard whereof, he ſought by al good offices and faire promiſes to draw the Venetians to his ſide, thinking that their frendſhip might much auaile him for the execution of his deſeignes: wherevpon, among other matters he promiſed to giue them in authenticall manner the inueſtiture of all the Citties and places which they then poſſeſſed to which the Empire might pretend any title or claime.

The Emperors promiſes to the Venetians.

Theſe offers were the cauſe that the Senate delayed to ſend (according to their vſuall manner) to congratulate the Emperor for his new dignity: For hauing determined to ſend Franceſco Contaren to ſucceed Gaſparo Contaren their ordinary Ambaſſador reſident with his Imperiall Maieſty, whoſe time of ſtay there, apointed by the Lawes, was already expired, they did put off his diſpatch from day to day becauſe they would giue the French noe occaſion to ſuſpect that they intended to enter into any league or treaty with the new Emperor.

What mooued the Emperor to ſend his Ambaſſador to the French King.

Charles by this meanes beeing out of hope to draw the Venetians from the friendſhip of the French, changed his purpoſe, and reſolued to ſend Phillibert his Ambaſſador to the French King, as well for that he would haue men thinke that he was deſirous to treat with him about the affaires of Italy, without mentioning the Venetians, as for to induce them to haue recourſe to himſelfe, for feare of ſome agreement betwixt their two Maieſties, wherein they ſhould not be comprehended, they hauing already made proofe of very many miſcheefes which the alliance of ſuch like Princes had procured to their common wealth: he did beſide write to his Ambaſſador, reſident with the King of England, to complaine vnto that King, (whoſe authority at that time was ſo great, as he was choſen for Vmpier and mediator of al the important ſtrife betwixt the Emperor and the French King) of the Venetians, who not beeing contented to accompliſh the agreement betwixt Maximilian and them, did moreouer refuſe his alliance and frendſhip (being therevnto inuited) but there was no great regard giuen to his complaints, becauſe that the Emperor making ſhew to be deſirous of Peace, intelligence was giuen, that he prepared all things fit for warre. Theſe pollicies being knowne to King Francis, after that he had freely communicated to the Senate all the Emperors practiſes and deſeignes, would not giue eare to the offers of his Ambaſſador, and ſtanding vpon his gard, he ſought by all meanes to entertaine his frends and Confederates, and to that purpoſe he had mutuall conference with the King of England neere to Ardres in Picardy, who for that end came to Calais, that he might more amply confirme the peace and frendſhip ſworne betwixt them, where hauing ſeene one another and conferred together with their Councells of their perticular affaires, with all manner of ſports and delightes in the middeſt of the plaine betwixt Guynes and Ardres, the French King returned to Boloign and the King of England to Calais.

The King of England, is choſen Vmpier and mediator betwixt mighty Princes.

The French King and the King of England talke together

About

About this time, a daughter being borne to the French King, he entreated the Republick of Venice to witnesse for it at the Font, shewing therby that he was desirous in all thinges to give them content, in regard of his speciall loue towards them.

The Venetian common wealth, doe christen a daughter of the French Kings.

Yet notwithstanding for all this, the conclusion of the league mentioned betwixt the Pope, the French King, and them, did in no sort goe forward, albeit it had been oftentimes debated at Rome where their Ambassadors were present with the Articles that were determined, For the King perceiuing the great letts which the Emperour had as well in Spayne as in Germany, against whom this league was practized, thinking that thereby his owne affaires were safe enough and forth of danger, for which to haue been prepounded, therefore, vpon the conclusion thereof he framed diuers dolorous things, which had neuer beene mentioned at the beginning, whereby it was perceiued, that his mindes had a farther reach, namely, to driue the Emperour if it were possible forth of Italy, and to this end he did aid the King of Nauarre with great forces for the recouery of his Kingdome, which King Ferdinand not long before had surprised.

VVhy the King delayed to conclude the league.

The Pope by this meanes, reuoluing many matters in his mind beganne likewise for his part to make new demands, and to propound new articles concerning the treaty of the league, craning that it might be expressly mentioned, That the associats should giue him all help and ayd to chastice the vassals of the Church that should rebell against him, gaining thereby plainely to vnderstand that he would renew his ancient desire to expell the Duke Alphonso of Este from the State of Ferrara, which was nothing else but to raise a greeuous warre in Italy. For the Duke knowing his owne forces not to be sufficient to resist the Associats would haue beene enforced to imploye the aid of Forraine Princes, and to haue hazarded all extremities in his owne defense.

The Popes new demands vpon the conclusion of the League.

Vpon these new propositions of the Pope and the French King, the Venetians likewise were desirous to looke to themselues, and they grew more slack in the conclusion of the league, not breaking the fiue yeares truce already ratified by the Elect Emperor, nor would they likewise displease the King of England, who by sondry good offices had shewed himselfe their great friend, whom they knew would be highly displeased with that league, in regard of the alliance and friendship betwixt him and the Emperor.

The Venetians difficulties on the same conclusion.

Whilst thus vpon these occasions the treaty of the league remained doubtfull, they had intelligence of that which they neuer expected, how that the Pope had secretly agreed with the Emperor to inuade, at their common cost, the Dutchy of Milan; This did wonderfully amaze all men, and especially the Venetians, because the Pope by driuing the French forth of Italy with his forces and authority, was desirous to inthronize and encrease the Emperors power there, whom not long before, himselfe did greatly suspect, and held dangerous for the Churches state and for all the Princes of Italy.

The Pope and the Emperor make secret League against the French King.

The Popes deseigne was accompanied with diuers and sondry practises of the Imperialls, (the Bandetti of Milan who were in great nomber and the cheefe of the Citty being ioyned to them) to the end that by their meanes at one selfe same time some sodaine tumult might be raised in the Citty, and in diuers other places of the Duchy, to expell the French who dreampt on no such matter, and whose nomber was already much decreased by reason of the Lord Lautrecs absence, who not long before was gone into France.

VVhat the Popes and Emperors deseignes were.

But the Lord of L'escut, his brother and his Lieftenant General in that Dutchy, hauing discouered this enterprise before it was executed, did forthwith leuy such nombers of Soldiers, as he made himselfe assured maister of all the townes, and frustrated their practises and deseignes, driuing all the Bandetti forth of the Dutchy, where they had by degrees setled themselues, whom he pursued euen to the gates of Rhegio, whither they escaped by means of him that commanded there

The Lord of Lescut discouereth the enterprise of the Bandetti of Milan.

For the Pope, who (as hath beene said) was a Partaker of their deseigne. Hereupon the Pope tooke matter of discontent, for that without any respect to his dignity and power, or to the friendship and alliance betwext him and the most Christian King, the French had come and vsed violence in his townes and Castles, making his complaints to the Venetians; whereas indeed, the King had most cause to complaine, because that by the agreement made betwixt them, it was expresly mentioned, that the Pope should not receiue the banderi of the Dutchy of Milan into his Territories, nor the king those of the Dominion of the Church into his. The Venetians being desirous, as much as in them lay, to appease this discontent, (for the Popes resolution and the treaty made, and sworne by him with the Emperor, was not as yet manifestly knowne) sought to blot out of the Popes mind the suspition which he seemed to haue, by remembring him of the good offices which the King had euer performed to the Sea Apostolike, earnestly entreating him, not for a trifle to breake the holy alliance, so long time sworne betwixt them, seeing that by the breach thereof nothing but mischeefe could ensue. But all these remonstrances and entreaties were booteleſſe with the Pope, who had already contracted with the Emperor, on condition, that the French being expelled forth of the Dutchy of Milan, Parma, and Placentia, should bee ioyned to the Churches Patrimony, and all the residew of the state should bee restored to Francis Sforza; and that the Pope in the meane time should dispense with Charles for the oath which hee had taken in the inuestiture of the Kingdome of Naples, to the end hee might with more iust title still retayne the Empire.

The Pope is displeased with the Lord Leſcut his pursute.

The Venetians seeke to appease the Popes indignation against the French.

The conditions of the agreement betwixt the Pope and the Emperor.

The Venetians, being wholy hope-lesse of making any attonement betwixt the Pope and the French King, resolued not to faile in their duty wherein they were tyed to the King, for the conseruation of the Dutchy of Milan. The report was that diuers soldiers were already leuied by the Pope and the Emperors command, and if their secret practizes could not preuaile, they would on a sodaine fall to open warre; for which cause, the Pope, (albeit it was vnder an other collour) had leuied sixe thousand Swisses, and Prospero Colonna being declared cheefe of the enterprise comming to Bologna, did from all parts leuy soldiers, whilest the Viceroy of Naples, with the Cauallery of that Kingdome, and the Marquis of Pescara with the Spanish Infantery, were on the bankes of the Riuer Trante, speedily to passe ouer on the first occasion. This caused the Venetians, for their part, speedily to enrole sixe thousand Italian foot, and to assemble all their Cauallery on the Bressan Territory, commiting their whole army to Theodore Trivulcio their Generall, commanding him to encampe on the banks of the riuer Adda, that hee might speedily passe ouer, if the affaires of the French should require it. They commanded moreouer Paulo Nany, Gouernor at that time of Bergamo, to follow the Army with the Generall in quallity of Prouidator.

The Popes and Emperors forces ready to march, if their secret intelligences should faile.

In the meane time vpon the rumor that was spred abroad in France of these stirres in Lombardy, the King forth-with sent the Lord Lautrec to Milan, and being comme thither, perceiuing that his forces were not sufficient to defend that state, if it should be enuaded with a mighty army, he thought it fit to keepe backe the new aide which the enemies expected from comming to ioyne with them, who already had a thousand men at armes and about eight thousand foot. The Pope had but three thousand Swisses, for of sixe thousand that he had leauied, there remayned with him but the one halfe. And at the same time, Fernand the Emperors brother being come to villac, to assemble sixe thousand foot-men, to passe afterwards with them into Italy, to the releefe of the imperiall army; for which forces the Emperor hauing craued passage of the Venetians, they answered that they could not doe it, in regard of their alliance with the French King, whome if they failed at his need they should be taxed with shame and infamy. Vpon this answer, because they would haue their passages to bee enforced, they sent strong garrisons thither, yet neuertheleſſe after diuers propositions for the stopping of the

The Venetian army redy to march.

The Emperor craueth passage for his soldiers

Almaines paſſage, the matter being found to be difficult, they left it by the conſent of the Lord of Lautree to the inhabitants of the country, and ſent all their forces on the Cremonois, there for to ioyne them with the French, according to Lautrecs direction, who beeing deſirous to haue neere him ſome Venetian Gentlemen of authority and experience, to conferre withall on the affaires of the war, and about the defence of the State of Milan, the Senate ſent Andrè Gritti to him, Paulo Nani notwithſtanding remayning ſtill in the campe as Prouidator.

They chooſe likewiſe Ieronimo Peſare for Prouidator Generall, who was carefully to prouide for all their fortes on the firme land, wherein were placed two thouſand foot-men newly leauied, and certaine companies of men at armes, who on all occaſions ſhould defend them from trouble and dangers. They determined moreouer at Lautrecs perſwaſition to haue other three thouſand foot; namely fifteene hundred Gaſcons, and as many Valeſians, and likewiſe to contribute to the expence of certaine horſe and foot companies with whom the Duke of Ferrara promiſed to come into the field in the behalfe of the French, to the end that the King and all men elſe ſhould know, that they had in no ſort failed for the ſpeedy reliefe of the State of Milan, according to the couenants made betwixt them.

Ieronimo Peſare Prouidator of all the forts on the firme land.

In what manner the Venetians did releeue the State of Milan.

The French in the meane time were readiet to ſolicite the Venetians to doe that wherevnto they were obliged by the treaty of confederacy, then they were of themſelues to make neceſſary prouiſions, proceeding therein very ſlowly, which vndoubtedly is a very dangerous matter in warre: and al-be-it the Lord of Lautrec did warrant, that the Lord of Saint Vallier ſhould ſpeedily paſſe the mounts with ſix thouſand French, and that tenne thouſand Swiſſes, leauied for the King, ſhould forthwith march: yet for all that none came: and on the other ſide the enemies being growne ſtrong and mighty, by being ioyned with the Almain foot hauing ſafely paſſed thorow the Mantuan, and from thence thorow the State of Milan, knowing how greatly ſpeed might import them in that enterprize, were come to beſeege Parma, ſuppoſing that the taking of that City would purchaſe them great ſafety and reputation.

The Lord of Lautrec beſeeth for aide.

The Imperials beſiege Parma.

Now the Lord Lautrec hauing intelligence of their march, ſuſpecting their deſeigne, ſent his brother the Lord of Eſcut with a ſtrong garriſon for the gard of that city: yet neuertheleſſe that did not ſtay their enterprize, hoping eaſily to achiue it, as well for that the place was not very ſtrong, as becauſe their army was great and wel ſtored with all neceſſaries, as in deed it would haue come to paſſe, if Lautrec, who had receiued new ſupplies of Swiſſes, had not approched the enemies, by whoſe comming, and likewiſe for that the Duke of Ferrara with great numbers of foot-men marched to aſſaile Modena, and Regio, Proſpero Colonna was enforced (as he afterwards ſaid) to diſcampe from before Parma, to the great griefe and diſcontent of the Pope, who by his confederacy with the Emperor did chiefly harken after the taking thereof.

The Lord of Lautrec ſuccoreth Parma. Proſpero Colonna raiſeth his campe from before Parma.

The euent of this firſt enterprize hauing ſuch bad ſucceſſe was cauſe that the Pope complayning of the Emperours captaines entred into ſumme ſuſpition of them, as if they had drawne forth the ſeege of Parma at length, vntill that neceſſity had enforced them to diſcampe, perceiuing that his great deſire to obtaine that City made him freely to contribute to all the charges and expences of the warres.

The Pope ſuſpecteth the Imperials.

The Emperour on the other ſide hauing diſcouered the Popes ſuſpition, feared, that if he ſhould obtaine that which he pretended to haue by the treaty of agreement betwixt them, he would then giue ouer the remainder of the enterprize as eaſily as he had forſaken the French Kings alliance, excuſing himſelfe either vpon the coſt or danger of the warres: wherevpon for the better aſſurance of his deſeignes, he reſolued if it were poſſible to draw the Venetians to his party, and ioyne them to the league, and to that end he determined to ſend Alphonſo Saus

The Emperor is deſtaſted with the Popes ſuſpition.

to

to Venice to remaine there as Ambassador for the Imperiall Maiesty, and whom he caused with great cunning and vehemency to declare vnto the Senate, that to ioyne with him and the Pope was the true meanes to obtaine peace no lesse by him desired then by themselues, and for a testimony of his speech hee aleadged, That although the Emperour might obtaine the Dutchy of Milan, by iust title, yet neuertheless he would inuest Francis Sforza Duke of Bari therein, thereby to reduce the affaires of Italy to a quiet and peaceable State.

The Emperour by his Ambassador seeketh to draw the Venetians to his side.

The Senate for all these offers would not change their first opinion, as well for feare that the effects would not proue like to the Emperors goodly promises, as also being mindefull of the good offices which the French had lately done them, they thought it ill-beseeming their loyalty and dignity to forsake them at their need, whereupon they resolued to pursue the warre they had begunne. And the armies dayly encreasing, as well that of the French and Venetians, as the Pope and Emperours, by great numbers of Swisses that were come to both armies, and being by that meanes equall almost in forces and valour, both of them continued for the space of sixe monthes as it were at quiet, without any certaine deseigne.

At the last Prospero Colonna beganne to march first, bending towards the Riuer Adda to passe ouer, and afterwards to march directly to Milan, which was the whole ayme of the warre. Lautrec being aduertized hereof did soone dislodge from the Cremona territory, where hee had for a certaine time remained, and marched towards Cassan, to stoppe the enemies passage of the Riuer, who neuertheless by their speedy comming thither before the French, did crosse it betwixt Riua and Cassan: and then went on their way towards Milan.

The army of the Empire marcheth directly to Milan.

The enemies passe ouer the riuer Adda without any impediment.

Lautrec being preuented of his hope did in great hast follow the enemies, being desirous, if occasion serued, to offer them battaile. But Prospero Colonna, not meaning to hazard any thing, proceeded in such manner as hee tooke away all meanes of comming to a battaile, which Lautrec perceiuing, did at last retire with his army, which did dayly decrease, especially the Swisses, who went their waies without leaue vnder collour that they wanted their pay, and came to Milan, leauing the Venetian Prouidator with the artillery at Lodi, because that their Generall Triuulcio, hauing followed Lautrec had entred with him into Milan.

The Swisses leaue the French campe for want of pay.

Now Lautrec beeing come to Milan perceiuing his owne army to be diminished, and that of the enemies to be mightily encreased, he caused the Bastions and rampiers to bee razed, which the Duke of Bourbon had before then caused to bee made, resoluing not to stirre from thence, and there to expect aide from France. Prospero hauing crossed the Adda, and hauing intelligence that Lautrec was retired to Milan, fortifying it in all hast, determined to follow him, and came and lodged in an Abbey within foure miles off Milan, called Cherasall, where being vncertaine what he were best to doe, in regard of the great numbers of men that were within the City, a husbandman was brought before him that had beene taken comming from Milan, who told him in the presence of all the captaines, that hee was sent by some of the Imperiall faction that were within the City to Ieronimo Moron, to let them know that if they would march directly to Milan, they were certaine that hee might enter it, but if they should delay the matter and giue the French men leisure to fortifie themselues it would not then bee in their power to expell them. Vpon this aduertisement it was concluded by the chiefe captaines that the Marquis of Pescara with the Spanish bands, whom he then commanded, should march directly to the Roman gate, to be there at sunne set. Theodore Triuulcio, Generall of the Venetian army, had the gard of that gate and the suburb, where the Marquis of Pescara being come, taking twelue hundred men for that seruice hee gaue directly in vpon a bastion that was new begunne, and not yet defensible, wherevpon those of the gard were so amazed as without fight they were put to rout, forsaking their gard and fortifications.

Lautrec fortifieth Milan.

Prospero Colonna is within foure miles of Milan.

The traitors in milan giue aduertizement to Prospero Colonna.

The enemies being come to Milan win the Roman Gate and the suburb.

Theodore

Theodore Triuulce Commander of thoſe troupes being ſicke in his bead, did on a ſodaine ariſe and marched againſt the enemies with ſuch few ſouldiers as hee could gather together, to ſuſteine that attempt, thinking that they would follow him, but Night not bluſhing, and beeing vnaccompanied, he was beaten downe and taken priſoner with Iulio of Saint Seuerin, the Marquis of Vigeua, Mercurio Buono, captaine of the Venetian light horſe, Lodouico Marin Secretary to the common-wealth, with diuers others.

Triuulcio taken priſoner by the Imperials.

Lautrec hauing notice that the Venetian army being ſurprized had abandoned the ſuburbes without any fight, came with the reſidue of the army before the place of the caſtle. But perceiuing that there was no meanes to keepe the City the ſaid ſuburbe being loſt, determined to retire, and tooke the direct way towards Coma, with all his men at armes to be nere the Swiſſes, expecting the ſuccor that was to come from France, hauing before his departure left captaine Maſcaron a Gaſcon to command the caſtle with fifty men at armes and ſix hundred French foot.

Lautrec retireth with his Caualliery to Coma.

Maſcaron captaine of the caſtle of Milan.

The enemies being maſters of the city, made an ineſtimable ſpoile there, without any exception of perſons, for the ſacke laſted tenne whole daies, no commandement being of force to cauſe the ſouldiers to giue ouer. The Venetian horſmen departed from Laude and were comming towards Milan, but hauing intelligence by the way of the Cities loſſe & Lautrecs retreat, they eſcaped to Bergamo.

Milan is ſacke ten whole daies together.

Lautrec being come to Coma, the foure thouſand Swiſſes that remained in the French campe, did the morrow after retire home towards their country, their captaines not being able to hold them backe. Lautrec departing afterwards from Coma with the reſidue of his troupes, went to Lec, where hauing croſſed the Riuer, hee placed all his men at armes in garriſon in the Venetian country, but ſo ſoone as he was gonne from Coma, the enemies came thither, who hauing battered it ten or twelue daies, tooke it by compoſition.

The Swiſſes retire home into their country.

Coma taken.

Vpon report of theſe conqueſts of the enemies, Lauda, Pauia, Parma and Placentia yeelded vnto them without any difficulty, Cremona within a while after did the like; but Lautrec comming thither on a ſodaine with his forces did forthwith recouer it by meanes of the caſtle which held out yet for the French.

In this ſort did the French loſe, without being defeated or fighting any one Battaile, that goodly and ritch State, which they had purchaſed at ſo high a price, and with ſo much effuſion of blood. Proſpero Colonna in the meane time, to make vſe of his good fortune, purſued Lautrec, ſeeking wholly to defeat him, who (as hath beene ſaid) departing from Coma and beeing come to the Giradade, had paſſed the Breſſan territory, and from thence was come to Cremona, which hauing recouered, he remained there three or foure dayes, and then returned into the Venetians Contrey. Now in this meane time Proſpero Colonna hauing intelligence that Alexandria was left to the Gard of the Cittizens, he went thither and became maiſter thereof. At the laſt, becauſe winter was well foreward, the Senate permitted Lautrec to winter in their territories, whereof the Emperours Ambaſſador, reſident at Venice, complayning to the Senate, they anſwered that in ſo great a diſaſter enemies were to be releeued, and that it was againſt reaſon to refuſe their friends and confederates, and that in regard of the conuentions & treaties paſſed betwixt them, common ciuility did tie them to releeue the French in their aduerſity, and to giue them all helpe & aide, as wel for the defenſe as recouery of the State of Milan: yet neuertheleſſe ſomwhat to content him, it was decreed that the French and Venetians ſhould remaine quiet whileſt the French ſhould continue in the Venetians territories; leaſt that the enemies being enforced to defend themſelues, ſhould make any incurſions vpon their State.

But Bartlemew of Villa-claro hauing tranſgreſſed that decree, and croſſing the Adda, making incurſiõs on the Bergamask, the Prouidator Gritti permitted al mẽ to defend themſelues againſt the Imperials, whervpon certain companies of light horſe with certaine gentlemen baniſhed from Milan going forth of Cremona, & hauing croſſed the Adda did on a ſodaine aſſaile certaine numbers of the enemies

The Imperials breake the Decree.

men

men at armes, and hauing disarmed them, brought them away as prisoners.

Lautrees determination.

Lautrec in the meane time was desirous to march into the field with these forces that he had, and to goe to Cremona, determining to make a bridge ouer the Po at Pontuico, nere to Casalmajor, to become master of the country on this side and beyond the Riuer, that hee might freely ioyne with the Duke of Ferrara, who was in the field with great forces to trie if hee could take Modena and Reggio. As also because that place was thought to bee very commodious for the assailing of the Mantuan territory, and especially Viadana, a ritch place and abounding with all things, from whence they might draw great quantity of victuals for the nourishment of the army, and enforce the Marquis of Mantua (who as Gonfaloniero, or captaine Generall of the Church, was in the army of the league) to come and defend his owne country. But the Venetians not beeing of opinion to enterprize any thing till their forces were strong and well confirmed, nor in time of aduersity to purchase new enemies, disswaded Lautrec from that determination.

The Venetians disswade Lautrec from his resolution.

Pope Leo his sodaine death.

The affaires of Lumbardy standing at this stay, Pope Leo, vpon the newes that the French had lost the City of Milan, receiued such high content, and was so ouerioyed as a Catharre and a continuall feuer killed him in three daies space. His death did greatly preiudice the army of the league, as well in regard of the Swisses, who no sooner vnderstood it but they departed sodainely from the campe and forth of the whole state of Milan and returned home into their country, as also for the departure of the Cardinall of Medicis, Legat in the Churches army, who vpon the report of the Pope his cosins death, hauing discharged the army retired himselfe to Rome.

The Cardinall of Medicis after the Popes death retireth to Rome.

A new occasion did then present it selfe for the recouery of the State of Milan as easily as it was lost, the townes not beeing furnished with sufficient garrisons, nor the army of the league strong enough in the field for to releeue them. Beside, there was great confusion and disorder in Milan, the people beeing incensed against the Imperialls, for the losses which they had susteined by the Spanish foot-men, Swisses and Almaines, for which they hated them as much and more then they had in time before done the French, and next, by the departure of the Cardinals of Medicis and Syon, who were gone to the creation of the new Pope, the authority of the league was much diminished.

The Venetians leauy forces to march into the Dutchy of Milan.

For these causes the Venetians beganne to leauy forces from all parts, and commanded the greatest part of their garrisons which were dispersed here and there to march into the field: and that which did most of all confirme them, was, that the Swisses hauing published a generall assembly at Lucerna, they there decreed with a generall consent, to take vpon them the protection of the French, and to helpe them to recouer the Dutchy of Milan, whereupon, they speedily sent to the Venetians, wishing them still to continue their alliance with the French, for they were resolued to take armes for them and their allies. These newes did put fresh courage into Lautrec, and al-be-it it was in the depth of winter, hee neuertheless determined to march into the field, and to enter the State of Milan.

Colonna fortifieth Milan.

Prospero Colonna in the meane time did his best to fortifie the City of Milan, hauing strenthened the Spanish garrison there with certain number of Lansequenets whom he sent for thither, and made all preparations for the susteyning of a long seege if need should be.

The French on the other side and the Venetians sitting in councell to determine what they should first attempt, after diuers and sundry opinions, they resolued that Frederico Bozole should crosse the Po, with a good troupe of choice souldiers, and should goe to the confines of Parma, to listen what was done there, not carrying any artillery with him, to the end that if his designe prospered not hee might freely & without danger make his retreat, & that the residue of the army, as well well French as Venetians ſhould meet on the Cremonois. But Bozole beeing come neere to Parma and Placentia, not daring to attempt any thing, returned to Lautrecs campe at Cremona, as wiſe as hee went, and no other enterprize was made in this yeere 1527. Theſe two great Princes neuertheleſſe, the Emperour Charles and the French King continuing much incenſed the one againſt the other, whereby it was foreſeene, that Italy and diuers other Prouinces were to endure greeuous warres, as it came to paſſe the yeeres enſuing.

The French & Venetian army on the Cremonois.

10

The end of the fourth Booke of the fifth Decade.

20

The

The Contents of the fifth Booke of the fifth Decade.

THe French and Venetian campe lie before Maran. Francis Sforza commeth to Pauia with ſixe thouſand Lanſequenets. Nouara is taken by the French. Sforza commeth to Milan with his troupes. Lautrec beſeegeth Pauia and forthwith raiſeth his campe. The battaile of Bicoq. The Swiſſes retire into their country. Lauda and Cremona yeelded to the enemies. The Emperour ſeeketh the Venetians friendſhip. The Emperor and the King of England conferre together, with the league made betwixt them. The Iſle of Rhodes is taken by Soliman. The creation of Pope Adrian the ſixth. League betwixt the Pope, the Emperour, the Venetians, the Duke of Milan and the Florentines. Alliance made betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians againſt the French King. The Duke of Vrbin Generall to the Venetians. The Duke of Bourbon leaueth the French Kings party. The French army in Italy vnder the Admirall Boniuet. Nouara and Vigeua are taken by the French. The French come before Milan, and ſoone diſlodge thence. Monce taken by the French. Motion of peace betwixt the Emperour and the King. The death of Pope Adrian. The creation of Pope Clement the ſeuenth. The French retire in diſorder. The cauſe of the Kings diſcontent with the Emperour and the Venetians. The King commeth into Italy and taketh the City of Milan. The Duke of Albany is appointed to goe and enuade the Kingdome of Naples. The King beſeegeth Pauia. The Venetians are ſought to by both parties. A ſecret league made betwixt the Pope, the King, and the Venetians. The Marquis of Peſcara keepeth the viceroy of Naples from diſlodging forth of Lumbardy. The Imperialls come into the field and aſſaile the King. The King is taken priſoner by the Imperials and the French army

army is put to rout. The Popes reſolution after the defeate of the French. The Venetians reſoluing to defend Italy, are diuerted from it by the Pope. And laſtly the wordes and geſture of the Emperour at the newes of the victory.

The Fifth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

THE French army being much encreaſed in the beginning of the yeere 1522. by the arriuall of the Swiſſes, who in great numbers came to their campe, and by the Venetians forces ioyned to them, which were ſix thouſand foot, ſixe hundred men at armes, and eight hundred light-horſe. Lautrec by the aduiſe of all the captaines reſolued to march directly towards Milan, which was the principall motiue and aime of the warre. According to this reſolution they paſſed the Adda on the firſt day of march, and the campe was lodged within two miles of the caſtle. The third day after the French were encamped, they marched in order, making ſhew that they would aſſault the Rampire, the which they did not, either becauſe that at the firſt it was not Lautrecs meaning, or elſe for that in regard of the great numbers of ſouldiers that were within it, the diſpoſition of the people, and the readineſſe which was ſeene in the defendants, hee was diuerted from it, for the manifeſt difficulty of ſuch an enterprize.

Great numbers of Swiſſes in the French campe.

The French campe before Milan.

VVhat hindred the Lord of Lautrec from aſſailing Milan.

It is certaine that the Lord of Lautrec had no hope to take Milan by aſſault, but thought to effect it by length of time, becauſe that by reaſon of the multitude of his horſe and great number of the bandetti which followed him who ſcoured the whole country, hee did cut off all victuals from it: as alſo becauſe he had broken downe all the mils, and turned away the waters forth of their Channels, which brought great commodities to the Milanois, and he did beſides, hope, that the pay which the Milanois did giue the ſouldiers would ſoone be waſted: for the Emperor ſent little or none at all.

But the Citizens of Milans hatred towards the French was wonderful, and their deſire merueilous to haue Francis Sforza their new Duke againe, in regard whereof, enduring paciently all diſcommodities, they did not onely, not change their mindes for all thoſe miſeries, but the young men of the City did put on armes, and made captaines in euery parriſh: in ſuch ſort as the gardes which ſpeedily ranne to the remoteſt places of the army, did greatly releeue the ſouldiers; prouiding beſide, in ſtead of the mils that were broken downe, hand-mils; for all their meale was ſpent.

VVith what ſeruenſie the people of Milan endured the diſcommodity of the ſeege.

The Duke of Milan in the meane ſpace, who had a long time remained at Trent, expecting ſome fit occaſion to paſſe forward, went on his way with ſix thouſand Lanſequenets, and ſeized on the Fort of Croare which did belong to the Venetians, to the end to open his passage. From thence he came thorow the Veronois and Mantuan territories with ease to Casal-major, because that the Venetian army was ioyned with the Lord Lautrec, and there crossing the Po, hee came to Placentia, beeing afterwards aided by the Marquis of Mantua hee marched to Pauia, where he remained waiting for some fit occasion to goe to Milan, where his arriuall was extreamely wished for.

The Duke of Milan commeth to Pauia with six thousand Lansequenets.

So soone as the Lord of Lautrec, had intelligence of his comming to Placentia, he raised his campe, and went and lodged at Cassin fiue miles from Milan on the high way towards Pauia, and the Venetians at Binasca which lieth on the same road way, to hinder his comming to Milan, where in the meane time hee tooke Saint Angelo, and Saint Colombane. But being aduertized that the Lord of Escut his brother, was come from France with money and certaine companies of foot-men, and came by the way of Genoa, he sent thither for his conuoy Frederico de Bozzole, with foure hundred Lances and seuen thousand foot, Swisses and Italians, against whom the Marquis of Mantua going forth of Pauia, came backe thither on a sodaine, standing in feare of them, by reason they were more in number then had beene reported vnto him. Bozzole hauing ioyned his forces with the Lord of Escut, both of them together tooke the way towards Nouara, and comming to the castle, which held out yet for them, they tooke the ordnance that was within it, and battered the City, the which they tooke by force at the third assault, sacking it wholly and putting all those within it to the sword, Count Philip Tournielo the Gouernor excepted, and some few others with him who were made prisoners; from thence they went to Vigeua, which they likewise tooke, opening the way by the taking of those townes to the supplies which they expected from France.

The French take Nouara.

But in the meane time, Francis Sforza departing secretly in a night from Pauia, went thorow by-waies, and ioyned himselfe with Prospero Colonna neere to Landriana, a few souldiers remayning in Pauia with the Marquis of Mantua, who would not passe on any farther, because he would not be farre off from the Churches territories.

By reason whereof the Lord of Lautrec supposing his stay at Cassin to bee to no purpose, seeing that Francis Sforza was escaped, as also because it had beene no discretion for them to encampe before Milan, they determined for to turne the army towardes Pauia, hoping to take it; whereupon so soone as hee had re-assembled his army, hee went and encamped there, where at his arriuall a furious battery was made in two seuerall places, as well by the French, as the Venetians, so that the breach was iudged reasonable for an assault: And yet the beseeged resolued valiantly to defend themselues, and to hinder the enemies from taking it, not sparing their liues and meanes.

Sforza arriueth at Milan.

Pauia beseeged by Lautrec.

Prospero in the meane time perceiuing the manifest daunger wherein the City was, did speedily send thither a thousand Corsicans, and as many Spaniards, who in the night passed along very neere to the campe, not beeing descried before they were in a manner all past, and then the French watch which was still on horse backe, did charge them on their backes, and defeated some few of them, but not very many, by reason they were to late descried. Now the breach being thought to be reasonable, the Swisses, who by nature are impatient, requested the Generall of the army that they might march to the assault, but it was put off till an other time, the better to assure the businesse, staying till Pedro of Nauarres mine had plaied, which was made vnder a great Bastion, to the end that the ruines thereof might helpe the souldiers in their going to the assault.

And in this sort the arriuall of new supplies at Pauia, and their hope in the mine, were the causes that the assault was delayed and the campe raised. For Prospero Colonna perceiuing himselfe to be re-enforced with sixe thousand Lanie-

The campe dislodgeth from before Pauia.

quenets

quenets and others which Frantis Sforza had brought, did with his whole army come into the field, that he might be neere to Pauia, and he went and encamped at the Chartreux within three miles off the French and Venetians, to hinder them from giuing an aſſault to the City, for it had beene againſt reaſon to haue ſuffered it to be don, ſo great a power as his being ſo nere the enemies. Then was the Lord of Lautrec out of hope to take Pauia, wherevpon he diſlodged and retired his campe to Ladriana, and from thence to Monce, that he might be releeued with victuals as well from Laudeſan and from the territory of Cremona as from the Venetians country, receiuing in his diſcamping no other diſcommodity then a few light skirmiſhes.

The Emperors campe lodgeth at Bicoca.

The Imperials perceiuing the French army to march towards Monce, thinking that they would haue gonne to Milan, went and lodged at Bicoca three miles off from Milan, on the high way to Laude, which is a very ſpacious houſe belonging to a Gentleman, enuironed with goodly gardens and encloſed with deepe ditches, the fields round about beeing full of fountaines and ſtreames brought by conduit-pipes, according to the manner of Lombardy, to water the meddowes: being come to that place, they did ſpeedily raiſe all the dikes, and flanked them with great plat-formes well ſtored with ordnance.

The Swiſſes being, according to their manner, impatient, ſent their captaines to the Lord of Lautrec, to let him vnderſtand that their fellowes were wearied with lying in campe, and that of three things they craued one, ready money, leaue to depart, or that he would ſpeedily, without any to more temporizing, lead them to a battaile. The Lord of Lautrec conſidering how dangerous a matter it would haue beene to haue gonne and aſſailed the enemies in their campe, vſed meanes to moderate their fury, and told them that if money were long in comming, it was not thorow the Kings fault, but in regard of the danger of the waies, and yet neuertheleſſe it would very ſhortly arriue, therefore he entreated them, (as did all the other Lords of the army likewiſe) that they would bee patient for a while longer, ſeeing they did hope to vanquiſh the enemies without fight, or at leaſt wiſe to fight with them with greater aduantage. But the captaines of the French army, not being able to winne or retaine them, neither by their authority, entreaties, promiſes, nor reaſons, knowing that the chiefe ſtrength of their army conſiſted of that nation, of whom being abandoned they ſhould remaine a prey to the enemies, they concluded to fight rather then to flie, ſeeing that vnleſſe the Swiſſes were lead to the battaile, they were determined to depart thence.

Lautrec ſendeth to diſcouer the enemies campe.

Now according to this reſolution, the Lord of Lautrec did by the Swiſſes conſent ſend the Lord of Pontdormy to diſcouer the enemies campe, who marched thither with foure hundred men at armes and ſixe thouſand Swiſſes, who hauing diſcouered it they found ſmall likelihood of beeing able to aſſaile it, yet neuertheleſſe that did not change their opinion: wherevpon the Lord of Lautrec comming forth of Monce, did with his army march towards that place, hauing appointed the Swiſſes with the artillery to goe and aſſaile the front of their campe and the enemies artillery, which was guarded by the Lanſequenets: That the Lord of Eſcut with three hundred Lances, and a ſquadron of French and Italian foot ſhould march on the left hand vpon the way that leadeth to Milan, and ſhould goe to the bridge by which they might enter into the enemies campe: As for himſelfe he would vſe meanes to enter it with a ſquadron of horſemen, hoping rather to preuaile by cunning then by open force; for the better to deceiue them, hee commanded that all his ſouldiers ſhould weare red croſſes on their cazakes, which was the badge of the Imperiall army, in ſtead of a white croſſe which was the deuice of the French army: Franciſco Maria Duke of Vrbin, with the army of the Signory of Venice lead the rereward.

Iawl at order the French did aſſaile the enemies.

Pollicy of the Lord of Lautrec.

Now the Swiſſes being come nere to the enemies campe, al-be it that in regard of the depth of the trenches, which were deeper thē they imagined, they could not according to their firſt hope aſſaile the ordnance, their courage neuertheleſſe not diminiſhing, they aſſailed the trench, ſtriuing with great boldneſſe to get ouer it, but in the meane time the ordnance and the enemies ſmall ſhot, wherewith the rampier was ſtuffed, did greatly hurt them, ſo as the greateſt part of the captaines and chiefe ſouldiers died there. For as ſoone as Proſpero Colonna had notice of their comming, he embattailed his troupes, then he appointed euery man his place, accounting the victory for his owne, in regard of the ſtrength of the place, ſo as the Lord of Eſcut being gonne on the other ſide, as hee was commanded, directly to the bridge, finding, contrary to his expectation, a ſtrong guard there, was enforced to retire, ſo that the whole burthen of the battaile fell vpon the Swiſſes', who, as well in reſpect of the vantage of the place, as for the defendants valor, did labor in vaine, and did receiue a very great ouerthrow, ſo as being well rewarded for their raſhneſſe, by the death of many of their fellowes, they were enforced to retire.

The Swiſſes boldneſſe in aſſayling their enemies.

The battail of Bicoca.

The Lord of Lautrec, with the other Lords of the army, perceiuing all things in diſorder, would haue perſwaded the Swiſſes to encampe vpon the ſame place, offering them the next day to ſet the greateſt part of the men at armes on foot to march in the forefront, but it was impoſſible to cauſe them to condeſcend therevnto, ſo as they would needs returne to Monce, whether marching in good order with the French and the artillery, they receiued no hurt in their retreat, al be-it that the Marquis of Peſcara and the other Imperiall captaines did importune Proſpero to follow them, but he would not doe it, beleeuing, as it was very likely, that the French army made their retreat in good order, the men at armes remayning on the tayle of the army to repulſe the enemies if they ſhould follow them.

The Swiſſes retire to Monce.

The army being come to Monce, the Lord of Lautrec vſed all meanes to detaine the Swiſſes, and to that end did giue great preſents to their captaines, and among others to Albert Peter, a man of great authority amongſt them, who hauing declared vnto them in an open aſſembly the wrong which they did to their reputation, if they ſhould depart, then when they were in greater hope then euer to vanquiſh the enemies by reaſon of the French Kings comming, who was dayly expected, could not for all that ſtoppe their retreate: wherevpon, the morrow after their arriuall at Monce, they returned thorow the Bergamask home into their mountaines, their number being much decreaſed, for that, three thouſand of their fellowes, and two and twenty captaines were ſlaine at the trenches. The French and Venetian army did ſoone diſlodge from Monce, and croſſed the Adda at Treſſa, and there the two armies being parted the Lord Lautrec went to Cremona, to giue order for the defenſe of the City, and afterwards for his going into France (which he did) leauing his brother the Lord of Eſcut for the guard of Cremona, with the companies of men at armes, and the Lord of Boneuall in Laude and Frederick of Bozole with ſix companies of men at armes, and a ſufficient number of foot-men.

The Swiſſes returne home into their country.

The Venetian army retired to the Breſſan territory, hauing left a ſufficient garriſon for the gard of Treſſa. But forthwith after the Lord of Lautrecs departure, the towne of Lauda was ſurprized and ſacked by the Marquis of Peſcara, and ſoone after the Lord of Eſcut yeelded Cremona on compoſition to Proſpero, in regard he had no other hope to be able to hold out the ſeege, but by ſuch ſuccors as he expected from France, of which he heard no newes.

The enemies ſurprize Lauda.

Cremona is yeelded to the enemies.

The fortune of the French being in this ſort altered, and their reputation greatly diminiſhed, by being in ſo ſhort a time driuen forth of the Dutchy of Milan, by forces no greater then their owne, it was thought that the Venetians (who had already caſiered their army, diſmiſſed the greateſt part of their Cauallery, and giuen leaue to Andrew Gritti their Prouidator in the army to goe home to his owne houſe, hauing well acquitted themſelues (though to ſmall purpoſe) of whatſoeuer their confederacy and alliance with the French King had bound them to) would at laſt follow the proſperous fortune of the Emperour Charles,

Charles, who made them (as hee had often times before then done) to deſire their friendſhip, and much more then, then before, in regard of the great hope which he had conceiued in his minde, that the route of the French would incite them ſo to doe, promiſing to him-ſelfe thereby to diſroyne them, and ſo to draw them to his party, for the opinion hee had that this new confederacy and aide of the Venetians would chiefly auaile him for the conſeruation of the State of Milan, and for the obtaining of a proſperous iſſue of the warre.

The Emperor ſeeketh the friendſhip & alliance of the Venetians.

The Emperor then, reſoluing to doe it, and not beeing ſatisfied with opening the way to Gaſpar Contaren, Ambaſſador to the Seignory in his Court, and to haue told him how much it did import their Republick, to make the ſame alliance with him, as they had done before with the French King, did likwiſe communicate the ſame to the King of England, hauing talked with him at his returne from Spaine, the capitulations whereof beeing drawne by the Chancelor of the Empire, were giuen to Contaren, who finding them too rough, promiſe was made to him, that they ſhould in ſuch ſort bee moderated as the Senate ſhould finde them reaſonable. But becauſe by the diſtance of places, the matter was drawne forth at length, there was in the meane time a league and confederacie concluded betwixt the Emperor Charles and Henry the eight King of England, reſeruing place for the Venetians to enter into it within three moneths, which time was giuen them to aduiſe thereon. This beeing communicated to the Senate, there was nothing reſolued on for that preſent, but onely to make a generall anſwer to the offers and ſignes of friendſhip of thoſe two Princes, which was, That they were very deſirous of peace, and of their alliance.

The Emperor and the King of England talke together.

A league betwixt the Emperor & the King of England.

But the report dayly encreaſing of the French Kings great preparations of warre for his paſſage into Italy, which held the Venetians from making any certaine reſolution, the Emperour and the King of England, fearing that the Venetians would ſtill continue in their friendſhip and alliance with the French, determined, the better to haſt the concluſion of the new league, to ſend Ambaſſadors to Venice.

The King of Englands Ambaſſador came firſt to Venice, and being brought into the Senate houſe, hee entreated the Senators to deale plainely, and to declare what they intended to doe, if the French King ſhould returne with his Armie into Italy, to ſeaze on the Dutchy of Milan. The ſame requeſt did the Emperors Ambaſſador make, who came thither preſently after him, who going on farther, entreated, that if the moſt Chriſtian King ſhould paſſe the mounts, that the Republick would take armes and ioyne it ſelfe with the Imperiall forces to reſiſt him. The Venetians in this treaty dealt very conſiderately, well weighing the inconueniences that might happen on either ſide, reſoluing neuertheleſſe not to enter into any new alliance but vpon neceſſity, meaning not altogether to ſeperate themſelues from the friendſhip of the French, nor yet wholy to reiect that of the Emperor, wherevpon they anſwered the Emperour and King of Englands Ambaſſador in generall termes.

The Ambaſſadors of the Emperor and the King of England come to Venice.

The Venetians great diſcretion in their reſolution.

About the end of the yeare 1522. Soliman Ottoman, to the great infamy of Chriſtian Princes, tooke the Iſle of Rhodes, defended by the Knights of Rhodes, who before then were called, the Knights of Saint Iohn of Ieruſalem, whither the great Turke came in perſon, who hauing reduced thoſe of the Iſland and Towne to the extreameſt point of neceſſity, enforced them to capitulate, namely, that the great Maiſter ſhould deliuer him the towne: that as well himſelfe as all the Knights of that order ſhould depart in ſaftie, and carry away with them as much wealth as they could, and for to haue ſome aſſurance thereof, the Turke ſhould retire his nauall armie from thence, and with-draw his land forces fiue miles from the Citty. By meanes of this capitulation Rhodes remained to the Turke, and the Chriſtians, (promiſe beeing kept with them) departed into Sicily, and from thence into Italy. Now to returne to the Emperor and King of

An. 1522.

Rhodes taken by Soliman.

Englands purſutes to the Venetians, for the concluſion of the aboue mentioned league, the Venetian Ambaſſadors reſident with thoſe Princes, were often dealt with; but, the better to haſten the buſineſſe, and to preuent the delaies cauſed by reaſon of the farre diſtance of places, Ieronimo Adorni Councellor and ordinary Chamberlaine to the Emperor, came to Venice, beeing ſent by his Maiſter to treate of and conclude that buſineſſe: who beeing brought into the Senate, went about to perſwade them to forſake the French Kings alliance, and to embrace that of the Emperor and the King of England. But the Senate beeing mooued by ſundry reaſons, did ſtill anſwer as they were wonte, not breaking either with the one or other.

The Creation of Pope Adrian the ſixt.

In the meane time, after Pope Leos death, Pope Adrian, Cardinall, Biſhop of Bertheuſa, and a Dutchman by Nation, who had beene Schoole-maiſter to the Emperor Charles, and by his meanes made a Cardinall by Pope Leo, was at the time of his Election in Spaine, and hauing receiued newes thereof (would be called Adrian the ſixt, taking none other name vpon him then his owne) did embarke himſelfe, and came to Nice: and from thence went to Rome, whither all the Prelates ſpeedily came, and all Princes ſent their Ambaſſadors to preſent their accuſtomed obedience: wherein, becauſe the Venetians among others would not faile, they deputed ſixe of the chiefe of the Citty: namely, Marco Dandulo, Lodouico Mocenigo, Vincentio Capel, Antonio Iuſtiniano, Petro Peſare, and Marco Foſcare: who being come to Bolognia, and vnderſtanding that the plague was very great in Rome, they remained there for certaine dayes: but beeing aduertized that the Pope was enforced to leaue the Citty, and to retire elſe-where, they returned to Venice.

The Venetians Ambaſſage to the Pope.

The new Pope was noted to bee of a generous diſpoſition, and very much addicted to quiet, beeing very zealous for the common good of Chriſtendom. For ſo ſoone as hee was inſtalled in the ſupreame dignity, his greateſt care was, to vſe meanes to vnite all Chriſtian Princes together, and to end all their controuerſies, writing briefs to them all for that purpoſe, with great affection, cauſing his Nuncios to preſent Monitories to thoſe Princes with whom they reſided, threatning to excommunicate them, if within three moneths they did not agree together, or make a generall truce, in which meane ſpace all their ſtrifes might be compoſed and ended. He did likewiſe write particularly to the Venetians, entreating and exhorting them, not onely to hearken vnto peace, but to procure all other Chriſtian Princes to vnite themſelues together, and to oppoſe themſelues againſt the greatneſſe of the Ottoman Empire. But perceiuing the execution of this enterpriſe to bee very difficult, hee was deſirous in the meane time to conclude a league betwixt himſelfe, the Emperor, the Venetians, the Duke of Milan, and the Florentines, for the defence and quiet of Italy. The Senate did at the firſt entertaine his propoſition with great affection, eſteeming it to bee very good and profitable, but hauing conſidered in what manet the Pope did practiſe it, how that the end was to haue them to take armes againſt the Turke, they would not enter too farre into it, nor incurre the diſpleaſure of ſo mighty a Monarke: wherein wholy to ſatisfie him, they on a ſodaine ſent the aboue-named Ambaſſadors, that were appointed to preſent their obedience to him, (the plague beeing ceaſed in Rome) who beeing arriued, were honorably receiued and enterteined by his Holyneſſe, who promiſed them to deale in ſuch ſort as they ſhould be fully ſatisfied.

The Pope is zealous of an vniuerſall peace.

League betwixt the Pope, the Emperor, the Venetians, the Duke of Milan, and the Florentines.

The treaty of agreement in the meane time with the Emperor was not interrupted, for all theſe goings and commings, the Senate hauing appointed three of their number, namely, Ledouico Mocenigo, Georgio Cornare, and Marc-Antonio Veniere to conferre with Ieronimo Adorni the Emperors Commiſſioner, that they might determine of it afterwards, vpon their report, in the Councell of the Pregays, and make ſome reſolution thereupon.

This

This conference beeing ended, and the whole buſineſſe beeing ſent back to the Councell to bee debated, their opinions were very different, ſome ſaying that it was beſt to continue their alliance with the French King, and others to make a new one with the Emperor; the two chiefe of theſe contrary opinions, were Andrè Gritti, and Georgio Cornare. The firſt, beeing highly eſteemed for the great offices which hee had borne, and for his great authority in the commonwealth, ſpake firſt, with great vehemencie in the behalfe of the French King: The other beeing of like authority, and accounted as wiſe a man as any in the Councell, ſpake to the contrary, and ſaid, that the Dutchy of Milan did by right appertaine to Francis Sforza, and that therefore by conſequent they were to make alliance with the Emperor.

Different opinions in the Senate concerning their alliance with the Emperor.

Both of them by their great and apparent reaſons, did rather poſſeſſe the Senators mindes with doubts then with any certaine reſolution, ſo that the Senate delayed the determination thereof as much as they could, their vſuall manner inducing them therevnto, which was not to doe any thing raſhly, the importance of the matter, and their deſire to ſee more preparations of the French Kings, who prouiding for warre had ſent the Biſhop of Bayeux, to entreate them to put off their determination for a moneth longer, aſſuring them that before that time were expired, hee would come downe with a greater army then had euer beene ſeene in Italy in the memory of man.

But becauſe the King did dayly ſend new meſſengers to the Senate with very great offers, and for that they were aduertized that Anna of Montmorency and Frederick de Bozzolo were comming to Venice for the ſame cauſe; The Emperor and the King of Englands Ambaſſadors, who did very much ſuſpect thoſe delayes, did proteſt in open Senate, that within three dayes next they would depart thence, leauing all matters imperfected. In regarde whereof, the Senate being enforced to end that buſineſſe, and the truſt which they repoſed in the French Kings promiſes beginning to faile, by reaſon that hee had for diuers monethes fed them with vaine hope, and eſpecially, becauſe their Ambaſſador with the ſame King did aſſure them of the contrary, they reſolued to embrace the Emperors frendſhip, with whom they made agreement on theſe conditions.

The proteſtation of the Emperor and King of Englands Ambaſſadors in Senate.

That there ſhould be a perpetuall peace and confederacy betwixt the Emperor Ferdinand Archduke of Auſtria, and Francis Sforza Duke of Milan, on the one ſide; and the Senate of Venice on the other. That the Senate ſhould ſend, when need ſhould bee, for the defence of the Dutchy of Milan, ſixe hundred men at armes, ſixe hundred light horſe, and ſixe thouſand foot. That it ſhould doe the like for the defence of the kingdome of Naples, if any Chriſtians ſhould enuade it (the Venetians beeing vnwilling to oblige themſelues againſt the Turke, becauſe they would not incenſe Soliman againſt them): That the Emperor ſhould bee bound to defend againſt all men, with like number of Souldiors, whatſoeuer the Venetians poſſeſſed in Italy.

The articles of the alliance made betwixt the Emperor, Francis Sforza and the Venetians.

That the Venetians ſhould in eight yeares pay to the Archduke, the ſumme of two hundred thouſand Ducats, in regarde of their antient ſtrifes, and for the agreement made at Wormes. That the Venetians ſhould poſſeſſe their Cities, townes and places of their demaines, with the ſame preheminence and iuriſdiction as they then enioyed them: That all thoſe who had beene banniſhed by the Senate, and their goods confiſcate for taking the Emperours part, ſhould returne into their owne Countrey, bee reſtored againe to their goods, and ſhould during their life haue a yeerely penſion of fiue thouſand Ducats.

Theſe things beeing thus concluded, the Kings of Poland, Hungary and Portu-

Portugall,as friends to both parties,the Duke of Sauoy likewiſe, the Florentines, the family of Medicis,Antonio Adorni Duke of Genoa,and the Marquis of Montferrat were ioyned in this league; as for the Pope and the King of England they were named Gardians and conſeruers of this conuention.

The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the Emperor to reioyce with him for the new league.

This accord beeing thus eſtabliſhed and confirmed, the Senate elected two Ambaſſadors to ſend to the Emperor, namely, Lorenzo Prieuli, and André Nouagiero: and to the Archduke his brother Carlo Contaren, to reioyce with them for the new league,and for to giue them ample teſtimony of their affection towards the houſe of Auſtria. And becauſe that Triuulcio,Generall for the Venetians,did greatly affect the French, the Senate in that regard, did honorably diſmiſſe him, ſeeming to be very well pleaſed with his former ſeruice, by offering him a yeerly pention of three thouſand crownes if he would continew with them as a priuate Cittizen, till ſuch time as a better opportunity and occaſion ſhould preſent it ſelfe; but refuſing their offer, he went into France: And in his place they choſe Franciſco Maria Duke of Vrbin Generall of their forces, with the ſame conditions, taking vpon them the protection of his State againſt all men.

The Duke of Vrbin General to the Venetians.

In Italy all men thought,that ſeeing the Venetians were contrary to the French King,who in time before had fauoured him, that hee would forbeare to come into Italy to enuade the Dutchy of Milan, but when they vnderſtood how that hee did not onely continue his preparations, but that his army began already to march: thoſe who feared his victory, did forthwith make a new confederacie to reſiſt him, and perſwaded the Pope to bee the chiefe thereof. In very deed it was a thing to be wondered at, that ſo ſoone as the French King had certaine newes that the league betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians was concluded and finiſhed,hee made greater preparations then before to marche into the field, where as in times paſt, beeing ſolicited by the Venetians, hee proceeded therein more ſlowly,and that which is more,hee bent his thoughts on the Dutchy of Milan,at ſuch time as hee had moſt reaſon to looke to his owne kingdome, in regarde of the Duke of Bourbons practiſes with the Emperor,the which beeing diſcouered, hee forſooke the Realme,and retired himſelfe to the ſayd Emperor, according to his former proiect: by meanes whereof, the King determined for that time not to purſue his iourney into Italy: and yet neuertheleſſe keeping at home with him, part of thoſe forces prepared for the new warre, hee ſent the Lord of Boniuet Admirall of France thither,with eighteene hundred Lances, ſixe thouſand Suiſſes,two thouſand Griſons, two thouſand Valeſians, ſixe thouſand Lanſquenets, two thouſand French-men, and three thouſand Italians: who hauing paſſed the Mounts with that Armie, and beeing come to the borders of the Dutchy of Milan,marched directly towards Nouara, the which beeing not well fortified, neither with Soldiers nor Rampiers, did ſoone yeeld, (the Caſtle excepted) the like did Vigeua and all the reſt of the Countrey on the hether ſide of the riuer Theſin.

The Duke of Bourbon forſaketh the French Kings party.

Nouara and Vigeua yeeld to the French.

VVhat Proſpero Colonna did,vpon report of the arriuall of the French.

Proſpero Colonna (who could not bee perſwaded that the French King would perſeuer in his determination to aſſaile the Dutchy of Milan for that yeare, as well becauſe that the Venetians were confederated againſt him, as for the Duke of Bourbons rebellion,had not ſo ſoone as need required aſſembled his ſoldiers who were lodged in ſundry places, nor made neceſſary prouiſions for ſo great a motion) ſolicited all men to vnite themſelues together, to hinder the French from paſſing ouer the Theſin.

The Venetians on the other ſide beeing aduertiſed of the Frenchmens arriuall, did ſodainly command all their men at armes to meete vpon the bankes of the Riuer Olio, determining at the ſame time to make a leuy of ſixe thouſand foote, and foure hundred light horſe, to ſend them according to the treaty of the Confederacie for the defence of the Dutchie of Milan, and three thouſand other footemen to lye in garriſon in their Citties and ſtrong Townes: they they made Leonardo Eme their Prouidator generall, and ſent a ſpeedy meſſenger to the Duke of Vrbin, to will him to march forth-with into Lombardy, for the execution of his charge there. And hauing notice of the Lord of Boniuets progreſſion, they commanded their Prouidator to leade their forces into the Country of Giradade, to aſſure the Citties of Bergamo and Crema, and like-wiſe to releeue ſpeedily the Citty of Milan, whither the French did bend all their deſeignes.

The Venetians preparations againſt the French.

The French being come to Vigeua, finding the waters of the riuer to bee ſhallower then Proſpero ſuppoſed, part of them beganne to paſſe ouer at a ford, and others in boates, within foure miles of the Imperialls Campe, and made a bridge for the artillery at a place where they found no gard, nor reſiſtance: whereof Proſpero being aduertized, did ſpeedily ſend a hundred men at armes, and three thouſand foot for the gard of Pauia; and him-ſelfe with the reſidue of the army went into Milan, where by the aduice of all the Captaines, hee beganne to repaire the baſtions and rampiers of the ſuburbes, which had beene neglected ſince the laſt warre: ſo as if the French had directly come to Milan, the Imperialls would haue forſaken the Citty, and would haue gone either to Pauia or Coma, for it was ſo reſolued in their Councell; but hauing ſtayed longer then they ſhould neere to the riuer Theſin, to vnite them-ſelues together, they came afterwards to Saint Chriſtophers within a mile of Milan, and then comming betwixt the gate of Theſin, and the Roman, they planted their ordnance in the vantgard, making ſhew as if they would aſalt the Citty: but after they had encamped there certaine daies, without aſſailing it at all, in regard of the great forces that were within it, they went to Monce, which they tooke with eaſe: from thence Captaine Bayard, and Frederic of Boſſola, marched towards Lauda, on which, (being altogether abandoned,) they likewiſe ſeazed. Then determining to releeue the Caſtle of Cremona, they marched on the Cremonois, and being without any difficulty come neere to the Caſtle, they did refreſh it with victualls, and other neceſſaries, and reſolued to aſſaile the Citty.

The French paſſe the Theſin without any let.

The error of the French.

The French lying before Milan do con a ſodoine raiſe their Camp.

They take Monce.

The Ambaſſadors of the Emperor and the Duke of Milan, which lay at Venice, being moued by theſe dangers, did ſolicite the Senate to ſend their forces ouer the riuer Oglio, to the end that they might goe and encampe in ſome ſtronge, and ſafe place on the Cremonois, to diuert the French from the ſeege of Cremona, albeit their whole enterprizes, were onely for the taking of Milan, for which part of their forces were at Carauagia, and at Monce, to ſtop the Venetian army from paſſing on any farther.

The Imperialls perceiuing the enemies intent did ſolicite the Venetians to ioyne with them, not conſidering the perills and difficulties that did preſent themſelues: by meanes whereof the Senate knowing that the ſame buſineſſe did depend on the ſytuation of places, and on ſundry accidents which happened, did referre the whole matter to the iudgement and diſcretion of the Duke their Generall, who after hee had heedefully viewed all the paſſages determined to encampe beyond the riuer Oglio, betwixt Romano, and Martinenga: whereat the Imperialls beeing diſcontented, made a new entreaty that they might come and encampe more neere to Treſſa.

In the meane time other ſuccors came from elſewhere, into the Dutchy of Milan, as well of Lancequenets by the way of Trent, as from the Vicery of Naples; and beſides, they dayly expected the Duke of Bourbon, who was comming into Italy as Lieutenant generall to the Emperor.

Now in the mideſt of all theſe armes, the motion of peace betwixt the Emperor and the French King was not altogether interrupted, for the Archbiſhop of Barri, who for a time had beene his Holineſſe Nuncio in France, was for that purpoſe gone into Spaine to treate of the conditions of peace, the which in reſpect in reſpect of an vniuerſall quiet like was like-wiſe very pleaſing to the Venetians, not without ſuſpition neuer-the-leſſe, that it would come to paſſe as it had at other times happened, that thoſe Princes ſhold afterwards agree together to ouerrunne them: yet not-with-ſtanding, they would not without ſome other greater occaſion faile in ought where-vnto they were tyed by their laſt confederacy: and therefore they ſent to their Prouidator, (vpon the report that the Imperialls would march into the field) willing him to croſſe the Adda, and to ioyne with the Viceroy of Naples, leauing ſtrong garriſons in their frontier townes, and to take care to lodge euer in ſafe and ſtrong places, and eſpecially to auoide, as much as he could, from being enforced to enter into Milan.

The Venetians ſuſpect the motion of peace betwixt the Emperor and the French King.

The Duke of Vrbin neuer-the-leſſe made ſome difficulty to execute that commandement, and to paſſe the Adda, thinking no ſafety to bee therein till the Lancequenets were firſt of all come into the field with the Marquis of Mantuas forces; as alſo for that hee had intelligence, that great numbers of Swiſſes were come to the French Campe, who were thought to bee ten thouſand: in regard whereof, being entreated by the Imperialls, to ioyne with them at Beauregard, he refuſed to doe ſo, becauſe that Quarter was but foure miles off from the French campe, whereby it was to be feared, that approaching ſo neere the enemies, they might be enforced againſt their wil and to their diſaduantage to come to a battail: as alſo for that two thouſand Swiſſes were lately come to Laude, and it was to bee doubted that they would come and aſſaile the Territory of Crema, or the Bergamaſk, whither it was like-wiſe reported that ſixe thouſand Gryſons were comming, ſent by the French King, who had at the ſame time diſmiſſed the Venetian Ambaſſador reſident in his Court.

The Duke of Vrbins difficulty to execute the Senates commaund.

But the Imperialls ſtill ſoliciting the Duke of Vrbin to ioyne with them, the Senate, to take away all ſuſpition of bad dealing, commanded their Generall to doe it, hauing in the meane time leuied three thouſand Italian foot, and foure hundred light horſe which were ſtradiots, for the gard and defence of their towns; the command of whome was giuen to Iohn Mora, who was elected gouernor of Crema, with title of Prouidator Generall of the Breſſan Teritory. At the ſame-time Petro Peſare was ſent Prouidator to the army inſted of Heme who fell ſicke, and was retyred to Venice.

The Venetians make new leuies of horſe and foot.

The Venetian Army being come to Treſſa, and the Marquis of Mantua being gone to Pauia, the French army was in great want of victualls, all paſſages being ſtopped whereby they were wont to be brought to them, wherein the Venetian army purchaced great praiſe, eſpecially the Venetian Stradiots, ſo as the Admirall fearing him-ſelfe to fall into the ſame want of victualls wherevnto hee thought to haue reduced the Citty of Milan, reſolued to diſcampe, and to retire ſome twelue miles from the Citty.

At this ſtay ſtood their affaires, when Pope Adrian dyed on the foureteenth day of September, to the great loſſe and diſcommodity of the confederates, to whome by his death the Pontificall authority was not onely wanting, but like wiſe the pecuniary contribution, wherevnto hee was tyed by the Capitulations of the confederacy. So ſoone in a manner as the Admirall was departed from before Milan, the Cardinalls, who had already beene fifty daies in the conclaue, created a new Pope, which was, Iulius of Medicis, who tooke vpon him the name of Clement the ſeauenth.

Pope Adrian his death.

The creation of Pope Clement the ſeuenth.

This election certainly was very pleaſing to all men, for the great opinion that the whole world had conceiued of him, becauſe hee was a man of great authority and worth, and reputed to bee graue and conſtant in his determinations. The Senate being deſirous to let him know how highly they loued and honored him, appointed eight Ambaſſadors to goe and congratulate him for his new promotion: and to preſent him with their vſuall obedience: the Ambaſſadors were were Marco Dandulo, Ieronimo Peſaure, Dominico Veniero, Vincentio Capel, Thomaſo Contaren, Lorenzo Bragadino, Nicolo Tepula, and Lodouico Bono.

The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the new Pope.

Within a while after Prince Grimani dyed, after hee had gouerned one yeare and tenne moneths, hee was with great pompe carried to Saint Anthonies Church.

ANDRE GRITTI
the 77. Duke.

ANDRE GRITTI, Procurator of Saint Marke, a man very famous for his rare and ſingular vertues, was choſen in his place, who had already in time before managed abroad and at home, the moſt important affaires of the Common wealth.

After this manner was the yeare 1523. ended. At the beginning of the next following, the French mens difficulties, did inuite the Emperors Captaines to thinke on meanes how to finiſh the warres: for this purpoſe They ſent for the Duke of Vrbin to Milan, with Petro Peſare the Prouidator of the Army, to conſult how they ſhould proceed in the warres, where all men were of opinion, that ſo ſone as the ſixe thouſand Lancequenets, which the Viceroy had ſent to leuy, ſhould be arriued at Milan, the Emperors army togither with that of the Venetians ſhould aſſaill the enemies, and either by force or famine driue them forth of the Dutchy of Milan, who beeing already reduced to extreame want of victualls, and mony, did dayly disband at the head of their Armie, the which the Admirall perceiuing

An. 1523.

The Imperials determine to aſſaill the French.

perceiuing, did ſtill by little and little retire forth of the State of Milan. This retreat of the French cauſed the Venetian army to aduance foreward, the which being come to Binaſca, did ioyne with the Viceroy and the Marquis of Mantua, who hauing left a ſufficient garriſon in Milan, were come into the field, and finding themſelues to be ſtrong, they came within fiue miles of the French Camp, thereby keeping them not only from ſcouring the Contrey, but from victuals which were wont to come vnto them. And the Imperials and the Venetians growing afterwards more bold, did croſſe the Theſin neere to Pauia, to make themſelues maſters of the contrey, and to take from the enemies thoſe commodities which they vſed to receiue from thence.

The Imperials purſued the French.

The French wondring at the enemies boldneſſe were likewiſe enforced to paſſe the ſame riuer to oppoſe themſelues againſt their deſeignes, the Duke of Vrbin hauing paſſed Theſin beganne to ſcoure the Contrey, and hauing on euery ſide beaten the plaines, he went and encamped before Garlas, a towne ſtrongly fenced with dikes and Rampiers, wherein were foure hundred Italian footmen, to which after he had made a breach, he gaue an aſſault the very ſame day, and tooke it by force, with great ſlaughter of thoſe that were within it. The taking of this towne cauſed diuers others to yeeld vnto him.

The Imperials take Garlas.

The Admirals hope beeing grounded vpon two points, both of them failed him: The one was that Rance de Cera comming downe with eight thouſand Griſons into the Venetians territories, would conſtraine them to call back their forces to defend their owne Contrey: aud the other was, that the ayd of Suiſſes which the King ſent to him would ſpeedily arriue, and fill vp his army which was much diminiſhed; but both thoſe hopes prooued vaine. For the Griſons would not depart from their houſes, when they vnderſtood that they ſhould find reſiſtance and no aide, and the Suiſſes being come to the bankes of the riuer Steſia, tarried there ſtill, beeing not able to paſſe it by reaſon of the great encreaſe of the waters: wherevpon the Admirall being preſſed by the Enemies and the nomber of his forces daily decreaſing, being deſirous to ioyne with them, commanded a bridge to be made ouer that riuer, and the day following he cauſed all his ſoldiers to paſſe ouer to the Suiſſes, the enemies being lodged within two miles of them.

VVhy the Griſons would not leaue their houſes.

Now the Imperialls perceiuing in what diſorder the French were retired, who left diuers peices of Ordnance, with other munition behind them, intreated the Duke of Vrbin to purſue them in their company, whereunto the Duke of Vrbin ſeemed to conſent: But the Prouidator refuſing ſo to doe, the Venetians would not paſſe ouer the riuer, thinking that they had already paſſed farther then they were tyed to by the bonds of the Confederacy, by which they were bound to nothing elce but for the defence of the Dutchy of Milan, and they had entred into the lands of the Duke of Sauoy: for which refuſall the Duke of Vrbin was greatly commended, and the Senate being deſirous to acknowledge it, albeit he had not ſerued them long, did neuertheleſſe honour him with the Title of Generall of all their forces, as well horſſe as foot, with a preſent recompence.

Now whilſt the Venetians were buſied in this war, ſondry cares & dangers troubled them from elſewhere, for they had intelligence that Soliman practized ſome high attempt, and was deſirous to execute it, by reaſon that he made great preparations of Soldiers and armor, the which did much amaze them, and cauſed them to keepe ſtrong garriſons in all their ſea townes, and cheefly in the Ile of Ciprus, whereunto they knew the Turke aſpired; and to furniſh that expence, impoſed a loane, as well on their perticular cittizens, as on al their citties and ſubiects, which ſpeedily furniſhed them with ready money.

The Venetians ſtand in feare of Soliman.

In this meane time the French King, notwithſtanding the bad ſucceſſe of his army, had neither loſt his courage, nor his deſire to returne into Italy, being the more prouoked thereunto by the diſdaine which he had conceiued of the Emperor

Emperor, who not beeing ſatisfied with taking vpon him the defence of the ſtate of Milan did moreouer trouble him in his owne Realme, by ſtirring vp the King of England againſt him. wherevpon, he made great warlike preparations to returne himſelfe in perſon into Italy the which he hoped to doe with more eaſe and ſpeed, becauſe his Army was ſafely returned into France.

Cauſe of the French Kings diſcontent with the Emperour.

Theſe newes did greatly trouble the Senators, not only in regard of the huge expence they were to be at, by reaſon of their alliance with the Emperor for the defence of the ſtate of Milan, but likewiſe for the feare they were in of their owne ſtate, the French King beeing mightely incenſed againſt them, not ſo much for that which they had done in their laſt encounters, as for that they being ſince then ſollicited to returne to his alliance and to quit the Emperors, they had wholy refuſed it.

VVhy the French King was diſpleaſed with the Venetians.

The Venetians being then aduertiſed that the French army paſſed the mounts, did cauſe all their forces, which lay in ſondry places in Garriſon, to meet on the Verona territory, whether they ſent word to the Duke of Vrbin to come, and willed Peſſare their Prouidator to goe thither with all ſpeed, to waite what ſhould be commanded him. The Pope in the meane time being ſhaken with feare, & ſondry ſuſpitions, told the Venetians, that it was well done to be vnited with himſelfe and the Emperor and to proceed maturely in all matters, for the liberty of Italy, and for the defēce of the ſtate of Milan that they poſſibly could: but if they ſhould not find themſelues ſtrong enough to reſiſt the mighty army of the French, it were better to ſeeke in time to reconcile themſelues to the moſt Chriſtian King, then to delay it till he ſhould fiercely march againſt them, thereby to auoyd thoſe inſolencies, which doe vſually follow victories: He willed them to conſider that the power of the French was very great and of force to ouerturne the whole ſtate of Italy: and that they ſhould doe well to ſend ample power and authority to Marco Foſcare their Ambaſſador at Rome, to treat of that which the French had already offered them.

The Popes remonſtrances to the Venetians

Though the Pope propounded all this by way of Councell, yet neuertheleſſe it was perceiued thereby, that his meaning tended to a new confederacy with the French the better to aſſure the ſtate of the Church, and that of Florence: For which the Senate did not yet perceiue any reaſon, ſo ſoone and without cauſe to quit the Emperors alliance, to returne to that of the French King, ſeeing it would haue argued ouermuch lightneſſe and inconſtancy, and ſmall diſcretion to make the Emperor their enemy, before they were certaine of the French Kings will: and therefore they had determined that their army ſhould enter into the ſtate of Milan, to be employed in the Emperors ſeruice, but the Duke of Vrbin before he would execute their determination ſent them word how dangerous a matter it were for the Common-wealth, to ſend their army abroad at that time, becauſe that if they with their forces ſhould aſſure the ſtate of Milan, it was to be feared that the enemy would turne his deſignes ſomewhere elſe, and perhaps againſt their ſtate, and therefore he ſaid that it were beſt to tarry till the French army had paſſed the riuer Sila, before that they did put their reſolution in practiſe. But the French making great haſt, were ſooner in the Dutchy of Milan then they were looked for, and from thence marching directly to the Citty, they came to the ſuburbes of the gate of Theſin, before it could be ſufficiently rampierd and prouided of victuailes, whereupon all the Captaines were of opinion to forſake it: therfore the Duke of Bourbon, the Vicerdy and Sforza retired to Soncina with all the troopes that were within it; and the Marquis of Peſcara to Lauda; but they gaue ſpeciall order, that Pauia might be well fortefied and ſtored with ſoldiers and all other neceſſary prouiſions, into the which Antonio de Leua entred with three hundred men at armes, and fiue thouſand foot, partly Spaniards and Almaines beeing all of them old ſoldiers. In this ſort did the French recouer the Citty of Milan, into the which the King would not haue the army enter leaſt they VVherevnto the Pope attended.

The French come to Milan.

The Imperialls retire to Soncina and Lauda.

The Duke of Albany enuades Naples.

should sack it. At the same time John Stuard Duke of Albanie, appointed by the King to goe and enuade the Realme of Naples, with two hundred Lances, seauen hundred light horse, and foure thousand Suisses, craued passage of the Pope thorow the Churches territories, and thorow Tuscany, to march to that enterprise, which was resolued on to draw the Imperiall forces thither, to the end that the defence of the state of Milan might bee weakned, where dayly sundry townes yeelded without any great difficulty.

Pauia besieged by the French King.

All the cheefe exploits of warre were neere vnto Pauia, whither the King with his whole army was come to besiege it, resoluing not to stirre from thence till hee had taken it, thinking that it would greatly diminish his reputation, if hauing so goodly an armie, hee should leaue such a Citty behinde him, so well stored with Soldiors and victuals, as that was. The King had (according to the common report) not reckoning those who stayed at Milan, two thousand Lances, eight thousand Lansquenets, sixe thousand Suisses, sixe thousand Pioners, and foure thousand Italians: the number of whom did afterwards very much encrease, with great prouision of Artillery, and the flower of all the French Nobility.

The Imperials on the other side placed their cheife hope in the conseruation of that Citty, and therefore all men were desirous to see, what the euent of that siege would bee, especially the Pope and the Venetians, fearing on the one side, the French Kings armes who was displeased with them, if hee should prooue the victor, and on the other, those of the Imperialls, if chasing thence the French, they should become maisters of Italy.

The Venetians feare.

Amidst these sundry thoughts, they shewed themselues in a manner newters, neither sending their forces to the ayde of the Imperialls, nor agreeing in any sort with the French, expecting with good deuotion the successe of Pauia, which beeing reduced to a siege, did seeme would bee very long. The Pope neuertheless thinking it to bee a part of his duty, to procure peace betwixt these Princes, sent his Datarie to the Kings Campe to treate of an agreement, wherevnto the King seemed to condiscend, the Viceroy was soone aduertised thereof by his Holynesse, to the end hee might testifie that his desire was conformable to the duty wherevnto hee was obliged by the place and degree that hee held, to vnite the Emperor and the most Christian king in a firme peace and friendship, that all of them together might afterwards arme against the power of Soliman, who was already in the field with a mighty Armie.

The Pope is a mediator betwixt the Emperor and the French King.

Conditions of peace propounded by the Pope

The conditions of the treaty of peace propounded by the Pope, were, That the Emperor should enioy the kingdome of Naples, and the French king the Duchy of Milan, with particular promise not to passe on any farther into Italy, without the Popes knowledge and consent. This treaty hauing continued for certaine daies, no effect thereof succeeded, but onely iealousies betwixt the French and Spaniards: wherevpon the Venetians were againe solicited by both parties to fauour their sides. The Count of Carpi came to Venice from the French to solicite the Senate to renue their alliance with the most Christian king, or at least-wise, that they would not bee against him: The Viceroy on the other side, sent Charles of Arragon thither, to require them to send those forces which they were bound to by the capitulations of the league: They answered the French Ambassador in generall termes, how that they had referred all that businesse to the Pope: but to him the Viceroy sent, albeit they did not refuse his demand, yet neuertheless they answered coldely, as those who knew very well how to fit their councels to the euent of things, and this irresolution of theirs continued till such time as the Pope had very secretly concluded with the French king, both for himselfe & them, wherevpon, when they came to resolution in the Senate, their opinions were different, either because in many of them the memory of their ancient alliance with the French King was renewed, or else for that they supposed hee would

The Venetians sought to, by both sides would prooue victorious, in regarde of the great forces that hee had ready in Italy, againſt enemies that were wholy vnready and very ill prouided of all neceſſaries: which cauſed them rather to encline to the French, then to the Imperials.

VVhat moued the Senate to ally themſelues with the French.

According then to this reſolution, a peace, and league betwixt the Pope, the King, and the Venetians was determined and concluded at Rome with the Ambaſſadors, in the beginning of Ianuary, the yeare 1525. and confirmed afterwards by the Senate at Venice. This treaty beeing handled very ſecretly, the Senate beeing moſt importunately vrged by the Emperors Ambaſſadors, to ioyne their troopes with the Imperiall Armie, after ſundry excuſes, anſwered that they would not contradict the Popes command, and leaſt of all at that time when they were vpon a treaty of peace which his Holyneſſe purſued by the Emperors conſent, and that therefore they would not interrupt it, nor bee a meanes to prolong the warre.

An. 1525.

The league beeing thus concluded, the French King ſent the Bailiffe of Dijon to Venice, to congratulate them, and to aſſure them of his loue to the Commonwealth, from which hee promiſed neuer to diuide himſelfe. Hee did afterwards require that the ſame accord, which was ſecretly concluded, might be publiſhed abroad, wherevnto the Venetians did freely condeſcend: thinking it to bee the beſt, thereby to cauſe the Imperials, who expected their ayde, to hope no longer for it, and that they beeing deſtitute of their helpe, diſpairing of beeing able to keepe the State of Milan, might retire ſome-where elſe, or incline to peace.

The Senates anſwer to the Imperialls.

The Pope was of a contrary opinion, ſaying, That the treaty ought not to be publiſhed, the better to reduce the Imperials to greater neceſſity and danger, which would happen ſo ſoone as the French ſhould paſſe the Po, which they ſaid they would doe, promiſing to repaſſe it at the Popes pleaſure: but time and neceſſity preſſing him to diſcouer himſelfe, in regard hee was to grant paſſage to the Duke of Albany thorow the Churches territories, for his iourney into the Realme of Naples: the Pope made ſhew, as if the Duke of Albany would paſſe by force and violence with his troopes thorow the lands of the Church and the Florentines, and that for himſelfe hee would remaine neutrall in that warre, and ſeeke to procure an vniuerſall peace and concord, proteſting againſt thoſe two Princes, and admoniſhing them both to throw downe Armes, to come to an agreement, and to lay in depoſito in the hand of a third perſon not ſuſpected, whatſoeuer did yet hold out in the Dutchy of Milan, for the Emperor, and Duke: Hee gaue notice thereof to the Viceroy by Paul Vettori, Captaine of his Galleys, as alſo how he could not ſtop the Duke of Albanies paſſage, but that it behooued him to bee aſſured of him by new conuentions, hee likewiſe ſent him diuerſe other articles, which hee hoped to inſert in the peace.

Sundry opinions on the publication of the league.

The Pope proteſteth againſt the Emperor and the King, if they agree not.

Theſe propoſitions cauſed the Imperialls to ſuſpect that the Pope had agreed with the French King, (as in effect hee had done) for perceiuing themſelues enforced at one time, with great want of money to maintaine the warre in Lombardie, and to haue an eye to the kingdome of Naples, they could neuer bee ayded eyther by the Pope or the Florentines, and were beſides very well aſſured that the Venetians would forſake them, who entertaining the Imperiall Captaines with hope that they would obſerue the league, did deferre the execution thereof with ſundry excuſes, ſo as the Viceroy was euen at the point to returne with his Army into the Realme of Naples for the ſafety thereof.

The Imperialls ſuſpect the Pope.

But in the Councell held for that purpoſe, the opinion of the Marquis of Peſcara did wholy preuaile, who ſhewing himſelfe no leſſe couragious then diſcreet, ſayd, That it was moſt neceſſary to continue the warre of Lumbardy, and that on the victory thereof, all other matters did depend.

The Marquis of Peſcara cauſeth the Imperiall army to tarry in Lumbardy.

The Emperor at the ſame time according to his alliance made with the King of England, did ſo handle the matter, that the ſaid king ſhould the yeare following come to Calais with a mighty army to make war on France, who to that end ſent a Knight to the Emperors Campe, which cauſed the Imperials to hold out more boldly, as being aſſured that the Chriſtian King aſſailed in his own Realme, would be enforced to raiſe his camp, & to haſt thither for the defence thereof, the agreement made betwixt the Pope, himſelf, & the Venetians, being not as yet diuulged.

The newes then of the King of Englands great warlike preparations for his comming downe into France, beeing blazed abroad, cauſed the Venetians not to haſten the publication of the agreement, fearing leaſt the King, vpon that report, might bee enforced to lead his forces elſe-where. But the ſucceſſe of the enterpriſe of Lombardy, and of all other deſeignes, depended at the laſt on the ſiege of Pauia, which held out longer then all men expected: the which the Pope and the Venetians did very much diſtaſte, not altogether ſo much for the length thereof, as fearing leaſt the French Captaines, impatient of ſo long ſtay, ſhould perſwade the King to goe and charge the enemies, and by that meanes commit to the hazard of fortune, not oney his Armie, but likewiſe their ſtates; and the liberty of Italy, which (hauing none other meanes to withſtand the Imperialls, if they ſhould become victorious) would prooue their prey.

The Pope and the Venetians feare leaſt the King ſhould come to battaile.

In the meane time the ſiege of Pauia ſtill continued, notwithſtanding that for want of munition, the battery did in ſome ſort ceaſe, which was forth-with remedied by the Duke of Ferrara, who cauſed great ſtore to bee brought to the Campe thorow the Parmeſan and Placentine territories, by the carriages and beaſts of husbandmen. But the Imperiall forces beeing augmented by the ſuccours which were newly arriued, and the Viceroy hauing notice of the decay of the Kings Armie, by reaſon of the long winter that they had continued in field, as alſo that the King had diuided his Army (namely thoſe whom the Duke of Albany led, and fiue thouſand men that the Marquis of Saluces had with him at Sauona, and the places neere adioyning, beſides great numbers of others, who remained as well at Milan as in other places, for the ſafety of Victuals) determined, till the Duke of Bourbon with the Lanſquenets ſhould arriue, to marche into the field for the reliefe of Pauia. But the Duke of Bourbon arriued in the meane time, with fiue hundred Bourgonian men at armes, and ſix thouſand Lanſquenets whom the Archduke paide: whereupon purſuing their iourney, not determining to giue the King battaile vnleſſe it were vpon great aduantage, but onely to trye if they could put freſh ſuccours and victuals into the Citty, they came and lodged without the Parke, on the ſide of the Chartreuſe, within Cannon ſhot of the Kings Campe, who beeing perſwaded by all his followers to diſcampe, and to retire either to Binaſca or to Milan, and that therby without bloud or danger hee might forthwith obtaine the victory, becauſe that the enemies Army beeing without money, could not long hold out, but would bee enforced to diſſolue it ſelf, or to be ſcattered vp and down heere and there about the country: Hee would not for all that giue ouer the ſiege of Pauia, thinking that it would highly ſhame and diſgrace him, if that Army wherein hee was in perſon, ſhould ſeeme to be afraide, and giue place at the enemies comming.

What cauſed the Imperials to come into the field.

The King would by no meanes diſcamp from before Pauia.

The Imperialls then hauing made two ſquadrons of horſe, and foure of foot, they came thorow the Parke wall, of which they had beaten downe three ſcore fathom, ſome of them directly to Mirabel, & the reſidue to the kings camp, where after a ſore fight on either ſide, the king being with great numbers of mē at armes in the midſt of the battaile, fighting valiantly, his horſe was ſlaine vnder him, and falling to the ground, being hurt in the face and in the hand, was taken by fiue ſoldiors that knew him not: but the Viceroy arriuing, hee made himſelfe knowne to him, who with great reuerence kiſſed his hands, and receiued him priſoner for the Emperor. All the French Army was forthwith put to rout, & the greateſt part of the ſoldiers were diſarmed, the rereward of horſe excepted, conducted by the duke of Alançon. This ſo great & famous a victory obteined by the Imperials ouer the French;

The Imperials aſſaile the kings Camp.

The King is taken by the Imperials, and the army is put to rout.

French ; did greatly afflict the Venetians with care, fore-ſeeing the great burthen they were to vndergoe, the counterpoize of the French forces failing them, and all the other Princes of Italy beeing too weake to make reſiſtance : and were greatly affrighted with that ſucceſſe, they alone beeing to defend the liberty of Italy, againſt ſuch a mighty enemy, growne great in ſtrength and reputation : beeing yet doubtfull whether hee would conteine himſelfe within the limits of the Dutchy of Milan, or elſe beeing puffed vp with that fortunate ſucceſſe, paſſe on farther and follow the courſe of his victory.

The Venetians diſcourſe on the Kings taking.

Their whole forces were but a thouſand men at armes, ſixe hundred light horſe, and tenne thouſand foot, and reſoluing to leuy more, they exhorted all the other potentats of Italy to do the like according to their ſtrength and means: but they cheefely laboured to vnite themſelues with the Pope, ſuppoſing that all other Italian Princes would depend on his authority: vnto whom after they had declared all the eminent dangers that threatened them, and that he had attentiuely heard them, they would not for all that, induce him to make any braue reſolution, nor hinder him from thinking on an accord, determining to accept ſuch an one as it ſhould pleaſe the conqueror to offer him, rather then with his owne forces, and thoſe of his friends and confederates, oppoſe himſelfe againſt the violence that might bee offered him : and hee had already begun to treate with the Viceroy, fearing leaſt the Imperiall forces beeing deſtitute of all meanes, ſhould come and fall vppon the Church territories, and on thoſe of the Florentines.

The Popes reſolution after the defeate of the French.

The Viceroy gaue a willing eare to the agreement which the Pope craued, knowing of what importance it was for the confirmation of the victory, and for the drawing of himſelfe and the Armie forth of many neceſſities where-with they were oppreſſed, ſuppoſing likewiſe that by his example all the other Princes of Italy dooing the like, it was no more to bee feared that the French would euer afterwards come and raiſe any tumults in Italy.

The Venetians hauing diſcouered this treaty, and knowing how many inconueniences the Popes ſafety would bring vpon them, they not beeing able to diuert him from his intent, proceeded ſlowly in their determinations, without breaking off altogether with the Imperialls, nor likewiſe contracting any other alliance with them, but they ſought to perſwade the Pope, that for their laſt refuge (becauſe they would not bee found vnfurniſhed, if the accord which hee ſought to make ſhow of, haue no good ſucceſſe,) to leuy ten thouſand Suiſſes, and at the ſame inſtant to diſpatch a Nuncio to the King of England, to entreate him to ſuccour Italy in ſuch an vrgent neceſſity: that they likewiſe would ſend an Ambaſſador to the ſame King, to make the like requeſt, whereby they hoped to obtaine ſome ſpeedy ayde of him : ſuch great enuies and diſtruſts had that victory procured vnto Charles.

The Venetians ſeeke to alter the Popes opinion.

But the Venetians perceiuing that the Popes intent did wholy tend to an agreement with the Imperialls, they likewiſe reſolued to follow him therein, ſeeing they could not doe otherwiſe. Therefore the Viceroy hauing ſent Iohn Sarmiento to Venice, to aduertiſe them of the victory, they courteouſly entertained him, with great demonſtration of loue towards the Emperor: and they ſent word to Lorenzo Prieuli and André Nouagero, (who beeing already gone in Ambaſſage towards Charles, did tarry at Genoa) that they ſhould proſecute their iourney into Spaine, to reioyce with him in the Senates behalfe for his gotten victory, and to excuſe their delay for not ſending their Forces to the Imperiall Campe.

The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the Emperor.

Now the Emperor beeing aduertiſed of this fortunate ſucceſſe, (albeit in his heart hee was pricked forward with a deſire of glory and greatneſſe, which made him very ioyfull, yet neuertheleſſe ſhewing by his ſpeech and outward geſture, a wonderfull modeſtie, hee aſſured all men that hee would vſe it, as it beſeemed that ſpeciall fauour which God had done him, and for the good and quiet of all Chriſtendome: Wherevpon hee forth-with ſent the Duke of Seſſa to the Pope to offer him peace, and to aſſure him that hee was wholy diſpoſed to the peace and quiet of all Italy. Hee cauſed the ſame ſpeech to bee deliuered to the Venetian Senate by Alonzo Sanchez his Ambaſſador, and by the Prothonotarie Carracciola, who remained at that time in Venice.

The Emperors ſpeech and geſture vpon the newes of the victory.

The Emperor ſendeth an Ambaſſador to the Pope.

But by how much the Imperialls ſeemed to deſire peace and alliance with the Potentates of Italy, at ſuch time when as they ſhould rather haue beene ſought to, then haue ſolicited others, by ſo much more they gaue ſuſpition, that they practiſed high and ſecret enterpriſes, hurtfull to the liberty of Italy, which cauſed the Venetians to temporize, without concluding or reiecting thoſe treaties which the Emperor motioned.

The end of the fifth Booke of the fifth Decade.

The

The Contents of the sixth Booke of the fifth Decade.

THE sorrow which did afflict all France for the Kings imprisonment, and the Councels resolution. The Venetians answer to the French Commissioner. Accord betwixt the Pope and the Emperor. The Marquis of Pescara demandeth the Castles of Milan, and Cremona of Sforza. Accord betwixt the Pope and the Venetians. The curtezie which the King of England used towards the French King. Agreement betwixt the Emperor and French King. The King complaineth of the Emperor. A league concluded at Coignac, betwixt the Pope, the French King, the Venetians, and Francis Sforza. The King of England is entreated to enter into the league, with his answer. Lauda is taken by the Confederates. The Duke of Bourbon commeth to Milan. The Armie of the league retireth from before Milan. The offer of the Pope and the Venetians to the King, concerning the enterprise of the kingdome of Naples. Genoa is besieged by the Confederats. Francis Sforza deliuereth the Castle of Milan to the Emperor. The Citty of Cremona is deliuered to the Confederates. Rome is surprised by the Colonnesi, and the Pope maketh an agreement with them. The King of England giueth a great summe of money to the Pope. The Emperors preparations both by land and Sea. The Confederates prouisions to resist the Emperor. The great leuy of Lansquenets made by George Frondsperg in the Emperors behalfe. The Marquis of Saluffes crosseth the Po with his forces. Foscare exhorteth the Florentines to continue firme in their league. The Spanish Nauall Army flieth from the Confederates. The Pope seeketh an accord with the Viceroy. Frosolona is in vaine besieged by the Viceroy. The Confederates Army in the kingdome of Naples. Aquileia in Abruzzo taken. The Confederates take the

Burrow

Burrow of Sea. The Confederates ſummon the Citty of Naples to yeeld. Great diſorder in the Armie of the league for want of pay. The Duke of Bourbon commeth into the field to beſeege Rome. Accord betwixt the Pope and the Viceroy. Cottignola is taken by Bourbon. Great troubles in Florence. Bourbon beeing come neere to Rome craues paſſage of the Pope to goe into Naples. The Duke of Bourbon aſſaileth Rome. His death. Rome is taken by the Imperialls. And laſtly, the great cruelties which they there committed.

The Sixth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

The ſorrow of all France for the Kings captiuity and the Councels reſolution.

THe newes of the battailes loſſe, with the Kings taking, beeing brought into France, the ſorrow and griefe which afflicted the Lady Regent his mother, and all the ſubiects cannot bee imagined: yet neuertheleſſe like a diſcreet and vertuous Lady, ſhee determined by all meanes poſſible to redreſſe it, and for that purpoſe hauing ſent for all the Princes and Lords which were in France, to come ſpeedily to Lyons, where ſhee then lay, to determine and prouide for matters concerning the Kings liberty, and the Realmes ſafety; It was there reſolued to ſend to forraine Princes to vſe meanes for the Kings deliuery, and among others to the Venetians, and Gaſpar Sorman beeing to that end ſent to Venice from the Lady Regent, hee declared vnto them in her name, that albeit the Realme of France did not feare the enuaſions of any, but was ſtrong and mighty enough to defend it ſelfe, and willing to employ all her power for her Kings deliuery; yet neuertheleſſe ſhee entreated the Signory to aſſiſt her in ſo iuſt a cauſe, and ſo profitable for them and all Italy, by ioyning themſelues with the Lords of France, to enforme the Emperor Charles to ſet the King her ſonne at liberty, vpon honorable conditions.

The Senates answer to the French Commiſſioner.

The Senate, vpon theſe entreaties, did manifeſt their great griefe for the Kings diſaſtrous fortune, with that of the kingdome, declaring the great affection which it did beare to the crowne of France, and for that preſent made none other anſwer but this, That becauſe the buſineſſe was of great importance, it deſerued to haue the Councell aſſembled to determine thereof. But during theſe practiſes, Accord betwixt the Pope and Emperor.

the Pope, who had ſent the Archbiſhop of Capua into Spaine to make an agreement with the Emperor, did ratifie the accord, concluded and determined before with the Viceroy, by which the Venetians were excluded from it, if within twenty twenty dayes after the ſignifying thereof, they did not ratifie it, by meanes whereof the Senate was enforced to renew their treaties with the Emperours Ambaſſadors, and to ſend, (in regarde of the difficulties of importance which were offered) Petro Peſare to Milan, to treate with the Viceroy.

The French in the meane time did not giue ouer their former purſutes, beeing not yet out of hope to ioyne the Venetians to themſelues, (albeit the Popes authoritie might then haue drawne them to a contrary reſolution): wherevpon the Biſhop of Bayeux, and Ambroſe of Florence came to Venice, to make in the name of the ſaid Lady Regent, and in that of the whole Kingdome, more certaine and reſolute propoſitions then at the former time, concerning the league and the Kings freedome. For this cauſe, as alſo for that apparent ſignes were dayly diſcouered of the Emperours great ambition, by reaſon of the deſeignes of his Officers and Agents, which tended onely to make him abſolute Lord of the State of Milan, and of all Italy; theſe French Ambaſſadors were attentiuely heard in the Senate, and their cauſe conſulted on.

French Agents ſent to Venice to treat of an agreement.

The Marquis of Peſcara at the ſame time entring Milan with three thouſand foote, two hundred men at armes, and with great numbers of light horſe, required the Duke to deliuer into his hands the Caſtle of Milan, with that of Cremona, ſpeaking plainely, That hee was come to take poſſeſſion of the Cittie of Milan, beeing ſent thither by the Emperour for the ſame purpoſe, (in whoſe name all Proclamations and other Mandates were already publiſhed) and although the Pope ſought to procure the Emperour to accompliſh the Articles of the confederacie, by conſigning the State of Milan into the hands of Duke Francis Sforza, all his purſutes were in vaine, for, delaying the matter from day to day, hee made now one excuſe, and then an other, imputing to the Duke diuerſe faults committed by him, and among others, That hee had treated with the Venetians, to deliuer the Caſtle of Milan vnto them; a matter which was neuer thought of by eyther of them.

The Marquis of Peſcara his audations demand to Duke Francis Sforza.

Theſe things with diuerſe others, did greatly with-draw the Venetians affection from the Emperour, and cauſed them to giue no more credit to all his promiſes; nor the Pope likewiſe, who ſpeedily to preuent thoſe perills, which threatned them dayly, reſolued to ioyne in league, in regarde there was ſome difficulty, and more trouble and tediouſneſſe to call the French into it.

Accord betwixt the Pope and the Venetians.

The Pope then renouncing the accord formerly made with the Emperour, contracted a new one, aswell in his owne name as in the Florentines, for the which hee ſtrengthened himſelfe with the Duke and Senate of Venice, in which agreement it was mentioned, that they ſhould ioyne together, to preuent thoſe dangers which the experience of things paſt had taught them might happen, and to aſſure the peace and quiet of Italy, and their owne ſtates in perticular, each of them taking vppon them the protection of one anothers ſtates and perſons, running altogether one ſelfe-ſame fortune, not beeing lawfull for eyther of them to treate with any other Prince, to the preiudice of that accord; and to ſuccour one an other with foure thouſand foote-men, foure hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſe, and with greater numbers if need were. And it was more-ouer added therevnto, that the Venetians ſhould bee bound to defend and maintaine the greatneſſe and power of the houſe of Medicis, to ſtoppe and preuent all tumult and commotions which any ſeditious mutins ſhould practiſe againſt it, and to fauour and aſſiſt him, who ſoeuer hee were, that the Pope ſhould place as cheefe Gouernour in the Citty of Florence. Theſe things beeing thus concluded and sworne to, the Pope the better to begin for his part to prepare that which was concluded on, commanded the Marquis of Mantua to visit the Parmesan with his men at armes, taking order besides to hasten the Grisons and Suisse footmen, where they had begun to leuy, but very slowly. The Venetians on the other side determined to encrease their Armie to the number of ten thousand foote, to make a leuy in Greece of other three hundred light horse, and generally to prouide for all matters belonging to their safety. And that which did greatly incite them therevnto, was, the curtezie which the King of England vsed towards the French, who beeing iealous of the Emperors power and greatnesse, fearing that if hee should grow too mighty, hee might afterwards chance to tread him vnder foote, conuerted his ill will towards the King into friendship; so as he treated with the Lady Regent, and the Councell of France, promising them all ayde and succour possible, as well of men as money to set the King at liberty, and to free Italy from all oppression.

The articles of the agreement.

The king of Englands courtezie towards the French King.

This treaty beeing passed betwixt the Pope and the Venetians, gaue hope that they should bee vnited with the Realme of France, but they proceeded therein after an vnusuall manner, because that the Pope, supposing that by the confederacie which hee had already made, hee had time enough to preuent dangers, and to bee able in the meane time to obtaine more reasonable conditions of the Emperor, hee proceeded very slowly in his agreement with the French, and cheesely since the Duke of Sessas comming to Rome, who was sent from the Emperor to his Holynesse, to signifie vnto him the great desire hee had to peace, and to restore Francis Sforza vnto the Dutchy of Milan, beeing found innocent of those crimes imposed vpon him, or if hee were guilty, to inuest his brother Maximillian in it. But the Venetians not relying on his promises, made earnest sute to agree with the French, meaning not to trust to his offers, which onely tended to breake the league, and to delay the prouisions of warre, they likewise fearing least the French should enter into league with the Emperour, as they were desirous to doe for the recouery of their King, and all their practises should by that meanes prooue vaine.

The Venetians feare.

An. 1526. That hapned which they had foreseene, in the beginning of the yeare 1526. when the newes yet vnhoped for arriued at Venice, of the attonement betwixt the Emperor and the most Christian King, by which the King was not onely set at liberty, but likewise a firme peace established betwixt them, by meanes of the Kings mariage with the Lady Eleonor the Emperors sister, & that of the Emperor with the sister to the King of Portugall: and that the Duke of Bourbon should haue the Dutchy of Milan, and should marry the Lady René, sister in law to the King.

Agreement betwixt the Emperor and the King.

This was that which they had euer most feared, but this doubt was for that time cleered, the Lady Regent hauing sent ample power and commission to Albert de Carpi her Ambassador at Rome, to conclude the league, the which did trouble the Pope and the Venetians: But it lasted not long, by reason of a common rumor that was spred abroad, that King Francis would neuer performe to the Emperor, that which hee had beene enforced to consent to, and that which made it credible, was, for that it was reported, that after his departure from Spaine, hee was much discontented with his entertainment in the time of his imprisonment, and especially because that to free himselfe from thence, hee had signed a very disaduantageous contract by the which he quitted the Dutchie of Bourgondy to the Emperor.

Now that they might truly know what his intent was, the Senate determined, (albeit they had decreed to send two of the cheefe of the Citty in Ambassage to him, to condole with him for his fortunes past, and also to reioice for his deliuery and mariage) not to spend so much time as an Ambassage would require, but they sodainly sent into France André Resti Secretary to the Preguays, where with more speed

ſpeed and leſſe ſuſpition, might negociate a buſineſſe of ſo great importance: and the Pope following their example, ſent Paulo Vettori thither for the ſame purpoſe.

Theſe men needed not greatly to labour to bee aſſured of his meaning. For after hee had louingly enterteined them, in the firſt diſcourſe that hee held with either of them apart, hee did greatly complaine of the Emperors inhumanity towards him whileſt hee was priſoner, not vſing him as beſeemed ſo great a Prince as hee was: aſſuring them that hee was no leſſe free then ready to moderate the Emperors inſolency, wherevpon, the Kings concluſion was, that if the Pope and Venetians would ſend Commiſſioners, the league ſhould bee preſently made, the which they ſaid was beſt to bee done in France, to the end the King of England might the more eaſily bee drawne into it; whom they hoped would prooue a party:

The King complaineth of the Emperor.

Hee ſayd likewiſe that hee would ratifie whatſoeuer had beene begunne, and for the moſt part concluded on by the Lady Regent his Mother, and the Councell of the Kingdome; they were then onely to bring ample authority from their Princes to contract, becauſe that then hee would ſhew them how conformable his affection and good will was towards the common ſafety:

That hee did hope to finde in the King of England, the ſame intent and like deſire to abate the Emperours greatneſſe, and to prouide for the defence of Italy:

That hee would out of hand ſend his Ambaſſadors to him, and that if the Italian Princes would doe the like, it would greatly helpe and further the cauſe;

The King intendeth to take Armes againſt the Emperor.

That with the forces of ſo many Potentates ioyned together, they might more eaſily reſiſt the deſeignes of the Imperialls.

So ſoone as the Venetians vnderſtood this anſwer, ſo conformable to their deſire, they ſent inſtructions and ample Commiſſion to Roſſi to conclude the league: the Articles whereof beeing before determined, were eaſily paſſed, ſome few things beeing altered.

Gaſparo Spineli the Secretary was likewiſe commanded, (who at the ſame time, was Agent for the Signory, with the King of England) to vſe meanes to induce that King to enter into that league, by declaring vnto him the great opinion which all men had conceiued of him, and the great account which was made of his authority, and that they onely craued him to bee Protector of that accord, and defender of the liberty of Italy.

The Venetians make meanes to draw the King of England into the league.

But the Pope proceeded very ſlowly therein, ſo as they were enforced oftentimes to vrge him to it, wherevpon the Ambaſſador of the Common-wealth reſident at Rome, ſhewed him dayly the goodly occaſion which preſented it ſelfe, for the procuring of their common ſafety, in that the French King was deſirous to reuenge the wrongs which hee ſaid hee had receiued of the Emperor: and that if the ſame deſire ſhould grow colde, and they two chance to agree together, by the Kings obſeruing the treatye of Madrid, there was no more hope of defending Italy from the cruell and ſlauiſh yoake of the Spaniards.

The Venetian Ambaſſadors remonſtrance to the Pope.

The Pope beeing mooued by theſe remonſtrances, reſolued to ſend Caponi into France, in whom hee repoſed great truſt, with inſtructions and ſpeciall power to conclude that league, albeit that at the ſame time Don Hugo de Moncada, comming to Rome from the Emperour, did treate to the contrary: and had in the ſame manner almoſt negociated by letters with the Senate of Venice, to whom ſo ſoone as hee was come to Milan, hee gaue notice of his arriuall into Italy, and of the cauſe why the Emperour had ſent him.

But

But the Pope and Venetians answered all his requests in one forme, That whensoeuer the Emperour should seeme desirous of peace, hee should finde them disposed thereunto, but that hee was to shew it in deeds, to which they would giue more credit then to words: that hee should doe well to raise his siege from before the Castle of Milan, to restore Francis Sforza to his state, and to accomplish whatsoeuer hee was tyed vnto by the Articles of the Confederacie, and that then it would bee a fit time to talke of laying downe armes, and of setling peace and quiet in Italy: but his answer heere-vnto was in generall termes: whereby they plainly perceiued, that this speech of peace tended to none other end but to delay with vaine hope the prouisions for warre, and by those cunnings to estrange the French from the Princes of Italy.

The Pope and Venetians answere to Don Hugo, negociating for the Emperor.

They had almost obtained their desire, the French being not so greatly affectionate to the league as they were at the begioning, either because the King was not well assured of the Pope and Venetians mindes, by reason of their practises with Don Hugo de Moncado (albeit they were communicated to him) or, (as some thought) that hee would but make vse of the name of the league, onely to make the agreement more easie, and to redeeme his children whom hee had given in hostage to the Emperor; and that insteed of Bourgondy, hee should take some other recompence: namely, for that the Bishop of Bayeux his Ambassador at Venice, sent thither for that purpose was a whole moneth without receiuing any letters from the King, either for the conclusion of the league, or for the execution of that which had beene agreed vpon; whereupon the Pope and the Venetians resolued to send againe into France, and with new offers to end the businesse of the league: to the which at last, the King, after that hee had intelligence that the Emperor would alter none of the Articles of the Capitulations made at Madrid, began more to incline, and vpon the tenth day of May 1526. it was concluded at Coignac, betwixt those of the Councell, and the Kings Procurators on the one side, and the Agents of the Pope and the Venetians on the other. The chiefe points of which, were, That betwixt the Pope, the French King, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan, (for whom the Pope and the Venetians promised the ratification,) there should bee a perpetuall league and confederacy: to the end that Francis Sforza might freely enioy the Dutchy of Milan, and the children of France be set at liberty, by receiuing an honorable ransome, which the King of England should appoint, with other particular obligations concerning the preparations of the warre concluded with the Councell of the Realme before the King's deliuery.

The children of France are giuen in hostage for the King their Father.

An. 1526. The league concluded at Coignac.

In this manner then was the league concluded, but it was not presently published, because they tarried for the King of Englands resolution, whom they desired should bee named one of the cheefe Contractants. Therefore the Confederate Princes resolued to send an expresse message into England, to solicite him forthwith to declare himselfe against the Emperour in the behalfe of the league: John Baptista Sanga, a man of singular wisedome went thither from the Pope, Iohn Ioachim from the French King, and Marc Antonio Veniero for the Venetians. But the King of England albeit hee seemed to bee desirous to listen to that agreement, as beeing distasted of the Emperor: resolued neuertheleese not to make any publick demonstration thereof, vntill hee had first of all requested the Emperour Charles to gratifie the Confederates so much, as to set the children of the most Christian King at liberty, and render the State of Milan to Francis Sforza, and for want of so dooing, to protest against him, and to denounce warre, in the name of all the confederates.

The Confederates sent Commissioners to the King of England.

The King of Englands answer.

Now because it would haue beene too long to haue proceeded after this manner, by reason of the difficulties which might haue beene made, such as it was, it was published with great solemnity, they thinking themselues strong enough to abate the Imperiall pride.

There

There was at the ſame time in the Venetians army, tenne thouſand foot, nine hundred men at armes, and eight hundred light horſe, and they daily expected great nombers of Suiſſes, paid partly by the Pope and the Venetians, and partly by the French King, at whoſe arriuall they reſolued to march to the releeſe of the Caſtle of Milan and to trie if they could take the Citty. The Marquis of Saluſſes on the other ſide with the French men at armes, and tenne thouſand foot, waged at the common charge of the league, was to enter the Dutchy of Milan, and to aſſaile Nouara and Alexandria, whilſt in an other place order ſhould be taken for a nauall Army.

The nomber of the Army of the League.

The Venetians commanded their Generall, and Petro Peſare their Prouidator to goe and encampe ſpeedily at Chiari, vpon the Breſſan terrritory, which was the rendezuous of all their troopes: and thoſe of the Pope, commanded by Franciſco Guicciardin came vpon the Parmeſan, to the end they might ioyne together and then march whether it ſhould be thought fitteſt for the ſeruice of the league. In the meane time Malateſte Baillone with a band of the Venetian troopes marched to Lauda, where he had intelligence with Lodouico Viſturlin a gentleman of the ſame Citty; and albeit there lay within it fifteene hundred footmen in Garriſon, he did neuertheleſſe with eaſe ſeaze on it and became maſter therof, and kept it in the name of Francis Sforza.

Lauda is taken by the Confederates.

After the taking heereof the whole Venetian army paſſed the Po, and within two dayes after, ioyned it ſelfe with the Popes, and all of them together marched directly towards Milan, the Duke of Vrbin beeing in great hope to take the Citty, becauſe it had beene told him that vpon their arriuall the People would riſe, and take armes in their behalfe, and that the Imperialls Captaines feuring it, had already ſent their riches and bagage forth of the Citty, meaning forth-with to abandon it. And vpon this hope of the peoples riſing, and of the enemies diſorder, Lodouico, Earle of Belgie, requeſted the Duke of Vrbin to giue him two thouſand footmen, with whom he offered to releeue the Caſtle of Milan.

The two Armies being ioyned together march to Milan.

Now the Confederates Army beeing come very neere to the Citty was lodged at the Monaſtery of Paradis towards the Roman gate, intending to aſſaile that ſurburbe, ſuppoſing to take it and to lodge there. And albeit the enemies made many ſallies and hotte ſkirmiſhes, they were ſtill notwithſtanding beaten back by thoſe of the league. But the night before the day that the Army ſhould ſet forward, the Duke of Bourbon who not long before was come to Genoa with ſix Gallies and bills of Exchange for an hundred thouſand Ducats, entred Milan with eight hundred Spaniſh ſoote that he had brought with him: He was very much ſollicited thereunto by the Marquis of Guaſto, and Antonio de Leua. The Duke of Vrbin at theſe newes diſpayring to take the Citty by aſſault, and fearing ſome greater diſorder, if he ſhould tarry any longer there, raiſed his campe, and retired in good order vnto Marignan, without any loſſe or empeachment at all.

The Duke of Bourbon commeth to Milan

The army of the league retireth from before Milan.

The Senate, who had conceiued great hope by reaſon of the armies approach neere Milan, that the Caſtle would be releeued, which was reduced to extreame want, did greatly wonder, and was ſorry, when it vnderſtood by the Prouidators letters that they had raiſed their campe, ſo that the Duke of Vrbin ſent Lodouico Gonſaga to Venice to iuſtifie his actions, who being brought into the Senate yeelded a particular account of what had paſſed, and of the occaſions which mooued him to proceed in that manner, wherewith the Senate was well ſatiſfied; but the Pope was not ſo eaſily appeaſed, complaining very much not only of this retreat but likewiſe of the whole courſe of the Duke of Vrbins actions, who did not vouchſafe in any ſort to communicate the affaires of greateſt importance to his Lieftenants, the which had greatly mooued him; ſo as for to pleaſe him, the Senate commanded the Duke of Vrbin euer after to communicate with Guiccardin all matters of importance, which ſhould be handled in the army.

The Pope is diſcontented.

On the other ſide, they prepared the nauall army, to aſſaile the ſea-townes belonging to the Emperor, and to thoſe ends the Venetians hauing appointed Ludouico Armiero for their Prouidator, ſent him to Corfou, wher Iohn Mora the other Prouidator, was with the army, of which, Armiero had commandent to take 12. Gallies, and with them to ſaile towards Rome, to ioyne with thoſe of the Pope and the moſt Chriſtian King, that all of them together might direct there courſe according as they ſhould iudge it to bee neceſſary and proffitable for the confederates. Diuers propoſitions were made concerning thoſe places whither the nauall army was to goe. The Pope deſired to haue it goe into Puglia to breake the deſeigns of the Coloneſie, and to diuert their forces from thoſe places, who hauing at Saint Germans aboue ſeauen thouſand foote, and great numbers of horſe, had made them-ſelues fearefull to the Pope: but the French King and the Venetians thought the enterprize of Genoa to be much more proffitable for the Confederates, as well for the Commodiouſneſſe of the ſame citty & for diuers other enterprizes, as for the great good happe of that exploit, which falling out fortunately would much encreaſe the reputation of the League: Pedro of Nauarre was declaired Generall of the Confederates Nauall army, a man well experienced in Martiall affaires, who although hee was preſented by the French King, was neuer-the-leſſe entertayned by all the aſſociates together.

Pedro of Nauar generall of the naual army

But the Churches Gallies, and thoſe of the Venetians being ready, they were a long time tarrying for thoſe of the French King and the Generall, a matter which did greatly weary the Pope and Senate, and gaue them iuſt cauſe of diſcontent, and to ſuſpect that the French King had changed his mind, by thinking on his owne particular intereſt, and not caring for that of the league: adding to this ſuſpition other preſumptions: That ſmall ſtore of mony had beene ſent to the Swiſſes, in comparriſon of the fourty thouſand Ducats which hee was tyed to giue for the payment of tenne thouſand foot of that nation, and that hee had not begun to warre on the Emperor in the parts beyond the mounts according to the concluſion.

The confederats ſuſpect the King.

The King alledged for his excuſes, that before hee was to renew that warre, it behoued him to denounce it to the Emperor, although there was no ſuch mention made in the articles of the confederacy: And as concerning the delay of his army, and payment of the Swiſſes, hee layd all the fault vpon the Captaines and Officers, as the Lord of Langi gaue them to vnderſtand at large. For, the moſt Chriſtian King, fearing leaſt the Confederates beeing diſtaſted of him, ſhould diſioyntly agree with the Emperor, he diſpatched the ſaid Lord of Langi into Italy, for to excuſe the long ſtay of his army, with commiſſion to goe firſt into Swiſſerland, to ſolicite their leuy and departure, or at leaſt-wiſe to giue them to vnderſtand that hee did procure and deſire it.

The French Kings excuſes.

The Lord of Langi beeing come to Venice, made the aboue mentioned excuſes, aſſuring the Senators that the King was much diſpoſed to warres, and that beſides the Gallies hee prepared great ſhippes of warre in Brettaine, to faill with a mighty army, to ouer-throw at ſea all the enemies attempts and deſeignes. From thence hee went to Rome where hee executed the ſame commiſſion: and as for the Swiſſes, hee ſaid that they had promiſed to hold a general aſſembly, where all things ſhould be reſolued on in the Kings behalfe; and aboue all things he aſſured the Pope and the Venetians that the King would not enter into any accord, vnleſſe mention were made of a generall peace, and by the conſent of all the other confederates. The king made like promiſe to Iohn Baptiſta Sanga the Roman, whome whom the Pope had ſent, (as hath been ſaid) to the King of England: who by the way remained certaine dayes for the ſame purpoſe in the French court.

The Lord of Langi commeth to Venice and Rome from the King.

The Senate making ſhew that his arriuall was moſt pleaſing to them, and that they did wholy giue credit to his ſaying, anſwered, that it had neuer doubted of the Kings good will and affection towards the league, and perticularly towards their common-wealth, and therefore it promiſed, that not only in that buſineſſe, which concerned the common good, but likewiſe in all other, and at all times, their loue and forces ſhould be inſeperably ioyned to his: but as concerning peace, they had neuer refuſed it; that on the contrary, they had neuer taken armes but with an intent to procure a firme and aſſured peace: and therefore if they might haue it, to the honor of the league and ſafety of the confederates, it ſhould alway be moſt acceptable to them: yet neuertheleſſe knowing that they might at that time rather deſire ſuch a peace then hope for it, they would incite the King to a greater willingneſſe to warre: wherevpon the Pope and the Venetians gaue him to vnderſtand, that if they ſhould conquer the Kingdome of Naples, it ſhould be for one of his children: the Common wealth retaining only ſuch a portion as ſhould be thought ſufficient for the recompence of their coſtes, labour and trauell.

The Senats anſwere to the Lord of Langi.

The offer of the Pope and Venetians to the King.

Vpon this hope, the King promiſed three hundred lances more, with a ſurpluſage of twenty thouſand Ducats euery moneth, for the ſeruice of the league, whenſoeuer they ſhould make any enterpriſe vpon the Kingdome of Naples. During theſe treaties Armiero the Prouidator being departed from Corfou with thirteene Galleis came to Terracina, where finding Andrew Doria with eleuen of the Popes Gallies they went altogether to Ciuitauechia, then from thence to Liuorne, where they met with Pedro of Nauarre with foure Gallions and ſixteene light Gallies of the French King.

It being then there determined to beſeege Genoa and to reduce it to the Kings deuotion, for the great profit and commodity of the confederates, the Army went firſt to Protouenere, which ſoone yeelded, with Spetia, and all the other towns vpon the riuer euen to Monega Then the army being deuided, Doria and the Venetian Prouidator went to Portofin, twenty miles from Genoa, and Nauarre with the French Army ſailed towards Sauona, which forthwith yeeleed to him: The firſt and cheeſe deſeigne of the Captaines of the league was, to ſtoppe victualls from entring by Sea into Genoa, whereof they knew it was badly prouided, and that by keeping it ſhort, they hoped quickly to reduce it vnder their obedience: and for that purpoſe they placed ſix Gallies in Gard, two of euery prince, which tooke certaine ſhippes with other ſmaller veſſells loden with victualls that were going to the Citty: ſo that it ſoone felt great want and diſcommodity. But the beſeeged were ſecretly releeued by thoſe of the riuer, who furniſhed them with part of the victualls, which vpon ſondry pretences were ſuffered to bee carried to the neighbor townes, albeit it was not done without ſome complaint againſt Doria, who either for ſome ſecret enuy that he bare to Nauarre, for that vnder his authority and command his contrey ſhould be vanquiſhed and taken, or for any other deſeigne of his owne, was ſuſpected not to haue carried himſelfe faithfully as he ought to haue done, nor after ſuch a manner as was requiſite for the ſpeedy ending of that buſineſſe.

The Confederates nauall army not farre from Genoa.

Doria is ſuſpected to releeue Genoa

The Genouois for the aſſurance of their Citty, had with great ſpeed placed at the mouth of the hauen certaine great ſhips loden with Artillery, beſides which were ſix light Gallies, commanded by Gobba Iuſtinian, who comming foorth at times to ſkirmiſh with the enemie, would not goe farther then within Cannonſhotte of the ſhippes, placed at the mouth of the Hauen, and of thoſe of the Caſtle of the Lanthorne, whereby all the hope to take the Citty conſiſted in the ſeege, which ſtill continued, the Captaines of the Pope and the

The fortifications of Genoa.

Venetians, hauing intrenched themſelues, to be freed from the enemies incurſions and ſurpriſes, if they ſhould happen to come forth, as alſo by reaſon of a tempeſt at ſea, which would not ſuffer them to draw the army forth of Portefin where it remained.

But the Genowais perceiuing them-ſelues dayly to be more ſhut in, determined to make a ſally, and to aſſaill and beate downe the enemies fortifications: the Captaines of the army hauing notice of the enemies deſeigne, landed Phillippin Doria and Iohn Baptiſta Grimani, with eight hundred foot-men, and two peeces of ordnance, and turned the poopes of the Gallies towards the land, ſo as the ſoldiers of the Citty comming to execute their attempts, were not onely courageouſly receiued, but brauely repulſed with great loſſe.

The Genowais are brauely repulſed in their ſally.

The Duke of Vrbin at the ſame time being ſolicited by the Venetians, and beingprickt forward by a deſire to recouer that reputation, which he had loſt in their retreat from before Milan, ſo ſoone as one part of the Swiſſes were come to the army, to the number of fiue thouſand determined to returne towards Milan, to the releeſe of the Caſtle, in which Sforza ſtill remained: and being come within a mile of the Citty with the army, hee ſent two thouſand foote-men to take Monce, and the mount of Briança, two places very commodious for victualls which mought be broughtforth of thoſe quarters to the Campe. The reſidew of the army being logded there, and the Captaines being aſſembled in councell to aduiſe by what meanes to releeue the Caſtle; which without was enuironed with double trenches, and great baſtions, couered with great numbers of the enemies ordnance, they were aduertized that Sforza, wholy diſpayring of releeſe, had yeelded himſelfe, and had quitted the Caſtle to the Imperialls, on this compoſition: That without preiudice to his titles he ſhould giue the Caſtle of Milan to the Duke of Bourbon, who receiued it in the Emperors name, ſuffering him to come forth in ſafety, with all thoſe that were with him. That it ſhould be lawfull for him to remaine at Coma, which ſhould bee giuen to him for his abode, with the gouernment and reuenue of the ſame Citty, till ſuch time as the Emperors determination might be knowne concerning his affaires. That a ſafe-conduct ſhould bee giuen him to goe in perſon to the Emperor: with diuers other articles contained in the agrement, hee came forth of the Caſtle, and being accompanied by the Imperiall Captaines, hee went to the Barriers of the Army, where hauing continued one whole day, he tooke his iourney towards Coma; but the Imperialls ſaying, that they had promiſed to giue him aboade, and ſafe lodging in Coma, and not to cauſe their ſoldiers that lay there in Garriſon to diſlodge, hee would no more truſt to them: And albeit hee had before determined not to doe any thing that might incenſe the Emperor, hee neuer-the-leſſe went to the Campe of the League, being accompanied by the Count of Gajazzo with two hundred light-horſe, where hauing remayned certaine daies, hee went to Lauda, the which Citty the confederates did wholy reſtore to him: And becauſe of all the Captulations made with the Imperialls, nothing elſe had beene performed to him but that hee and his people ſhould come forth with their goods ſaued: Hee did by a publike inſtrument, whileſt hee ſtayed in the Campe, ratifie the league made in his name by the Pope and the Venetians.

Francis Sforza yeeldeth the Caſtle of Milan to the Imperialls.

Francis Sforza ratifieth the league.

The loſſe of the Caſtle of Milan, albeit that it was irke-ſome to them and of great importance for their enterprize, did not for all that drowne their hope of taking the Citty, the which they knew to bee badly prouided of all things, and that there was not within it ſuffitient number of men for the defence thereof, in regard of the bigneſſe of it, and the great number of aſſaillants, diuers other Swiſſes beeing come to the Campe, beſides foure thouſand which were dayly expected, paide by the King, whereby they hoped that it would ſhortly be reduced vnder the power of the Confederates either by force or by a ſeege.

that

Whileſt they expected theſe ſupplies the Duke of Vrbin had reſolued to ſend part of his forces to Cremona, to attempt the taking of the Citty, which was an enterprize very pleaſing to the confederats, and cheefely to the Pope. But they were to delay the execution of that deſeigne, for feare left the Imperialls making a ſallcy, as it was reported they would doe, ſhould come and aſſaile the Campe. Neuer-the-leſſe at the laſt Malateſta Batllone went thither, but with leſſe forces then was at the firſt determined, by reaſon of the afore ſaid feare, who being come before Cremona, found the Citty to bee fortified with a double trench, and well furniſhed with defendants, hee neuer-the-leſſe aſſailed it diuers times, but in vaine: whereof the Duke of Vrbin being aduertized, knowing that it was an hard matter to take it with ſo few forces, and on the other ſide how greatly it would diminiſh the reputation of the league, if they ſhould giue ouer that enterprize, it was reſolued to ſend thither the Prouidator Peſare, Camillo Vrſino, and Antonio Caſtello, with ſtore of foote-men, and within a while after, new ſupplies of a thouſand Italian foote men were ſent thither with a thouſand Swiſſes. But for all that the buſineſſe going neuer the more forward, the Duke of Vrbin reſolued to goe thither in perſon, albeit it was greatly to the preiudice of the enterprize of Milan, who drawing forth of the army which lay before Milan, in a manner all the Venetian foote-men, hee left part of the men at armes there with all the Churches Companies, and the Swiſſes who were arriued to the number of thirteene thouſand, and went before Cremona, making his account to haue it, not by the onely force of batteries and aſſaults, becauſe that the enemies rampiers were two ſtrong, but by ſeeking with great numbers of Pioners to approach neere to their trenches and baſtions, and to become Maiſters thereof, rather by the force of the pike-ax then by armes: but all this being not ſufficient to take it, he proceeded to the battery and aſſaults, and at the laſt, thoſe within it being reduced to ſuch exſtreames, as a trompet being ſent to ſummon the Citty to yeeld, there came forth two Captaines, the one a Lancequenet, and the other a Spaniard, with Guido Vaina who capitulated: That if they were not releeued by the moneths end, they would come forth of Cremona the which they did, the time prefixed beeing expired: Whereof the Duke of Vrbin did forth-with aduertize the Senate, and the Citty was deliuered to Francis Sforza.

Malateſta Baillone before Cremona for the league.

The Duke of Vrbin bringeth ſupplis to the ſeege of Cremona.

The Capitulation of the Citty of Cremona.

Theſe newes were very pleaſing to the Senate, who vnderſtanding that Sforza made account to reſide there, ſent thither the Secretary Lodouico Sabadino, to remaine there with him in the name of the Signory.

The Colonneſie enter Rome violently.

But in the meane time their hapned a great diſorder at Rome to the cofederates great preiudice, who after the conqueſt of Cremona hoped to preuaile in the enterpriſe of Genoa, and to bee able (according to the proiects formerlie made) to encampe in two ſeuerall places before Milan. For the Colonneſi hauing aſſembled ſixe hundred horſe, and fiue thouſand foot, marched with greate ſpeed towards the Citty of Rome, where no man thinking of their comming, they entred by night, and ſeazed vpon three gates; then running vp and downe the Citty, they ſackt diuers Prelats houſes, the Pallace and Church of Saint Peter, without any reſpect to the Maieſty of Relligion, eſteeming ſacred matters leſſe then Turkes would haue done, ſo as the Pope could hardly retire, with ſome Cardinalls and others whome hee moſt truſted into the Caſtle Saint Angelo, the Colonneſi hauing determined to take him priſoner; who without any long ſtay did ſodainely leaue the Citty; the Cardinall Colonna hauing firſt of all attempted in vaine to cauſe the people to riſe in his behalfe: They carried away with them in gould, and ſiluer, and other commodites more then three hundred thouſand crownes.

The tumult being appeaſed which laſted not much aboue three howers: D. Hugo after that he had taken aſſurance of the Pope went to the Caſtle to talk with him, where vſing termes beſeeming a Conqueror, hee enforced him to grant a truce betwixt them, aswell in his name as in that of the confederates and the Emperors for foure monethes, by meanes whereof the Pope promiſed ſpeedily to cauſe his Army to repaſſe the Po, to call home his Galleis into the Churches territories, and to pardon the Coloneſſi, and all others that had any hand in that aſſault and tumult. That the Imperials and Coloneſi with their Companies ſhould depart from Rome, and foorth of the Churches ſtate; and ſhould retire themſelues into the Kingdome of Naples.

The Popes agreement with the Coloneſi.

This truce was for the time preſent willingly embraced by both ſides: by the Pope becauſe the Caſtle was not well victualled: by D. Hugo (the Coloneſi neuertheleſſe making inſtance to the contrary) becauſe it ſeemed vnto him that he had done much for the Emperor, and becauſe that all thoſe, in a manner, with whom he had entred Rome being laden with ſpoile were ſlipt away into diuers places. The truce did interrupt all the deſeignes of Lombardy, and the whole fruite of the victory of Cremona. But the Pope thinking afterwards more conſiderately, and with a ſetled iudgement, vpon the agreement which he had made, and foreſeeing into how many dangers he had throwne himſelfe in time to come, the better to free himſelfe from thoſe perrils wherevnto he was ſubiect if he ſhould obſerue the Articles of the truce, wrote to his Nuncios to enquire of the moſt Chriſtian King and the Venetian Senate, whether he were bound to performe that which he had beene enforced to promiſe to D. Hugo, or wholly to reiect it, and within a while after he ſent the Lord of Liege into France for the ſame purpoſe; who at the ſame time was come to Rome.

The Pope's doubt concerning the agreement.

The Pope knew very well that to obſerue the truce, was nothing elſe but to giue the Emperor meanes and time to beginne afterwards a greater and fiercer warre, and to ouercome by that delay thoſe difficulties wherewith he was preſſed, aſſuring to himſelfe in the end his ſtates in Italy, to the great danger and hazard of the liberties of all the reſt. But his immeaſurable feare diuerted him from al good councell, and hindred him from well diſcerning that truth: wherevppon the Generall of the Friers being come to Rome, by the Emperors commandement to treat of peace, he heard him attentiuely, and exhorted the Venetians to incline to an accord, ſaying, That ſince they were of neceſſity one day to lay downe armes and beeing then inuited to doe ſo, they ought not to contemne the occaſion that was preſented.

The Venetians anſwer to the Pope inuiting them to an agreement with the Emperor.

The Senate vpon this propoſition aſſuted him that it had neuer deſired warre, but had on the contrary by warre procured an aſſured peace, ſo that it might be treated and concluded by the moſt Chriſtian King, becauſe that doing otherwiſe they ſhould for euer alienate him from the affaires of Italy, and ſhould loſe a moſt aſſured refuge in their neceſſities and occurrences: therfore they vſed meanes to induce the Pope to temporize, and to expect an anſwer from France, that nothing did preſſe him to precipitate his affaires, and to grant the Emperors demand on ſuch vniuſt conditions, as to giue him a great ſomme of money, and beſides, to conſigne into his hands for the aſſurance of the treaty, Parma, Placentia, and Ciuita-uechia, places moſt important of the Churches State: That he was to conſider that the Emperors forces were not ſo great as they were reported, and that the greateſt ayde that he had forth of Germany came from George Frondſperg, who at his owne charges had brought him an army, the which beeing not able to hold out long, would of neceſſity be ſhortly broken.

That the Garriſon of Milan, beeing not paid, refuſed to obey hir commanders and would be gone. On the contrary how that they expected Rante de Cera from France with a great ſomme of money, and that there was great hope that the King himſelfe, who was come as farre as Lyons, would in perſon come into Italy:

That

That the enterprize of Genoa was ſet forward with good ſucceſſe: in a word, that all things promiſed an happy iſſue.

The Pope being vrged by theſe remonſtrances, and moſt of all (perhaps) by the wrongs which he had newly receiued, reſolued to hold in ſuſpence the practizes of that new truce, and to treat onely of an vniuerſall peace, by the aduiſe and conſent of the moſt Chriſtian King. The arriuall of the Lord Ruſſell did much auaile the reſolution, who beeing ſent by the King of England to offer thirty thouſand crownes to the Pope for the expence of the war, came at the ſame time to Rome, who did greatly ſolicite and exhort him to continue ſtead-faſt in the league, or elſe to labour to conclude an vniuerſall peace betwixt the Princes of Chriſtendome, the which being approued by the Venetian Senate, they wrote to Nouagiero their Ambaſſadour with the Emperour, that he ſhould enterpoſe that treaty of peace, it being decreed that the agreement ſhould bee treated and concluded in France, and ſhould afterwards, for the Emperors honour and dignity, be ratified and confirmed by him in Spaine.

The King of England offereth the Pope a great ſumme of money.

The chiefe pointes of the treaty were, That the children of the moſt Chriſtian King ſhould be ſet at liberty: that Lombardy ſhould be left peaceable, and Francis Sforza reſtored to his State, and that the Emperour ſhould pay the King of England that which he pretended to bee due vnto him: but difficulties dayly ariſing vpon theſe articles, each of them prepared on a ſodaine for warre. The Pope ſent his troupes, which he had recalled from the campe of the league, before the townes which the Coloneſi had vſurped vpon the Churches State.

The chiefe articles of the treaty.

The Emperour on the other ſide haſtened the prouiſions of the ſea-army, which was reported to be of forty ſhips, and ſixe thouſand foot that were paied, who met at the port of Cartagena to goe to the reliefe of the city of Genoa: he ſolicited his brother the Archduke to leauy the greateſt forces hee could in his owne country, and to ſend them into Italy: and had beſides giuen charge to the Prince of Orange to goe thorow the Duke of Sauoys country with greater numbers of Lanſequenets into the Dutchy of Milan.

The Emperors preparations by ſea & land.

The confederates reſoluing to ſtop the paſſage of theſe new ſupplies, made great prouiſions both by ſea and land. Diuers veſſels were arriued for the moſt Chriſtian King in Brettaine and at Marſeilles, with diuers others elſe-where which had beene taken neere to Genoa; to reſiſt the paſſage of the Spaniſh army they laboured to induce the Duke of Sauoy not to ſuffer the Imperials to paſſe thorow his territories: But that which they moſt feared was the Almaines who were reported to be leauied by George Frondſperg, an old captaine, and much affected to the houſe of Auſtria, who aſſembled great numbers of ſouldiers, inciting them to enrole themſelues in hope of booty; ſo that hauing receiued the garriſon which was at Cremona, he had in all with him more then ten thouſand foot.

George Frondſperg leauieth great numbers of Lanſequenets in the Emperors behalfe.

The confederates, to ſtop theſe Lanſequenets paſſage did firſt of all gaine the captaine of the caſtle of Mus by fiue thouſand Ducats which were giuen him, the one halfe by the Pope and the other by the Venetians, as well to ſet at liberty the Ambaſſadors of the Signory, whom hee had ſurprized in their iourney towards France, as alſo to draw him to their party, whereupon beſide, they gaue him the command of foure hundred foot well paied, with a good penſion for the guard of the Lake of Coma. The Venetians did likewiſe ſend for the ſame purpoſe Nicolao Sangotino their Secretary to the Marquis of Mantua to entreat him if the Almaines ſhould paſſe the mounts, that he would not ſuffer them to paſſe thorow his State. But being aduertized that theſe Almaines had made prouiſion of artillery and munition at Trent, thinking that they would paſſe thorow the Veronois, they made a leauy of other foure thouſand foot, and commanded certaine companies of men at armes and light horſe to come from the campe. Then they appointed Auguſtine de Mulla for Prouidator Generall beyond the Riuer Mence, prouiding all matters to repulſe them.

The confederates prouide to reſiſt the Emperor.

Now

The Lanſquenets come into Italy.

Now theſe Almaines tooke their way by the vale of Sabia very neere to Pioltella. By theſe meanes the Venetian captaines that were on the Veronois, did ſpeedily ſend Camillo Vrſin to Sales, with the light-horſe and certaine companies of the ableſt footmen, the reſt that ſtayed behinde were commanded to follow them by croſſing the Lake, which they being not able to doe, ſoone enough, by reaſon of a tempeſt that aroſe, was the cauſe that Vrſin came to late to meet with the enemies, who were already paſſed onwards on their way; yet neuertheleſſe hauing ſeized on the Pace of Corona, which is a very narrow place and ſtrong by ſytuation, he enforced the Almaines, who were already on their iourney, going thither to take an other way thorow the tops of the mountaines, which was very difficult and dangerous, by which, at the laſt they came to La Garda, and from thence to Chaſtillon: then within a while after they entred the Marquis of Mantua his State, leauing the way of Milan, contrary to the opinion of the confederates taking that of Placentia or Pauia.

They reſolued to follow them and ſtill to hold them in allarmes, the Marquis of Saluces, on the one ſide with great numbers of Swiſſes and Griſons, and the Duke of Vrbin on the other marching towards Soncina, skirmiſhing continually with the enemies rereward, to the great commendation of the captaines, and eſpecially of Iohn de Medicis, who notwithſtanding that all the Popes captains were departed, did neuertheleſſe continue in the Kings pay, and retained a company of men at armes in his name, who by his great courage and valor, was a merucilous terror to the enemies, and a great comfort to the confederates.

Iohn de Medicis a great captaine.

George Frondſperg hauing paſſed the Po without any let, and being irreſolute what way to take, did hold the confederates in doubt, and eſpecially the Pope, who fearing leaſt the enemies might turne towards Bolognia and from thence into Tuſcany, did earneſtly entreate the Venetians to command their army to paſſe ſpeedily ouer the Po, for to aſſure the Churches territories and thoſe of the Florentines: but their owne State being not free from the ſame feare; The Senate, in ſome ſort to ſatisfie him, and yet not meaning to much to diſfurniſh themſelues, commanded Lodouico Piſani, who was in the Marquis of Saluſſes army, to gather together certaine foote-forces, to ſend them ſpeedily for the guard of the Churches State: and Guicciardin making the ſame requeſt, Baboni di Nalai was ſent thither with a thouſand foote: they did beſide ſend word to their Generall, that when he ſhould perceiue the daungers of the confederates to encreaſe, and thoſe of the Venetians to leſſen, not to make any difficulty to releeue them, either with the whole body of the army, or with part thereof, as himſelfe ſhould iudge to be moſt neceſſary.

The Popes feare.

At the laſt it was concluded, for the preſent that the Marquis of Saluſſes alone ſhould paſſe the Po with his owne troupes and three hundred light-horſe of the Venetians, with certaine peeces of ordnance, taken from forth their campe to amuze the enemies: But the Almaines hauing croſſed the Riuer Nura, and that of Trebbia afterwards, without any let of their confederates were come and encamped at Fiorenzolles, hoping quickly to ioyne with the forces of Milan: and the Imperiall captaines not being able to cauſe the other Almaines to march, becauſe they wanted their pay, they preſently diſlodged, only with the Italian infantery, and certaine companies of light-horſe.

The Marquis of Saluſſes with his forces paſſeth the Po.

The Senate in the meane time, being wholly deſirous to ſatisfie the Pope, commanded the Prouidator to draw a gallāt troupe of the beſt ſoldiers forth of the army, and to ſend them ouer the Po, to ioyne with the Marquis of Saluſſes: whereupon the Prouidator Vitturi, did ſodainely depart with fiue thouſand foot & certaine companies of light-horſe; the Duke of Vrbin being at the ſame time (to the Venetians great griefe) gon to Mantua about certain particular affaires of his owne.

This marching of the enemies towards Florence, cauſed the cōfederats to feare, leaſt the Florentines, being troubled with the danger that threatned them, ſhould come

come to an agreement with the Imperials,to the great hinderance and preiudice of the league: Vpon this doubt the Venetians did ſpeedly ſend Marco Foſcare their Ambaſſadour to Florence, to exhort them in the name of the Republike not to ſeparate themſelues (by reaſon of that accident) from them,ſetting before them the great want of all neceſſaries that was in the Almaines campe,the weakneſſe and diſtreſſe of the Imperials: and on the contrary the great forces of the confederates,and their deſire to employ them all for them, and with them to run one ſelfe ſame fortune: and then,the hope of the happy ſucceſſe of that warre,by reaſon of the aide which they dayly expected from France, and finally the great preparations which were made to aſſaile the Imperials in ſundry places: Hee willed them to call to minde their ancient generoſity, and in particular,ſundry fortunate euents happened vnto them, being vnited with the Signory of Venice, how that the like might now befall them, hauing the ſelfe ſame conſtancy and magnanimity that they then had: that it was a thing moſt certain,that as their loue and affection towards the league did much encreaſe the reputation thereof, and did aſſure the confederates, euen ſo in like manner their diſunion would greatly hinder and preiudice it. For, to yeeld for feare of an imaginary danger,was nothing elſe but to precipitate themſelues into moſt certaine and pernitious miſchiefes,and by ruining themſelues to draw forthwith by their downe-fall othermen into the ſame precipice, or at leaſt wiſe by their declyning to ſhake and put in hazard the liberty of all Italy: wherevpon,for the great affection that the common-wealth did beare vnto them,and in regard of their common intereſt,the Senate would not faile in any point of their duty.

Foſcare his exhortation to the Florentines.

The Florentines declared how pleaſing his comming and remonſtrance had beene vnto them, and ſent Aleſſandro de Pacis their Ambaſſadour to Venice to giue thankes to the Senate,promiſing to continue ſteadfaſt to the league, and in particular to haue found intelligence and coreſpondence with the Republike,perſwading them to leauy ſixe thouſand foot more at their common charge, that they might with them reſiſt the Duke of Bourbon with more aſſurance,who was reported to haue drawn forces from Milan,and with them to march into Tuſcany.

The Florentines anſwere and reſolution.

In the meane time the confederates nauall army did ſtill continue neere to Genoa,which being reduced to all extremity,diuers meanes were propounded to hinder the Spaniſh nauall army to the number of forty ſhips prepared at Carthagena,from comming to the reliefe thereof; and among others Nauarre was of opinion,to ſaile vnto the frontiers of Spaine, and to aſſaile the Emperours army which lay in an open hauen, and to burne it. This opinion was allowed by the Venetian Prouidator, but Doria (al-be-it he likewiſe approued it) did neuertheleſſe conſider that the quallity of that country was very contrary to that propoſition, and the dangers of the ſea much greater, where they ſhould not finde any place of retreate to ſhield themſelues from tempeſts and ſtormes: and ſetting downe ſundry other difficulties,he made all the hearers to be irreſolute,and himſelfe conſtant not to goe to Carthagena: wherevpon they determined to ſaile into Corſica or Sardinia,and nere to thoſe Iſlands to waite for the Imperiall fleet, intending if it came to put forth to ſea and to fight with it; for the which purpoſe they concluded to ſend for ſome great ſhips from Marſeilles, and to arme the Genoa ſhips which had beene taken at the beginning.

Nauar his courageous propoſition.

Whileſt they dwelt on theſe reſolute preparations, they diſcouered the Imperiall fleet fifteene miles off from land, conſiſting of ſixe and thirty veſſels of all ſorts, ſayling with a faire winde directly towards Genoa, which was departed from Spaine ſooner then was expected, wherein were Don Charles of Lanoy viceroy of Naples,the captaine Alarcon,and Don Ferrant of Gonzaga. So ſoone as the Venetian Prouidator that lay at Porto-uennere to cauſe the veſſels to bee armed,had notice of the enemies comming, he put to ſea with ſixteene gallies that he had ready, and gaue chaſe to the enemies veſſels, but being ouertaken with with a contrary winde he was enforced to returne from whence he came, and the Spaniſh army in the meane time purſuing their iourney, drew ſtill neerer to land, determining to enter into the hauen of Genoa, but at ſuch time as it paſſed by Saint Florenzos Mount, it was deſcried by Nauarre, who lay at the foot of the hill with ſeuenteene gallies, who comming with them forthwith to ſea, did with great courage giue in athwart the Imperiall army, and falling foule one of an other, they fought from morning till two houres within night, where the Imperials were ſo roughly handled by thoſe of the league, and their whole fleete ſo torne by the artillery, as had not a tempeſt aroſe, which ſeparated them, it was certainely thought, that it would haue beene wholy defeated.

The Imperiall fleet is beaten by the confederates.

The confederates fleet retired to Portofin, ſtaying the ſame night for the other gallies that lay at Portouennere: and whether they did come or not their reſolution was by day breake to ſeeke the enemie. But ſo ſoone as it was day, albeit that they followed them as farre as Liuorne, yet they could not ouertake them, by reaſon that they were already to farre. The viceroy went on his way, but ſo beaten by the tempeſt, that his veſſels were ſcattered, part of which wherein Don Ferrant of Ganzaga was, were carried into Sicily, and afterwards came to Gayetta, where they landed the Lanſequenets: and as for himſelfe he arriued with the reſt in the hauen of Saint Stephen, which belongeth to the Sienois: if Armiero the Prouidator who lay at Portouennere could haue come to the aide of his fellowes, as he ſought diuers times to doe, all the Spaniſh army had beene defeated, but hee could not come by reaſon of the tempeſt: yet neuertheleſſe he was called home to Venice, by the councell of Tenne, to come and yeeld an account of his actions, and in particular for ſuffering victuals to enter into Genoa, and for that he did not goe with the army to Carthagena, and they ſodainely ſent Auguſtine de Mulla in his ſtead, who was Prouidator in Friul.

The Imperiall fleet ſcattered by tempeſt.

But Armiero hauing cleered himſelf of al thoſe imputations was wholy quitted, and then they knew that the fault, why Genoa was not taken, did proceed from the not ſending of ſuffitient troupes from the campe in Lombardy, which ſhould neerely haue ſhut the City in by land: which the captaines of the gallies had oftentimes craued.

Now the Pope, more then any elſe, was moſt troubled with the viceroys comming into Italy, fearing leaſt the aide which he had brought with him would ioyn it ſelfe with George Frondſperg: and therefore he ſent the Archbiſhop of Capua vnto him to treat of agreement, and to propound in the meane time a ſuſpention of armes: but the viceroy being deſirous to treat on very hard conditions, the whole matter was broken off without any concluſion, the Pope hauing taken courage, for that his army was encreaſed in reputation and ſtrength by the arriual of Rance de Cera, who beeing ſent by the French King into Italy was come to Sauona with the nauall army, and from thence went to ioyne with the Church-army which lay not farre from Rome for the ſubuerſion of Colonneſi.

The Pope maketh meanes to the viceroy for an agreement.

The French King ſendeth Rance de Cera into Italy.

The viceroy on the other ſide ſought to enter into the Churches territories, to defend thoſe of the Colonneſi, and to enforce the Pope to diſioyne himſelfe from the league, and to giue him a certaine ſumme of money for the payment of his army: wherevpon he ſet foreward and came with twelue thouſand men before Froſſolona, where he encamped, which is a towne very weake, and ſeated in the Champaine country, the houſes of particular perſons ſeruing in ſtead of walles, within which neuertheleſſe the captaines of the Church had left a ſtrong Garriſon to keepe him from any ſure footing in that country. At his firſt comming he beganne to batter the towne, not giuing any aſſault to it afterwards. But the arriuall of Rance de Cera and Aleſſandro Vitelli with the Churches forces, which were much encreaſed by the Popes dilligence, who had augmented his campe, with great numbers of foot-men paied and commanded for the reliefe of that place, was the cauſe that after certaine skirmiſhes on either ſide, the viceroy raiſed raiſed his campe two houres before day, and ſet fire to certaine munitions which were left, leauing there behind him ſome bullets for great ordnance, and retired to Ceſenna, and from thence to Cepparane.

Froſſolana is beſieged by the viceroy.

This fortunate ſucceſſe encouraged the Pope, and at the entreaty of the confederates Ambaſſadors, whom he could not otherwiſe ſatisfie, he reſolued to execute the enterprize of the Kingdome of Naples, notwithſtanding that it was in the middeſt of winter, being the month of Ianuary in the yeere 1527. The Venetians for this purpoſe commanded Auguſtine de Mulla their Prouidator in the nauall army to bring it to Ciuitauecchia, and ioyning there with the Popes gallies, to ſaile together towards Naples. But the French army tarrying to long, that of the Venetians ſailed towards Terracina to take in three thouſand foot, conducted by Horatio Baſſon, who was freed by the Pope from his impriſonment wherein Pope Leo had confined him.

The Count Vaudemont commeth to the army.

At the ſame time the Earle of Vaudemont came from France to make one in the enterprize of Naples, which they reſolued to enuade by ſea and land, who determining to imbarke himſelfe in the Venetian gallies, they re-enforced their army with two thouſand foot.

Aquila taken by Rance de Cera.

Rance de Cera in an other place, againſt the Popes will, entred into Abruzzo with ſixe thouſand men, where by the meanes of the Earle of Montorias children, he did hope with eaſe to take Aquila, the which he forthwith did, by reaſon that Aſcanio Colonna fled from thence ſo ſoone as he had intelligence of their arriuall. Doria likewiſe ſailed before with his gallies and went and aſſailed Pozzola, a place very important for the confederates, in regard of the commodiouſneſſe of the hauen of Baja: but being at his firſt arriuall repulſed by the artillery, he diſlodged from thence without aſſailing it; afterwards other gallies of the league arriuing, they reſolued to aſſaile the ſea Burrow of Stabia, where Diomede Caraffa lay with fiue hundred footmen, the which was taken by aſſault on the third day towards the ſide of the hill, and the day after the caſtle yeelded.

The confederates take the Burrow of the ſea.

The confederates take diuers places on the ſea coaſt.

The tenth day the ſouldiers tooke the Greeke tower and Surrenta by force, & diuers other places on the coaſt, did within a while after yeeld on compoſition. They had before then taken certaine ſhips laden with corne which were going to Naples where victuals were very ſcarce.

The confederates conſult about the ſiege of Naples.

Now the army of the league finding no reſiſtance at ſea it came ſo neere to the Peere of Naples, as the caſtle and the gallies plaied vpon it with their ſhot. It was then conſulted on, whether it were neceſſary to beſeege the city, ſome ſaying, that by the taking thereof, the warre would be ended, they hauing taken from the enemies all meanes to come by money for the entertainement of their army: as alſo, becauſe their greateſt hope of being able to keepe that State, conſiſted in the conſeruation of that city, the which being loſt they would forth-with leaue the Kingdome, and retire to ſome other place. Diuers reaſons might incite them to that ſeege. Firſt of all, the ſmall numbers of ſouldiers which were in the city, and yet that ſmall number not well diſpoſed to put themſelues forward to dangers for the maintenance of the inſolent Dominion of the Spaniards. Secondly the Nobility ſtood badly affected to the Spaniards, who for feare of looſing their goods durſt not ſhew their diſcontent: and laſt of all the Viceroys abſence, who was farre from thence, and the ſmall expectation which the Spaniards had of any ſpeedy releeſe from their fellowes.

Others who weare of a contrary opinion, thought it beſt to tarry for Rance de Cera, the better to ſhut in that city with greater forces, on which they knew the whole end and ſucceſſe of the warre depended, to the end to proceed therein more conſiderately and with greater hope; the delaying of a ſmall time could not but prooue very commodious to them, becauſe they certainely knew that there was want of bread in the city, and if ſuccors did enter into it, the ſcarcity would thereby be the more augmented, and would be cauſe of the peoples diſordered riſing,

rising, which would open a more easie passage to their victory: and that therefore it behoued them in wayting for such an occasion to saile towards Salerno, to seize on that city and others neere adioyning, whereby Naples it selfe would at last be brought vnder their obedience.

An Herald is sent to summon Naples.

But these reasons being not much approued nor thought worthy to be equaled with the profit which was to bee hoped for by the then taking of that City, they resolued to send an Herald to summon those within it to yeeld the city to the confederates with the promises and threatnings determined in the councell.

Hugo de Moncada sallieth forth vpon the confederates.

Don Hugo of Moncada, who commanded there, and held the people in awe, determining to defend himselfe, so soone as he had notice that the army of the league was within foure miles of the City tooke two thousand fiue hundred foote, as well of the Garrison as of the people, and three hundred horse, and with them marched forth of the City, to shew that he wanted no courage to frustrate the enemies deseignes.

Those of the league had already landed diuers souldiers vnder the command of the Earle of Vaudemont and Horatio Baillone, who marching towards the City to make discouery, met with Don Hugo his troupes, and skirmishing together, they did put them to flight in such disorder as they left certaine field-peeces behind them, which Moncada, hauing made a stand with his Spaniards, recouered, and by reason thereof hauing delaied his retreat, he was so amazed as he had not the leisure at his entry to plucke vp the draw-bridge and to shut the gate: the which standing open was on a sodaine seized by Baillone who followed him at the heeles hauing no great numbers of souldiers with him, and considering that if hee should enter he could not keepe them from the spoile, which would cause them all to be cut in peeces, he retired to the gallies which were with in a mile off the City.

This exploit did so affright the Neapolitains, as they presently sent to entreat the captaines of the army not to batter the city, nor to spoile the country neere adioyning: that they for their parts were ready to yeeld. But they could not make vse of this fauour of fortune: because that D. Hugo hauing intelligence of the small number of the army, shewed himselfe resolute to defend the City: so as the army for want of men remained idle, wayting for supplies out of France which were very slow in comming, and by their delay did snatch the victory forth of their hands: so as in the meane time of this expectation infinite disorders arose in the Churches army, for money and victuals fayling, therewithal martiall discipline was no more obserued, the souldiers did no more obey their captaines, euery one disbanded, they contemned the commandements of the Legate Apostolike, and all the interest of the league and the Pope: in such sort as diuers of the best aduised and most respected captaines, forsaking the pay of the confederates, went and serued the Imperials.

The great disorder of the army of the league.

VVhat hindred the taking of Naples.

For these causes the Pope continuing resolute in his former determination of agreement, sought all meanes to obtaine it, saying, That since he must needs serue, he had rather to do it to the Emperour, then still to depend on the vnruly wils of captaines, and namely of the baset souldiers.

The Duke of Bourbon marcheth to the field in dispight of all difficulties.

Now in this meane time, the Duke of Bourbons determination to march into the field, and to come and ioyne with the Lansequenets of George Frondsperg, did greatly trouble the Pope, and altered the confederates deseignes: for albe-it he found himselfe to be without money, munition, pioners, and vnfurnished of all meanes to get victuals, hee resolued neuertheless to passe on, thorow the middest of so many enemies townes, and against such enemies as were farre greater in number then himselfe. Bourbon then beeing thus resolued, hauing drawne away the Garrison from Milan, and from other places, went with his troupes and crossed the Trebia, vniting himselfe with the Lansequenets that were

were newly arriued, who tarried for him on the farther ſide of the Riuer, vncertaine as yet what courſe to take, al-be it the common report was, that at his departure from Milan, hee had promiſed to his ſouldiers the ſacke of Rome and of the greateſt part of Italy, the like alſo did captaine George to his Lanſequenets, who vpon that hope had endured very many miſeries ſince their departure from Germany, for they had receiued but one onely Ducat for a man, and afterwardes two or three Ducats for the whole time they had beene in Italy.

The Pope, in regard hereof, being greatly mooued, as well in particular for him ſelfe as for the Florentines, did renue his practizes of agreement with the viceroy, al be-it he had promiſed before not to conclude any thing without the conſent of the French King and the Venetians. That which mooued him therevnto was his owne feare, and the continuall exhortations of the Generall of the Friers, of whom hee made great account, who beeing newlie returned from the Emperours Court, aſſured the Pope of the Emperours affection towards his Holineſſe, and of his great inclination to peace; wherevpon, vſing this Generall in that treaty with the viceroy, hee continued in ſuch ſort as he ſeemed wholly to bee confirmed by that agreement, not making any warlike prouiſions for the ſafety of his owne perſon, ſaying, That as the vniuerſall Father and Paſtor, knowing the Emperour to bee greatly deſirous of peace, hee ought not for to ſhew himſelfe leſſe affected therevnto, and for the effecting thereof, freely to imploy all his meanes that hee could, without any ſiniſter ſuſpition, that all Chriſtendome might enioy the peace and tranquillity which it ſo much deſired.

What mooued the Pope to ſeeke an agreement with the viceroy.

The Pope truſteth to much to the viceroy

Bourbon in the meane time beeing come into the Bologna territory, ſpoyled all places round about, to the end that the Florentines, fearing the like dammage, ſhould compound with him, and contribute a certaine ſumme of money for the payment of his army, and thereby to auoide the ruine of their pallaces and goodly houſes, which lie neere to their city.

Theſe conſiderations did in ſuch ſort mooue the Pope, as the Lord of Langi beeing come forth of France to perſwade him not to make any agreement with the Emperour, and the rather to induce him therevnto, had brought him twenty thouſand Ducats, with promiſe of a greater ſumme, ſo ſoone as Cæſar Fieramoſca, ſent by the viceroy, had told him that his Maſter was ſatisfied with the truce for eight monthes, propounded by his Holineſſe, he on a ſodaine without any regard to the promiſes and aide of the French King, made an accord with the viceroy, ſaying, That time might make his condition worſe, if the Viceroy ſhould but know what diſorder was in the army of the league: and that the daunger of the Realme of Naples was nothing in compariſon of that of Tuſcany and Rome.

The Pope accordeth with the viceroy.

Therefore paſſing on farther, for the better aſſurance of That treaty, hee procured that the Viceroy ſhould come in perſon to Rome, whileſt the Cardinall Triuulcio, who was Legate in the Churches army ſhould goe to Naples to aſſure the Viceroy from him; who comming afterwards to Rome was honourably entertained there, and ratified the ſuſpention of armes for eight monthes, according as it had beene agreed vpon by Fieramoſca, promiſing to cauſe Bourbon to withdrawe his army forth of the Churches and Florentines State.

The Pope being to credulous, thought his affaires by this meanes to bee well aſſured, hauing promiſed by the agreement to giue threeſcore thouſand Ducats for the payment of the army, and to pardon the Colonneſi, and particularly Cardinall Pompey, reſtoring him to the Cardinalſhip whereof hee had depriued him. But the greateſt errour hee committed was, for that thorow badde councell hee had on a ſodaine with-drawne his whole army from forth the confines of the Realme of Naples, and his nauall army to Ciuitauecchia, and had wholly diſarmed himſelfe, retayning for the garde and ſafety of his owne perſon but an hundred light horſe, and certaine companies of black bands which had belonged to the deceaſed Iohn de Medicis, notwithſtanding that the Colonneſi were in armes, and committed ſoundry inſolencies.

The Popes error in diſarming himſelfe.

The Venetian Senate being aduertized of this agreement, would not faile to aduiſe the Pope not to truſt ouermuch to the viceroy: for al-be-it that hee had proceeded ſincerely therein, it was neuertheleſſe to be feared that Bourbon, who had the like authority from the Emperour as had the viceroy, beeing diſpleaſed that the accord was made without his conſent, would not ratifie it: Then they declared vnto him what inconuenience and diſorder his ſo ſoone diſarming did bring with it, ſeeing that the Siennois and Colonneſi, with whom hee had not yet fullie ended, were ſtill in armes.

But the Pope contemning all theſe reaſons and remayning obſtinate in his reſolution did verifie the common ſaying, That good and wholeſome councell giuen by an interreſſed and ſuſpected perſon, cauſeth rather a precipitate downefall. For the Pope thinking that the Venetians ſpake for their owne particular intereſt, becauſe hee had forſaken them, would not harcken vnto them: wherevpon, Bourbon within a while after writing to Rome, that hee could no longer hold backe the ſouldiers for want of pay from comming to beſeege it, he then perceiuing that to bee very true which they had told him: al-be-it that at the firſt hee thought that hee had ſaid ſo onely but for to draw ſome greater ſummes of money from him, or elſe in a brauado, and that hee did not meane to breake the truce.

Alſo hee was wont to ſay afterward, that though hee ſhould haue feared any ſiniſter accident, yet neuertheleſſe hee would not haue changed his opinion, becauſe hee would not haue the world to knowe that hee had beene deceiued by truſting to any one. Now hee imagining that the ſame would not come to paſſe which did happen, had already appointed Matheo Guilberto his Datary to goe as Legate into Spaine, to treat particularly there on the conditions of peace.

The Venetians beeing aduertized of the Popes reſolution did write to the Duke of Vrbin that hee ſhould aſſemble his troupes, and ioyne them with thoſe of the Marquis of Saluſſes that were on the Bolognois: They afterwards ſent to Sebaſtian Iuſtinian their Ambaſſadour with the Chriſtian King, willing him to aſſure his Maieſty, that al-be-it the Pope had forſaken them that they would neuer depart from his friendſhip, and that if hee thought good to accept of the truce, they would likewiſe accept of it, and not otherwiſe. The Pope in the treaty of the accord which the Viceroy had reſerued place for the Venetians to enter into it, becauſe they had not ſhewed themſelues much contrary to the truce, the better to pleaſe him, who beeing vnited with the moſt Chriſtian King were very well contented not for to breake off wholly with him, hoping ſtill to draw him to their party: for they made more account of the friendſhip of France then of all the reſt: wherevpon perceiuing that the King did not willingly giue eare to this truce, they would no more motion it.

The Venetians aſſurance to the King.

But concerning his propoſition to them to renue the warre in the Realme of Naples, they did very much commend the reprizall of armes but not to goe into that Kingdome, ſaying, That they had there loſt the good will of the people, and their reputation, by yeelding vp, thorow the Popes ſeparating himſelfe from them, all the townes which they had there taken: but that the ſureſt and proffitableſt way for the preſent, was to prepare for the defenſe and conſeruation of that which they poſſeſſed in Lombardy, if the accord ſhould happen to bee made. An if it ſhould fall out otherwiſe, it ſhould bee for the profit of the league to haue the Cities of the Churches ſtate and the Florentines at their deuotion.

The Venetians anſwere to the King concerning the renuing of the wars of Naples.

Now

Now the Imperiall army notwithſtanding the agreement conceiued at Rome betwixt the Pope and the viceroy, went ſtill forward, although that Cæſar Fieramoſca had ſignified vnto them the agreement to cauſe them to returne backe, For the Duke of Bourbon at the ſame time, either becauſe hee would not obey, or elſe it beeing not in his power to doe it, cauſed his army to march towards Romagnia, where he beſeeged Cottignola, the which hee tooke by compoſition, then marching towards Furli, hee came and lodged at Villafranca fiue miles off, and taking the way of Meldola, he ſhewed that his meaning was to paſſe Tuſcany by the Val di bagna: wherevnto he was much ſolicited by the Sienois who offred him great ſtore of victuals, and pioners.

Cottignola taken by the Duke of Bourbon.

The Venetians hauing notice of the enemies determination ſent word to the Duke of Vrbin, that leauing ſtrong Garriſons in the territories belonging to their State, hee ſhould paſſe on with the reſidue of the army to aſſure the lands of the Church and the Florentines, and to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Imperials deſeignes. The Duke of Vrbin according to this direction being come with part of the army neere to Bolognia, and the Marquis of Saluſſes likewiſe, beeing lodged in ſundry places, hee paſſed on towardes Imola, and encamped betwixt Rauenna, and Faenza, at the ſame time as the enemy departed from Cottignola: It was there a long time debated amongſt the captaines of the league what courſe to obſerue in that warre: and in the end it was concluded to haue two ſeuerall campes, the better and with more eaſe to cut off all victuals from the enemies, to what place ſoeuer they ſhould march. The Pope taxing this councell did neuertheleſſe make vſe of it, vnder collour of his raſh agreement, ſaying, That the ſlow proceeding of thoſe of the league for the preſeruation of that which beelonged vnto him had enforced him for to take an other courſe for his ſafety.

The confederates army doth ſtill follow the Imperials.

Now the Pope, who contrary to all mens opinions had ſtill thought himſelfe ſafe enough, beeing then ſtrangely daunted, by this new aduertizement, called before him all the Ambaſſadours of the Confederate Princes which were in his Court, and after hee had declared to them on the one ſide, how that the zeale to the publike good, but chiefly neceſſity had enforced him to accept the truce, and on the other, the malicious deceit of the Imperialls towardes him did earneſtly entreat them to make interceſſion for him to their Princes, that they would not forſake him, nor the Florentines likewiſe in ſo manifeſt daunger, to the great hurt and preiudice of the common cauſe, and hee did particularly entreat Dominico Veniero Ambaſſadour at Rome for the Signory of Venice, that hee would ſo deale with the Senate, as that they ſhould commaund the Duke of Vrbin to paſſe the Appenine hils with his army, promiſing to renue the league and ſincerely to obſerue it.

The Pope acknowledgeth his error and implyeth the confederates aide.

The Senate vpon this propoſition, al-be-it they iudged it to bee a very dangerous matter, to ſend their troupes ſo farre off from their owne State, and to aduenture them in the craggy mountaines, and that beſides, the Pope had not giuen them any cauſe to take care for his affaires, in regard hee had forſaken them, continuing neuertheleſſe in their former reſolution, commanded the Duke of Vrbin and Lodouico Piſani, who was come to the army as new Prouidator to paſſe the mountes if neede ſhould require: wherevpon ſo ſoone as the Imperiall army had paſſed the mounts, that of the Confederates followed it: ſo as almoſt at one time the two armies were in Tuſcany, the Duke of Bourbon beeing then lodged neere to Arezzo, and the Confederates army at Barberina, the City of Florence remayning in a manner in the middeſt betwixt theſe two armies.

The two armies at one time in Tuſcany.

This was the cauſe of great troubles in the Citty, ſome crauing a popular gouernment, and others would haue that of a few priuate perſons, wherevpon the greatneſſe of thoſe of Medicis came to controuerſie, and the popular faction would at least haue preuailed, those of Medicis beeing driuen from the publike gouernment, and Hippolito and Alessandro of Medicis the Popes Nephewes being declared enemies to their country, when as the Duke of Vrbin arriued opportunely at Florence during these stirs, who so soone as he perceiued the Duke of Bourbon to direct his course towards Tuscany, taking with him fourescore gentlemen forth of the army, with the Prouidator Pisani and Frederico Bozzola, went speedily to Florence to continue the Florentines in their fidelity towards the league.

He by his arriuall did frustrate the deseignes of the contrary faction which was affrighted to see the army so neere, hauing no assurance of any relieue from elsewhere, so as he reduced matters to their former state without any effusion of bloud for that time: and delt besides in such sort, as the Florentines should be vnder the protection of the league, and should maintaine, at their owne charge in the confederates campe, two hundred and fifty men at armes, and fiue thousand foot, or a greater number if the Pope should so appoint it.

Vvhilest these things were done in Florence, the other confederates renued the league at Rome, by which they promised the Venetians to contribute towards the expence of their army, prouided that it did not depart forth of Tuscany or the Churches State without the Popes permission, and that it would be one of the first in the enterprize of Naples. These conditions seeming to hard to the Senate, were not accepted; Dominico Vensiero their Ambassador, for being to forward in his offers was called home to Venice, and as one guilty for going beyond his commission was deliuered ouer into the hands of the Auogario to haue his processe made, and Francesco Pesare was sent Ambassador in his stead.

Dominico Veniero put to his tryall.

The Duke of Bourbon either for that hee despaired of being able to make any attempt vpon Florence, by reason that all the confederates forces were not farre from thence, or for that he was euer desirous to goe to Rome, determined to march thither, being partly prouoked, by the negligence and small care that they had in Rome to prouide for the daungers which threatned it: because that the Pope relying in vaine on the people, and on a great number of husbandmen that were retired thither, of whom more then fiue thousand were armed, had not taken care to leauy new forces, and least of all to prouide for those that he already had: namely, that hauing giuen charge to Philippin Doria to leauy three thousand foot-men, he hauing raised one thousand and brought them to Ciuitaueccchia, his Holinesse did not vouchsafe to send for them to come to Rome for the gard of the City: and caused his Datary to write to Count Guy of Rangon, who lay at Ottriccoli with great numbers of foot not to come to Rome, vnlesse hee should bee expresly commanded by him so to doe, notwithstanding that the Earle was aduertized from the Duke of Vrbin, that the Duke of Bourbon marched thitherwards, and that he might haue come thither in time: but hee durst not disobey the Popes commandement, so that diuers did blame him for it, saying, that in such a case he should haue obeyed the Duke of Vrbin, as captaine Generall of the league.

VVhat caused the Duke of Bourbon to to march to Rome.

The Duke of Bourbon then, departing forth of the country of Arezzo without artillery or baggage, and marching with incredible speed, not being hindred by the raine which at that season was very great, nor yet by want of victuals, he came neere to Rome before such time as the Pope had scarcely any aduertizement of his comming, and hee found no resistance neither at Viterbo, whether the Pope had not sent forces in time, nor yet in any other place, yet neuertheless, before hee would come nere to the walles, hee sent to the Pope to demaund passage for his army into the Kingdome of Naples, (as hee said) beeing mooued therevnto by reason of the small store of victuals which hee had, and fearing least by his long tarrying that hee might bee surprized by the army of the league who very neerely pursued him, or as others thought, by a martiall martiall arrogancy, to haue ſome collour for that which he had in his minde determined to doe.

The Duke of Bourbons great speed in his march to Rome.

The Pope would not regard his demands, nor yet heare them, as well becauſe hee knew already the inward policies of the enemy, as for the great truſt which he repoſed in the people of Rome, and in the leagues nauall army of ſixe and twenty gallies that lay at Ciuitauecchia with certaine companies of foot-men: As alſo for that Rance de Cera (vnto whom the Pope gaue the chiefe defenſe of the City of Rome) had rampired the ſuburbes, in the defenſe whereof hee ſo much truſted, that al-be-it they were in all mens iudgements very weake, hee would not permit the bridges vpon Tiber to be cut for the ſafety of Rome, if the ſuburbes and part of the City beyond Tiber could not be defended: and had beſides, made ſuch bad prouiſion of all neceſſaries, as it encouraged the enemies to approach the walles, and to come to the aſſault with ladders.

The defendants did not deſcry the enemies till it was almoſt to late, by reaſon of a thick miſt which ſodainely aroſe, wherewith the enemies army was couered, vntill it came to the very place where they gaue the aſſault, where Antonio de Montfalcone was in gard with an hundred ſouldiers, vnto whoſe reſcue diuers of the armed people came running, who for a certaine ſpace ſuſteined the enemies attempts. But the Imperials continuing the aſſault very fiercely, theſe new vnexperienced ſouldiers perceiuing daunger hourely to encreaſe forſooke the defenſe, and committed themſelues to flight.

The Duke of Bourbon giueth an aſſault to the ſuburbs of Rome.

The Duke of Bourbon at the beginning of their aſſault marching formoſt, went before all the companies, where being ſhot into the body by an Harquebuze, he fell downe dead to the ground. The Prince of Orange, being very neere him when he fell, cauſed him forthwith to be couered with a cloake, to the end the ſouldiers might not be daunted by the death of their Generall, and then he did hotly purſue the victory.

The death of the Duke of Bourbon.

The Pope, who in the palace of the Vatican attended what would bee the euent thereof, hearing that the enemies had entred, did forth-with flie with diuers Cardinals and other Prelats to the caſtle Saint Angelo. The Lords Rance de Cera and Langey, hauing laboured in vaine to mooue the people to take armes for their owne defenſe, and had fought valiantly with thoſe few forces they could gather together and with them a long time kept the caſtle bridge, were at laſt enforced to retire. The City beeing thus abandoned, and all the people in confuſion and flight, the enemies on all ſides entred it, and became Maſters thereof without any difficulty. Philippin Doria and Count Guy, ſo ſoone as they perceiued the Duke of Bourbon to march towards Rome, did on a ſodaine without wayting for any other commandement ſet forwards to reſcue the Pope with the forces of Ciuitauecchia and Oruietta: but the Duke of Bourbon by his ſpeed hauing preuented them, and ſhut vp all the paſſages by which they were to follow him, did enforce them to returne from whence they came.

The Pope with diuers Cardinals retireth to the caſtle Saint Angelo.

Now the Duke of Vrbin hauing ſet forward to follow the enemies, but very ſlowly, by reaſon of the hindrances of his campe, did at laſt with the whole army come as farre as Viterbo, who finding all the country to be ſpoiled by the enemies, hee was enforced by want of victuals to tarry there, his army beeing by ſundry accidents much diminiſhed, hauing in all but ſeuen thouſand men, in ſtead of thirty thouſand appointed by the confederates. The army, lodging in that place, the light horſe and foot-men did oftentimes ſcoure the whole Country, where meeting with the Imperiall ſouldiers, that were laden with great ſpoile and disbanded comming from Rome, they ſtriped them of all they had.

Beſides that, at the taking of the City all manner of crueltie was vſed:

faction would at least haue preuailed, those of Medicis beeing driuen from the publike gouernment, and Hippolito and Alessandro of Medicis the Popes Nephewes being declared enemies to their country, when as the Duke of Vrbin arriued opportunely at Florence during these stirs, who so soone as he perceiued the Duke of Bourbon to direct his course towards Tuscany, taking with him fourescore gentlemen forth of the army, with the Prouidator Pisani and Frederico Bozzola, went speedily to Florence to continue the Florentines in their fidelity towards the league.

He by his arriuall did frustrate the deseignes of the contrary faction which was affrighted to see the army so neere, hauing no assurance of any relieue from elsewhere, so as he reduced matters to their former state without any effusion of bloud for that time: and delt besides in such sort, as the Florentines should be vnder the protection of the league, and should maintaine, at their owne charge in the confederates campe, two hundred and fifty men at armes, and fiue thousand foot, or a greater number if the Pope should so appoint it.

Whilest these things were done in Florence, the other confederates renued the league at Rome, by which they promised the Venetians to contribute towards the expence of their army, prouided that it did not depart forth of Tuscany or the Churches State without the Popes permission, and that it would be one of the first in the enterprize of Naples. These conditions seeming to hard to the Senate, were not accepted; Dominico Vensiero their Ambassador, for being to forward in his offers was called home to Venice, and as one guilty for going beyond his commission was deliuered ouer into the hands of the Auogario to haue his processe made, and Francesco Pesare was sent Ambassador in his stead.

Dominico Veniero put to his tryall.

The Duke of Bourbon either for that hee despaired of being able to make any attempt vpon Florence, by reason that all the confederates forces were not farre from thence, or for that he was euer desirous to goe to Rome, determined to march thither, being partly prouoked, by the negligence and small care that they had in Rome to prouide for the daungers which threatned it: because that the Pope relying in vaine on the people, and on a great number of husbandmen that were retired thither, of whom more then fiue thousand were armed, had not taken care to leauy new forces, and least of all to prouide for those that he already had: namely, that hauing giuen charge to Philippin Doria to leauy three thousand foot-men, he hauing raised one thousand and brought them to Ciuitauecchia, his Holinesse did not vouchsafe to send for them to come to Rome for the gard of the City: and caused his Datary to write to Count Guy of Rangon, who lay at Ottriccoli with great numbers of foot not to come to Rome, vnlesse hee should bee expresly commanded by him so to doe, notwithstanding that the Earle was aduertized from the Duke of Vrbin, that the Duke of Bourbon marched thitherwards, and that he might haue come thither in time: but hee durst not disobey the Popes commandement, so that diuers did blame him for it, saying, that in such a case he should haue obeyed the Duke of Vrbin, as captaine Generall of the league.

VVhat caused the Duke of Bourbon to to march to Rome.

The Duke of Bourbon then, departing forth of the country of Arezzo without artillery or baggage, and marching with incredible speed, not being hindred by the raine which at that season was very great, nor yet by want of victuals, he came neere to Rome before such time as the Pope had scarcely any aduertizement of his comming, and hee found no resistance neither at Viterbo, whether the Pope had not sent forces in time, nor yet in any other place, yet neuertheless, before hee would come nere to the walles, hee sent to the Pope to demaund passage for his army into the Kingdome of Naples, (as hee said) beeing mooued therevnto by reason of the small store of victuals which hee had, and fearing least by his long tarrying that hee might bee surprized by the army of the league who very neerely pursued him, or as others thought, by a martiall martiall arrogancy, to haue ſome collour for that which he had in his minde determined to doe.

The Duke of Bourbons great speed in his march to Rome.

The Pope would not regard his demands, nor yet heare them, as well becauſe hee knew already the inward policies of the enemy, as for the great truſt which he repoſed in the people of Rome, and in the leagues mauall army of ſixe and twenty gallies that lay at Ciuitauecchia with certaine companies of foot-men: As alſo for that Rance de Cera (vnto whom the Pope gaue the chiefe defenſe of the City of Rome) had rampired the ſuburbes, in the defenſe whereof hee ſo much truſted, that al-be-it they were in all mens iudgements very weake, hee would not permit the bridges vpon Tiber to be cut for the ſafety of Rome, if the ſuburbes and part of the City beyond Tiber could not be defended: and had beſides, made ſuch bad prouiſion of all neceſſaries, as it encouraged the enemies to approach the walles, and to come to the aſſault with ladders.

The defendants did not deſcry the enemies till it was almoſt to late, by reaſon of a thick miſt which ſodainely aroſe, wherewith the enemies army was couered, vntill it came to the very place where they gaue the aſſault, where Antonio de Montfalcone was in gard with an hundred ſouldiers, vnto whoſe reſcue diuers of the armed people came running, who for a certaine ſpace ſuſteined the enemies attempts. But the Imperials continuing the aſſault very fiercely, theſe new vnexperienced ſouldiers perceiuing daunger hourely to encreaſe forſooke the defenſe, and committed themſelues to flight.

The Duke of Bourbon giueth an aſſault to the ſuburbs of Rome.

The Duke of Bourbon at the beginning of their aſſault marching formoſt, went before all the companies, where being ſhot into the body by an Harquebuze, he fell downe dead to the ground. The Prince of Orange, being very neere him when he fell, cauſed him forthwith to be couered with a cloake, to the end the ſouldiers might not be daunted by the death of their Generall, and then he did hotly purſue the victory.

The death of the Duke of Bourbon.

The Pope, who in the palace of the Vatican attended what would bee the euent thereof, hearing that the enemies had entred, did forth-with flie with diuers Cardinals and other Prelats to the caſtle Saint Angelo. The Lords Rance de Cera and Langey, hauing laboured in vaine to mooue the people to take armes for their owne defenſe, and had fought valiantly with thoſe few forces they could gather together and with them a long time kept the caſtle bridge, were at laſt enforced to retire. The City beeing thus abandoned, and all the people in confuſion and flight, the enemies on all ſides entred it, and became Maſters thereof without any difficulty. Philippin Doria and Count Guy, ſo ſoone as they perceiued the Duke of Bourbon to march towards Rome, did on a ſodaine without wayting for any other commandement ſet forwards to reſcue the Pope with the forces of Ciuitauecchia and Oruietta: but the Duke of Bourbon by his ſpeed hauing preuented them, and ſhut vp all the paſſages by which they were to follow him, did enforce them to returne from whence they came.

The Pope with diuers Cardinals retireth to the caſtle Saint Angelo.

Now the Duke of Vrbin hauing ſet forward to follow the enemies, but very ſlowly, by reaſon of the hindrances of his campe, did at laſt with the whole army come as farre as Viterbo, who finding all the country to be ſpoiled by the enemies, hee was enforced by want of victuals to tarry there, his army beeing by ſundry accidents much diminiſhed, hauing in all but ſeuen thouſand men, in ſtead of thirty thouſand appointed by the confederates. The army, lodging in that place, the light horſe and foot-men did oftentimes ſcoure the whole Country, where meeting with the Imperiall ſouldiers, that were laden with great ſpoile and disbanded comming from Rome, they ſtriped them of all they had.

Beſides that, at the taking of the City all manner of crueltie was vſed:

euery where infinite complaints were heard of thoſe who were inhumanely tormented, partly to enforce them to pay their ranſom, and partly to bewray the wealth that they had hidden. The cries and pittifull lamentations were heard of Roman dames, and Nunnes, who the ſouldiers lead away in troupes to ſatisfie their Luxury. All holy things, the Sacraments and Relikes of Saints, where-with the Churches were ſtored, being deſpoiled of their ornaments, were euery where trodden vnder foot; wherevnto were added infinite vilanies of the barbarous Lanſequenets. The ſacke and pillage laſted many monthes, which according to the common report, as well in ready money, gold, ſiluer, and iewels, amounted to more then a Million of Ducats, and the ranſomes that were paied, did riſe to a farre greater ſumme.

The Imprials great cruelty in Rome.

The end of the ſixth Booke of the fifth Decade.

The

The Contents of the ſeuenth Booke of the fifth Decade.

THE Venetians ſorrow and greefe for the taking of Rome and the Pope by the Imperialls. The Cardinalls meete at Bologna to treate of the Popes deliuerance. The Venetians warlike preparations by Land and Sea to free the Pope from his impriſonment. The Venetians ſeaze on Rauenna to keepe it for the Holy Sea. The Duke of Vrbin taketh Perugia to the ſame end. The Duke of Vrbins reſolution for the Popes deliuery. The French King maketh great warlike prouiſions to ſend into Italy. Andre Doria in the ſeruice of the French King. The army of the Confederats remaineth on the Confines of the Siennois. The Popes agreement to come forth of priſon. The Venetians reſolution vpon that agreement. The Lord of Lautrec commeth into the ſtate of Milan with great forces. Boſco and Alexandria taken by him. Pauia is taken and ſackt by the French. Genoa is reduced vnder the French Kings obedience. The Turke being aſſailed by Marcello, had ſoone after his reuenge. The Lord Lautrec marcheth towards Rome. The demands propounded by the French King in the motion of peace. The Agreement, whereby the Duke of Ferrara and the Marquis of Mantua enter into the league. The entire enlargement of the Popes perſon. The Venetians ſend an Ambaſſad to the Pope, inuiting him to enter into the league. The like Ambaſſade of the moſt Chriſtian King to the ſame effect. The Popes excuſes not to enter into any new confederacy. The Lord Lautrecs iourny into the Kingdome of Naples. The Popes demand to the Venetians, with their anſwer. The Imperialls refuſe to fight. The Lord Lautrec encampeth before Naples. The Duke of Brunſwich commeth with great forces into Lombardy. The Venetians preparations againſt the Duke of

Brunſwich

Brunſwich. He returneth into Germany. The Imperialls are put to rout at Sea. The arriuall of the Generall of the Venetian Army before Naples with the diſcommodities which it there endured. Andre Doria reuolteth from the Kings ſeruice. The Pope reſolueth to remaine neuter. The great wants of the Army before Naples. And laſtly the Lord Lautrecs Death.

The Seuenth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

The Senate after the taking of Rome, determine to oppoſe themſelues againſt the Emperor.

HE accident at Rome being knowne at Venice, together with the Popes impriſonment, did greatly afflict the Senate with griefe and compaſſion, and with a diſdaine for the wrong offered to the perſon of the holy Father, wherevpon they not intending to ſuffer any longer the Emperors fortune to encreaſe to their owne perill, determined to releeue the Pope with all their forces, and therein to ſpare for no coſt: which cauſed them to write to the Duke of Vrbin their Generall, and to Piſani and Vitturi the Prouidators, to lay by all other deſeignes and attempt onely, if it were poſſible, to free the Pope from his impriſonment: and the better to effect it to come neere to the Caſtle wherein hee was ſhutte vp, to ſeeke by all meanes to draw him thence; and becauſe no other matter might hinder this enterprize, they forth-with made a new leuy of foote, to encreaſe their forces to the number of ten thouſand foot, which lay on the confines of Crema and Lauda, to reſiſt Antonio de Leua, who being come forth into the field, and finding no oppoſition, was likely euery day to grow more ſtrong by the aid which he expected forth of Germany. The Venetians were incited therevnto, by the great preparations of the Kings of England and France, who hauing notice of the great inhumanity vſed towards his Holineſſe, and the ſcandall giuen to the Church of Chriſtendome, by detayning the head thereof in priſon, determining to remedy it reſolued betwixt themſelues at their owne charges to ſend an army into Italy to free the Pope, and to put him in poſſeſſion of all the Churches lands: and another mighty one into Flanders, by aſſayling that country to enforce the Emperor to abandon Italy for the defence thereof.

The King of France and England reſolue to free the Pope.

Theſe two Kings were very earneſt in this buſineſſe, wherevpon the Cardinall of Yorke, who could doe more then all men with the King of England, came for the ſame purpoſe to Amiens to the French king, to procure an enteruiew of thoſe two kings, to the end they might conſult together more conſiderately concerning the Popes deliuery. The moſt Chriſtian King ſeemed to be no leſſe willing therein, who ſent ſpeedy word to his Captaines in Italy to procure by all meanes the the Popes freedome from imprisonment, and to assure the State Ecclesiasticall: and the better to prouide for it with more speed, he aduised those Cardinals that were at liberty, to meet at Auignon, where, as in a safe and commodious place, they might with ease treat thereof, and from thence send their resolutions into Spaine, The Cardinalls approouing this Councell of vniting themselues together did for sundry respects make choyce of the Citty of Bolognia for their meeting place.

The Cardinals meet at Bolognia to treat of the Popes deliuery.

The Emperor in the meane time being aduertized of the Popes taking, by his choose Chancellor that was going into Italy, did by his speech manifest that he was highly displeased therewith, alleadging diuers goodly matters for his iustification. But the effects were not answerable thereunto; resoluing on nothing for his deliuery, but in his discourse did oftentimes excuse the Duke of Bourbon and his Army, he did amplifie the iniuries which the Pope had done him; he accused his inconstancy and little assurance in his treaties, calling to mind the dangers whereinto the Confederates had gone about to cast him: whereby and by euery of his discourses, it was easily perceiued that in secret he was well pleased therewith, and that he would neuer consent to his deliuery, nor to that of the French Kings children, but by compulsion.

The Emperors dissimulation concerning the Popes taking.

The French King hauing before sent to make a leuy of tenne thousand Suisses for the enterprise of Lombardy, and his agents going therein slowly to worke, so soone as he had notice of the taking of Rome, fearing the alteration of Fortune, and the Imperialls deseignes did sodainly send the money to Lyons, and sollicited their speedy departure.

The Venetians on the other side did not ceasse by all good offices to maintain and encrease that good desire in the King, propounding vnto him how necessary it was hotly to pursue that warre with great forces, Religion and State agreeing in one, not to suffer the dignity of the Sea Apostolick, and the liberty of Italy to be troden vnder foot: and for to incite him no lesse by deeds then words, they determined to renew their nauall army, which was much weakened by the bad ayre and other discommodities at Ciuitauechia, where it had for a time remayned, & to arme besides it, foure Basterd Galleis, of which they appointed Antonio Marcello Captaine, thereby to strengthen the army that it might assaile the Sea-coasts of Puglia. They did moreouer propound to the King to leuy, besides the Suisses at their common charge, other tenne thousand foot, drawing in the meane time to their pay all the best experienced Captaines in martiall affaires that they could find: among whom were the Count of Gaiazzo and the Marquis Palauicin. And to encourage Francis Sforza, of whose freindship and readinesse they made great account, they lent him tenne thousand Ducats, with which he promised to encrease his forces, which were already more then two thousand foot, and to come in person with them to Lauda, there for to ioyne with the Venetian army. Now becausse that the territories of Romagnia were without Garrisons, and exposed to sundry dangers in so wretched a time, no man giuing them ayde nor succour, the Senate beeing greatly prouoked therunto, sent a good summe of money to the Gouernor of Rauenna to leuy foot forces for the garrison of the Citty, encouraging him to defend it, with promise of greater ayd if need should be, as within a while after they did, by sending him three hundred foot and an hundred light horse vnder the command of Iohn de Nalde, inioyning him to keepe that City for the Sea Apostolick and the league.

The Venetians preparations by Sea & land

The Venetians place a Garrison in Rauenna for the behoof of the Sea of Rome.

But strife arising in that Citty betwixt the Inhabitants and the soldiers, the Venetians were entreated by them of the Citty to send thither one from Venice to be Prouidator there, whereupon Bartholomeo Contrren by the Senates consent went thither to supply that place. Those of Ceruia within a while after did the like where the Guelphes, hauing chased away those of the Gibelline faction, did receiue garrison and a Magistrate of the Venetians, the Legat earnestly requiring it, for for the quiet and conſeruation of the ſame Citty.

The Duke of Vrbin taketh Peruſa.

Whileſt theſe things were done, the Duke of Vrbin hauing receiued the Senates commandement, and diſpoſing him-ſelfe for the execution thereof, did firſt of all make him-ſelfe ſure of the Citty of Peruſa, wherein Gentil Baillone commanded, who was ſuſpected to hold with the enemies part, whome with threatenings hee enforced to depart thence, and hauing left a ſtrong garriſon, there, hee marched with the army to Todi, and from thence to Oruietto where he ioyned himſelfe with the French, and Eccleſiaſticall troupes, as he had formerly concluded to doe. And hauing there aſſembled all the cheefe Captaines, to reſolue on what they ſhould afterwards doe, hee cauſed the Senates letter to bee openly read, and then aſſured them, for the obeying of their command, that hee intended to march directly to Rome, to free by all meanes poſſible the Pope from impriſonment, reſoluing if the enemies ſhould ſhew them-ſelues, to fight with them, and with others to runne one ſelfe-ſame fortune.

The Duke of Vrbins propoſition.

This propoſition beeing allowed by the Prouidator Piſani, was entertained with the Generall conſent of all the reſt, (the Prouidator Vitturi excepted) who being of a contrary opinion oppoſed him-ſelfe againſt it both in word and deed, proteſting by writing and deteſting ſuch an enterprize as moſt pernicious, and of doubtfull iſſue, ſaying that their ſoldiers were farre inferiour both in number and valour to the Imperialls, who were very many, and for the moſt part good ſoldiers and well experienced, either in fight, or in knowledge how to vanquiſh, and therefore more valliant and ready to ſuſtaine all attempts how great ſoeuer. By meanes whereof hee cooled the Dukes former heate, who not-with ſtanding continued in his firſt reſolution to draw neerer to Rome, meaning neuer-the-leſſe to lodge in a very ſtrong and commodious place, what-ſo-euer ſhould befall, then hee propounded a new inuention, to the end to trie firſt without danger, if hee could get the Pope from thence, which was ſpeedily and on the ſodaine to cauſe Frederick of Bozzola to march towards Rome with one company of men at armes, a certaine number of light-horſe, and ſome companies of harquebuziers on horſe-backe, hoping that his ſodaine and vnlookt for arriuall, might offer ſome meanes to the Pope to eſcape by that conuoy, and to come to the army of the league, but this deſigne ſucceeded not, for diuers occaſions, and cheefely becauſe that Frederics horſe falling vpon him, hee was there-with ſore hurt, ſo that hee could goe on no farther, but was enforced to returne.

Vittury is contrary to the Duke of Vrbin

But the army in the meane time continuing their approches, they were aduertized by certaine ſpies, that the trenches which the Imperialls had made neere to the Caſtle, were very great, and hard to be forced: whereby the difficulties of the enterprize were encreaſed: and moreouer that they at Rome expected the Spaniſh Infantery which was at Naples, and that Captaine Alarçon was already arriued; wherevpon the Duke was of opinion to paſſe on no farther with the army, the which was allowed almoſt by all the other Captains: and therefore hee did ſpeedily aduertize the Senate, ſaying that for to releeue the Caſtle, it behooued him to haue greater forces then he then had, and in particularizing them, he did affirme that to draw the Pope from thence, there ought to bee in the army the number of ſixteene thouſand Swiſſes, leuied by a decree of the Cantons, not accounting thoſe that were already there, and beſides the Swiſſes tenne thouſand Italian Harqueguziers, three thouſand Pioners, and fourtie peeces of ordnance.

What great forces they were to haue to free the Pope from priſon.

Theſe newes did greatly diſpleaſe the Venetians in regard of the delaying of matters, and of the Popes troubles and wearyſomeneſſe, which was much encreaſed by reading of a letter, written by the Pope to his Liuetenant Guicciardyne, who ſent it to the Senate; by the which hee entreated, ſolicited, and coniured the confederates, by all meanes to procure his deliuerance. The Senate therefore hauing heard of the oppoſition and hinderance made by the Prouidator Vitturi, concerning the approach of the army neere to Rome, diſcharged him of his office, and being called home to Venice he was committed to the Auogario there to yeeld an account of his actions.

Senate

Vitturi called to account for being contrary to the Popes delinery.

The Senate in the meane time inſiſting more earneſtly in the ſame reſolution, to releeue the Pope, and to draw him from thence, wrote to the Generall, and to the Prouidators, to vſe all meanes poſſible for that purpoſe to approach neere to the Caſtle, the which the Generall refuſing, choſe rather to giue ouer his place, which the Senators tooke in bad part, but after that the one and the other of them were appeaſed, they confirmed him in the place of Generall for two yeares more.

The kings great preparations to ſend into Italy.

The French on the other ſide greatly deteſting the Popes impriſonment, and enuying the Spaniards fortunate ſucceſſe, made great preparations of warre, the King making account to come to Lyons to take order for the affaires of war, hauing firſt commanded fifteene thouſand Swiſſes to be leuied, and tenne thouſand Italian foote. And that hee might like-wiſe haue a nauall army for that purpoſe, hee tooke Andre Doria to his pay with eight Gallies, and promiſed to giue him a yearely entertaynement of ſixe and thirty thouſand crownes, and appointed the Lord of Lautrec Captaine Generall of all the troupes by land; where-with the Venetians being highly pleaſed, did the more to honour him, appoint Petro Peſare Procurator of Saint Marke, their Ambaſſador, who ſhould meet him at his comming into Italy and waite vpon him whereſoeuer hee went.

Andre Doria in the Kings ſeruice.

The Imperialls in the meane time that were in Rome, albeit that their number was much encreaſed by the arriuall of the Spaniards that came from Naples, finding them-ſelues to bee foure and twenty thouſand foote, tooke their leiſure, enioying with eaſe the wealthy ſpoyles that they had gotten at the ſacke of the Citty, their Captaines beeing not able, neither to cauſe them to come fourth of the towne, nor yet to reſtraine their vnbrideled licence: two companies alone of Lancequenets, leauing the Citty went and ſpoyled Terni and Narni, going on no farther, not-with-ſtanding that the Confederates army was farre enough of: for thoſe of the league hauing loſt their hope of the enterprize of Rome, the Venetians following the Marquis of Saluſſes, and all the French went and encamped on the confines of the Siennois, to aſſure thereby the Florentines Territories, and to bring them to this paſſe, (the which they did) to ratifie the league, and to entertaine fiue thouſand foote in the army at their owne charges, wherein they ſhewed them-ſelues ſo much the more willing and ready, by how much they were neere vnto danger, the Imperiall Captaines threatning to turne their forces vpon them, being diſpleaſed with them, for that in the beginning of the Popes miſfortune, they had made ſome ſhew to follow the Emperors party, and yet after-wards had cleaued to his enemies.

The Venetian forces did at that time conſiſt of ſixe thouſand Italian foote-men, two thouſand Lancequenets, thirteene hundred light horſe, and two thouſand men at armes, and the French Infantery was not aboue ſeauen thouſand foote-men, albeit the King paid a greater number. But the great dearth of victuall and the ſharpe diſeaſes which did dayly decreaſe the army, did hinder them from enterprizing any matter. By reaſon whereof the enemies forces being encreaſed and thoſe of the league diminiſhed, the Pope hauing loſt all hope of ſpeedy releef, did wholly incline to practizes of agreement and hoping to haue a better compoſition of the Viceroy, who was at Sienna, he ſent for him, and by the ſame meanes entreated the Duke of Vrbin to ſuffer him ſafely to come to Rome.

The number of the Venetians army.

The Pope inclineth to an agreement.

The Viceroy went willingly and in great haſt to the army, not ſo much for the Popes profit, as for the hope he had to be made General therof. But being arriued at Rome, whither he came by a ſafe conduct of the Captains of the league, he had notice notice that the Lancequenets and Spaniards wiſht him no good, who after the Duke of Bourbons death had choſen the Prince of Orange for their Generall, ſo as he had not the courage to ſpeake of any agreement with the Pope, but much leſſe to tarry there: for being not gracious in the eyes of the army, he had no more authority, neither in the affaires of warre, nor in the treaty of agreement with the Pope, who at the laſt being banckrout of all hope, did on the ſixth day of Iune make an agreement with the Imperialls, on the ſame conditions, in a manner, as he might before then haue decreed vpon with them.

Articles of agreement betwixt the Pope and Emperor.

That the Pope ſhould pay vnto the army foure hundred thouſand Ducats: ſhould deliuer to the Emperor to keepe ſo long as he ſhould thinke good the Caſtle of Saint Angelo, the Forts of Oſtia, Ciuitauechia, and Ciuitacaſtelane, with the Citties of Placentia, Parma and Modena. For the accompliſhment of which matters, the Pope, being not yet wholly ſet at liberty, was to remaine priſoner in the Caſtle, with the Cardinalls that were with him, who were thirteene in number, vntill the army had receiued the firſt paiment, which was of one hundred and fifty thouſand Ducats, and that afterwards they ſhould goe to Naples or Gayetta to expect in that place how the Emperour would determine of them.

How the Venetians behaued themſelues vpon this agreement.

This manner of proceeding did greatly diſpleaſe the Venetians: but the Pope, fearing his owne life, becauſe of the Coloneſi and the Lancequenets, was enforced to allow of this agreement, albeit that it was very preiudicial to him: whervpon the Venetians, hoping that time might bring them better fortune, determined to keepe the Citty of Cremona, and to that end cauſed the army, which they had in Lombardy, neere to Crema, to croſſe foorthwith the riuer Adda, to put a Garriſon in to that Citty, and to hinder the conſignation of the others, by breaking the condition agreed vpon, and by ſpoyling the Contrey neere to Milan and Pauia to moleſt and weaken the Imperialls.

Now the Caſtle of Saint Angelo was by this accord foorth-with yeelded to Captaine Alarcon, who entred it with three companies of Spaniſh footmen, and three companies of Lancequenets, appointed to guard the Caſtle and the Pope: But the other townes and Caſtles, that were promiſed, were not ſo eaſily conſigned, by reaſon that the Caſtle of Ciuita-Chaſtelane was guarded by the Confederates, and Andrew Doria refuſed to deliuer vp that of Ciuitauechia, vnleſſe he were firſt paied fourteene thouſand Ducats, which he ſaid was due vnto him for his entertainment: Parma and Placentia on the other-ſide, abhorring the Spaniſh gouernment, refuſed to receiue them, and thoſe of Modena were reduced vnder the obedience of the Duke of Ferrara, who making vſe of the Popes calamity, threatning the Modenois to ſpoile their corne, which was almoſt ripe, did enforce them to deliuer vp the citty into his handes.

The Confederates army remained quiet without attempting any thing. expecting the arriuall of the Lord of Lautrec, who was ſaid to be already in Piedmont, with great forces, both of horſe and foot, albeit the Captaines in the meane-time were of ſondry opinions, ſome thinking that being vnited with the French, it would be beſt for them to march directly to Rome, where they ſhould find the Imperiall army in ſuch diſorder as they might eaſily ſet the Pope at liberty, by reaſon that it was much diminiſhed, as well by the contagious ſickneſſe which was in the Citty, as by the ouer-much licence which the Soldiers had taken for certaine monethes ſpace, liuing without al order, and without any martiall diſcipline, ſome of them being lodged in the Citty, and others heere and there abroad, and that diuers of them beeing diſbanded went their waies daily without any leaue: whereby they might with eaſe driue thoſe few from Rome that remayned behind.

Sondry opinions in the Confederats army about the Popes deliuery.

Thoſe of the contrary opinion thought, that for the effecting of that deſeigne it were better to ſcoure the ſtate of Milan, beeing neere thereunto, to enforce the the Imperials to leaue Rome, and to come to the defenſe thereof, which might prooue either to ſlow or inſufficient to ſtoppe the current of the victory, whereby they might at one time execute diuers fortunate exploits, and perhaps giue an end to the warre.

Lautrec entereth the Dutchy of Milan with great forces.

This being alowed by all men, and propounded to the Lord of Lautrec at his arriuall, he entred into the ſtate of Milan with eight thouſand Suiſſes, three thouſand Gaſcons, and tenne thouſand footmen conducted by Pedro of Nauarre, and went and encamped before the towne of Boſco, on the marches of Alexandria, where was a Garriſon of a thouſand footmen, the moſt of whom were Lancequenets, who after they had for the ſpace of tenne dayes ſuſtained the battery and ſundry aſſaults, did at the laſt yeeld themſelues at the diſcretion of the Victor.

Boſco and Alexandria are taken by Lautrec.

This conqueſt was followed by that of Alexandria, whither the Lord Lautrec came afterwards and encamped, wherin lay fifteene hundred footmen, who being moleſted at one time, both by the Artillery and the mynes, were enforced to yeeld; their liues and goods beeing ſaued.

Striſe betwixt the confederats concerning the taking of Alexandria.

But the taking of Alexandria was cauſe of the beginning of ſome contention betwixt the confederates. For the Lord of Lautrec being deſirous to leaue fifteene hundred footmen in Garriſon there, to the end that at al euents his owne companies might haue one place of retreat, and thoſe which ſhould come from France finde ſome comodiouſneſſe of meeting there the Duke of Milans Ambaſſador, fearing that it would be the beginning of an occaſion to poſſeſſe that State for his King, oppoſed him-ſelfe againſt it, the like did the Ambaſſadors of England and Venice, whereupon Lautrec agreed (not without indignation) to leaue it freely to the Duke of Milan: a matter which did afterwards greatly preiudice the leagne.

Now Lautrec, after the conqueſt of Alexandria propounded that he would march to Rome to free the Pope from impriſonment, who, although he had agreed (as hath beene ſaid) with the Almaines and Spaniards, did neuertheleſſe ſtill remaine a priſoner vnder their guard, vntill that he had accompliſhed the articles of the agreement, as wel for payment of the money, as for the conſignation of the aboue mentioned townes, where-in were found ſundry difficulties: whereuppon the Emperor did not there-in ſhew him-ſelfe well-diſpoſed nor reſolute, although by his ſpeech he ſought to haue all men to beleeue the contrary.

The Venetians oppoſe themſelues againſt the Lord Lautrecs propoſition to goe to Rome and to leaue the State of Milan.

But the Venetians did wholy diſlike of Lautrecs propoſition; not that they ſtood leſſe affected to the Popes enlargement then did the King, but becauſe they thought the enterpriſe of Rome leſſe profitable for the common cauſe then that of Milan, as it had beene debated before his comming, and afterwards confirmed by himſelfe, that there was at the ſame time great hope of beeing able to conquer Pauia and Milan, where there were weake Garriſons, and that Antonio de Leua, who by his dilligence and ſkill, more then by force, did gouerne that State, lay greeuouſly ſicke, and was vnable to prouide remedies: that loſing this opportunity the affaires of the league would euer afterwards decline, in regard of the huge number of Lancequenets that were ready to come down from the County of Tiroll, into Lombardy, But by taking Milan from them, which was their only retreat, and hauing neither cauallery nor victualls, they would be enforced to change their mindes, and to tarry at home in their houſes: that in the meane ſpace it would giue time and leiſure to tenne thouſand Almaines, payd by the King of England, to come to the campe of the league, and afterwards they might with thoſe forces march to Rome, and driue the enemies before them, aſſuring, together with the Churches State, the libertye of all Italy.

Pauia is taken by Lautrec.

The Lord of Lautrec inclining to their requeſt, determined to march towards Pauia, before which with great ſpeed he went and encamped (the releeſe which Antonio de Leua ſent, not beeing able to enter it) the which being battered for the ſpace of foure daies, and a great part of the wall beaten downe, the ſoldiors making ther approches, did enter it by the breach. The Citty was ſackt, and the French for eight daies together vſed all ſorts of cruelty vpon the inhabitants, who had vanted that they had beene the vanquiſhers of the French King, becauſe that King Francis was taken priſoner lying at the ſeege of the ſame Citty.

The Genowais at the ſame time being afflicted with ſundry loſſes and calamities, and cheefely with famine, ſent Ambaſſadors to the Lord Lautrec for to capitulate. The Citties Duke, whoſe name was Antonio Adorni, retired him-ſelfe into the Caſtellet, and the tumult being appeaſed by Phillip Doria, who was priſoner there, the Citty returned vnder the Kings obedience, who appointed Theodorio Triuulcio gouernor thereof: and the Venetians, becauſe they would not leaue their Captaines vnrecompenced, who had valiantly behaued themſelues in the reduction of Genoa, they encreaſed to Cæſar Fregoſa the conduct of other thirty men at armes, and doubled his pay; they did like-wiſe acknowledge the valour and proweſſe of Guy Nalda, Auguſtin Cluſone, Haniball Fregoſa, Cæſar Martinenga, and diuers others whoſe valour did greatly apeare in that action.

Genoa reduced vnder the Kings obedience.

The buſineſſe of Genoa being ended, and Iohn Mora, the Prouidator of the Venetians nauall army being come with ſixteene Galleis to Liuorne, where hee found Doria who tarried for him, with ſixteene Gallies, they reſolued together to giue in vpon the Iſle of Sardinia, hoping eaſily to winne it, and that it would bee very commodious for them, for the conqueſt of Sicily; but this enterprize proued infortunate, for the fleete being come neere to the Iſland, and hauing taken certaine Sea townes, it hapned, as it went from one place to another, that it was aſſailed by a furious tempeſt, which did ſcatter it into ſundry places, certaine Venetian Gallies beeing a long time beaten in it, did at laſt arriue ſafely at Liuorne. The reſt after-wards hauing runne the ſame fortune, came to Corſica, whether the French Gallies had already eſcaped, (two excepted) which were broken vpon the rockes of Sardinia. And not being able at that time to enterprize any thing at Sea, by reaſon that winter approched, Iohn Mora retired with his Gallies to Corfou: Petro Lande was at the ſame time Generall of the Venetians nauall army, who was commanded to ſcoure the Seas neere to the Iſlands, and places of their dominions, to aſſure and comfort their ſubiects, and that ſayling into Sicily hee ſhould take all the ſhips that were fould to bee loden with corne, and ſend them to Venice where was great ſcarcity of victualls.

The French and Venetian fleet are ſcatered by tempeſt.

But the Generall hauing for the aſſurance of the Seas ſent Auguſtine de Mulla the Prouidator with two light Gallies, to ſcoure on the one ſide, and Antonio Marcello with foure Baſtard Gallies whereof hee was Captaine on the other, it fell out that Marcello beeing come to Candy into the Hauen of La Suda, had intelligence that a Turkiſh Gally was to paſſe neere vnto the Iſland; he ſupoſing that it was Cortugoll, a famous Pirate, who not long before in the ſame Seas, had taken and ſpoyled a Venetian ſhippe, and then burnt it, killing all the Martiners and paſſengers that were in it, did ſpeedily come forth of the Hauen, and beeing deſirous to reuenge that iniury eame on a ſodaine to aſſaile it, the which hee tooke, and then retired with his owne and this Gally to La Bicorna: Where the Gallies ryding with their Poopes towards the land, hee deſcried within a while after ſeauen Turkiſh Galleis to paſſe along one after another, which belonged to the Moore of Alexandria, (as the ſame did

did which he had taken) Marcello remaining firme in that place, without any feare at all was amazed when he ſaw himſelfe aſſailed on the ſodaine by the Barbarian, who hauing re-aſſembled his owne, did furiouſly aſſault him, where-vpon Marcello was enforced to eſcape by flight; the like did his fellowes, who not departing ſo ſoone as he, but one alone eſcaped, the other two being taken were carried to Alexandria.

The Turke being affiſted by Marcello had his ſpeedy reuenge.

The Venetian Captaine beeing to yeeld an account for this deed, the Auogares of the Republick were commanded to take notice thereof, and for this purpoſe he was ſent for from the army as a priſoner; but greefe by the way killed him. Soliman being aduertized of the indiſcretion of the Captaine, and of the Senates good will, not like a barbarous Prince, vſing curteſie, and liberality towards the Senate, ſent back their Galleies which were taken, being loden with ſalt-peeter, which they greatly needed, and beſtowed them vpon the Venetians as his guift. For this cauſe and for diuers other ſignes of friendſhip, the Senate thought good to ſend an expreſſe Ambaſſade to him to giue him thankes in the common-wealths name for all his curteſies and demonſtrations of Frendſhip towards it, and to continew and encreaſe that good will in him.

Marcello dieth by the way for greefe.

Solimans liberality to the Venetians

Thomas Contaren was choſen for this purpoſe, vnto whom were giuen diuers rich garments and other preſents of great value to preſent to the Baſchas of the Port, and cheefely to Ibraim, who for the friendſhip and affection which the great Turke did beare vnto him, was at the ſame time in great credit and reputation.

Whilſt theſe thinges were done in the Leuant, the Lord of Lautrec returning to his former deſeignes, at ſuch time as all men expected, that following the courſe of his victory he would haue marched towards Milan to beſeege it, he turned another way, and hauing with his army paſſed the Po, he marched towards Placentia, intending, (as he ſaid) to lay by all other enterprizes, and to thinke on nothing, but how to ſette the Pope at liberty. All men wondred at this ſodaine change, ſeeing the faire occaſion which was offered, if he had continued to giue an end vnto the warre of Lombardy by taking the Citty of Milan.

Lautrec leueth Milan and marcheth towards Rome.

It was not knowne whether Lautrec was mooued thereunto, rather by ſome particular affection, or for ſome intereſt of his King, then for any care he had of the Popes liberty. It is certaine that in his heart he did beare a ſecret grudge to the Venetians, and Francis Sforza, for their oppoſitions concerning the matter of Alexandria. Theſe ſuſpitions were confirmed by his manner of proceeding, who ſpeedily departing, with ſuch ill prouiſion as hee had, forth of the ſtate of the Dutchy of Milan, did afterwards purſue his iourney very ſlowly, and for that after hee had ioyned him-ſelfe with the Almaine foote-men, vpon the expecting of whome hee had at the firſt excuſed his delay, he remained at Parma without doing any thing.

What mooued the Lord Lautrec to change his determination.

The Army of the league, had no better ſucceſſe, who beeing lodged neere to Montefiaſcone did ſpend the time vnprofitably, notwithſtanding that the weakneſſe of the enemies army did ſufficiently affoord them meanes to execute ſomme enterprize. This gaue occaſion to the Venetians to ſuſpect, that the Duke of Vrbin, for his owne perticular intereſt, did not proceed with ſuch fidelity as he ought, therefore they placed guardes ouer his wife and children who lay at that time at Murana. The Duke of Vrbin hauing intelligence that the Venetians did diſtruſt him, ſent Horacio Florida, oue of his Gentlemen to Venice, to procure leaue for him to come thither, that he might iuſtifie himſelfe and yeeld an account of his actions.

The Venetians do ſuſpect the Duke of Vrbin.

The Senate, either for that they were better informed, or elſe beeing very deſirous to fitte them-ſelues vnto time and neceſſity, would not permit him to depart from the army, but hauing remoued the guards from his wife and children made a ſhew that they were well ſatisfied and contented with his ſeruice to the Republike.

And perceauing after-wards that they could not alter the Lord of Lautrecs reſolution, they placed their forces which they had in Lombardy, which were fifteene thouſand foote in garriſon in ſundry places, for the gard of thoſe townes which they had recouered in the ſtate of Milan, and gaue to the ſaid Lord Lautrec fifteene hundred light horſe for the enterprize of Rome.

All the care and meanes to keepe the conquered townes in the Dutchy of Milan, fell vpon the ſignory, Francis Sforza being not able to doe it, who of himſelfe could not entertaine the ordinary Gariſons, not-with-ſtanding that he was obliged by the treaty of agreement, to ſend forces into the field to reſiſt the attempts of Antonio de Leua: beſides this, the Venetians feare to loſe their owne, did incite them therevnto, who ſtood in doubt like-wiſe that the warre would light on their owne ſtate, hauing intelligence of the great forces which were leuied in Tiroll, and in other places neere adioyning, with the great preparations of victualls and other munitions which was made at Trent to ſend into Italy. By meane whereof, the Senate imagining that it behooued them to encreaſe their army, to the number of twenty thouſand foote, and to make a very great prouiſion to maintayne, in a manner, an other very difficult and dangerous warre, ſent to entreat the King of England, that in ſo great a neceſſity hee would bee pleaſed to releeue the Common-wealth, by contributing a part of the payment of the army, where-with they were to conſerue and maintaine the liberty of Italy, whereof hee had ſo often ſaid that hee would bee the Protector.

What moued the Venetians to eat the chardge of the warre in Lombardy.

But the King of England, continuing that which hee had at other times ſpoken, that hee would beginne to make warre on the Emperor in Flanders, and by that meanes enforcing him to diuert his forces elſe-where, hee might free Italy from that danger, made a ſhew, that for the common good of them all, hee himſelfe was to make greate preparations, and neceſſary prouiſions for ſuch a deſeigne. In regard whereof, the Signory, being conſtrained alone to vndergoe all the charges of the warre, was faine to haue recourſe to extraordinary meanes, the publike treaſure beeing in a manner exhauſted, by reaſon of the continuall warres.

A colorable excuſe of the King of England to the Venetians request.

Among all theſe ſtirres and great warlike preparations, the treaty of peace was not altogether broken of, the Emperor making ſhew to deſire it, both with the French King and the Venetians: where-vpon ſundry practizes were ſet on foote to that end. The Demands of the moſt Chriſtian King, and the Venetians, were in efect theſe, that the Emperor ſhould reſtore to the French King his children; That hee ſhould ſet the Pope at liberty, giue ouer all that which hee held from the Church, re-eſtabliſh Francis Sforza in the ſtate of Milan, and withdraw his forces forth of Lombardy and from Rome.

The French king and Venetians demands

The Emperor did not altogether reiect theſe demands, neither yet would wholy accept of them, but in ſeeking, not without difficulty, to make ſome certaine reſolution, hee demanded of the Venetians a great ſumme of mony, holding by that meanes the treaty in ſuſpence, being deſirous to make vſe of time, and to behaue him-ſelfe according to the euent of the affaires of Italy, and the new ſtirres which his brothers preparations would procure: hoping in the meane time ſtill to bee able, with better aduantage, to conclude an agreement with the French King alone, determining to exclude al the other Confederates, and to appropriat vnto him-ſelfe the Dutchy of Milan.

What was the Emperors meaning concerning peace.

This was eaſily diſcerned by his owne words, perſiſting euer in all motions of agreement, that he would haue Francis Sforzas cauſe debated and cenſured by Iudges there-vnto appoynted, and that in the meane time the Citty of Milan, and the whole ſtate ſhould bee kept and garded in his name, and by his owne owne Garriſons, his cheefe ayme tending wholy to become abſolute maiſter thereof, hauing firſt broken all the forces of the Confederates. Where vpon all theſe motions of peace being laid aſide, warre was againe denounced to him by the Confederates: who hoping therein to make good vſe of the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantua, in regard of the neere neighbour-hood of their ſtates, both the one and the other were ſounded, and it was at laſt concluded with the Duke of Ferrara, that hee ſhould bee receiued into the league, on condition to ſend to the Confederates army, two hundred men at armes, paid by him-ſelfe, and monethly to contribute, for the ſpace of ſixe moneths, tenne thouſand Ducats toward the payment of the infantery: and on the other ſide, the Confederates promiſed to take him and his State like-wiſe into their protection and ſafegard, where-vpon within a while after a great and Magnificent Pallace was reſtored to him which was his owne in Venice.

An accord made with the Duke of Ferrara.

As concerning the agreement with the Marquis, there was greater difficulty in the concluſion thereof, becauſe he craued to bee made Generall of the League in the abſence of the Lord of Lautrec: wherevnto the Venetians would not conſent, for the reſpect they did beare to the Duke of Vrbin. But in the end, Ieronimo Zene, Gouernor of Verona, being ſent by the Senates commandement vnto Mantua, to end that buſineſſe, hee did conclude it without the aboue-mentioned condition, the Confederates taking the perſon of the Marquis, and his State into their protection.

The Marquis of Mantua, ioyned to the league.

Now the Emperor perceiuing that he was to deale with ſo many enemies, determined firſt of all to publiſh the iuſtice of his cauſe, and by that meanes to draw away the King of England from them, and for this purpoſe hee reſolued to ſet the Pope at liberty, for which hee ſent an ample commiſſion to the Viceroy, and to D. Hugo de Moncada, (who being newly deceaſſed,) the Viceroy did execute it, the Pope making ouer to the Emperor, according to the agreement, Oſtia, Ciuitauecchia, and Ciuito Caſtellane, and paying likewiſe, (but more commodiouſly) the ſumme of mony promiſed, and promiſing in ſpeciall, not to haue any dealing in the affaires of Naples nor Milan againſt the Emperor.

The Emperor commaudeth that the Pope ſhould be enlarged.

The Confederates reſoluing to make warre both by ſea and land, in the beginning of the yeare 1528. prepared great forces for to paſſe into the Kingdome of Naples, as it had beene determined according to the deſire and intention of the French King, not-with-ſtanding that they were well aſſured, that the Imperiall army, at their departure from Rome, would take their iournie into Naples. But the Confederates thinking it a matter of great importance, to draw the Pope into the Confederacy, were in great hope thereof, becauſe that his Holineſſe hauing aduertized the French King and the Venetians of the paſſed agreement, and his owne liberty, entreated them to excuſe him, if neceſſity had enforced him ſo to doe, confeſſing that he was greatly bound to the Princes of the League, and to haue receiued a very rigorous and cruell entertainment of the Imperialls.

The Pope complaineth of the imperialis dealings.

So ſoone as the Venetians vnderſtood that the Pope was ſet at liberty, and that he was newly gonne to Oruietta, they ſpeedily ſent Lodouico Piſani the Prouidator to his Holineſſe, to lament with him, in the Common-wealths name, for his paſſed fortunes, and to acquaint him with the great greefe that the Signory had conceiued thereat, and with what care they had labored his enlargement, whereof they were now wonderfull ioyfull, to ſee that to bee effected which they had ſo much deſired. That the Republike had willingly imployed all her forces and meanes, beene at great charge and expence to entertaine an army in Tuſcany, at the ſame time as it behoued it to haue an other in Lombardy: had not refuſed to expoſe it ſelfe to all dangers for the conſeruation of the Sea Apoſtolike, and for the particular profit of his Holyneſſe Perſon, as it was yet ſtill ready to doe, and to reuenge the notorious iniuries done vnto him; that the Kings of France and England, the Florentines, the Duke of Milan and the Venetians were of the same mind, not to leaue such an Insolency vnpunished: how that cursed nation had incurred the wrath of God and men, that they did not doubt but that Iustice and Innocency would preuaile, and that his Holinesse being restored to his former state, all matters would redound to his honour and glory. And that therefore all the Confederats did greatly desire and likewise hope that his Holinesse to releeue their sinceere and entire intention with his authority, would confirme the Confederacy as Cheefe thereof, by newly ratifieing, that which before had beene agreed vpon by them, seeing that the first agreement ought to be of more force, then the latter, as beeing concluded by himselfe in quallity of Pope, and with his pure and freewill, and this latter being extorted by force and violence, as from a prisoner that was desirous of his liberty.

The Venetians Ambaſſage to the Pope.

The French Kings Ambassador to the Pope.

The French King caused the same congratulation to be made to him by the Lord of Longueuall his Ambassador whom he sent to Rome, to testifie the great desire he euer had to constraine the Emperor by force to doe that which at last he had done, and that the practizes of peace betwixt the Emperor and him, had beene to none other end but to amuze him and make him cold in the preparations for warre, and not with an intention to conclude any thing with him, helping himselfe with the same cunning, wherewith he had sundry times practized in his behalfe.

These Ambassadors were very pleasing to the Pope, and by him attentiuely heard, whereupon, he gaue thankes to the King and the Venetians, with demonstration of great loue towards them, saying, that for his deliuerance, he felt himselfe no lesse bound to the French King and the Venetians then if he had beene freed by their armes: but yet neuertheless all this was without any resolution, for vpon their entreaty that he would confederate himselfe with the rest, he beganne to make them sundry answers: at one time putting them in hope presently to doe it, at another, excusing himselfe, that hauing nether men, money, nor authority, it would not greatly profit them if he should declare himselfe, and yet neuertheles it might hurt him, because it would giue an occasion to the Imperialls to molest him in sundry places: besides his Pontificall dignity, the condition of the times and the greeuous and sharpe miseries that he had sustained, did very much incite him to a neutrality, and to become a fit Instrument to treat with the French King, and the other Christian Princes concerning an vniuersall peace and quiet: and that therefore he would no more commit himselfe to the hazards of warre.

The Popes excuse because he would not enter into any new confederacy.

It may be that beeing carried away by the Emperors faire promises, (who with his owne hand wrote a gentle and courteous letter to him, how that he would hence foreward follow his councell and commit vnto him the whole negotiation of the peace) he might speake thus, or else that which is most likely and which was afterwards discouered, he was content to forget all the wrong which he had receiued by his imprisonment to haue better means to reuenge the iniuries done to himselfe and his house by the Florentines.

VVhat the Popes Intention was.

His intent then was with sundry excuses to couer this desire of his: for being discouered, it would haue bred such a distrust in the Lord of Lautrec, as it would easily haue caused him to alter his purpose from passing on any farther in the enterprize of Naples which was a thing the Pope desired, to the end that the Lancequenets might be enforced to depart from Rome, who mutening often-times among themselues would not get them thence, demanding new paiments of money.

The Lord of Lautrec beeing ignorant of the Popes deseigne, and vpon the assurance of his ayd and fauor, did in the meane time pursue the enterprise of Naples, albeit it was against the opinion and consent of the Venetians who by reason reaſon of that new leauy of Lanſequenets for the enemies, could haue wiſhed that hee might not goe ſo farre off, to the end they might the better and with more conueniency be releeued.

Lautrec then, being reſolute in his opinion, tooke his way thorow Romagnia and La Marca, thinking it to be beſt and moſt conuenient for the commodity of victuals, and for the carriage of the ordnance, determining to enter into the Realme of Naples by the way of Otronte, which diuideth the Churches State from the Kingdome of Naples, thorow which at one time were gonne before, the Venetian troupes, diuided into two bands, in the firſt were Valerio Vrſino and the Prouidator Piſani: and in the other, followed Camillo Vrſino and Petro Peſare. Theſe being gonne before, ſeized on Ciuitella, and afterwards on Sulmona, and on diuers others in Abruzzo, which yeelded voluntarily. But the whole troupes did afterwards meet altogether neere to Saint Fermo, to the number of thirty thouſand foot, and great numbers of Cauallery, as well men at armes as light-horſe, a preparation without all doubt ſuffitient for any enterprize whatſoeuer, the Lord Lautrec hauing taken the longeſt way into Puglia by the ſea ſide, in regard of the difficulty to carry the ordnance, if in thoſe mountainous places hee ſhould haue met with any encombrance of the enemies.

Lautrec marcheth towards Naples.

The Prince of Orange and the Marquis of Guaſto beeing greatly mooued for the daunger, wherevnto they perceiued the affaires of Naples to be brought, did not without great difficulty draw away their troupes from Rome, which was greatly furthered by the ſumme of twenty thouſand Ducats which the Pope gaue to the Imperiall captaines, vnder collour of ſome old claimes, whereof they gaue ſome pay to the Lanſequenets, who more then the reſt ſeemed moſt loath to depart. But the number of their whole army did not amount to aboue foureteene thouſand, and yet ſo ſore weakened, as well by the contagious ſickneſſe which was in Rome, as for that many ſouldiers were disbanded and gonne home to their country loden with ſpoile.

The number of the Imperial army.

But the Pope by this meanes being freed of that which did moſt preſſe him, and for the which he had till then kept himſelfe a looſe from the confederates, ſo ſoone as theſe enemies troupes were departed from Rome, hee ſent the Archbiſhop Sipontyne to Venice, to demand of the Senate that it ſhould forthwith render vnto him the Cities of Ceruia and Rauenna: and on the other ſide he diſpatched the Biſhop of Piſtoya into France to excuſe him to the King (whom till then hee had entertained with ſundry hopes that he would declare himſelfe for the league) for that he could not according to his deſire make a new confederacy, becauſe that wanting both money and forces, his declaration would nothing profit the Confederates; that all he could doe was to treat of peace, and for that purpoſe he had giuen commiſſion to the ſaid Biſhop to goe to the Emperour, to exhort him with vehement ſpeeches thervnto, mixing neuertheleſſe with that diſcourſe, ſome complaint againſt the Venetians, for that they had poſſeſſed and did ſtill detaine certaine of the Churches lands.

The Popes demands to the Venetians.

The Popes excuſes to the French King.

The Popes demand was much diſpleaſing to the Senate, not ſo much for the matter in queſtion, as becauſe it was made in an vnſeaſonable time, perceiuing very well that the Pope ſought onely ſome occaſion to breake off from them, as alſo for that it was a matter vnreaſonable raſhly to yeeld vp theſe townes, in ſo diſodered a time, and in which the Imperials did ſtill hold many townes of the Churches State: yet neuertheleſſe ſundry were of opinion that it was not good to breake with the Pope for any occaſion whatſoeuer, but that they ought by all meanes to gratifie him, and for the reſt to depend on his promiſe and good will, repoſing ſo much truſt in him, as that he would not forſake them.

This buſineſſe being debated in the Senate, Dominico Treuiſan, Procurator of Saint Marke, a man of great reputation for his long experience and knowledge in affaires of importance, declared by ſound and pregnant reaſons: how that it was

was best to obserue the Pope, and to render those Cities which he demanded: On the contrary, Lodouico Mocenigo Knight, one of the chiefe Senators, and who had beene of opinion to send backe the Nuncio with a refusall of his demand, rose vp, and hauing propounded the inconueniences which might redound to the Signory, by surrendring, in so miserable a season, those Cities which the Pope craued, the Senators grew to be diuided, some of them inclyning to one side and some to an other. But at last they resolued to answere the Pope, That the Senate had euer beene very desirous of peace, which might be for the good and safety of the Commonweal.h, and particularly to the glory and aduancement of the Church, and that therefore it would willingly embrace any kinde of agreement, but that it behoued them first to consult together to moderate the other difficulties, and that for the same end they would shortly send an expresse Ambassadour to treate in his presence of the businesse propounded by the Archbishop *Siponti*ne, and of all other matters, to let him know their sincere and entire loue towards him.

Sundry opinions of the Senate concerning the Popes demand.

The Senates answere to the Pope.

According to this answere, they on a sodaine appointed *Gaspar*o Contaren their Ambassadour for Rome: but the Pope being displeased therewith, shewed himselfe more sharpe and earnest in his demaund; wherevpon the Lord Lautrec hauing sent to his Holinesse the Count Guydo Rangone, and the Knight Casall, to vse all meanes they could to appease him, they did not only loose their labour, but he told them besides that if those Cities were not surrendred to him, in stead of declaring himselfe for the league (wherevnto they did dayly solicite him) hee would vnite himselfe with the Imperialls, causing his Nuncio to say as much to the King: and indeed he declared by euident signes that he inclined therevnto, hauing expresly sent a Nuncio into Spaine to treat with the Emperor, al-be-it he affirmed, that hee had giuen him commission but to treat of an vniuersall peace, wherevnto if the Emperour should refuse to harken, that he should denounce warre, as the other Confederates had done.

During all these practizes, the Imperiall captaines, who were already passed into the Kingdome of Naples, beganne to be of different opinions: For the Marquis of Guasto on the one side councelled them to march whither the Lord Lautrec lay with his army, to trie if they could draw him to the fight, this he did for diuers occasions which mooued him to hazard the whole, on the vncertaine euent of a battaile.

Sundry opinions of the Imperial captaines.

First, because that the Confederates were diuided amongst themselues (their infantery being greater then Lautrecs) for that the people of the Kingdome did dayly rise in the behalfe of the French, the difficulty of receiuing any money from the Emperour, and the mutines which vpon that occasion the Almaine foot-men made, in regard whereof it being to bee feared that the entire losse of that State would ensue, he thought it much more proffitable to hazard all on the euent of battaile, wherein lay as great hope of good successe as of danger: and the French army being broken, al the townes, which they had taken, would returne vnder their obedience, and the Kingdome of Naples might thereby bee assured.

Others maintained the contrary, saying, That the safest way for them was to lodge in some place strong by sytuation, and commodious for victuals, from whence the enemies could not easily driue them, where they might obserue and narrowly marke the behauior of the army of the league, and according therevnto to order their owne enterprizes: and if that they should perceiue the enemies to encrease in prosperous successe, then to take vpon them the defense of the City of Naples, because that vpon the conseruation or losse of the same did wholy depend the successe of that warre: That they had receiued newes how that the Prince of Melphi, and Fabricio Maramani were onwards on their way, with great forces for their relieue, & that their army being therewith strengthened, they needed no more to feare the enemies attempts, but should be able to breake

all

all their deſeignes. That it was the part of him that had charge to defend a State enuaded by a mighty army, to temporize, becauſe that time doth very often bring with it great and vnlooked for commodities: that without all doubt there were diſorders in the enemies army, and by ſo much the greater, by how much the intereſts of the Confederates were different: that there was nothing which could leſſe be gouerned by diſcretion and good councell, then the ſucceſſe of battailes: that there was none ſo ſafe and ready a way to victory, nor any thing more worthy the reputation of a great captaine, then to entertaine the enemie with ſundry cunnings, and conſume him by little and little, with time and diſcommodity, the which vndoubtedly might happen to the French campe: That they needed not likewiſe to feare, but that the Neapolitans would prouide money for the neceſſary payment of the Lanſequenets, till ſuch time as the pay from Spaine ſhould arriue.

The Imperials embrace the opinion of Alarcon.

This opinion beeing accompanied with the authory of Alarçon who did conſtantly maintaine it, was receiued for the beſt, wherevpon they reſolued to paſſe forward, with an eaſie march, euer lodging in ſtronge and ſafe places, and in this manner to enter into the Terra di Lauor, to come neere to the City of Naples. But the Imperials beeing retired into Troy to make prouiſion of victuals and to enquire after the enemy, Lautrec (as the French are more hardy and reſolute) embraced that deſeigne which the enemy had quited, and determined to ſeeke them out and to offer them battaile, mooued chiefly therevnto (as hee ſaid afterwards) for feare leaſt his army ſhould on a ſodaine diſſolue it ſelfe and depriue him of the fruite of other fortunate ſucceſſes till then obtained, for want of pay.

Lautrec reſoluеth to fight with the enemy.

For, payment being to come from France, he perceiued that the King did openly ſhew himſelfe to be weary of ſo great expences, and his officers to be negligent in appointing neceſſary prouiſions: hee had beſides great hope to winne the victory, the Marquis of Saluſſes being ioyned with him, and daylie expecting the Venetian and Florentine troupes, conſiſting of very choice footmen.

On the contrary, notwithſtanding that the number of ſouldiers in the Imperiall campe was not inferiour to the French, their valour neuertheleſſe was much diminiſhed, as well by the great ſickneſſe, as by the diſorder and exceſſe which they had for the ſpace of many monthes committed, whereby their bodies and mindes being become weake and effeminate, had in a manner loſt all their vſuall brauery: and beſides, thoſe ſouldiers beeing wont to liue at pleaſure, with an extraordinary liberty, did no more obſerue as they ought martiall diſcipline. Moreouer, Lautrec was much ſtronger then the enemy in cauallery and prouiſion of ordnance, whereby it ſeemeth that he did not without cauſe perſwade himſelfe to obtaine the victory, and to conquer that whole State.

The Imperiall army hauing intelligence that Lautrec approached, came forth of Troy, and hauing poſſeſt a little hill which riſed towards the plaine, did their encampe and fortifie it ſelfe. Lautrec beeing come neere therevnto, placed his ſouldiers in order of battaile, determining (notwithſtanding that the Venetian and Florentine troupes were not arriued) to fight with them and to offer battaile, defying and prouoking them by his ordnance which plaied vpon their campe. But the Imperials receiuing ſmall hurt by the ſhot, in regard of the ſytuation of the place wherein they were, and reſoluing not to fight, keeping themſelues within their rampiers and fortifications, ſent forth onely ſome light-horſe and a few Harguebuziers to skirmiſh with the French, who marching ſtill forward came and lodged hard by the enemies campe, which they did indanger by their artillery, thoſe that were come forth to skirmiſh not beeing able to hinder Lautrec from comming forwards, wherevpon the enemies determined to diſlodge, and to goe and encampe on the farther ſide of Troy towards Nocera: where hauing within a while after intelligence that Horacio Baillone with the Florentine troupes was come to the campe of the league, and that Camillo Vrſino and Lautrec defieth and prouoketh the Imperial army to battaile.

The Imperials retire towards Naples.

and the Prouidator Pisani, would arriue there the morrow after, they resolued to depart forth of Abruzzo, and to march directly towards Naples, according to their first desseigne; chiefly to defend that City as the principall of the whole State.

The Lord Lautrec being out of hope to enforce the enemies to fight, who had already so openly refused it, conuerted all his desseignes to make himselfe Master of the country, and not to leaue any enemy towne behinde him, before that he would march to Naples. Wherevpon hauing intelligence that the Prince of Melfi, had entred Melfi with great numbers of souldiers, he sent Pedro of Nauarre thither with his Gascon companies, and Baillone with the blacke bands and two Cannons, who hauing battered it, they tooke and sacked it.

The confederates take Melfi.

Ascoli, Barletta, Trani, and diuers other townes, yeeld to the confederates.

At the same time the Prouidator Pisani with two thousand Venetian foot-men tooke the towne of Ascoli, and then he came and ioyned with Lautrec, vnto whom were yeelded Barletta, Trany and diuers others townes neere adioyning, some of them being mooued therevnto by the feare of the disaster of Melfi, and others by a particular affection which they did beare to the French, being weary of the Spanish gouernment, so as there was no other towne in all Puglia that held for the Emperour but only Manfredonia. Wherevpon Lautrec hauing left for the besseeging of that City and for the gard of those that he had conquered, the Venetian troupes, which were in all two thousand foot-men, an hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horse, he marched in great speed with the residue of the army towards Naples, all places thorow which he passed, yeelding vnto him.

Lautrec marcheth with his army towards Naples.

Being come to Casoria, three miles from Naples vpon the high way to Auersa, hee determined to encampe there, as the onely meanes to make himselfe Master thereof, and for that purpose caused his army to march directly towards the City, betwixt Pogio Royall and Saint Martins Mount, the companies extending themselues within halfe a mile of Naples, and the Lord Lautrec in person was Lautrec encampeth within two miles of Naples.

gonne somewhat farther then Pogio royall, to the Duke of Montalto his Farme, where he fortified himselfe.

At the same time, the Venetians nauall army hauing beene refreshed and restored at Corfou, after the losse that it susteined by tempest neere to the Isle of Sardinia, was come along the coast of Puglia, being sixteene Gallies in number, vnder the conduct of Iohn Mora the Prouidator, because that Petro Landi Generall of the Venetian gallies was gonne into Candy, to appease certaine troubles of the country men in the streight of La Canea.

Six Cities appointed to the Venetians by the agreement of the league.

Now by the agreement and conuention of the league, sixe cities of Puglia were appointed to the Signory of Venice, namely, Ottranto, Brundusium, Monopoli, Poulignane, Mola, and Trani, which it had in times past enioyed, and therefore the Venetians hauing, besides the Gallies, diuers other armed vessels, did with greater courage pursue the conquest of those townes, being assured, besides their owne strength, of the loue and good will of the Inhabitants, who did infinitely wish for them, wherevpon so soone as the army approched, Monopoli and Trani yeelded to them, the rest making shew to doe the like, so soone as occasion should be offered.

Monopoli and Trani yeelded to the Venetians.

But the Lord Lautrec hauing solicited the Venetian captaines to come and ioyne their gallies with Philippine Doria at the seege of Naples, they were enforced to giue ouer their enterprize, they being enioyned to follow his commandements: for Philippin Doria was come before Naples with eight gallies onely, to keepe victuals from entring into the City by sea, but fearing least the besseeged sallying forth vpon him, he might be defeated, in regard he had no greater forces, the arriuall of the Venetian gallies would assure him and more straightly shut in those of the City.

At this stay stood the affaires of the Kingdom of Naples whilest the Venetians were were elſewhere buſied with alarmes, becauſe that Henry Duke of Brunſwich, after a great report of his comming, being ſolicited by the Emperour and his brother Ferdinand to paſſe into Italy, had entred Lombardy to diuert the Confederates forces from the enterprize of the Realme of Naples, the which being reduced to great extremity, hee could not ſo ſpeedily releeue as by this meanes, The Duke of Brunſwich then being come to Trent, he entred Lombardy by the Veronois territory, leading along with him about twelue thouſand foot-men, ſaying that he would ioyne with Antonio de Leua, who was already come forth into the field with eight thouſand foot-men, that they two beeing ioyned together might goe and aſſaile the Cities belonging to the State of Venice, againſt whom Brunſwich had denounced warre, and had with a vaine and rediculous propoſition challenged Andre Gritti Duke of Venice to a ſingle fight, who was a man of foureſcore yeeres of age.

The Duke of Brunſwich commeth into Italy with great forces.

A vaine and rediculous challenge.

The Venetians, reſoluing to defend themſelues, concluded to raiſe twelue thouſand foot-men, amongſt whom were foure thouſand Swiſſes, vnto whom they ſpeedily ſent money into Swiſſerland, and intreated the French King by his authority to fauour that leauy: they had beſides, great numbers of light-horſe from Greece and Dalmatia: then they recalled the Duke of Vrbin from the Marches of Ancona, and commanded him to viſit all their townes and fortes of moſt importance, to prouide them of ſtrong garriſons, and to take order for whatſoeuer hee ſhould thinke neceſſary for their ſeruice, ſafety, and defenſe: they appointed afterwards, diuers Gentlemen, to command their principall cities. Ieronimo Diede was ſent to Treuiſo with an hundred and fifty footmen, Pedro Sagreda with like number to Padua, to Verona went Zachary Doria, Philippo Correrio, Aleſſandro Donato, Ambroſio Contaren, Ioſepho Badoario, Lorenzo Sanuto, Auguſtino Canall, and Almoré Barbaro, each of them with fiue and twenty ſouldiers with them to looke to the gates and other important places of the city.

In the meane time, vpon theſe newes great warlike preparations were made in France to ſend into Italy, of whom the Count of Saint Pol was made Generall, who was of the houſe of Bourbon, to the end to follow the Duke of Brunſwich, if hee ſhould paſſe on into the Realme of Naples, if not, to make warre on the Dutchy of Milan, together with the companies of the Venetians & thoſe of Francis Sforza. But all theſe preparations did little auaile by reaſon of their late comming. For the Duke of Brunſwich beeing followed with his owne forces determined to aſſaile certaine cities belonging to the Venetians, being the rather mooued therevnto, becauſe that at his arriuall, Peſcara, Reuotella, and certaine other townes vpon the Lake of La Garda, had yeelded to him. The Duke of Vrbin, who had put himſelfe into Verona, hauing ſtill an eye vpon Brunſwich, did preuent his deſeignes, and went ſodainely to Breſſia, where hee ſtrengthened the Garriſon, then from thence hee went to Bergamo, into which hee cauſed great numbers of the people of thoſe Vallies to enter, who were very faithfull and truſty to the Venetians, and with a wonderfull celerity, hee cauſed the city to bee encompaſſed with great trenches, making it thereby defenſible, then, giuing very many trauerſes and moleſtations to the enemies, by cutting off victuals and many other commodities from them, the Duke of Brunſwich deſpayring of beeing able to execute any notable enterprize, after that hee had (according to their barbarous cuſtome) ſpoiled the country, and burned ſundry faire buildings to leaue ſome memory of himſelfe behinde, hee departed without any other great exploit forth of the Venetian State, and came vpon that of Milan, where he met with Antonio de Leua, who vpon report of his comming had paſſed ouer the Riuer Adda to ioyne with him, that they might afterwards execute ſome great enterprize, and hauing repaſſed the Adda, they went and encamped before Lauda, forth of which the Duke of Milan was newly newly departed, beeing aduertized of the enemies comming, and was come to Breſſia, by the conſent of the Senate, hauing left a ſuffitient number of ſouldiers in Lauda, with Iohn Paul Sforza, his naturall brother, to command there, who being aſſailed by the enemies, did valliantly receiue and repulſe them.

The Venetians preparations againſt the Duke of Brunſwich.

The Duke of Brunſwich beeing ioyned with Antonio de Leua doth come and beſeege Lauda.

By meanes whereof, Brunſwick finding himſelf without means to entertain ſuch an army any long time, and beeing fruſtrate of his hope to returne home laden with glory and ſpoile, not determyning to go on any farther towards Naples, (as at the beginning hee had purpoſed, hee tooke his iourney towards the Lake of Coma, to returne into Germany: hee was purſued at the heeles by the Count Gaiazzo and Mercurio Bue, who comming forth of Bergamo gaue in vpon his rereward.

Brunſwich returneth into Germany.

The report of the Lanſequenets departure did greatly afflict the beſeeged Neapolitans, looſing thereby all hope of ſuccours, on whom it ſeemed that their whole ſafety did depend: becauſe that not long before they had with bad ſucceſſe aſſailed the Gallies of Phillipine Doria, ſuppoſing to open to themſelues the paſſage by ſea, ſeeing that by land was wholly ſhut from them, Lautrec hauing taken Pozzuolo and the places neere adioyning, by which great abundance of victualls came to Naples; which was the cauſe that before the Venetians Gallies arriued, they were deſirous to tempt fortune, and to free themſelues of the ſtumbling block by ſea, by breaking Phillippine Doria, who with the Gallies lay in the Gulph of Salerno.

Pozzuolo taken by Lautrec.

They manned ſixe Gallies, foure Fuſts, and two Brigantines, with a thouſand Spaniſh Harquebuziers of the choiſeſt and moſt valliant of the army, with whom went along Don Hugo the Viceroy, and almoſt all the chiefe captaines and men of authority. To theſe veſſels were added diuers fiſher-boates, to amaze the enemies a farre off, by the ſhew of a greater number of veſſels. All theſe Lords beeing ioyfully embarked, as if they had beene going to a triumph, came to the Iſle of Capri: from thence, leauing the Cape of Minerua, on their left hand, they came into the maine ſea and ſent two Gallies before; who were commanded, that ſo ſoone as they ſhould come neere the enemies, to make ſhew of flight, to the end to draw them forth to fight at ſea, hoping to take them with eaſe: But the matter fell out otherwiſe, for Phillipine Doria beeing aduertized the day before by truſty ſpies of the enemies determination, had with great ſpeed and ſecrecy drawne three hundred Harquebuziers from Lautrec, then ſo ſoone as hee diſcouered the enemies fleet a farre off, making towards it, he was at the firſt ſomewhat doubtfull, in regard of the great number of veſſels that hee diſcouered, but beeing ſoone freed of that ſcruple, when he perceiued that there were but ſixe veſſels onely; hee cauſed three gallies of his owne to keepe aloofe, as though they had ment to flie, to the end that by returning, with a very faire winde, they might giue in vpon the enemies broad ſides, and himſelfe with fiue Gallies went forward to meet them, who were commanded to diſcharge their ordnance vpon him, to take away, by the ſmoake, both his ſight and aime: but Phillippin beeing quicker then they, gaue fire to a very great Baſilisk in his owne Galley, which ſtrooke the Admirall Galley wherein the Viceroy was, who with diuers others were therewith ſlaine, then hee diſcharged all his other ſhot, which did hurt and kill diuers.

An enterprize of the Spaniards againſt the Gallies of Philippin Doria.

A policy of the enemies.

The enemies ſhot on the other ſide ſlue ſome, but not very many: then comming neere to one an other, they beganne with Harquebuzes and other weapons a very fierce fight, which laſted along while, till ſuch time as the three firſt Gallies, which ſeemed to flie towardes the maine ſea, returning vpon the enemies, ſtrooke the Admirall Galley vpon the broade ſide, and ſunke two others, two were taken by Doria, and two others, which had beene ſore beaten, committed themſelues to flight, perceiuing that the enemies were victorious.

The Imperials are defeated at ſea.

There

There dyed at this incounter of cheefe Commanders, Don Hugo the Viceroy, and Cæſar Fieramoſca, with more then a thouſand men of the ordinary companies: there were taken priſoners, the Marquis of Guaſto, Aſcanio Colonna, the Prince of Salerno, Santa Cruz, Camillo Colonna, Gobba Serenon, and diuerſe other Captaines and Gentlemen; whereby the Citty of Naples was bereft of her beſt and braueſt defendants. The number of the dead, & of the priſoners.

During theſe exploits at ſea, Petro Lande, Generall of the Venetians ſea-army, arriued before Naples with twenty Galleys, who came from Puglia, where hee had taken the ſixe Citties belonging to the Venetians. His arriuall did greatly profit the French, and annoy the enemies, becauſe that hauing left ſixe Galleys at Gayetta, and as many at Cumes: hee with the reſidue, ſcowred all places neere to Naples, did ſhutte the ſea from the beſieged, ſuffering nothing to enter into the Citty, and ſtopt their paſſage, who were come foorth of the Towne to runne vp and downe along the Sea ſide, who durſt not returne for feare of the ſhotte of the Venetian Galleis, he did beſide ſeaze on diuers places where their mills ſtood, whither thoſe of the Citty did vſe to ſend their corne to be ground, whereby they were enforced to vſe hand-mills, or to eate their graine beeing vn-grownd, which was diſtributed vnto them foorth of the munition. The great commodity which the arriuall of the Generall of the Venetian Galleys brought to the confederates.

Beſides, it did greatly ſerue for the ſafe and more eaſie bringing of victualls to the Army, which came from ſea, whereof there was great ſcarcity, as well by reaſon of the great nomber of vnprofitable eaters that were there, as of the great dearth which was then generally ouer all Italy, and likewiſe in regard of the ſmall care of the Captaines.

At the ſame time, the Lord of Barbezieuz, being come from France to Sauona with money for to pay the Army, and hauing ſent it by ſea into the kingdome, great difficulties were made for the bringing it to the Campe: the Lord Lautrec ſendeth forces to the ſea-ſide to receiue the money, but the Gallies beeing not able to come to land, by reaſon of the working of the Sea, the Marquis of Saluſſes returned the day following with his Lances, and a ſtrong band of Gaſcons, Suiſſes, Lanſquenets, and of the black-bands: Wherevpon at their returne they mette with the Imperialls, who were come foorth of Naples in great troopes to aſſaile them, and to take away the money, who were valiantly repulſed by Valerio Vrſino with the Venetian troopes, and by Hugo de Pepoli Captaine of the Florentines, to their great loſſe and hurt, but Hugo de Pepoli hauing too farre purſued the runne-awayes, was within an Harquebuze ſhotte of the Battaillon of the black-bands taken priſoner by the Imperiall horſe-men. The Lord of Barbezieux commeth to Sauona. A fierce incounter of thoſe of the league and the Imperialls.

Hithervnto had the affaires of the league proſpered, with hope of giuing a ſpeedy end to the warre, by the conqueſt of the Realme of Naples: but within a while after, euident ſignes began to appeare, not of the declination of their good fortune, but of their entire ruine, fortune in a manner declaring that ſhee could no longer fauour the affaires of the French in Italy. For the Armie was afflicted with diuerſe ſodaine diſeaſes, ſundry occaſions occurring, as firſt of all, the celeſtiall influence, which the ſame yeare had in diuerſe places cauſed contagious ſickneſſe: next, their aboade there in the moneth of Auguſt, when as the Soldiors liuing careleſly, did greedily and in aboundance eate of all manner of fruites: but that which did moſt hurt them, was the waters, which beeing for diuerſe moneths turned foorth of their ordinary channells, and courſes, had well neere drowned the whole Counttey round about, and infected the ayre. The afflictions of the Army of the league before Naples.

The Lord Lautrec being greatly troubled by theſe difficulties, & either enforced to continue the ſiege with theſe diſcomodities, or elſe to enlarge his troopes farther of, was councelled by all the Captaines, to ſend the ſoldiers into the territories neere at hand, and by ſeparating them in that manner, to take from the diſeaſe, which was already become contagious, the cauſe of any greater progreſſion, and giue meanes to the diſeaſed to heale and to looke to themſelues. But that which did moſt of all torment the Lord Lautrec, was, for that hee perceiued the victory, which hee had almoſt obtained, to be ſnacht foorth of his hands, and that by enlarging his troopes, hee knew very well that the Imperialls, who had great numbers of horſe to ſend abroad, and finding no reſiſtance at all, would haue meanes to prouide for all their diſcommodities. Hee vnderſtood dayly how that Simon Roman, whom hee had ſent into Calabria, had fortunate ſucceſſe, that all thoſe people hauing a particular inclination to the French, did yeeld vnto him: that the townes and Hauens of Puglia, were in the hands of the Venetians: that Abruzzo was from the beginning at the deuotion of the French: that the Spaniards were already in a manner driuen forth of the whole kingdome: and yet neuertheleſſe, that all theſe happy conqueſts would turne to nothing, if by temporiſing they ſhould giue any relaxation to thoſe of Naples, who were already reduced to great extremity, and loſe the occaſion of taking that Citty, whereon depended, the good or bad ſucceſſe of that enterpriſe.

The great ſorrow of the Lord Lautrec.

Beſides, hee was aſhamed to ſee the Spaniards, who were afflicted with greeuous diſeaſes and diſcommodities, ſhould conſtantly beare them, without enduring any ſpeech of yeelding; whereas the French at the firſt touch of aduerſe fortune did ſtrike ſayle, and ſeemed to bee ouer-come by the vanquiſhed. Hauing afterwards receiued a farre leſſe ſumme of money out of France then hee expected, or was needfull for the paiment of the Army, hee diſpaired of beeing able any longer to entertaine it. But that which did moſt of all torment him was, to ſee himſelfe to bee conſtrained to enforce his owne nature, beeing not wont willingly to heare nor eſteeme an other mans opinion, and leaſt of all to giue ouer a reſolution which hee had once taken: Wherevpon notwithſtanding that occaſion was dayly offered to change his minde, and to fitte himſelfe to time, yet for all that hee would neuer conſent to diſcampe, nor ſuffer any man to depart thence, vntill that extreame neceſſitie enforced him to doe that which reaſon might haue perſwaded him to; becauſe that meane ſoldiers alone did not dayly dye, but the very cheefe of the Army, and among others, Lodouico Piſani, and Petro Peſare the Venetian Prouidators, and the Earle of Vandemont within a while after: diuerſe beeing ſtricken with the contagion, retired to Gayetta and to other places.

The Lord Lautrecs nature.

Great ſickneſs in the French Campe.

In the meane time, a new accident did more trouble him then all the reſt, and cauſed him wholy to deſpaire of any fortunate enterpriſe, which was, the determination of Andrè Doria, who beeing male-content with the French, had forſaken the Kings ſeruice, and entred into the Emperours pay. The cauſe thereof was attributed, as well by himſelfe as by others, to diuerſe ſubiects, and chiefly to a diſdaine which hee conceiued in his minde, becauſe that the King did not eſteeme of him according to his merrits, not granting vnto him the office of Admirall, which was then vacant, and giuen to the Lord of Barbezieuz: That the King would not ſatisfie his iuſt requeſt, to yeeld vnto the Genowais the accuſtomed ſoueraignty of Sauona.

André Doria reuolteth from the Kings ſeruice.

The cauſe of André Doria his reuolt.

Sundry ſignes appearing of this diſcontent, the Pope had ſome ſuſpition thereof; Wherevpon hee aduertiſed the King of it, perſwading him to make more deere account of ſuch a man then hee had done, who was able to doe much for the furtherance of the ſeruice of the league, and not to ſuffer him to depart mal-content with ſuch forces, to the Emperors ſeruice. But the French King ſuſpecting at the ſame time all the Popes actions, his councell could nothing preuaile with him. Yet neuertheleſſe finding it to bee true afterwards, and perceiued

perceiuing the matter to be of importance, knowing no meanes how to preuent it, or elſe beeing peraduenture willing to be freed from ſuch expence, he councelled the Pope to giue him entertainement, in regard of his great deſire to ſerue the Church, rather then to ſuffer him to go to the Emperors ſide. The Pope ſeeming to be deſirous of it, and yet not willing to diſpleaſe the Emperor, excuſed himſelfe by reaſon of his owne ſmall meanes, adding that ſo ſoone as by the Kings helpe hee ſhould recouer Rauenna and Ceruia, hee might then more freely, be at greater expence.

The Popes anſwer to the King, concerning the entertainment of Andrew Doria.

Doria in the meane time without longer diſſembling that which he had determined to do, ſent one of his Gentlemen to the Emperor, in whoſe Court the Articles of agreement betwixt them were reſolued on: which were, The Liberty of Genoa vnder the Emperors protection: The Subiection of Sauona to the Genouois, and the entring of the ſaid Doria into the Emperors pay with twelue Gallei:, and a yeerely pention of threeſcore thouſand Ducats.

Articles of agreement betwixt the Emperor, and Doria.

This reuolt of Doria did greatly hinder the Confederates, and mightily preiudice the enterpriſe of Naples, becauſe that the Venetian Gallies, remaining alone, were enforced to retire their Rowers or Gally-ſlaues, which wrought in the trenches, to looke to the buſineſſe at Sea: and the Admirall Barbizieux on the other ſide beeing come from France with ſixteene Gallies, tarried at Sauona, (not daring to ſaile to Naples) where he landed a great part of the footmen to ſend them for the gard of Genoa, albeit they were appointed to goe to the ſuccour of the Lord Lautrec: ſo as from this accident proceeded all the miſhap of the ſeege of Naples, and the loſſe of the leagues reputation.

The great diſcomodity which the reuolt of Doria did procure.

As alſo becauſe that the Lord Lautrec could neuer make vſe in time of thoſe forces which Rance de Cera had at Ciuitauechia, by reaſon of the Popes different and vncertaine reſolutions, who (beeing ſolicited by the Lord Lautrec with huge and in a manner menacing ſpeeches, and afterwards with gentle and courteous language to declare himſelfe, promiſing to reſtore thoſe of his family in Florence) would neuer make any certaine reſolution; euer ſaying, that as one zealous of the common good, peace was his chiefe ayme and obiect, the which, with more ſafety, and leſſe ſuſpition to treat of, he would remaine neuter, although the contrary appeared by ſundry apparent ſignes, that he did more encline to the Emperors ſide, then to any other: but becauſe he would not vrge the Lord Lautrec to prooue an open enemy, he anſwered, that to declare himſelfe, would nothing auaile them, in regard (as he had oftentimes ſaid) that he had not ſufficient forces for any great enterprize.

That the moſt Chriſtian King might neuertheleſſe make vſe of the Churches State, and of the commodities thereof, without renewing vpon that occaſion the Confederacy. By this meanes the French forces were daily weakned, and diſorders and diſcommodities encreaſed in the Campe: and the beſeeged on the contrary, were in hope of good ſucceſſe.

The aid from France, which had been ſo often craued of the King, and which his maieſty had ſo often promiſed, did not arriue, and the troopes raiſed in the Kingdome of Naples were not ſufficient to fill vp the army, nor to ſupply the want of the military factions, the Campe ſtanding in need of all thinges, becauſe that the enemies Cauallery ſallying forth many times to ſurpriſe the victualls, which was brought to the Campe from the neighbor townes, the Army in ſteed of beſeeging was little better then beſeeged.

The wants of the army before Naples.

In a word diſcomodities did ſo encreaſe, as there was noe one company in the whole army, but had great ſtore of ſicke perſons in it. The ſoldiers were become lazie and idle, and throwing their armes from them, obſerued no order, diſcipline, nor any obedience, eſpecially the men at armes who beeing disbanded without their Captaines leaue, did forſake the Campe: the Captaines likewiſe, were partly abſent farre from thence, to cauſe themſelues to be healed, and to recouer their healths, and part of them alſo liued vnprofitably in the Campe, beeing weake and ill diſpoſed of their perſons. But among others, the Lord Lautrec was very ſick, beeing ſpent as well in minde as body, for the great danger that hee perceiued the Armie to bee in: Wherevpon, his owne fault encreaſing the ſorrow and griefe of his heart, made him for the ſpace of many dayes vnable to giue order for the affaires of the warre.

Diſorders in the army

The Lord Lautrec greeuouſly ſick.

But beeing come to himſelfe, and a little recouering his ſpirits, hee began to viſit the whole Campe, to preſerue order and the Guardes, fearing to be aſſailed. Matters did dayly decline, ſo as by reaſon of the ſtrength of the Imperials horſemen, there was no more commerce betwixt the Campe and the Galleys, and thoſe of the Campe, becauſe they had no horſe, could not runne forth of the wayes: But that which did aggrauate all the diſorders, was the death of the Lord Lautrec, vpon whoſe valour and authoritie all matters relyed, and it was certainly thought, that his diſeaſe encreaſed by too much trauaile.

The Lord Lautrecs death.

The end of the ſeuenth Booke of the fifth Decade.

The Contents of the eight Booke of the fifth Decade.

HE Marquis of Saluſſes beeing made Generall of the French Army, by the death of the Lord Lautrec, raiſeth his Campe, from before Naples, and retireth to Auerſa. The taking of Auerſa, and the Marquis by the Imperialls. The Citty of Genoa reuolteth from the French King, by the meanes of Andre Doria. The determination of the Confederates to goe and beſiege Milan is broken. Pauia is taken by the Confederates. Nouara with diuerſe other places, are yeelded to the Confederates. The Lord of Saint Paul his iourney to recouer Genoa, is in vaine. The Caſtle of Genoa is raced by the people. The Genowais fill vp the Hauen of Sauona with grauell. The Pope demandeth the Citties of Rauenna and Ceruia of the Venetians. A treaty of peace held at Rome, but to no purpoſe. The great warlike preparations of the Archduke of Auſtria to ſend into Italy to the Emperors ayde. The Venetians lend money to the French, and to the Duke of Milan. The French King reſolueth to make warre vpon the Emperour on the frontiers of Spaine. The Venetians ſolicit the King to come in perſon into Italy. The Imperialls recouer Aquila and Matricia. The Marquis of Guaſto beſiegeth Monopoli. Brunduſium is yeelded to the Venetians. An allarme beeing giuen to the Duke of Vrbin, hee runneth to the defence of his owne ſtate. An enterview of the French and Venetian Armies. The defeate and taking of the Count Saint Paul by Antonio de Leua. The Duke of Vrbins retreate to Caſſan. The Duke of Vrbin defeateth a part of the enemies at the paſſage of a Riuer. Antonio de Leua retireth to Milan. The Venetian Senate are male-con- tent with the King. The Emperors arriuall at Genoa. The Emperors great forces in Italy. The Florentines send Ambassadors to the Emperor. The great warlike preparations of the Venetians. Peace concluded at Cambray betwixt the Emperor and the King. The King is very earnest with the Emperor to make an accord with the Venetians. And lastly, a new confederacie betwixt the Venetians and Francis Sforza Duke of Milan.

The Eight Booke of the fifth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

The Marquis of Salusses Generall of the Army after Lautrecs death

HE Lord Lautrec beeing dead, Michaele Antonio Marquis of Salusses a couragious Lord, and well beloued of the Soldiors, tooke vpon him the charge of the Armie in a manner ruined, who beeing councelled to discampe, not so much for the present state of their affaires, as for the danger and necessity that pressed him, gathered together those forces that remained, and retired with small losse to Auersa, expecting succours from Rance de Cera. Vpon his retreate, the Imperialls comming foorth of Naples, gaue in vpon his rereward: but by reason of his good order, the losse was not great. Certaine French troopes were broken, and Pedro of Nauarre beeing taken prisoner was ledde to Naples, where hee dyed.

The Marquis with the Army retireth to Aversa.

The Marquis beeing come to Auersa, was neerely pursued by the Imperialls, and beeing not able to make defence, hee sent the Count Guy de Rangone to parley with the Prince of Orange the Imperialls Generall, with whom it was capitulated, That the Marquis should quit Auersa, with the Castle, Artillery, and Munition: That as well himselfe, as the other Captaines, should remaine prisoners, except the Count Guy, who treated particularly for himselfe: That the Marquis should doe his vtmost to cause the French and Venetians to render vp the kingdome, with diuerse other conuentions which made this French Armie miserable, who of vanquishers became vanquished, to the Venetians great greefe and discontent, whose fortune for the kingdome of Naples, was, to depend on that of the French their friends and confederates.

The Capitulation about the yelding of Auersa

Genoa by meanes of Andrè Doria reuolteth from the King to the Emperor.

This losse was accompanied by a very greeuous and most preiudicious accident to the league, and of great importance to the French, which caused great strife betwixt them: for, the plague beeing very great in Genoa, and by reason thereof in a manner forsaken by all men, and likewise by the soldiers, and namely by by Theodore Triuulcio the Gouernor, who retired into the Caſtle: Anare Doria making vſe of this occaſion, came neere to the Citty with certaine Galleys, and thoſe few ſoldiors that hee had, which did not exceed the number of fiue hundred footmen, not hoping neuertheleſſe to performe that which hee afterward did, and entring it without any great reſiſtance, by the fauour of the people, who were greatly delighted with the name of liberty, which hee promiſed them, became maiſter thereof, where on a ſodaine hee changed the manner of gouernment vnder the Emperors protection.

It lay not in Triuulcio his power to hinder it, who beeing come to the Citty but a while before, had much to doe to eſcape into the Caſtle, hoping, (as hee ſaid) vpon the arriuall of ſuccours to bee able at his pleaſure to enter the Citty, and to reduce it to the Kings deuotion, as it had beene in time before. For hee ſent to the Lord Saint Paul, to ſend him ſpeedily three thouſand footmen, by whoſe ayde hee hoped to recouer the Citty: Wherevpon the Captaines of the Confederates did determine, That the Lord of Montilan ſhould turne to Genoa with three thouſand Lanſquenets and Suiſſes, which came from France, and were already arriued at Alexandria.

The Venetians great preparations.

The Senate in the meane time, did not ceaſe to giue order for neceſſary prouiſions, for the ſpeedy renewing of the warre in Lombardy, and for that they would not giue Antonio de Leua any time to make preparations they ſolicited one an other ſpeedily to take armes: they ſent the Secretary André Roſſi into France, to haſten the forces which were to come into Italy: they did beſides, command the Duke of Vrbin to receiue all thoſe Almaines into their pay, which had forſaken the Duke of Brunſwich, hauing more-ouer ſent to Iuree, money for the payment of fiue thouſand Lanſquenets: ſo as the Republick had in a very ſhort ſpace, more then tenne thouſand footmen of ſundry nations, Almaines, Suiſſes, and Italians, fifteene hundred light horſe, and eight hundred men at armes, with which forces, and thoſe of the French beeing ioyned together, they did hope to driue Antonio de Leua forth of Italy.

The number of the Venetians forces.

The Duke of Vrbins determination.

The Duke of Vrbins chiefe purpoſe was to place a ſtrong Garriſon in Lauda, beeing a place of great importance for the Duke of Milan, and for the Venetians likewiſe, becauſe the keeping thereof did greatly auaile for the aſſurance of Bergamo and Crema: and then to paſſe the Po ſo ſoone as the French ſuccours ſhould beginne to come vpon the Alpes to ioyne with the French, and afterwards to goe and aſſaile Antonio de Leua. For the ſupplyes of fiue thouſand footmen, and fiue hundred Lances, & as many light horſe, which were expected, beeing arriued, the Duke of Vrbin talked with the Count Saint Paul at Monticella on the Po, to conſult in what manner they were to proceed in this warre for the profit and commodity of the common cauſe.

The propoſition of the Count Saint Paul.

The Duke of Vrbin by the aduiſe of the Senate, propounded to employ their whole forces in Lombardy, to driue Antonio de Leua, if it were poſſible, foorth of the State of Milan, to the end to cut off all meanes from the Imperialls of ſending downe any ayde by that way into Italy forth of Germany, and of hauing victuals from thence for the feeding of their Armie as they were wont. The Lord Saint Paul, and the other French Captaines were of a contrary opinion, ſaying, That it was not fitte to abandon the affaires of Naples, vnleſſe they ſhould looſe their honour and reputation both with the people and the enemies, propounding beſides, how important a matter it was to keepe the Imperialls buſied in the kingdome of Naples, who by that meanes could not come and ioyne with Antonio de Leua.

In this diuerſitie of opinions, a way was found to content both parties: namely, not altogether to abandon the affaires of Naples, and yet to make the cheefe attempts in Lombardy.

For,

For, the Confederates, poſſeſſing diuerſe and ſundry places in Puglia, where the people did greatly affect the French and Venetians; it was reſolued to re-enforce thoſe troops that they had there, to trie if they could aduance the buſineſſe any better, and keepe the Imperiall Captaines amuzed and in feare: and for that purpoſe the Senate wrote to the Prouidator of their nauall Armie, that he ſhould carry his veſſels into Puglia, and to place ſtrong garriſons in thoſe townes which held for the Signory and for the French, and then to beſiege the Caſtle of Brunduſium: and that on the other ſide, the Prince of Melfi, and Rance de Cera, ſhould paſſe ouer into thoſe parts with fiue thouſand footmen, whom the Venetians ſhould furniſh with veſſels for their paſſage.

The enterpriſe of Milan broken.

But as concerning Lombardy, and the ſtate of Milan, they reſolued, (the forces there beeing compleate) to goe and beſiege the citty of Milan, and to this end all the troopes beeing come as farre as Landriane, the Captaines were of an other opinion, hee that was ſent to diſcouer the Citty hauing told them, that ſuch an enterpriſe could haue no fortunate ſucceſſe: Wherevpon they determined to goe and encampe before Pauia, the which they hoped to take with eaſe, becauſe there were no more then two hundred Lanſquenets, and eight hundred Italians in it, and both the armies beeing by ſundry wayes come neere to Pauia, they encamped round about it, and hauing planted on the hither ſide of the Riuer Theſin, in the plaine on the lower ſide of the Citty, nine Cannons, they plaid in ſuch ſort vpon a baſtion neere to the Arſenall, that in a ſhort ſpace it was halfe ruined, and on the farther ſide of Theſin, three Cannons to batter, (when they ſhould goe to the aſſault,) a Flanqueer right oppoſite to the Arſenall, and vpon a little hill on the hither ſide Theſin fiue Cannons, which did batter two other baſtions, and at the foote of the hill three others which plaid vpon the wall, all which ordnance belonged to the Venetians: and that of the Lord Saint Paul ſerued for the beating downe of the fortifications.

The Confederates beſiege Pauia.

After a ſufficient battery in ſundry places, and ſo ſoone as they had drawne the water foorth of the Dikes, they went to the aſſault, where for two houres ſpace thoſe within the towne did valiantly defend it, but their number beeing too ſmall to ſuſteine ſuch an aſſault, thoſe of the league did at the laſt enter it with very ſmall loſſe, and with great honor to the Duke of Vrbin: ſeauen hundred ſouldiors of the towne were ſlaine, the reſidue eſcaped into the Caſtle with Galeas de Biraga the Citties Gouernor, and diuerſe of the inhabitants, who yeelded ſoone after vpon compoſition, the Citty was wholy ſackt, but of no great valew; in regard of the two former.

The Confederates take Pauia.

Nouara and diuerſe other townes yeeld to the Confederates.

The taking of Pauia did procure to the league great contentment and notable reputation, not onely in regarde of that Citty, but becauſe that Nouara, and diuerſe other neighbour townes did within a while after, yeeld, to the great loſſe and diſcommodity of the enemies, who from thence had aboundance of victuals for the reliefe of their Army in Milan. The Venetian Senate beeing wonderfull ioyfull of ſuch happy ſucceſſe, promiſed to it ſelfe, that it might bee able to recouer all thoſe diſaſtrous miſhaps ſuſteined before Naples, and in regard heereof it did infinitely thanke and extoll the Lord Saint Paul, intreating and exhorting him to goe forward as hee had begunne, hoping that vnder his conduct they ſhould bee able to recouer not onely the State of Milan, but the kingdome of Naples.

The newes of the loſſe of Genoa beeing in the meane time brought into France, did greatly greeue the King, who ſpeedily ſent commandement to the Lord Saint Paul, that all other Commiſſions beeing layde apart, hee ſhould march to Genoa, to attempt the reducing thereof vnder his obedience: For the three thouſand footmen appointed for the releeſe thereof not going thither, becauſe they wanted their pay, Triuulcio was in great diſtreſſe, proteſt-

proteſting that if he were not ſpeedily releeued he muſt of force yeeld himſelfe: wherby, the affaires of the league, which beganne to proſper, did afterwards fall into great difficulties: becauſe that as the commoditie of conquering Milan did preſent it ſelfe by the reputation of the taking of Pauia, and by the diſcomodity which Antonio de Leua his army endured, where for the effecting thereof it behooued all the forces to be brought together, with two Camps to aſſaile and ſhut in ſo great a Citty; they were conſtrained to giue ouer all, the Lord Saint Paul hauing bent all his thoughtes and deſeignes to releeue Genoa, wherevpon, he did not only refuſe to goe to the enterpriſe of Milan, but did ſollicite the Duke of Vrbin to goe along with him thither with the Venetian forces for the recouery of it, wherevnto the Senate would not conſent, becauſe that by ſending their forces ſo farre off, they ſhould not only looſe all the fruit of the Victory, and put the Duke of Milan into diſpaire, but expoſe the Citty of Bergamo and other townes of their owne State to great dangers.

The Lord Saint Paul leaueth Milan to go to the releef of Genoa.

Perſiſting then both the one and the other in their opinion, the French Army ſeperated it ſelfe, and paſſed ouer the Po at Stella, to march through Tuſcany to Genoa, and the Venetians Campe, by the Senates aduiſe, retired to Pauia, to fauor, with the reputation thereof, the affaires of Genoa, (it beeing in the meane time in ſafety), and to excute like-wiſe what ſo-euer occaſion would preſent.

But the enterprize of the Lord Saint Paul had no fortunate ſucceſſe, who finding Genoa to be mand with a ſtrong garriſon, and hauing in his owne army but two thouſand footmen, beeing out of hope to obtaine that which he deſired by tarrying any longer there, notwithſtanding that he had made his approaches neere to the Citty, determined to returne into Lombardy to ſpend the winter time, where by the conſent of Sforza he did put himſelfe into the Citty of Alexandria.

The lord Saint Paul his deſeignes to releeue Genoa prooueth vaine

Now Triaulcio in the meane time hauing notice of his departure, and expecting ayd from no place elſe, reſolued to yeeld the Caſtle, as he did, the which was forthwith raced to the ground by the People to take away that hinderance of their liberty.

Caſtle of Genoa raced by the People.

The Citty of Sauona like-wiſe, where-into the Lord of Monteian (ſent thither with his forces to releeue it) could not enter, returned vnder the Genowaies Gouernment, who on a ſodaine filled the hauen thereof with ſtones and grauell to make it vnſeruiceable.

The Genowaies fill the Hauen of Sauona with grauell.

The Venetians perceiuing that the French King did openly ſhew himſelfe to be diſpleaſed with them, becauſe that the Duke of Vrbin, with their forces, did not goe to the releeſe of Triaulcio, were very deſirous for his ſatiſfaction to reuiue the enterprize of Genoa, as alſo for their owne commodity, becauſe they accounted that Citty to be very conuenient for the affaires of the league, beeing as it were the only Gate of Italy through which the Spaniards might enter by Sea to moleſt them, and therfore they wiſhed that it were at the deuotion of the French King their friend, and eſpecially at that time, when the report was that the Emperor was in perſon cõming into Italy, wherevpon they ſecretly exhorted the Genowaies, to returne againe vnder the protection of the moſt Chriſtian King, as of a moſt mighty and meeke Prince: For they could not at that time execute their deſire by open force, as well for the place where they wintered, the which was very ſharpe and difficult in Winter, as for the ſmall number of their army which was much diminiſhed by ſundry accidents: and albeit they were aduertized of the great ſcarcity of victuals in Milan, how that Antonio de leua lay ſick, and his Army much weakened, all which were goodly occaſions where on to enterprize ſome great and notable exploit, they durſt not for all that in regard of the ſmalneſſe of their forces goe forth into the field to execute

The Venetian forces much diminiſhed.

any

any thing, beeing in feare likewise of the discommodities that commonly grow in winter.

The Venetians were elsewhere in great care for the townes which they possessed in Puglia, which at all times both in peace and warre were very commodious for them: they held Trani and Monopoli, and the French Barletta: the others beeing abandoned, these were kept, and yet not without great difficulty, since the route of the French Army, by the dilligence of the Prouidator Vitturi, who beeing aduertised at the siege of Manfridonia where hee lay, of the disaster before Naples, hee sent speedily by Sea a certaine number of footmen into garrison into those townes, to keepe them in their duty. Camillo Vrsino lay in Trani, and Giouanni Conrado Vrsino in Monopoli, and Rance de Cera, who was the Kings Lieutenant in the Prouince, was retired to Barletta.

The Venetians keepe the cities in Puglia.

The Venetians then beeing very carefull to keepe those places, and hoping to bee able not onely to resist the enemy, and to keepe the warre farre from their owne State, but likewise to make some progression, in regard of the enemies letts, determined to send reliefe thither, as well of victuals, and all sorts of munitions, as of Soldiors, by encreasing the Garrison with sixe hundred footmen leuyed in Dalmatia in the middest of Winter by the Prouidator Mula, who hauing brought them into Puglia, went back on a sodaine with his Galleis to Corfou, there to repaire and encrease the nauall Army, to the end afterwards to ioyne it with that of the French King, which was making ready at Marseilles, that both of them together might oppose themselues against the Imperialls sea-forces, which were reported to bee very great at Barcelona, and were comming to ioyne with those of Doria.

The Pope in the meane time continuing his former pursutes, concerning the rendring of the Cities of Rauenna and Ceruia, caused the French King to send the Vicount Turenne to Venice, to intreate them in some sort to satisfie the Pope, by yeelding vp those Cities which hee demanded. The Senate making shew of nothing more then to please the King, did represent to the Ambassador their iust titles to them, hauing receiued Rauenna of Obizzo Polente Lord thereof more then foure hundred yeares since, and that Ceruia was fallen to the Republick, by the testament of Dominico Malateste, by the payment of certaine godly Legacies, which they yeerely continued by accomplishing the Testators will.

The French Kings instance to the Venetians in the Popes behalfe.

How that if they had beene desirous to possesse Townes beelonging to other men, they would not haue refused the offers of those of Furly and of other Cities of Romagnia, who were desirous to bee vnder their obedience; they would not besides haue defended nor maintained with great cost and danger, the Citty of Bolognia, and others belonging to the Pope, nor haue kept them for him: that those Cities had beene taken at such time as the Pope had quitted the League, and that they might now for the same occasion iustly detaine them.

The Venetians answer to the Kings Ambassador.

Moreouer, that they had spent a great masse of treasure in that warre, which those Cities were not able to recompence.

That the King was to consider, how much it might import him, if those so commodious Cities should bee quitted by his friends and confederates to bee giuen to the Pope, who stood badly affected towards the Crowne of France, nay euen into the very hands of the Imperialls, seeing that it was apparent that the Pope, eyther by his owne proper motion, or through feare, did wholy depend vppon the Emperour: that hee was beside, to consider of their interest, and the wrong which would bee offered to the other Confederates, to the Florentines, and to the Duke of Ferrara, who vndoubtedly would bee greatly distasted thereby, and would coole that heate which pusheth

puſheth them foreward to the affaires of the league, and moreouer how that thoſe townes, did preſently ſerue for a bridle to containe the Pope in his dutye, ſeeing that without them, he would already haue openly ſhewed him-ſelfe, a friend to the Emperor.

The Vicount giuing place to all theſe reaſons, went to Rome to the Pope, were for to compoſe the buſineſſe, he propounded ſundry offers to his Holineſſe, namely, that thoſe townes might be enfeoffed to the Signory of Venice, with a certaine annuall acknowledgment, as diuers others belonging to the Church had beene, or that they might be ſequeſtred by the French King to diſpoſe thereof as he ſhould thinke fitte. The V. counts offers to the Pope.

Theſe propoſitions beeing made to the Senate, were neither accepted, nor wholly reiected: but calling to mynde the Republicks benifits to the Church, and what it had done for the ſeruice of Popes, they ſeemed to repoſe great truſt in his Holineſſe wiſdome, how that himſelfe might find ſome honeſt remedy for that difficulty, and in this vncertainty of buſineſſe ended the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred twenty and eight.

The begining of the yeare following did ſhew great ſignes of beeing diſpoſed to peace, and of feare likewiſe of new troubles: but the diſcontent and wearyſomneſſe of Princes cauſed the Confederates to proceed ſlowly in their prouiſions of warre: wherevpon as well by reaſon of the ſpeech of peace, as for the ſharpneſſe of the winter, all military factions ceaſed.

The Emperor ſpake openly that he deſired nothing more then an vniuerſall peace, and eſpecially to fit himſelfe to the Princes of Italy, and to theſe ends had ſent the Cardinall of Santa Cruz (for this was the Generall of the Friars title) to Rome to treat of peace, and to cauſe Hoſtia and Ciuitauechia to be ſurrendred to the Pope. The French King, who wiſhed nothing more, ſent a commiſſion to his Ambaſſadors, and the King of England ſent Ambaſſadors to Rome for the ſame purpoſe, as vnto whom it alone appertained to conclude this treaty. The Venetians did the like, by giuing ample power to Gaſparo Contaren, their Ambaſſador in the court of Rome, whereby he was inioyned to follow the aduiſe and councell of the moſt Chriſtian King, and his proper inclination to peace and to the common good of all Chriſtendome, and to giue vnto him all power and liberty to promiſe in the common-wealths name, whatſoeuer ſhould be concluded and determined in the particular conuentions: they did moreouer entreat the Pope to take vpon him the burthen of that buſineſſe, to bring it to ſuch a good end, as all men hoped for by his authority and wiſdome: promiſing that if hee ſhould procure an vniuerſal peace; in reſpect of the ſtrife betwixt the Sea Apoſtolick and the Signory, concerning the Cities of Rauenna and Ceruia, they would then ſhew their good meaning therin. The Venetians offers to the Pope, ſo that peace might be procured.

But on the other ſide, there were diuers preſumptions why they were to doubt of his intention, and whether he would ſincerely acquit himſelfe of that charge: For it was very well knowne that the French King did ſuſpect him, and that he gaue no credit to his wordes, nor did repoſe to much truſt in him, holding whatſoeuer he propounded for doubtfull and incertaine: and therfore did ſecretly exhort the Venetians to renew their forces both by ſea and land, declaring how that he was in no ſore troubled for the vnfortunate ſucceſſe before Naples, as proceeding from a certaine maleuolent fortune, and not from the want of courage of his ſoldiers, and therefore that he was more ready and deſirous then euer, to renew the warre in Italy, Secret practiſis betwixt the King and the Venetians.

The Emperor on the other ſide, albeit that he did promiſe to come into Italy to take the Imperiall Crowne, and to eſtabliſh peace there, yet neuertheleſſe the great preparations of warre that hee made, was the cauſe why men thought that hee had an other deſeigne in his minde, cleane contrary to his ſpeeches, The Emperors great preparations to come into Italy.

toge-

together with his great desire to appropriate to himselfe the State of Milan.

The Popes intention.

The Pope likewise had a great desire to recouer, not onely the territories of Romagnia, but Modena and Regio, and likewise to haue satisfaction for the wrongs and greeuances which hee had receiued of the Florentines, with a will to restore his Nephewes, of the house of Medicis, into Florence to their antient greatnesse and dignity: the which was very hard to bee accomplished without comming to strokes.

The Venetians intention.

The Venetians in like manner, albeit that for many yeares they had beene intangled in warre, hauing spent therein more then fiue Millions of gold, and that therefore it behooued them to desire peace, to giue some rest and relaxation of their fore-passed troubles, as well to themselues as to their subiects, did neuertheless, with great resolution, constantly persist in the protection and defence of the Duke of Milan, meaning not to suffer, in any sort, that his State should fall into the Emperors hands: but as concerning the restitution of the Cities of Puglia and Romagnia, they were ready to hearken vnto it, prouided that an vniuersall peace, for the generall good and quiet of all Italy, might bee well established.

Such at the same time were the deseignes and propositions of the confederate Princes, and such likewise were all mens discourses, concerning eyther warre or peace. The report, in the meane time, of the Emperors comming into Italy, did dayly increase, and for that end sundry great preparations were made at Barcelona, and the Archduke Ferdinand beeing come to Ispruch, gathered together certaine summes of money, to pay the footmen which hee leuyed, to send them into Italy to his brothers ayde, giuing out, that it was to assaile the Venetians State.

André Doria, neuertheless, at the same time, and some other of the Imperialls, propounded to the Senate sundry meanes of agreement, saying, That the Emperor did beare a great and singular affection towards their Republick, offering themselues freely (if so it pleased the Republike) to mediate a peace betwixt them. The Venetians behaued themselues modestly in these offers and treaties, fearing that it was some cunning to separate them by these iealousies from the friendship and allyance of the French, their ancient allyes and confederates: So as for all that they did not discontinue their preparations for warre, the Senate meaning to depend on none but it selfe, and that whensoeuer a treaty of peace should bee, it should bee made by them beeing armed with the honor of the Commonwealth.

By this time, the terme of the Duke of Vrbins seruice was expired: They confirmed hm againe for three yeares more in the same office of Generall of their Army, and augmented his pay with tenne thousand Ducats euery yeare, and his company of men at armes to the number of two hundred, and besides, they gaue to Guy Vbaldo his sonne, a company of fifty men at armes in their Army, and a yeerely pension of a thousand Ducats. They afterwards made Iano Fregosa Generall Superintendent of the affaires of warre, with good entertainment, for the acknowledgement of his valour and fidelitie, and for that they would euer haue in their army some one of authority and command, whom they might trust in the Duke of Vrbins absence, (as hee then was,) whereupon they sent for him, beeing then at Bressia, commanding him to come with speed to the Armie, to execute his charge.

The Venetians great preparations by sea and land.

Diuerse others were in like manner honoured with sundry grades of honour in their Armie. The Count Gajazzo was made Generall of the light-horse, and Antonio de Castello Captaine of the Artillery: They did afterwards, send to the Campe to the Prouidator Nani a great summe of money for the leuie of a number of new footmen to make the companies compleat. And to shew that they had likewise a care of their Sea-affaires, they made Ieronimo Pesare Generall

Generall of their Nauall army, and Aleſſandro Peſare, and Vincenzo Iuſtiniano, Prouidators commanding them to be in readineſſe to depart: they did choſe moreouer tenne captaines for the Gallies, who ſhould cauſe thoſe tenne to bee armed which at the beginning of winter had beene diſarmed, to the end that the Signory might haue aboue fifty gallies ready to ſet ſaile: and although that by the Confederacy they were bound to furniſh but ſixteene gallies, they neuertheleſſe, promiſed to adde foure more, to make vp the number of twenty for the leagues ſeruice, of which Ieronimo Contaren was made Generall.

Now the Duke of Milan, and the Lord Saint Paul beeing ſolicited by them to augment the number of their infantery (as they were bound to doe) and they excuſing themſelues, for want of money, the Senate reſolued to lend the French twelue thouſand Ducats, and eight thouſand to the Duke of Milan. But aboue all things they entreated the French King not to abandon the Confederates at ſuch a time, in regard of the great affection which they had euer borne to him, and for their conſtancy in purſuing the warre. Without this ſupply, the Lord Saint Paul would haue beene brought to an extreame want of men, money, and all other things neceſſarie for the maintenance of the warre in Italy, for there was not any preparation at all ſeene to bee made beyond the mounts for the execution of any enterprize, which the King had often promiſed ſhould bee done, and eſpecially at that time when there was more need then euer, to ſtoppe the Emperours paſſage into Italy, by offering him great reſiſtance at his entry, or by enforcing him to looke to the defenſe of Spaine aſſailed by the way of the Pirenean mountaines (as was reſolued) which the Venetians did moſt of all purſue, thinking thereby to breake the Emperors deſeigne of comming into Italy.

The Venetians loue to the French and the Duke of Milan.

But they peceiuing that the King did rather encline to the warre of Italy, they were in great hope that at one time the warre might be renued in Lombardy and in the Realme of Naples, and before that the Emperours aide ſhould arriue, to make ſome notable progreſſion.

Vpon theſe hopes, the Senate ſent for the Duke of Vrbin to come to Venice, where, in the preſence of the Ambaſſadours of France, and the Duke of Milan, and of one of the Lord Saint Pauls Gentlemen, they might conſult and aduiſe on meanes to make warre, where in the end was concluded, before all other matters to purſue the enterprize of Milan, by ſiege rather then by aſſault, by ſurprizing all the neighbour townes and places to reduce the army of Antonio de Leua to want of victuals. And for this purpoſe it was likewiſe decreed for to haue twenty thouſand foot-men in their army, namely, about ſome eight thouſand in the French troupes, and as many in thoſe of the Venetians, two thouſand from the Duke of Milan, and two thouſand Lanſequenets which they daylie expected from Lyons, leauied already at the common charge: and as for the enterprize of Genoa, they determined for to purſue it, according vnto the aptneſſe of time, and the ſucceſſe of Lombardie.

The reſolution of the aſſembly held at Venice by the Confederats.

Now becauſe that the whole ſafety of the affaires of Italy did depend vpon the ſtopping of the Emperours comming thither, they reſolued to augment, they moſt that might bee, the French and Venetian nauall armies, and eſpecially of great veſſels, which might eaſily reſiſt that of the Emperours which was compoſed of the like, to the end that the Emperour vnderſtanding the difficulty of his iourney, might abſteine from comming.

In the meane time they had notice that the King had changed his purpoſe, meaning for to make warre on the Emperour on the hither ſide of the mounts, vpon the Confines of Spaine, as had beene before determined: at which newes the Senate beeing aſſembled to diſpatch Andre Nouagera newly newly choſen Ambaſſadour to the French King : the Senators were diuided in opinion, whether to perſwade the King to come in perſon into Italy, or to ſend his army towards the Pirenean mountaines to enuade Spaine.

The King determineth to make warre in Spaine.

The reſolution of the Venetian councel vpon the Kings comming into Italy.

The matter being debated in open councell, where Moceniga on the one ſide, a man of authority and well acquainted with affaires of State, and Mark-Antonio Cornare, a man of great vnderſtanding, on the other, being heard, diuerſly to maintaine the one and other opinion, that of Cornare preuailed, whereby they decreed to enioyne the Ambaſſador Nouagera to perſwade the King, or if he were already enclined therevnto, to incite him more, to depart forthwith and to come into Italy.

Nouagera being come into France did not faile to doe that which had beene reſolued in the councell, whereof there had beene ſundry opinions, hoping to obtaine that which he had propounded, becauſe the King had heard him with good attention, and greatly commended his councell, as determining to put it in practize: and for that purpoſe the King did meane within a while after to come into Languedoc, to reduce all the forces that were there into the next and neereſt place to Italy, whether he promiſed to goe, being followed (beſides twenty thouſand foot-men) with tenne thouſand Lanſquenets, and tenne thouſand Pioners.

The Kings anſwer and determination.

The Kings departure, being in this manner held for aſſured, the Senate reſolued that Nouagera ſhould remaine in France nere to the Lady Regent, the Kings mother, and that Sebaſtian Iuſtiniano, whom Nouagera was ſent to ſucceed, ſhould follow the King into Italy.

The Senate in the meane time did with ſpeed make all neceſſary preparations for the renuing of the warre; making account that at the latter end of Aprill, the Republikes army ſhould goe before, and beeing ioyned with that of the Lord Saint Paul, ſhould march to the enterprize of Milan, which being executed, the Emperours comming would ſeeme to be wholly broken: and by meanes of this victory, and by the helpe of the army, and the Kings preſence, they ſuppoſed to be afterwards able to take the city of Genoa with eaſe, and any other deſeigne that they pleaſed to execute,

The Venetians care to preſerue the places which they held in Puglia.

The Venetians at the ſame time were very carefull to prouide for the guarde of the places which they held in Puglia, by ſending for that purpoſe into the ſame country great numbers of foot-men, to preſerue whatſoeuer they there poſſeſſed, and to attempt to make ſome farther progreſſion, if occaſion ſhould be offered, and alſo for to keepe the Imperiall forces buſied and diuided farre from Lombardy.

This great heate of the Kings beganne by little and little without any apparent cauſe to coole, and the prouiſions for warre to goe ſlowly forward, wherevpon money was ſent very ſparingly from France to the Lord Saint Paul, who deſpayring in a manner of beeing able to entertaine the army, proteſted that hee would gette him gonne and leaue all, ſeeing that of tenne thouſand men, whom hee ought to haue, hee had ſcarce the one halfe, by reaſon that being badly paied, they left the campe in troupes. At the laſt, the Lord Chaſtillon, who had beene long expected, came to the campe, with leſſe ſtore of money then was needfull, and within a few daies after, he left the campe, and went to Venice, ſaying that hee would goe into Puglia to aſſure the troupes that were there, and to carry them a certaine ſumme of money: for which iourney, the Senate hauing ſpeedily commanded ſome veſſels to bee made ready, according vnto his requeſt, hee did daily with many excuſes, delay his departure, which gaue a ſuſpition that hee had neither money, nor any good will for to goe into Puglia, but that hee gaue out that hee would goe thither, becauſe hee would not breake off the prouiſions which the Venetians had already made.

The Lord Chaſtillon commeth to Venice and makes a ſhew that hee would goe into Puglia.

The

The King, doubting the matter, and knowing how great cauſe hee gaue them to ſuſpect, did within a while after ſend Iohn Iaquin his Ambaſſadour to Venice to ſolicite the departure of the army with the other prouiſions for war, without making any mention at all of the Kings ſo much deſired comming, which did ſo highly import them. This did greatly encreaſe the Venetians ſuſpition, and did infinitely trouble them, in regard of the daungers which threatned them from the Emperour, and alſo for that this delay did cauſe them to looſe the fruite of ſo many hopes, their army remayning vnprofitable on the ſhore of the Riuer Adda, becauſe that it was not able alone to execute the enterprize of Milan.

The Senats ſuſpition concerning the Kings comming.

The Senate neuertheleſſe did not ceaſe ſtill to arme, ſoliciting the King for that, wherewith hee cauſe leſly did preſſe them, and for this end they choſe Gaſparo Pineli Secretary to the Signory, to goe ſpeedily into France to giue the King to vnderſtand, that for their part all things were in readineſſe to renue the warre, and that there was nothing wanting but his preſence, promiſing to ſend forthwith their troupes to meet him: to the end that with greater ſafety and ſpeed they might execute ſome notable enterprize.

The Venetians ſolicite the King to come into Italy.

At the ſame time the Bandetti of the Realme of Naples came into the field in ſundry places of the Kingdome, and did extreamely preſſe the Imperials, whereby Rance de Cera did promiſe to himſelfe ſome good ſucceſſe, being ſupplied with money, and with certaine foot companies; he had by ſundry meſſengers acquainted the King therewith, who from him did repreſent vnto his Maieſty the State of the affaires, that he might obtaine the ſupplies that he craued, the which, albe it they were promiſed to be ſent with the army, were neuertheleſſe delayed from day to day, to the great preiudice of their league, by giuing time to the Imperials to renue and augment their forces: for the report of the Emperours comming had cauſed diuers Barons and people of the Kingdome to change their purpoſes, diuers of them being deſirous to inſinuate themſelues into his fauour, ſome to obtaine pardon, and others to get offices and immunities in the Realme, ſo that the Prince of Orange being gonne into Abruzzo, recouered Aquila by compoſition, by drawing forth of the city and the whole country neere adioying an hundred thouſand Ducats for the payment of his army: from thence he ſent forces to Matriça, where Camillo Parde lay in Garriſon with foure hundred foot-men, who beeing gon forth thereof a little before, promiſing to returne ſo ſoone as the Imperials ſhould approach it, the foot-men that were within it, went ouer the walls and left it, whereby the towne was yeelded.

The bandetti of Naples come into the field.

Aquila is recouered of the Imperials.

Matrica taken by them.

This notwithſtanding, the ſucceſſe of the Imperials was not ſo good in Puglia, where treaſon being ſecretly practized in Barletta, and diſcouered, Iulio of Naples, captaine of certaine foot forces, and ſome of the townesmen as authors and complices of the Rebellion were put to death.

Treaſon diſcouered in Barletta.

Beſides, the Venetians hauing drawne horſe-men forth of Greece into the ſame Prouince, they ioyned with thoſe o Simon Romano, and all of them together ſcouring the Country, did aſſure it, and kept the waies open to victuals, hauing driuen Pignatello Count of Borella forth of the whole Prouince.

Now the Marquis of Guaſto beeing come into Puglia, would not deale with Barletta, a very ſtrong and well fortified city, but went and encamped before Monopoli, with foure thouſand Spaniards, and two thouſand Italians, and lodged in a ſmall bottome couered by the mountaine, ſo as he could not be hurt with the towne ordnance, wherein lay Camillo Vrſino, Andre Gritti gouernor of the city and Iohn Vitturi the Prouidator, vnto whom Rance de Cera forthwith ſent three hundred foot-men by the Gallies.

Monopoli beſeeged by the Marquis of Guaſto.

The Marquis then cauſed a great Baſtion to bee made right ouer againſt the walles within Harguebuze ſhot, and two others vpon the ſea ſhore, on each ſide one, Then hauing battered the towne, and made a breach hee gaue an assault, where he lost aboue fiue hundred men, and great numbers of Pioners, with three peeces of ordnance that were broken, wherevpon he retired a mile and halfe further off, becauſe that the cities ordnance did him much hurt in the place where he was lodged, which cauſed the Venetians to ſally forth, and to aſſaile the baſtions that he had made, where they ſlue aboue an hundred men, and then they aſſured the Hauen by a baſtion made vpon their ſhore, oppoſite to that of the enemies.

The Marquis giueth an aſſault to the city to his leſſe.

The Marquis being newly returned before Monopoli, and hauing made two Caualiers, with two trenches, two hundred foot men ſallied forth of the towne and burned his workes. After that, the Marquis making an other approach on the right ſide of the battery, and cauſing a baſtion to be made behind, he planted the ordnance vpon it, and did beate downe three ſcore fathome of the wall, within foure fathome of the ground: but hauing intelligence, that new companies had entred the towne the ſame night, ſent by Rance de Cera, he withdrew his ordnance, and at laſt diſcamped, wherevpon being come to Conuerſa, he afterwards retired to Naples. The braue reſiſtance of Monopoli and the retreate of the Marquis, did greatly encourage the Confederates, ſo that diuers Barons and others, repenting that they had gonne to the Imperial party, ſhewed themſelues very ready for a new rebellion: the which emboldened the ſouldiers and captaines of the league, to vndertake ſome enterprize.

The Marquis retireth from before Monopoli.

This being reported to the Senate, perceiuing that their nauall army remained idle at Corfou, expecting the arriuall of the French army, they commaunded their Generall to ſaile into Puglia, where beeing arriued, he caſt ankor neere to Brunduſium, hoping, (as it came to paſſe) that thoſe of the towne, prouoked by a particular affection towards the Venetians, would forthwith yeeld. The city beeing yeelded on conditions was preſerued from ſpoile, and from all wrongs of the ſouldiers, and Iohn Franciſco Iuſtinian was made gouernour thereof, as Magiſtrate for the Signory, and preſently afterwards they beganne to batter the caſtles, the charge thereof was committed to Camillo Vrſino, who hauing in ſhort ſpace brought them to a ſtreight paſſe, could not for all that enforce them to yeeld, by reaſon of their hope, ere long to ſee the Imperiall nauy vpon that ſea.

The city of Brunduſium yeeldeth to the Venetians.

The Venetian army in the meane time did from the Cape of Otranto moleſt the whole country, to the great hurt of the Imperials: Simon Romano died at that exploite, who was a valiant and couragious perſon. The affaires ſtanding at this ſtay, the Prince of Orange knowing that the Confederates forces were not ſo meane and weake, as they could eaſily bee driuen forth of the Realme, neither yet ſo mighty as they were able to make any progreſſion of great importance, Or perhaps, becauſe that the Emperour would haue the Popes content preferred before all other matters, that hee might haue him for his friend and confederate at his comming into Italy, after that he had put ſtrong garriſons into the moſt important places, he turned with the reſidue of his forces towards Peruſa, to driue Malateſte Baillone thence, and from thence to enter into Tuſcany, to reſtore thoſe of Medicis to their country.

The Prince of Orange determineth to goe to Peruſa.

The behauiour and approaches of the Prince, did cauſe the Duke of Vrbin to ſuſpect, that he went about to enuade his State, wherevpon he departed ſodainly from the army, to goe and prouide for his owne territories: The Venetians were not well pleaſed with their Generalls departure, in ſo troubleſome a ſeaſon, as well for their owne intereſts, as for feare of the ſuſpition of the French, who by that accident, taking ſome occaſion of a feigned ſuſpition, might grow ſlow in the prouiſions for warre. Therefore the Senate determined with all ſpeed to ſend Nicolao Tepulo to him, who had beene already before appointed to go to him to the camp, to aduertize him of the new conduct, & by forcible reaſons to exhort him, in the name of the Common-wealth, to returne ſpeedily to the army army, and to induce him the more willingly thereunto, they ſent him a good ſumme of money for the payment of three thouſand foot men appointed for the guard of his State: but for that time there was no great need thereof. For the Prince of Orange hauing intelligence that the Count of Aquila, and Camillo Vrſino called Parde, hauing ioyned their forces together, were come to Canoſa, and their troupes dayly encreaſing, it was to bee feared that they would cauſe ſome commotion of conſequence, hauing changed his determination, would not at that time depart forth of the Kingdome, fearing ſome great inſurrection of the people in regard of the great extortion that was there committed, by meanes whereof the Spaniſh name was very odious to them, whereupon hee thought it fit, firſt of all to appeaſe thoſe ſtirres, and to make prouiſion of victuals, referring the execution of his former deſeigne to a more commodious ſeaſon (the which hee did) ſo that the Duke of Vrbin beeing thereby freed of his ſuſpition, did forthwith come to the army, determining for to march towardes Milan with all his troupes, the Lord Saint Paul hauing ſent him word, that hee would take the ſame way; beeing inuited thereunto by the difficulties wherein the Imperials then were, and by the fortunate ſucceſſe of the French; becauſe that notwithſtanding that two thouſand Spaniſh foot-men were arriued at Milan, whom the Genowais would not entertaine, al-be-it that they expreſly came to releeue them, diſcommodities, neuertheleſſe, by their comming were as much augmented as their forces, ſeeing that in ſo great a dearth and want of money they were to feed and pay them.

The Duke of Vrbin runneth to the defenſe of his owne State.

The Prince of Orange changeth his determination.

The Duke of Vrbin being come backe to the army determineth to beſeege Milan.

On the contrary diuers townes on the hether ſide Theſin were at the ſame time yeelded to the Lord Saint Paul, ſo as the whole country, in a manner, to his great gaine and reputation, was reduced vnder his power.

Enterview of the French & Venetian armies.

Both the armies then aduancing forwards, they met together at Saint Martins Burrow, fiue miles from Milan, where after a long conſultation, concerning the meanes how to execute that enterprize they reſolued with both the armies to encampe round about the towne, to encompaſſe and take in as much of the walles as they could, thereby to weaken the enemies defenſe by buſying them in ſundry places: But there was not deſcerned in the captaines ſuch readineſſe and ſpeed as was befitting the execution of ſuch a deſeigne, becauſe that the French ſaid, That in the Venetians campe the number of ſouldiers was farre leſſe then they ſuppoſed, and not ſo many as ought to bee, and that by ſeparating themſelues, they ſhould, beeing alone, be weake and in great daunger. The Venetians on the other ſide, declared that they better accompliſhed that whereunto they were tied then had the French, and that therefore they would ſee them encampe firſt, and they afterwards would doe the like, and vpon theſe diſtruſts one of an other they departed, their former reſolution being broken.

The two armies diſtruſt one an other.

The Lord Saint Paul marched towards Landriana, the Duke of Vrbin tooke the way towards Monce, and the Duke of Milan departed with a determination to enter into Pauia with all his forces: making account by this ſeparation, to ſcoure the waies, moleſt the country, and keepe victuals from Antonio de Leua, hoping thereby to ouerthrow him, and to obtaine at laſt their common deſire, which was, to poſſeſſe Milan and Coma, the two onely Cities of importance which held out in that whole State for the Emperour: But ſo ſoone as the French were arriued at Landriana, they ſuffered themſelues to bee carried away (as it was thought they would) with the enterprize of Genoa, beeing very vehemently ſolicited thereunto by Cæſar Fregoſa, who meaſuring matters according to his own deſire, made the euent very facile & eaſie, whereupon, they promiſed to themſelues that they would ſoone returne to their quarter, and therfore they requeſted the Duke of Vrbin in ſtaying for thē, not to ſtir from thence where he was with the Venetian forces & the Duke of Milans, for the execution of their former deſeignes, ſuffering nothing whatſoeuer in the meane time to enter into thoſe cities.

The Lord S. Paul reſolueth to execute the enterpriſe of Genoa.

Now the French army departing in this reſolution to goe to Genoa, tooke the way of Pauia, the Lord Saint Paul, ſending the ordnance before, with the waggons and the vantgard, and himſelfe ſomewhat late, followed with the battaile and the rereward. Antonio de Leua being aduertized by his ſpies, how that he ſtaied behind, farre from the vantgard, determined to follow and aſſaile him if occaſion were offered: wherevpon in the night he came forth of Milan with his ſouldiers wearing white ſhirts vpon their armor, & marching without ſound of drum in good order he met with them in the plaine, before they had any knowledge of his comming, the firſt ſquadron of the French being gonne on ſo far, as it could not in any time arriue to the reſcue of the reſt, as alſo becauſe that the Lord Saint Pauls ſelfe, did ſtay behinde, by reaſon that a peece of ordnance did ſticke faſt in the mire at the paſſage of a Riuer, where whileſt he was buſied with thoſe few men at armes that were there with him, and ſome fifteene hundred Lanſquenets vnder the command of captaine Boſſu, he found, vnlooked for, the Spaniſh ſhot at his backe, who were at the firſt brauely repulſed by men at armes, euen into the battaillons of the Almains, but there being a deepe ſtreame betwixt the French and Spaniards, their ſhot retired behind that ſtreame, where was a pace of the breadth of thirty or forty foote. The Lanſquenets on the French ſide did fight valliantly, and with them the Lord Saint Paul, who was alighted from his horſe, as were Iohn Ieronimo Caſtillon, and Claudio Rangone, captaines of two thouſand Italians, who did gallantly defend themſelues. But at the laſt the Imperials comming to the charge with a great battaillon of Almaines, the horſe-men and Lanſquenets turning their backes, the Italians did the like, and the Lord Saint Paul being remounted was taken as he would haue leaped ouer a dike, and there were taken priſoners with him, Ieronimo Caſtillone, Claudio Rangone, Lignach, Carbon, and other captains of great note.

Antonio de Leua aſſaileth the Lord Saint Paul.

The Count Guy de Rangone being gonne before with the vantgard early in the morning, as it was concluded the night before, had not any notice of the fight till he was ſafely come to Pauia: all the Lanſequenets in a manner eſcaped, and Antonio de Leua went backe with his priſoners to Milan. Thoſe that eſcaped, part of them retired themſelues to the Venetians territories, where they were kindely entertained, and others into other places. The Duke of Vrbin hauing intelligence of this defeate, forſooke his abode at Monce, where he lay, and retired to Caſſan, a place of more ſafety, for which the Senate did highly commend him: he had with him about fiue thouſand foot-men, foure hundred men at armes, and ſeuen hundred light horſe, with great ſtore of carriage. But come to Caſſan, which is a place nere to the Riuer Adda, he did then fortifie himſelfe with ſtrong Rampiers, leauing but one way open which was fenced and garded with all neceſſaries, ſuppoſing that place to be moſt commodious, to be able with eaſe to releeue, if neede were, Pauia and Lauda, to offend the enemies, and to defend the State of the Signory; and beſides, to fauour, if occaſion were offered, the enterprize of Genoa by ſea. Wherevpon thinking himſelfe to be very ſafe in that place, he would not follow the opinion of Iano Maria Fregoſa, who councelled him to retire with his army to Breſſia, for feare of any inconuenience, being not equall in forces to Antonio de Leua. He being emboldned by this victory, and more deſirous to breake the Confederate forces, had followed the Duke of Vrbin as farre as Vaury, two miles from Caſſan, which cauſed ſome doubt in the Venetians, leaſt hee would haue paſſed the Adda to haue made waſt of the Breſſan, Bergamaſque and Creman territories: But the Duke repoſed great truſt in his light Cauallery, the which ſurpaſſed that of the enemies, both in number and valour, who by ſcouring all the neighbour Countries round about, did not onelie cut off all the victualls from the Imperialls campe, but had had ſo affrighted them as none of them durſt any more come forth of the trenches: therefore the Duke remayning firme in his reſolution, to continue in that place, would not raiſe his Campe, as well in regard of his reputation, as for the victualls that were brought to him from the country, neere adioyning, which would other-wiſe haue releeued the enemies, and if hee ſhould haue retyred to the Citty, hee would haue ſpent thoſe which were appoynted for their friends.

The number of the Venetian army.

Antonio de Leua followeth the Duke of Vrbin in his retreat to Caſſan.

Now the two armies being ſo neere one to an other, they did continually goe forth to skirmiſh on both ſides, where the Imperialls were ſtill beaten. Antonio de Leua ſuppoſing to haue ſome ſatisfaction for his loſſes, by ſome other meanes, ſent Cæſar of Naples on the farther ſide of the riuer Adda, to ſcoure the Territories of Breſſia and Crema, whereof the Duke of Vrbin being aduertiſed, leauing the Count Gajazzo for the gard of the Campe, he tooke with him a good troope of ſoldiers and went and ambuſht him-ſelfe, neere to the place where he knew the enemies would paſſe the riuer, from whence, part of them being gone ouer, hee came forth vnlookt for, with great fury, vpon thoſe who ſtayed behind vpon the riuer ſhoare, ready to paſſe ouer, hauing firſt of all ſent his light Cauallery, to intercept their way, if ſo bee that they would haue fled towards their campe. But Cæſar of Naples beeing troubled with this vnlookt for accident, did ſpeedily cauſe the bridge to bee broken, fearing leaſt the Duke, for his part, would haue come ouer and fought with him, wherevpon, all thoſe that ſtayed behind, to the number of fifteene hundred, were either cut in peeces or taken priſoners by the Duke, and among others, it fell out, that a braue Spaniſh Captaine was taken by a woman of big ſtature, who in mans attire receiued pay of the Count Gajazzo, and the Count hauing, for mirths ſake, called before him on a time, the Captaine that was priſoner, ſhewing him Margueriton (for ſo the ſoldiors called her) told him that the ſame was the ſoldier that had taken him priſoner, the Spaniard looking vpon her, anſwered, that he did comfort him-ſelfe in his miſhap, for that he had beene taken by ſo braue a man, as hee ſeemed to bee, but when hee told him that it was a woman, ſhame and diſdaine did ſo ſeaze vpon him, as within few daies after he dyed with greefe.

Part of the enemies are defeated by the Duke of Vrbin.

Great valor of a woman in mans attire.

Afterwards the two armies kept them-ſelues in their quarters, for the ſpace of many daies: but the Duke of Vrbin calling the Captaines ſundrie times to councell, and propounding diuers things vnto them, did ſuffitiently manifeſt his deſire to aſſaile the enemies, and to cauſe them to diſlodge. At the laſt he reſolued to goe forth with all his forces, and to vſe meanes by cunning to come to ſtroakes with Antonio de Leua, vpon ſome aduantage: hee cauſed all the ordinance of the Campe to bee brought into one place, and then hee began to march with all the troupes, both foote and horſe, and with three peeces of ordnance, meaning to leaue them behind him, by retiring ſo ſoone as hee had begunne the skirmiſh, fayning flight both for feare and vpon neceſſity: whereby the enemies comming forward to get thoſe three peeces, ſhould bee put to rout by the ordnance of the Campe, and being ſo diſordred he would againe returne vpon them with greater violence. But this deſigne fell not out according to his expectation; becauſe that the Count Gajazzo comming forth ſooner then he ſhould, with a part of his Infantery, and beginning the skirmiſh too far off from the Campe, being not able with thoſe hee had brought with him long to ſuſtaine the enemies fury, was enforced, not-with-ſtanding that hee fought valliantly, to retyre in ſome diſorder. Wherevpon, the Duke perceuing him to bee in danger did on a ſodaine make haſt to his reskew, and gaue in with ſuch fury athwart the Imperiall Infantery, which neerely purſued the Count Gajazzo, as hee cauſed them to make a ſtand, and to turne their backes, ſtill purſuing and beating them euen into their Campe.

The Duke of Vrbins enterprize to defeate the enemie.

The enimes are beaten by the Duke of Vrbin.

Antonio de Leua loſt in this action more then fifteene hundred foote, part of them being ſlaine, and the reſt taken priſoners: where-vpon hee durſt no more after after that ſuffer his ſoldiers to ſallie forth of the Campe, nor attempt any enterprize, continuing in great feare and doubt, what hee were beſt to doe, being afflicted with ſundry cares and difficulties. For, on the one ſide, hee could tarry no longer there for want of victualls, and then hee perceiued that his aboad there could in no ſort profit him: on the other ſide, to diſlodge, and to returne to Milan, he thought it would greatly blemiſh his reputation, and that of the whole army, as if he ſhould confeſſe, that hee retired for feare, being chaced by a number of enemies, farre leſſe then him-ſelfe: That it was to no purpoſe to enter into the Venetians ſtate, but very dangerous, all their townes beeing mand with ſtrong Garriſons well fortified and on the other ſide the people of Milan, were beyond meaſure diſcontented, and in manner deſperate, by reaſon of the extortion and wrongs which they had ſuſtayned by the ſoldiers, were ready to make an inſurrection, and to alter the ſtate, calling, without controulement, for their Duke, who lay then with his troopes in Cremona, for he doubted not but that the Venetians being deſirous to ſee him inſtalled in his State, would hazard all their forces, when hope of obtayning that which they ſo much deſired ſhould bee offered them.

The doubts and feare of Antonio de Leua.

Antonio de Leua retireth to Milan.

But not-with-ſtanding all theſe reaſons, Antonio de Leua being enforced by neceſſity to diſlodge, retired to Milan. After his departure, the Duke of Vrbin was deſirous to come neerer to Monce: but the Senate hauing ſome ſuſpition that Sforza did treate of an agreement with the Emperor, which if it ſhould come to paſſe, their army would be incloſed, and all the paſſages ſhut vp from releeuing Bergamo, cauſed him to goe with the Army towards Lauda, to diſcouer the Duke of Milans intent, and to bee aſſured of him: But ſince then, the report of the Lancequenets comming, dayly encreaſing, and how they did meane to come downe thorow the Verona Territory, to ioyne them-ſelues afterward with Antonio de Leua, the Senate decreed to place all their troupes in the townes and cities of their owne ſtate: Wherevpon, the Duke of Vrbin, according to this reſolution, retired to Breſſia, with one part of the army, and the Count Gajazzo went with the reſidue to Bergamo.

The report of the Lancequenets comming cauſeth the Venetian Army to retire to the Cities.

At the ſame time as theſe things hapned, the French King tending altogether to peace, that hee might haue home his children, and the Emperor like-wiſe enclining therevnto, the Lady Marguerite, the Emperors Aunt, was by him deputed to conclude this treaty on his part, hauing for this purpoſe ſent her a large commiſſion, which was imparted to a Secretary, whome the King had to that end ſent into Flanders: Wherevpon, the King likewiſe did ſpeedily appoynt the Lady Regent his mother, with like commiſſion, which was like-wiſe communicated to the Emperors Agents. The commiſſions being viewed on both ſides, the Cittie of Cambray was appointed, where theſe two Ladies ſhould meet, and talke together, to treat of the particularities of peace.

The Citty of Cambray choſen for the treaty of peace.

The King did in no ſort aduertize the Senate of this treaty till it was very late, at ſuch time as the Lady Regent departed to the Treaty of Cambray, when the matter could be no longer diſſembled, neither did hee ſo much as communicate vnto them any particularities of the Treaty, but he onely promiſed the Ambaſſadors of the Confederates in generall, that hee would make none agreement what-ſo euer with the Emperor, without their conſent and ſatiſfaction; then ſhewing his great affection towards the Republike, hee did greatly exhort them to a generall peace, (which aſſuring them ſhould be mentioned in that diet) he entreated all the Confederats to ſend ample power and authority to their Ambaſſadors, which were at his Court, to bee preſent thereat in their names, and to conclude the peace.

The Venetian Senate are male content with the French King.

The Senate found this manner of proceeding by the King to bee very ſtrange, who wonderfull cunningly had a long time entertayned them with hope of his comming into Italy, or to ſend great forces thither both by land and ſea, and for that

that he had done neither of them, and had euer fed them with words, for feare of breaking of the treaty, yet for all that being deſirous to ſhew that they had ſtill the ſame mind, and inclination to peace, which they had before, they determined to ſend to their two Ambaſſadors Iuſtinian and Nouagera, who were at the ſame time in the french Court, commiſſion and authority to be preſent at that Treaty, and to promiſe in the Common-wealths name, what-ſo-euer ſhould bee neceſſary and conuenient for the concluſion of peace. But Nouagera falling ſicke before the arriuall of this commiſſion in France, died, to the great greeſe of his Country-men.

The Venetians giue authority to their Ambaſſadors to be preſent at the treaty of Cambray.

Now the whole burthen of this charge lay alone vpon Iuſtinian, who had particular inſtructions of the Senates meaning and reſolution: the which in effect was, That in any caſe, that which had beene agreed vpon on the three and twentith of the precedent month, might be obſerued, and likewiſe, that the ſame which had beene concluded and reſolued on before, at the Diet of Wormes, might take effect: becauſe that all the ſtrife betwixt the Republike and the houſe of Auſtria, did onely proceed from not obſeruing the precedent accords: but that aboue all other things, they would haue the ſtate of Milan to be rendered, and reſtored to Francis Sforza: of which charge and commiſſion the Venetian Ambaſſador had no great cauſe to make vſe, For not-with-ſtanding that hee had followed the Lady Regent to Cambray, hee neuer-the-leſſe remayned the moſt part of the time at Saint Quintins, certaine miles diſtant from Cambray, none of the moſt important particularities, nor trueſt articles of the treaty, being communicated vnto him.

The Venetians meaning concerning the Articles of peace.

The Senate by this meanes did doubt, that the King was deſirous to conclude an agreement for him-ſelfe alone, without any regard to their particular intreſt, nor to the other Confederates; and that as concerning that which hee had promiſed, to conclude nothing with the Emperor without them, proceeded from feare, leaſt they ſuſpecting his intent, ſhould preuent him, by making an accord with the Emperor, and hee by that meanes ſhould bee excluded from all their friendſhippes, and his accord made thereby more difficult, and with leſſe aduantage. Therefore the King had ſent the Biſhoppe of Tarbi into Italy, with commiſſion to goe to Venice, to the Duke of Milan, to Ferrara, and to Florence, to treate of matters belonging to the warres, albeit it was the leaſt part of his meaning: And within a while after Theodore Triuulcio came to Venice, where in the Kings name he required the Senate, to deliuer ouer vnto him in Depoſito, the Citties of Rauenna, and Ceruia, till ſuch time as that buſineſſe were ended, aſſuring them that hee did it to giue occaſion to the Pope to declare him-ſelfe, it being a matter of great importance to haue his fauour.

The Venetians ſuſpect the Kings carriage

Triuulcio his requeſt to the Venetians from the King.

Anſwer was made to this requeſt, that as concerning his comming, the Republike would not faile him of all aide and ſuccor, which it had before times promiſed, and to giue him a more euident proofe thereof they were content to ſend to Suza, or to Aſt, twenty thouſand Ducats, before hand towards the firſt paiment. But for the ſequeſtration of the Citties of Romagnia, an vniuerſall peace being to bee treated of at the Treaty of Cambray, that difficulty, among others, was there to bee reſolued; how the Senate ought not to conſent to that ſequeſtring, till ſuch time as it perceiued al their affaires quiet and all other contentions ſetled.

The Venetians anſwers to Triuulcio.

But in this, the Kings cunning, and ſundry ententions, beeing diſcouered, they did except, with great deuotion, the reſolution at Cambray. Therefore the Senate commanded Lodouico Faliere their Ambaſſador in England, to treate with that king, who had euer ſhewed himſelf a great friend to the Republike, to be pleaſſed, (as he had at other times bin) to take it into his protection, and to procure, that in thoſe affaires which were handled at Cambray, nothing might be concluded to the hurt and preiudice thereof, nor to the liberty of Italy, whereof, many yeares yeares before, he had to his immortall prayse, taken vpon him the defense whilest these preparations were made on all sides, the Emperour, who for all the treaty of peace had not ceassed to purlue his deseines, nor to make his preparations for his iourney into Italy came to Genoa, with many shippes and Galleis, within which were a thousand horse, and nine thousand footmen the which he causcd to be landed at Sauona, for their more easie passage into Lombardy. His deseignes for that present, could not be truly descouered, becausc he affirmed that his comming into Italy was to establish peace there, and to compose all his variances with the Potentates of Italy: yet neuertheless, he did with all speed, and from all parts assemble the greatest forces he could; Antonio de Leua came and ioyned with him with twelue thousand footmen, the Prince of Orange with seauen thousand, the Lanceque nets which had beene leuied in the connty of Tiroll to the number of tenne thousand came through the Verona territory to meet him so as all his forces being ioyned together, amounted to forty thousand footmen, beside the cauallery, which was great, the Almains being folowed by tenne thousand Bourguinian horse-men.

The Venetians recourſe to the King of England.

The Emperor arriuall an Genoa.

Nom'er of the Emperors forces in Italy

The Emperors arriuall, and with such prouision, did greatly amaze the minds of all Italy, together with the rumor that was spredde abroad, how that the accord betwixt the Emperor and the most Christian King was already concluded, the Confederates beeing not therein comprehended, notwithstanding that the King had promised the contrary: so that there was not any, but the Pope alone, which was free from this feare in all Italy, (according to the particular treaty which he had before concluded with the Emperour at Barcelona), which till then had beene kept secret), whereby he made account to make vse of the Imperiall forces for the execution of his deseignes, and cheefely to restore his nephewes into Florence, and to place them in their antient dignity and greatnesse, as had beene con cluded betwixt them.

Italy amazed at the Emperor crmming.

Therefore, the more to honor his comming, so soone as he vnderstood that he was landed at Genoa, he sent thither three of the cheefest Cardinalls of the Colledge for to congratulate his arriuall, and to accompany him euery where.

Florentines send Ambassadors to the Emperor.

The Florentines vpon these newes, whom it first of all concerned to purchase his fauor, and to be assured of his meaning, did within a while after likewise send their Ambassadors vnto him, who after the congratulation, were to excuse them for entring into confederacy against him, hauing therein beene enforced by the Popes authority and commandement, and for that they had since then continued therein by necessity: and they proceeded no farther becausc they had not any commission, especially concerning the strife betwixt the Pope and them: but the Emperor seeming to be desirous to satisfie the Pope in that which he had promised him, their Ambassador was to no purpose.

What kept the Venetians from sending Ambassadors to the Emperor

The other Potentates of Italy, did likewise send their Ambassadors to his Imperiall Maiesty, requesting his friendship and peace- The Venetians alone remaining constant in their determination, resolued to enter into no agreement with the Emperor but vpon extremity: not, but that they were desirous of peace, but becausc he feared that the Emperor had a meaning contrary to the liberty of Italy, and that he would so handle the matter as all the whole state thereof should depend only vpon him: wherevpon, they thought, that to shew themselues humble and low-minded, was nothing else but to encourage him, and to confirme him in his desire and hope of beeing able to command all Italy. So that they did then wisely by not sending their Ambassadors to him: but they gaue their consent that the Duke of milan, (who as beeing tyed vnto them, had therevppon, craued the Senates aduise) might send his Ambassadors, as a vassall of the Empire: and as for themselues, being in a manner left alone, they did with speed make great prouisions for warre, to assure (as much as might bee) their owne state, they leauied new troupes of foot to augment their army, and to strengthen the garrisons

Great prepara. tions of the Venetians.

of

of other Citties: they choſe Franciſco Paſcalie, Prouidator Generall for the firme land, whoſe principall charge was to viſit their forces, and to furniſh them with all neceſſaries: they tooke diuers Captaines into their pay, and among others Sigiſmond Malateſte, with a thouſand foote, and two hundred light horſe; and becauſe great numbers of Lancequenets, departing from Bolognia, were already paſſed by, they cauſed John Contaren the Prouidator, and Cæſar Fregoſa with a ſtrong garriſon to enter into Verona.

Now becauſe it did greatly import them to keepe the other Italian Confederate princes in breath, The Senate did not faile to encourage the Florentines, and to commend their conſtancie, exhorting them to defend their country and liberty, promiſing to giue them all aide and ſuccour that the time would permit, and particularly to cauſe their forces to enter vpon the Parmeſan, and Placentine Confines, ſo ſoone as the Emperor ſhould diſlodge, to draw into thoſe quarters, for the defence of his Citties, the Emperiall forces which were in Tuſcany.

The Venetians exhortation to the confederats

They did the like to the Duke of Ferrara, vnto whome they ſent Marke Antonio Renier their Ambaſſador, to declare vnto him the Republikes good meaning, for the common defence of the liberty of Italy, and the particular affection which they did beare to the Duke, and to his whole ſtate, for which, being conioyned by neere neighbour-hood, and by ſundry other reſpects, they would neuer refuſe to runne one ſelfe ſame fortune with him: and therefore they deſired to be acquainted with his intent and meaning. The Duke ſhewed that hee was highly pleaſed with his Ambaſſade, and promiſed to doe much, and particularly to leuy great numbers of men of warre, which hee aſſembled neere to Modena, to ſerue, not alone for the defence of his owne ſtate, but in all places where the Confederates ſhould haue neede.

The Venetians offers to the Duke of Ferrara.

The Treaty of Cambray was at the ſame time publiſhed, which already by a Common rumor was knowne to all men, namely, how that none of the Confederates were comprehended in it. There was onely, place reſerued for the Venetias to enter into it, ſo as within the ſpace of foure moneths they would end their controuerſies with the Emperor, which was nothing elſe but a ſilent excluſion in regard the greateſt difficulties remayned vndecided.

Publication of the treaty of Camb ay.

The King by the ſame treaty was among other things bound to cauſe thoſe townes which the Venetians held in Puglia to bee rendred to the Emperor, and vpon their refuſall to declare himſelfe their enemy, and to helpe him to recouer them by force. For the execution of which article, the King did on a ſuddaine ſend his Ambaſſadors to Venice, to entreat them to render to the Emperour whatſoeuer they held in Puglia, being bound to make that requeſt by the Treaty of Cambray, and that, according to the forme of the Capitulations at Coignac: adding therunto, that he did ſo much rely on the affection which they had euer made ſhew to beare vnto himſelfe, and to the Crowne of France, as albeit that there were not any Treaty that did oblige him to demand that of them, hee did neuer-the-leſſe perſwade him-ſelfe that hee ſhould obtaine it, at his owne priuat requeſt, it importing him ſo highly, as hee could not otherwiſe redeeme his children from the Emperor, who were one day to ſucceed him in the Kingdome.

The Kings requeſt to the Venetians.

The Senate anſwered that it did ſtill continue, in that good will and affection which it had euer borne to the King and Crowne of France, the Republike being in a manner ioyned to that Kingdome by an indiſſoluable band, in regard of ſundry faire reciprocall offices, and common intereſts: that they could not deny but that they had greatly deſired to haue beene comprehended in that accord made with the Emperor, not ſo much for the prouiding for their owne ſafety as for to take away all ſuſpition that they were in any fault, or that the Common-wealth had not found intelligence, and correſpondency with the Crowne of France. Yet neuer-the-leſſe, they did ſo much rely vpon the Kings goodneſſe and wiſdom, as they hoped by his interpoſing of his authoritie with the Emperor, to obtaine

The Venetians anſwer to the King.

peace

peace and assurance which they so much desired. But concerning the restitution of the Citties of Puglia, it was euident, that they were not tyed to doe it by any bond, seeing that the King had concluded peace; without comprehending them therein, hauing thereby absolued them from the bond of the Confederacy, by which was expresly mentioned, that the King could not make any accord without them: Yet they neuer-the-lesse desired to giue him therein some satisfaction; but hee was to tarry for some opportunity how to doe it, seeing that the deliuery of my Lords his children was to bee made within two moneths, by which time, they hoped to finde some meanes to compose the strife betwixt the Emperor and them, whereby the same businesse might in like manner by the same meanes be finished to the Kings content.

The King entreateth the Emperor to make an accord with the Venetians.

Vpon this answer the King dispatcht the Admirall into Italy, to exhort him to vniuersall peace, and cheefely to make an accord with the Venetians, by meanes whereof, hee hoped to bee able to accomplish the conditions of the Treaty of Cambray, by causing the Citties of Puglia to be rendered to him, hauing already for his part begun that which belonged vnto him to execute, by commanding Rance de Cera with all his companies, to depart forth of Puglia, hauing consigned into the hands of the Emperors commissioners, all the places which hee held in his name in the Realme of Naples, by perswading like-wise the Venetian officers to doe the like: But they being before aduertized of the Senates intention, had refused so to doe.

At this stay stood the affaires of Italy at that time. The Emperor being in armes, and very mighty; the Pope his friend and Confederate, the other Potentates of Italy being in a manner ready to obay him, and the French wholy chaced forth of Italy; for albeit they had not as yet layde downe their armes, it was neuer-the-lesse mentioned in the Treaty, that the King should no more medle with the affaires of Italy nor Germany, in the behalfe of any Potentates, to the preiudice of the Emperor. The Venetians alone, in the middest of so many difficulties, made preparations to resist the Emperor, if so be that he were desirous, (as it was thought he would bee) to seaze vpon the State of Milan: therefore their confederacy being broken with all others, they did newly reuiue it with Francis Sforza, exhorting him to take courrage, and to hope well, meaning in his behalfe to employ all their forces.

The end of the eighth Booke of the fifth Decade.

The Contents of the ninth Booke of the fifth Decade.

FIRST, Soliman taketh Armes to reſtore Iohn Vayuode into the kingdome of Hungary, with the taking of Belgrade. The inſurrection of the Hereticks in Germany. A motion of peace betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians. The enteruiew of the Pope and the Emperor at Bologna. Accord betwixt the Emperor and the Duke of Milan. Accord made betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians. Warre againſt the Florentines. Pope Clement crowneth the Emperor at Bologna. Confederacy betwixt the Pope, the Emperor, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan. The Marquiſat of Mantua is made a Dutchy. The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to Conſtantinople to be preſent at the Circumciſion of Solimans children, being by him entreated to that end. The Almains demand a councell, and the Popes anſwer thereunto. The Emperor graunteth the Interim in Germany concerning religion, vntill a councell were called. Solimans great deſeigns againſt Chriſtendome. The Venetians make great preparations and ſtand vpon their gard. The Venetians reſolue to remaine newter in the warre, betwixt the Emperor and Soliman. The Kings of France and England determine to make warre vpon the Emperor. Soliman returneth into Hungary with a great army. The Emperor commeth likewiſe with a great Army neere to the Citty of Vienna, there to tarry for the Turke. The Nauall Armies of the Emperor, and Soliman. Coron and Patras, are taken by the Imperial army. The Duke of Ferrara recouereth Modena & Regio. A ſecond enteruiew of the Pope and Emperor at Bologna. The Venetians refuſe to renew the league, being ſatisfied with the former, and not meaning to adde anything to it. And laſtly a new league concluded, betwixt the Pope, the Emperor and all the Potentates of Italy, (the Venetians excepted.)

The Ninth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

WHILEST Italy was in alarme by reaſon of the Emperors arriuall with ſuch great prouiſions, Soliman the Turkiſh Emperor reſolued to reſtore Iohn Vayuode King of Hungary to his Kingdome, from whence, Fernand had expulſed him, and being entired to this end with a mighty army vpon the Confines of Hungary, he came and encamped before Buda, which he tooke with eaſe, then hee cauſed his Cauallery to ſcoure the Champaine Country of Auſtria, ſpoyling all places that were ſubiect to the Arch-duke, threatening him that hee would within a while after encampe with all his forces before Vienna: Wherevpon hee cauſed great preparations, of victualls and warlike engins to be made, to ſend them thither by Danuby. Theſe newes did greatly trouble the Emperor, perceiuing that it concerned his reputation and the ſafety of the States of the Empire, not to ſuffer ſo mighty an enemy to come ſo neere him, beſides the trouble and care whereto his brother was reduced, whileſt hee buſied him-ſelfe in matters of meaner conſequence, as ſpectator of the eminent dangers of his whole houſe, and ſubiects.

Soliman taketh Buda.

This miſcheefe was followed by an other as great, for his brother aduertized him, that the Sect of Hereticks did very much encreaſe in Germany, that they were aſſembled in great troupes, and made ſhew of great innouation, and that if they were not ſpeedily preuented by rooting them wholy out, it was to bee feared that ſome great hurt would redound to the Catholike Religion, which would preiudice the temporall States of Princes, and cheefly thoſe of the Empire. Theſe occaſions being well weighed, cauſed the Emperor to condeſcend to peace, and to purſue it in effect, the which deſire at the firſt, men thought that he had but feigned; For the Emperor thinking it not only dangerous, but ſmally for his honour, to depart forth of Italy, and to leaue matters imperfect, without eſtabliſhing a ſure peace there for a time, he beganne to ſhew that his mind enclined thereunto.

The Hereticks begin to ſtirre in Germany.

But becauſe hee plainely perceiued that hee could not effect it without making an accord with the Venetians, on whome, (during theſe troubles) the State of all Italy ſeemed to depend, being yet doubtful whether the French king would ioyne with them, who were ſo much diſtaſted of him, by reaſon that hee did no more care to obſerue the Treaty of Cambray, now that hee had home his children, then hee had done that of Madrill, after that hee was ſet at liberty: Hee reſolued with him-ſelfe to make an accord with the Venetians, and made this his deſire knowne

The Emperor is deſirous of an accord with the Venetians knowne to his owne Councellours, the better to finde ſome meanes to end this buſineſſe, in which diuers men of authority did employ themſelues.

Andrew Doria ſent Frederico Grimaldi to Venice to offer them freely to employ himſelfe in this treaty, aſſuring them that he knew for certaine that the Emperor was deſirous of an agreement with them, and that if the Senate would be pleaſed to haue him to meddle in the buſineſſe, he did hope ſpeedily to diſparch it. The Senate neither accepting nor refuſing this offer, anſwered that it had euer deſired peace, and highly eſteemed (as it became them) the Emperors freindſhip, being at the ſame preſent of that mind, but that they were very deſirous to ſee ſome euident ſigne whereby they might perceiue the Emperors intention to be ſuch as he ſpake of, for, the keeping of the Lancequenets in hoſtile manner vppon their State, ſpoiling and waſting the Breſſan territory, was a token of a contrary affection.

The Venetian anſwere to thoſe that ſpak to them of Peace with the Emperor.

Soone after, Sigiſmond de la Tour, Chamberlaine and Ambaſſador to the Marquis of Mantoa came to Venice, to exhort the Senate in like manner to an agreement with the Emperor, affirming the very ſame that Doria had done, how that the Imperiall Maieſty was deſirous of an atonement with them, entreating them to giue conſent to ſuffer the treaty thereof to bee concluded in the Citty of Mantoa, whether he knew that the Emperor would forth-with ſend his Agents, with commiſſions to that end.

During theſe treaties the Emperour prepared for his comming to Bolognia to ſpeake with the Pope, according as it had beene concluded at Barcelona.

All men had great hope of this enteruiew, wherein, matters of importance were to be decided: of which, men greatly doubted, remaining with attention to ſee what would be the end thereof, eſpecially the Venetians, becauſe their affaires were very much intermingled and of great difficulty. The Pope ſeemed greatly to affect them, ſeeking, (by the meanes of Cardinall Cornare) to induce them to lay downe their armes, and to come to ſome honourable compoſition: and therefore hee had already before then ſent the Biſhop of Vaiſon his Nuncio to the Emperor at Placentia, who was thought to haue greatly preuailed in diſpoſing him vnto peace with all men, and cheefely with the Venetians.

Expectation of the enteruiew at Bologna.

This was the cauſe why diuers Senators ſhewed themſelues more ſtrict in this negociation, ſome of them being deſirous to tarry, till it were called vpon in the aſſembly at Bologna: others, of a contrary opinion, propounded that it behooued them to accept of the offer of the Marquis of Mantoa, and make preſent choyce of Ambaſſadors to ſend thither to treat of agreement: And why ſhould we (ſay they) deferre it any longer? The Emperor hath a mighty army, the forces of the league, being broken and diſſolued, are weake, nay rather defeated: the Florentines alone, the Duke of Milan, and We, are left to vndergoe the burthen of ſuch a warre: which is indeed a matter very vneaſie, by reaſon of our ſmal meanes after ſo great expences that we haue beene at, and in regard of the great forces that the Emperor hath at this preſent in Italy: and yet neuertheleſſe in ſuch an inequallity of things, whileſt he daily increaſeth in hope, and we wax weak, he is content to treat with vs vpon equall termes, and (as I may ſay) to humble himſelf and to be the formoſt in inuiting vs to peace and freindſhip and we refuſe it and make ſmall account thereof.

Sundry opinions in the Senate concerning the motion of peace with the Emperor.

A Diſcourſe made in Senate concerning peace with the Emperor.

« And beſides, it is not to be doubted, but that which Doria firſt of all; and then the Marquis of Mantoa haue ſo freely offered and promiſed, hath not only proceeded from his owne conſent, but hath beene done by his expreſſe commandement, for beleeue it, they would neuer vndertake to be dealers betwixt ſuch great Princes, with ſuch an aſſurance of their mindes, were they not more then certaine thereof, and is it then a part of wiſdome to let ſuch an occaſion to eſcape which offereth it ſelfe to doe that which wee haue ſoe often-times deſired, and which at this preſent more then euer is to be wiſht for ? Wee haue had for many yeares, continuall warre, wherein wee haue ſpent more then fiue Millions of gold, ſo, as this Citty, and our whole State, which did ſcarcely beginne a little to breath after the forepaſſed warres, is now wholy ruined, and all mens meanes conſumed, and yet for all that, a way being opened vnto vs, to ſettle vs hence-forward in reſt and quietneſſe to our honor and reputation, by prouiding (as there is hope) for our ſafety and comfort, we will hold the matter doubtfull, and expoſe our peace to the hazard of fortune, which may, (as it hath often done) produce ſuch an accident, as will change the Emperors mind and will, or elſe, by his remayning armed here in Italy, may encreaſe our diſcommodities and dangers, or by his departure, leauing matters in trouble and confuſion, keepe vs yet for as many yeares more at as great expence in warre: and then, God knoweth, what will be the end thereof.

Thoſe which haue hithervnto praiſed the conſtancy of this Senate, for that without ſparing coſt, and without feare of any danger, it hath defended, with ſuch great affection, the common cauſe, and the liberty of Italy, perceiuing now, (accidents being changed, and how needfull it is to change opinions) that it doth continue in the ſame way and deſire, to dwell in armes, and to make warre, hauing meanes to auoide it, will perhaps change their minds, and deeme vs to obſtinate, and others will repute vs fooliſh and ill-aduiſed, for that wee will not handle matters, not onely by reaſon, but according to our owne will, without applying our ſelues to time and occaſion, by temporizing and expecting better fortune: It is without doubt good and commendable to deliberate maturely on matters which preſent themſelues, but we muſt not exceed the limmits of reaſon, leaſt wee come to extremity, which is euer dangerous, but follow as moſt proffitable, the middle way; becauſe it often happeneth, that a long delay of his, which holdeth matters in perpetuall irreſolution and length, cauſeth as much, and more danger, then an ouer haſty and precipitate councell: From this, vntill now, we haue ſufficiently kept our ſelues, hauing for ſo many yeares maintayned warre, and tried all poſſible meanes to reduce this Eſtate to a ſetled quiet and ſafety: Let vs now take heede, leaſt we runne into the other extremity, for feare leaſt by ſeeking to much our owne aduantage, and craving too much aſſurance, we come to hinder our ſelues, and to expoſe our affaires to greater dangers.

A Diſcourſe in Senate contrary to the former.

Others were not of this opinion, thinking it more honorable and more profitable to temporize, not letting the Emperor know, that they were deſirous of an agreement. Theſe men did conſider the ſmall aſſurance, that was in the Emperors Army, which wanted mony and victualls, whereby, theſe two failing, it was of neceſſity to breake: That their Citties were fenced with ſtrong garriſons, That the Emperor could not in any ſort aſſaile them vpon hope of ſodaine taking of them: That he was beſides, called away elſe where, and enforced to depart ere long forth of Italy: That the Turke had beſeeged Vienna, and reduced it to great danger: That all his brothers country was ſpoyled and ruined, by the Turkiſh Cauallery. That the Heretickes had raiſed great troubles, and of great importance in ſundry places of Germany, if they were not ſpeedily ſuppreſt by his preſence: That hee, being once gone forth of Italy, and his army broken, or at leaſt much decayed, there was no doubt, but that they might with eaſe ſeaze on the whole Dutchy of Milan, and mainteyne the Citties of Puglia vnder their obedience, and in a word, become victors in that warre, and purchaſe in all places an immortal glory and reputation: and where as at this preſent they treated of receauing an other mans lawes and conditions, the Emperor ſhould bee enforced to ſue for and accept the Republikes friendſhip, on conditions to their aduantage for feare leaſt the French, euer ready to armes, ſhould attempt to contract a new league with them, and being afterwards ioyned together ſhould come and trouble him, whilſt he were buſied in ſome other war: That no man was to perſwade him-ſelfe, that the Emperor diſtaſting diſtaſting this Republick, becauſe it had beene for many yeares vnited with the French, would come at this time for any loue therevnto, to propound conditions of agreement: but that they were rather certainely to beleeue that it was his own profit that mooued him thereunto, knowing the State of his owne affaires to be badly aſſured, and the impoſſibility of beeing able to hold together his army and to make any long aboad in Italy: That it was a general rule, that whatſoeuer pleaſeth the enemy, and is by him eſteemed neceſſary and profitable, ought to be reiected, as a thing which on the other ſide may beget contrary effects. His ſhew of humanity, and his deſire of peace and quiet, was a cunning of the Imperialls to court their owne weakneſſe, and to make men beleeue that by truly procuring their owne aduantage, their only aime was the common good.

But let vs yet preſuppoſe (ſaid theſe men) that it were good at this preſent to make an accord with the Emperor. It is at the leaſt more then reaſonable to tarry till the aſſembly at Bolognia, where the Emperors will and intention may be better diſcouered, eſpecially in the accord which ſhal be treated of, concerning the Dutchy of Milan, wheron in the end, as well by reaſon of the ancient and new confederacy, as for ſundry great intereſts of the Commonwelth, the moſt aſſured reſolution of peace ought to depend.

Theſe reaſons did greatly mooue many of thoſe that were there preſent, who were of opinion not to lay downe armes, but with honor and ſafety to the Common-wealth, deferring for that time, the nomination of Commiſſioners which were to goe to Mantoa to treat of peace. The Senates reſolution.

They reſolued to ſend the Secretary Andrew Roſſi to the Marquis, to thanke him for his offer and kind affection which he did beare to the Signory, and to excuſe them for that they could not as yet reſolue vppon any treaty of agreement, by reaſon that the Pope and the Emperor were ſhortly to meet together at Bolognia, to compoſe the affaires of Italy, that the Biſhop of Faenza, the Popes Nuncio, had already a hand in that negotiation and particularly in that which concerned the Common-wealth.

The Pope in the meane time being gonne from Rome came to Spoleta, and from thence to Bolognia, there to expect the Emperor, who after that the Pope had made his entry, came thither within few dayes after, ſo, as ſondry welcomes and reciprocall careſſes being made, they beganne to treat of the affaires of Italy, and how to eſtabliſh a firme peace there, either of theſe Princes ſeeming to bevery deſirous thereof. The Pope and the Emperor come to Bolognia.

But the firſt and moſt important, was, the accord with the Duke of Milan, who after ſundry goings, to and fro of the Prothonotory Carracciola, and of D. Garcia de Padiglia from Placentia to Cremona, being aduiſed by the Venetians, who the more to honour him, cauſed Marc Antonio Veniero their Ambaſſador, to accompany him, determined to go in perſon to the Emperor to Bolognia, hauing receiued a ſafe conduct from his maieſty, vnder coullor of comming to him to iuſtifie himſelfe becauſe the difficulteſt point of his buſineſſe ſeemed to bee, for that the Emperor was diſtaſted of him becauſe that being farre of, the Duke had refuſed to humble himſelfe, and to doe that duty which did belong to a vaſſall of the Empire, or elſe for that he would haue debated his buſineſſe with to great arrogancy, or at the leaſt with too much diſtruſt of the Emperours Iuſtice and Clemency.

This matter beeing almoſt finiſhed, was interrupted by the Imperialliſts, who demanded, for the aſſurance of that which ſhould bee agreed vpon, that Francis Sforza ſhould deliuer vnto them, the Cities of Pauia and Alexandria, the which by the Venetians aduice hee flatly refuſed to doe, the State hauing mand them with ſtrong Garriſons, and lent the Duke tenne thouſand Ducats for their entertainment. This demand of the Imperiall officers did reuiue both in the Duke and the Venetians their former ſuſpitions, that The Imperials demand concerning the accord for Milan.

the Emperialls were desirous to appropriate to them-selues the State of Milan: The Pope vpon this refusall, demanded to haue these Citties consigned into his hands, whereof the Duke like-wise craving to bee excused, because hee could not doe it without the Venetians consent, and that it would bee best to referre the matter to the deciding of his cause in the assembly at Bolognia, it was referd thither without any resolution.

The Duke then being come to Bolognia, and brought in to the Emperors presence, hee did very humbly thanke him for his curtesie, in that he had suffered him to come before him: then hee told him, that hee did so much rely vpon his iustice, at hee desired none other assurance or support then his owne innocency, and in so saying, heelaid downe at the Emperors feet the letters of safeconduct, which he had in his hand, where-with the Emperor was highly pleased: A moneth was spent in the handling of the difficulties, as well of his accord as of that of the Venetians, and at last the Pope hauing greatly imployed him-selfe therein, both the one and other were concluded.

The Duke of Milans great humilit, to the Emperor.

Francis Sforza promised to pay vnto the Emperor within a yeare foure hundred thousand Ducats, and other fiue hundred thousand within tenne yeare, namely fifty thousand yearely; Coma, and the Castle of Milan remayning in the Emperors hands, who promised to surrender them so soone as the first yeares payment were made, and gaue him the inuestiture, or rather the confirmation of that, which hee had before giuen him.

As for the Venetians, they did like-wise consent to surrender Rauenna, and Ceruia, with their Territories, to the Pope (their clames saued) the Pope pardoning those who had practized or done any thing against him. They did like-wise agree to render to the Emperor, in the moneth of Ianuary next ensuing, all that which they possessed in the Kingdome of Naples, and to pay him the residue of the two hundred thousand Ducats due at the last peace contracted betwixt them, namely, twenty thousand Ducats within a moneth, and fiue and twenty thousand yearely after-wards till the end of the payment, and to pay him another hundred thousand Ducats besides, the one halfe within tenne moneths, and the other within a yeare after, and that the Duke of Vrbin should be comprized in that peace, as being vnder the Venetians protection. Diuers other Articles were added, concerning particular persons, and the generall commerce, so as by this peace and confederacy, Italy was freed from the tumults and dangers of armes, where-with it had beene afflicted the space of more then eight yeares, with infinite horrible accidents.

The Articles of peace betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians.

Florence alone was exempted from this good hap, vnto whome other mens peace had procured a worse and more dangerous war, by reason of the Florentines contention with the Pope. The Imperiall army leauing the Venetian State, and being come neere to the confines of Tuscany, went on very slowly by the Popes commandement, who desired to preserue the city of Florence and her whole territory from the souldiers spoile and oppression, which gaue the Florentines time and occasion to fortifie them-selues, and to make strong rampiers about their walles, and to receiue two thousand foot-men into it which Malateste Baillone brought thither, after that he had by composition yeelded the City of Perusa to the Marquis of Guasto, which made them more vnwilling to grant the Popes demaunds: As also becaus that their delay to make their approches, had begotten an opinion in the Florentines, that the Emperour would rather in shew then in effect, satisfie the Popes desire. But the Pope on the other side being extreamely incensed against them, because they would not referre themselues to his iudgement, wherein he promised to proceed with all meekenesse, and being in great hope to obtaine his desire by freely disposing of the Emperours forces, seeing that he had no more need of them, by reason that he had made an agreement with with the Venetians and the Duke of Milan, he determined rather to come to the extreameſt point of all then to giue place in any thing.

The Florentines great trouble.

The Venetians were greatly grieued for the Florentines troubles and vexations, as their friends and confederates, and ioyned together in one ſelfe ſame cauſe, for the tuition and defenſe of the liberty of Italy: but the Republike was charged with ſuch exceſſiue expences, as al-be-it that all her forces were ſtill whole, yet neuertheleſſe it could not giue them that aide and aſſiſtance which was needfull: and therefore the Senate exhorted the Florentines to make an accord, if it were poſſible, with the Pope, vpon any honourable condition which might not preiudice their liberty.

VVhat moued the Emperor to enforce the Florentines to obey the Pope.

The Emperour in the meane time commanded the Marquis of Guaſto to ſet forward with the army, and to goe and encampe before the walles of Florence, being mooued therevnto by his owne particular intereſts, beſides the Popes, greatly deſiring to haue thoſe of Medicis to returne into the city, becauſe that he had promiſed to giue the Lady Marguerite his naturall daughter in mariage to Alexander the Popes Nephew, to the end that his ſonne in law might hold an eſtate anſwerable to the greatneſſe of ſo high a marriage: thinking moreouer that it would greatly profit him, for the encreaſe and aſſurance of his power in Italy to haue the gouernment of that City, which had euer ſhewed it ſelfe much inclined to the French, to depend wholly in time to come vpon him.

All the warre being in this manner brought into Tuſcany and neere to the wals of Florence, all the remainder of Italy, and Chriſtendome, were at peace, the which hapned very opportunely at the ſame time, that all of them being vnited together might march againſt Soliman, who deſyring there to purchaſe glory and reputation by armes, being the more emboldened therevnto by the quarells and contentions of Chriſtian Princes, did menace their Realmes and Dominions: for notwithſtanding that winter approched, and that he wanted great ordnance, he was conſtrained to diſcampe from before Vienna, the which was defended by a number of braue men, he neuertheleſſe cauſed it to giuen forth abroad that he would returne againe at the ſpring, and beſeege it with greater forces, or elſe ſome other City of Germany.

Soliman reſtoreth Iohn King of Hungary to his Kingdome.

Soliman diſlodging from thoſe quarters, did eſtabliſh Iohn in the Kingdome of Hungary, ſhewing thereby that his principall aime was to purchaſe the fame of a valiant and generous Prince: he did moreouer create high Treaſorer of the Kingdome Lodouico Gritti, ſonne to Andrè Gritti Duke of Venice, borne of a Concubine at Conſtantinople, whileſt being young he remained there about buſineſſe. The conditions of peace being thus accompliſhed, the Venetian Senate being very carefull to eſtabliſh it, and to purchaſe and keepe the fauour and friendſhip of theſe Princes, determined to ſend Ambaſſadors to the Pope and the Emperor to teſtifie both to the one & other, the great contentmẽt which they had receiued by ſuch an accord and reconciliation, and how deſirous they weare to haue that peace and friendſhip long to continue betwixt them. Some of the cheefeſt Senators were appointed for this Ambaſſage, namely Marco Dandulo, Lodouico Gradonico, Lodouico Moceniga, and Lorenzo Bragadino, vnto whom, to make the Ambaſſage more honorable, were added Antonio Suriano, choſen at the firſt for ſucceſſor to Gaſparo Contaren Ambaſſador with the Pope, and Nicolao Tepulo who was to be reſident with the Emepror.

The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the Pope and the Emperor.

Theſe ſixe then came to Bologna at the beginning of the yeare 1530. where the Pope and Emperor lay, who honorably entertayned them, where they executed the tenor of their commiſſion a part, firſt of all to the Pope and then to the Emperor. They did highly extoll the Pope, for that as the common Father, embracing with Piety and wiſdome, the cauſe of Chriſtendome, hee had ended ſo many troubles and calamities; and the Republike did particularly thanke him, for his care of the wealth and commodity thereof, by compoſing in friendly manner manner their ſtrifes with the Emperour, and thereby freed them from the expence and trouble of warre.

The Ambaſſadors diſcharge their duties to the Princes.

They declared to the Emperour the neceſſity which had enforced them to take armes, and to continue the warre, their ſorrow and griefe for matters paſt: but aboue all their firme reſolution to obſerue and maintaine the accord made betwixt them, and their deſire of a perpetuall and an diſſoluable friendſhip betwixt the houſe of Auſtria and the Republike.

The Ambaſſadors hauing in this manner fully executed their commiſſion, ſo as nothing was left for them to negociate, they were neuertheleſſe commanded not to ſtirre from Bologna, that they might be preſent at the Emperours Coronation, which was to be done in that City: becauſe that Charles, meaning at the firſt to be crowned at Rome, according to the ancient cuſtome of other Emperours, being called home by the Germains, for matters of great importance, reſolued to haue the ceremony performed at Bologna, by reaſon whereof great numbers of people comming thither from all parts, and Princes Ambaſſadours, they thought that ſuch an Ambaſſage as theirs would become the pompe and ſollemnity of ſuch a day, which was vpon the foure and twenty of February, which being ended, the Ambaſſadours returned to Venice, being honoured by the Emperour with a guift of fiue hundred Portiguze worth ten crownes a peece, the which, according to their cuſtome, were laied vp in the publike treaſury: The ancient fathers of the State hauing wiſely decreed, that if thoſe citizens that were ſent in Ambaſſage to Princes, did receiue any thing of them in guift, they were to deliuer it vp in publike, they, thinking it vnreaſonable to refuſe that which was giuen in honour to him that did repreſent the Common-wealth, nor likewiſe to ſuffer that which was giuen to publike perſons, to be conuerted to priuate vſes, and if at times they were permitted to enioy them, it paſſed by the common ſuffrages of the Senate, whereupon he vnto whom it was giuen, held it afterwards of the Senates grace and liberallity: and by this meanes, they did cut off all occaſion from bad Citizens of being partiall for any Prince whatſoeuer, vpon hope of gaine, to the detriment of the Common-wealth: Within a while after, three Ambaſſadours came to Venice from the Emperour, to render a reciprocall office of friendſhip, and in particular to reſolue vpon the execution of certaine Articles of peace, who were entertained with all honour and ſumptuouſneſſe, and at their departure they were preſented with cuppes of gold, of the value of a thouſand crownes a peece; and touching the Emperours demand, for his ſake diuers of the Republikes ſubiects were pardoned, and others raiſed to great honours and dignities.

The Emperor is crowned at Bologna.

The Emperors guift to the Venetian Ambaſſadors brought into the publike treaſury.

The Marquiſate of Mantua is erected into a Dutchy.

The Emperour after his coronation went to Mantua, where he was receiued with all royall magnificence by Frederico Gonzaga Marquis of that place, who by him was recompenced with the degree and title of Duke, to himſelfe and his poſterity: from thence, being to paſſe thorow the Republikes State, in his iourney by Trent into Germany, the Senate commanded Paulo Nani and Giouani Delfino, Generall Prouidators in the firme land, and likewiſe Giouani Mora, gouernor of Padua, and Pedro Grimani gouernor of Vincenza, to meet him at Villafranca with great company of Gentlemen, which lieth vpon the Mantuan and Verona confines, and to waite vpon him ſo long as he ſhould make his abode vpon their territories: they commanded likewiſe the officers of Verona, to make ſpeedy prouiſion of victuals, and other neceſſaries for thoſe of his Court, and for the ſouldiers: and they did in particular, in the Republikes name, preſent him, with wine, veniſon, fiſh, ſweet meats, and all other exquiſite delicates fit for entertainment.

The great entertainment giuen to the Emperor on the Venetian territory.

The Emperour then paſſed along with all his forces, beeing attended on by great numbers of Lords and Princes Ambaſſadours, and amongſt others by Nicolao Tepulo, appointed (as hath beene ſaid) ordinary Ambaſſador with his Maiefty, and in paſſing by Verona, without entring the city, where, and in the caſtles the gards

gards were doubled, he came to Chiuſa, being ſtill accompanied by the Commiſſioners that repreſented the common-wealth, and being thorow all their State entertained with great honor, he ſeemed to be highly pleaſed and ſatisfied therewith, and proteſted great loue to the Republike.

As theſe things ſeemed to encreaſe theſe Princes confidence, and to confirme peace and friendſhip, euen ſo was it to be feared that they would in Soliman (great States being euer filled with iealoſie) beget ſumme ſuſpition, that the Signory would enter into league againſt him with the Chriſtian Princes, and that which made him to doubt it, was the common report that was ſpread abroad, that peace was eſtabliſhed amongſt thoſe Princes, that they might afterwards, being vnited together, make warre vpon the Turke, and oppoſe themſelues againſt Solimans great deſeignes, who hauing once already beſeeged the city of Vienna, did threaten to returne thither againe with a mightier army. Certaine Cardinals, appointed for that end, did meet at Bolognia with the aſſiſtance of the Ambaſſadors of other Princes to treat of neceſſary preparations to beginne the warre with the Turke, and though the Common-wealths Ambaſſadors were not preſent at that aſſembly where there was nothing concluded on, the report neuerthelesſe encreaſing the matter (as the manner is) and being bruted at Conſtantinople for otherwiſe then the truth, was the cauſe that diuers did blame that councell, who thinking to remedy a miſchiefe, fell into a greater and a more dangerous.

Soliman diſtaſted of the Venetians by reaſon of a report that was current in Conſtantinople.

Now, the Senate being aduertized by Lodouico Gritti, who as Ambaſſador to John King of Hungary had followed Soliman to Conſtantinople, of the Turkes ſuſpition, reſolued to diſpatch an Ambaſſadour to the great Lord, to acquaint him with the peace made with the Emperour, and with the reaſons that mooued them therevnto: and alſo to aſſure him of the Senates firme and conſtant deſire, euer to continue friends to the Ottomans: and if he ſhould perceiue Soliman to be well inclined towards them, then to renue the Articles of peace. The Senate did not without cauſe vſe all theſe reſpects and demonſtrations of friendſhip to Soliman, becauſe that not long before, at his returne from Belgrade, he had ſent Ibraim Bei his Ambaſſador to Venice, to acquaint them with that which had paſſed in Hungary, and particularly how that he had reſtored King Iohn their friend and Confederate to his Kingdome: he did beſides, ſend an other Chiaus to the Senate, to entreate them to ſend their Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople to be preſent at the ſollemnity of the circumciſion of two of his ſonnes; and at the ſame time he vſed great liberality towards them, by giuing them for a preſent a thouſand Canthars of Salt-peter, brought from Alexandria hauing heard that the Venetians did need it.

The Venetians ſend an Ambaſſage to Soliman.

Thomaſo Moceniga was choſen for this commiſſion, who within few daies after did ſet forwards on his iourney with Franciſco Barbaro, who was choſen Baylif, to ſucceed Pedro Zene, who being ſent as Ambaſſadour to the Porte of the great Lord, had borne himſelfe as Vice-bailiſe for the ſpace of ſeuen yeeres. This Ambaſſage came in a very opportune ſeaſon to Conſtantinople, for the reſpects aboue mentioned: for the Croizade hauing beene publiſhed, and the report and expectation thereof being very great, by reaſon that the preachers in their pulpits had exhorted all the people to contribute towards the enterprize againſt the Infidels, Soliman had conceiued a certaine opinion in his minde, that the Venetians, after the accord made at Bolognia, had with the other Chriſtian Princes conſpired againſt him: whereby meaſuring all their actions paſt, he did among other matters complaine, for that by the peace they had giuen a great ſumme of money to the Princes of the houſe of Auſtria his enemies which had the more enabled them to make warre vpon him, adding beſides therevnto, that becauſe they had not acquainted him therewith, till the concluſion of the buſineſſe, they had not performed the part of a State that was his friend, ſuch an one as the Signory made ſhew to be.

Soliman ſuſpecteth the Venetians.

But

But all theſe rumours beeing already ſpread abroad amongſt the Baſhas, and other men of note, did at the arriuall of the Ambaſſadours, vaniſh, wherevpon, was ſpeedily renued and confirmed the league, on the ſame conditions as it was before. Then the Ambaſſadours were preſent at the feaſt and ſollemnity of the circumciſion of his children, which was done with great pompe, coſt and royall magnificence, in all which ſhewes, the Venetians did ſtill hold a very honorable ranke.

The circumciſion of Solimans children.

During theſe great feaſts and ſollemnities, Soliman being in deed inuited to great attempts, did in his minde ruminate on affaires of conſequence, he did oftentimes diſcourſe with his Baſhaes concerning the raiſing of an army wherewith to returne into Hungary and Germany, to ouerthrow the power of the Auſtrian Princes; by reaſon whereof he diſpatched matters of great importance: he determined to ſend a great Nauy to ſea, intending vpon occaſion, to execute ſome braue exploit, but eſpecially to aſſure the ſea by all meanes, which the Gallies of the Knights of Rhodes did continually ſcoure, who hauing planted themſelues in the Iſle of Malta, giuen vnto them by the Emperour, did nothing but ſcoure and moleſt all the ſeas, and chiefly thoſe which belonged to the Turkes.

The incurſions of the Knights of Malta againſt the Turkes.

Soliman at the ſame time, thought on the affaires of peace by determining to cauſe all marchandizes to be brought to Conſtantinople, with the ſpices which were brought from the Leuant to Alexandria, and to other markets of his Empire, meaning (as he ſaid) to make that city, the ſeate of the Empire, to abound in all things, and chiefly in gold, and therefore he had commanded all ſtrangers not to buy ſilkes or ſpices any where but at Conſtantinople, whither he cauſed them to be brought; with great ſtore of ſuch commodities which he had bought with his owne money.

Solimans purpoſe to enrich Conſtantinople

Theſe things did greatly diſcontent the Venetians, as well in regard of the warre he determined to make, as for the change of the trafficke: for al be-it his meaning was to aſſaile others and not them, yet neuertheleſſe, growing mighty by the ruine of other Princes, his power was fearefull to the Venetians, and the diuiding of his army, did ſtill giue trouble and moleſtation to the Republike, and did likewiſe put them to expence, by taking away trafficke from the vſuall and ordinary places, which did much diſturbe the buſineſſe of Marchants. Theſe conſiderations did mooue the Venetians to entreate the King of Hungary, who already did treat of an agreement with Ferdinand, to embrace this buſineſſe, thereby to deliuer Chriſtendome from ſo many miſchiefs. They made the ſame requeſt to the King of Poland, who was already a mediator in that agreement, to purſue it to the end. They did likewiſe ſolicite Lodouico Gritti at Conſtantinople, whoſe fauour and authority did daily encreaſe at the Port of the great Lord, to coole, by meanes of the Baſha, that great heate of Solimans, to cauſe his army to depart, by ſhewing vnto him how carefull the Republike was to keepe the nauigation free and ſafe from Pirates: and for the other likewiſe, to hinder the tranſportation of the commerce to Conſtantinople, which could not be done but with the great hurt and loſſe of all forraine nations.

The Venetians purſuites to diuert Solimans deſignes.

Now, wholy to keepe the Turkes from arming themſelues and entring into the Venetian Gulphe, The Senate commanded the Prouidator of the army, to aduertize the Gallies of Malta, no more to come vpon their Gulphe, nor to hurt thoſe veſſels which ſailed on the Leuant ſeas which they held, and that he ſhould threaten to diſarme them if they did otherwiſe. The Turkes held this for a greeuous wrong, and complayning of the Venetians, ſaid, that it did not beſeeme the friendſhip which they made ſhew to beare to the great Lord, to ſuffer them in their country before their faces to be ſo badly delt with, becauſe that they preſuming vpon the forces and prouiſions of the Republike, had not entertained any armed veſſels.

The Venetians forbid the Knights of Malta to come no more vpon their Gulph.

The Turkes complaints againſt the Venetians.

The

The Emperour being in the meane time come to Ausbourg, did there conuoke an aſſembly, where he cauſed his brother Ferdinand to be elected King of the Romaines: then treating of affaires concerning religion, the Proteſtants craued the celebration of a generall councell, where their opinions, touching faith, might be examined and concluded, which was a pretence to collour their cauſe with the authority of Religion: The Catholikes likewiſe for other reſpects, deſired a councell, hoping that the authority of the decrees that would there be made, ſhould ſuffice, if not to diuert the mindes of the chiefe of the Heretikes from their errors, yet at leaſt to reduce part of the multitude to the ſoundeſt opinion; ſo as the one and other of them required one ſelfe ſame thing, namely to haue a General Councell called.

The Almains deſire to haue a Generall Councell.

The Emperour being deſirous to ſatisfie this earneſt requeſt of all Germany, as alſo, becauſe it fell out very opportunely for his affaires, to appeaſe the cauſes of tumults, and contumacy of the people in that Prouince, did very much preſſe the Pope to conuoke the councell and promiſed him, to the end he ſhould not feare to haue his authority and dignity endangered, to be there in perſon, and to haue a particular care of him. The Pope, perceiuing the ſmall hope that was in it of any great good, and fearing rather ſome occaſion of other diſorders, without making any open refuſall, he anſwered, That for diuers reſpects, it was not yet time to treat thereof, becauſe that peace was not yet well eſtabliſhed amongſt the Princes of Chriſtendome, which ought firſt of al to be looked vnto, to the end that all of them being vnited together, might meete there, to aide and fauour the Councel.

The Pope excuſes concerning the conuocation of a councell.

The Proteſtants therevpon being more earneſt, and the Pope fearing that it would breed ſome greater inconuenience, beganne to deteſt that Nation, and to propound, that they were to be chaſtiſed with temporall armes, whereof, he often diſcourſed by letters, not only with the Emperour, but likewiſe with the Venetian Senate, to whom of purpoſe he ſent his Nuncio, to exhort them, therein to interpoſe their councell, authority, and forces, by intreating the Emperour to harken therevnto, and the eaſier to draw him to it, to offer him a ſumme of money.

The Pope hath recourſe to the Venetians, againſt the inſtances of the Germains.

But the Senate being of a contrary minde, ſought to diſſwade him from it, and in prayſing his good meaning they ſhewed him, how that to take armes at ſuch a time, and without vrgent neceſſity, was nothing elſe but to ſhew that he was afraide of a moſt iuſt cauſe (whereof all men were deſirous to be aſſured) by preuenting with force, the power which the concourſe and fauour of the people might bring to the aduerſe party: That it did not beſeeme him, who maintained reaſon and truth, to flie from the triall thereof, eſpecially by the Scriptures and by the ſame reaſon; and not to impoſe a neceſſity vpon the Proteſtant Princes to raiſe their forces, and thereby to make their cauſe to be more fauoured by the people, and accounted to haue ſome ſhew of honeſty, by oppoſing themſelues againſt the violence which would be done to them by comming in armes: That the Princes of Italy were whole drawne drie of money by reaſon of the late wars: The Electors of the Empire were doubtfull in ſuch a caſe, what part to take, and more deſirous of peace then warre, as their Ambaſſadours doe affirme, who for the ſame purpoſe were ſent to the Emperour at Bruxells: The free cities of Germany, are reſolute in no ſort to aide or fauour the Emperour if hee ſhould ſeeke rather to preuaile by force then reaſon: and the Emperour is to weake of himſelfe to leauy ſufficient forces to ouer-throw the Princes and people being riſen.

The Venetians anſwer to the Pope.

The Pope being mooued by theſe reaſons, or by the authority of the Senate, to whom he much referred himſelfe, hauing changed his minde, deſiſted from ſending his Nuncio to the Emperour as hee had determined: whereby this treatie was broken off. And to ſpeake truely, it was then thought moſt fit to conſider

consider rather how to resist the Turkes deseignes, and to keepe (as much as might be) the forces of Christendome vnited together, and chiefly those of Germany who were to sustaine the first attempts of the Barbarians, by reason that it was held for certaine that Soliman, being proud and haughty, could not digest his shamefull discamping from before Vienna which he could not take, & that he was desirous to returne thither with a mightier army, the which, according to the common report, he was already preparing.

The Emperour grauteth an Interim concerning the difference in Religion.

The Emperour in this regard, did rather encline to peace then warre, and without making any solid resolution, was content for that time to set downe certaine rules, concerning religion, vntil the next future councell. He likewise desired, the better to reduce all matters to peace and quiet, to end the controuersies which remained vndecided betwixt the Archduke Ferdinand and the Republike of Venice: whereupon, he commanded to choose vmpiers according to that which they had concluded; whereunto al be it that the Senate did not onely consent, but did likewise seeme greatly to desire it, by soliciting the deciding of the controuersie, yet neuertheless nothing succeeded thereof, contrary to the desire of both parties, by reason of the difficulty they had to name a third person, if it were so that the vmpiers could not agree amongst themselues. The Archduke chose the Duke of Mantua, the Bishop of Ausbourg, and the Popes Nuncio residing with himselfe; And the Venetians made choice of the Bishop Theatino, the Archbishop of Salerne, who was of the family of the Adorni and the Popes Nuncio residing at Venice, but those which pleased one of the parties, displeased the other, whereby matters remained still in controuersie, to the great preiudice and hurt of the subiects on the frontiers, and caused an alteration amongst the Princes.

Vmpiers chosen to end the controuersie betwixt the Archduke and the Venetians.

Besides this, the Emperour had not yet surrendred (which was the very latter end of the yeere) the castle of Milan nor the city of Coma to Francis Sforza, as he was bound to doe: whereupon the Venetians being desirous to haue it performed as soone as might be, for feare least time might produce some sinister accident, and Francis Sforza hauing not altogether meanes of his owne to furnish so great a sum of money, as was to be paied to the Emperour, they did lend him fifty thousand Ducats to make vp the payment, the which they re-emboursed, vpon a bargain of salt they made with him, by which meanes the castle of Milan and the city of Coma, were rendred to Sforza, to the Venetians great content, whose only end was to assure the Dutchy of Milan to the Duke.

The castle of Milan and the city of Coma are rendred to Duke Sforza.

The Venetians great desire to conserue that State for Sforza, was the cause, that he seeming to haue some distrust of the French, entreated the Senate to interpose their authority with that King, that he might desist from his great warlike preparations, which he was reported to make to renue his old claime to Milan: and notwithstanding that they gaue small credit to that report, yet neuertheless, to shew their constant desire of the preseruation and defense of that State, and to take from the French all suspition that they would euer separate themselues from the Emperour and the other Confederates, they determined to make it knowne to all men, as well in France, as in the Courts of other Princes. But the Emperour being displeased with this declaration, did summon them besides, to arme the number of souldiers which the Signory was bound to leauy by the treaty of Confederacy. The Venetians therevpon supposing that he aimed at some particular deseigne of his owne, and would draw them to more then they were tied vnto by the league, answered, that the affaires of Italy standing at such a stay, as there was nothing to be more hoped for then an assured peace, they were not to be vrged to so great expences.

Now at the same time, the Venetians supposing that King Francis, beeing newly married, and hauing recouered his children, should rather thinke on feasting, and pleasure, then on the trauails of warre, to make it knowne that they desired

deſired to partake ſome part of his content, ſent into France, Iohn Piſani, Procurator of Saint Marke, their extraordinary Ambaſſadour to reioyce with him in the name of the Republike. But he hauing diſcouered ſome true likelihoods, ſaid boldly, that they would not ſuffer the peace and publike quiet to be troubled or interrupted, and they would neuer faile in ought wherevnto they were tied by their confederacy.

John Piſani extraordinary Ambaſſador into France.

In the Interim of theſe negociations, the Republike enioying an aſſured peace, the Senate tooke care to re eſtabliſh it in her ancient preheminences, which it had enioyed before the laſt warres, and amongſt others, to appoint all the Biſhops belonging to their owne State: for which hauing made many requeſts to the Pope, without receiuing any certaine reſolution they ſeized on the temporalties of diuers Biſhoprikes which the Pope had giuen: whereat his Holineſſe being incenſed, made ſhew that he would reſent it, and to thoſe ends ſought al occaſions to breake off from them.

The Venetians craue the nomination of Biſhopricks vnder their dominions.

The Senate conſidering the difficulty of the matter, did conſult therevpon in open Councell, where the opinions were very different, ſome affirming that it was not good at that time to prouoke the Pope, but to deferre the matter till ſome other time, and to quit the ſeizure: Others of the contrary opinion councelled to purſue the buſineſſe, and that the Pope would at the laſt be enforced to grant their demaunds, ſo as in this diuerſity of opinions the matter remayned vndecided. The Senate hauing at laſt found a meanes of agreement, it was decreed, that in fauour of the Pope, the temporalties of thoſe that had beene promoted by his Holineſſe, ſhould be ſurrendred to them, in the cities of their obedience: and yet neuertheleſſe they did not giue ouer their demand, ſaying, that what they had done was onely for the reſpect and reuerence which they did beare to Pope Clement, hoping that he would grant them more then they craued: the Pope neuertheleſſe, who at firſt made ſhew that hee demaunded nothing elſe but that, as a ſigne of obedience, without beeing ſatisfied, ſtood vpon farre greater difficulties. But other matters of greater importance happening, cauſed them to ſue to the Pope, and to haue good correſpondence with him.

Soliman hauing made peace with the King of Perſia in the beginning of the yeere 1531. determined to aſſaile Chriſtendome on all ſides both by ſea and land, and for that purpoſe had ſent his Standard of Generall to Cariadine ſurnamed Barbaroſſa, a famous Pirate, for his great experience in marine matters, who was renowned for the infinite miſchiefes which he had done to Chriſtians, and hauing thus receiued him into the number of his captains, had aduertized the Venetians thereof, to the end they ſhould no more vſe him as a Pirate, but as one of his owne Porte.

Solimans deſcigne againſt the Chriſtians.

And although the Baſhas did oftentimes affirme that Soliman would continue in league and friendſhip with the Republike, yet neuertheleſſe, it ſeemed neither ſafe nor honourable to leaue the poſſeſſion of the ſea, to the diſcretion of that barbarous Nation, who was mighty, and armed: wherevpon it behooued them to make an extraordinary prouiſion of Gallies and ſouldiers: a matter which came to them in an ill time, by reaſon that their publike treaſure being exhauſted by the late warres, could not furniſh them with money to ſuffize ſo great expences: therefore it was neceſſary to haue recourſe to other meanes, and amongſt others, it ſeemed vnto them that the Tenthes leauied vpon the Clergy of their Dominions would bee ſuffitient for that buſineſſe.

The Venetians craue the Tenths leauied vpon the Clergie to helpe them againſt the Turkes.

Now they ſought in all humility to obtaine it of the Pope, but they could not thereby ſurmont the difficulties wherewith hee drew the matter forth in length: but to the double diſcommodity and griefe of the Venetians, he made account to leauy two Tenthes vpon all the goods of the Italian Clergie, for to employ them (as he ſaid) on the releeſe of the Cantons of the Catholike Swiſſes, againſt the other proteſtant Cantons, who threatned them with warre; and by this meanes the Republike was fruſtrate of the commodity which it hoped for by the Tenths, which beeing raiſed vpon their State, ſeemed to belong vnto them vpon ſo iuſt a cauſe: as alſo becauſe the ſaid leauy of Tenths, gaue ſome ſuſpition to the Turke, that it was done for ſome league practized againſt him.

The Venetians preparations to ſtand vpon their gard.

The Senate neuertheleſſe, al-be-it they were depriued of that helpe, and out of hope to obtaine it, did not ceaſe to make prouiſion of all things neceſſary, but ſurmounting all difficulties that were offered, they determined preſently to arme fifty Gallies, they which they ſent to ſea well furniſhed with all neceſſaries: But theſe great warlike preparations did by little and little vaniſh of themſelues: becauſe that Soliman being come to Andrinople, intending (as it was ſaid) to take order for his preparations, beeing carried away with the pleaſure of hunting, did daily delay the affaires of warre, ſo as that yeere remained peaceable and quiet on his part.

The Venetians by chaſing away the Pirats make the ſeas ſafe.

The Venetians nauall army in the meane time was not idle, for the ſea being full of Pirates, who beeing ioyned together in great numbers did ſcoure all the Seas, and hindred the nauigation and commerce, they were all of them chaſed, broken, or taken priſoners, to the great profit of all men, and to the Venetians praiſe.

The King of Hungary at the ſame time, notwithſtanding that he had all his warlike preparations well ordered and in readineſſe, and that hee was ſtronger then Ferdinand, yet neuertheleſſe whileſt he expected the Turkiſh aide for his better ſafety, fearing the great forces which the Emperour was reported to leauy for his brothers aide, or deſyring rather to end the matter in friendly ſort, then to come to ſtrokes, and namely deſtruſting his owne people, did not enterprize any thing: ſo as both parties being quiet, he ſent Iohn Alaſco his Ambaſſadour to the Emperour, of whom obteyning no certaine reſolution, he went to Ferdinand, where finding likewiſe as great difficulties, hee determined to goe to the other Princes of Germany, to treate with them of his Kings buſineſſe, but Ferdinand taking his ſafe-conduct from him, hee was enforced to returne into Hungary.

The King of Hungary ſeeketh peace of the Emperor and of Ferdinand.

King Iohn neuertheleſſe, did not ceaſe by other meſſengers to aduertize thoſe Princes that were aſſembled in the Diets held in ſundry places of Germany, and chiefly the Proteſtants, to diuert them from aiding Ferdinand, that Soliman accounted thoſe his owne frends or enemies, who ſhewed themſelues frends or enemies to the Realme of Hungary.

This King, not to omit any thing, did likewiſe ſend his Ambaſſadours to Venice, to entreat the Senate, to be a meanes, as well to the Emperour, as to the Pope, that embracing his cauſe, they might reduce matters to ſome honourable agreement. The Senate perceiuing that King Iohns intent was to trie all meanes euen to extremity, that he might keepe the Realme of Hungary to himſelfe, al-be-it that he had the Turkiſh army at his command for his defenſe, to take away the cauſe of new troubles in Chriſtendome, they did willingly harken to this requeſt, and were deſirous to further it to the Pope, but all their remonſtrances were to ſmall purpoſe, becauſe that his Holineſſe, fauouring more the cauſe of Ferdinand, then that of King Iohn, ſeemed to conſent that the matter ſhould rather be determined by armes then by accord.

The Venetians doe in vaine ſolicite the Pope for the King of Hungary.

Now within a while after, the rumor of warre beeing blowne abroad euery where, how that Soliman reſolued with a mighty army to come downe into Hungary to beſeege the City of Strigonium which Ferdinand kept, the Pope ſent the Biſhop of Verona his Nuncio to Venice, to know of the Senate, their determination, & what they wold do, if the Turke ſhould return with his army into Hungary,

and

and if all Chriſtian Princes would vnite themſelues together againſt that common enemy.

The Senators vpon this propoſition were very doubtfull and perplexed. For zeale to Religion on the one ſide did mooue them, and the feare likewiſe for their owne State, the Turke waxing ſo mighty a neighbour: on the other ſide, their doubt not to finde in the Chriſtian Princes ſuch ſteadfaſt conſtancy as to expoſe themſelues to neceſſary trauailes and dangers, held them backe: ſo as in this diuerſity of opinions, they anſwered the Pope, that the Venetian Senate had euer deſired and ſought the good of Chriſtendome: but as the ſame did ſodainely incite them to vndertake all matters for the ſeruice thereof, euen ſo they were ſory, that the condition of the times, and the particular eſtate of their affaires would not permit them to ſhew it in effect. That the greateſt Princes of Chriſtendome were at the ſame time at diſcord and diſſention amongſt themſelues, ſo as it could not be promiſed, that they would vnite themſelues againſt that common enemy, that the forces alone of the Signory were to weake to march againſt him: beſides, that their State, for the ſpace of two thouſand miles, from the Iſle of Ciprus vnto the end of Dalmatia was neere neighbour to the Turkes, where there were ordinarily great numbers of Citizens, and much wealth, a matter with indeed did enforce them to temporize with them, and kept them from ſo eaſily declaring themſelues their enemies: That they did therefore much commend the Popes goodneſſe and wiſedome, for that he did ſo well foreſee and prouide for the perills of Chriſtendome: And that they did hope that their excuſes would bee entertained of all men as moſt iuſt and reaſonable.

The Venetians anſwer to the Popes demand.

Ferdinand in the meane time, al-be-it he perceiued that all theſe treaties of league would come to nothing, yet neuertheleſſe, promiſing vnto himſelfe to bee able to obtaine by armes a more aduantageous peace then that which King Iohn had propounded vnto him, contemned all treaties that were offered, by reaſon that hee had beene declared King of Romaines in the aſſembly at Colein, and thereby ſucceſſor to his brother Charles in the Empire, and had moreouer obtained ſundry aides in the Diets held at Lins and at Prague, beſide the great help which he hoped to haue from his brother.

Ferdinands deſeignes againſt the Turkes.

The Venetians neuertheleſſe without giuing ouer their former propoſition of peace, hauing ſent their Ambaſſadours vnto Ferdinand, for to congratulate in the common-wealths name his new dignity, cauſed him to entertaine the motion of peace, exhorting him to embrace it, and to anſwere the hope which men had conceiued of him, that as a wiſe and vertuous Prince he would haue the peace and quiet of Chriſtendome in ſingular recommendation.

The Venetians exhort Ferdinand to peace.

All thoſe that had regard to the publike good, and did neerely conſider the conditions of thoſe times, deſired peace, becauſe they did fore-ſee that great warres and calamities would ariſe in other places, by reaſon that the Kings of France and England perceiuing a goodly occaſion offered to enuade the Emperours dominions, who was enforced to turne his forces againſt the Turkes, to defend the Eſtates of his houſe and the Empire, did practize ſundry waies to make warre vpon him, the one beeing prouoked with an antient deſire to recouer the State of Milan, and the other for a diſdaine newly conceiued againſt Charles for defending his Aunts cauſe, wife to the King, whom he had put away that hee might marry with an other, therefore they had ioyntly practized the German Princes who did not greatly affect the Emperour, and in the meane time they armed: ſo as it ſeemed that they tarried for nothing elſe to make warre vpon him, but till the Turke ſhould beginne, and thereby draw the Emperors forces into another place, according to their common report.

VVhat moued the Kings of France and England to make warre on the Emperour.

Soliman, who had dayly intelligence of the Chriſtian Princes deſeignes, much eſteeming the ſelfe ſame occaſions to ſee the Emperour at one time buſied in diuers and ſundry places, ſeemed euery day to be more reſolute to defend and maintaine the Realme of Hungary for King Iohn his friend and Confederate, desiring to recouer his reputation which he ſuppoſed he had loſt at his retreat from before Vienna.

1532. At the beginning then of the yeere 1532. the Turke being come to Andrinople, acquainted all men what way he ment to take: but before his departure, ſhewing both in word and deed, what great account he made of the Venetians friendſhip, he called home the great Gallies which he kept in Soria and Alexandria, for the aboue mentioned cauſes, and freely ſuffered them to traffick in all places as they were wont to doe, caring no more to reduce the trade to Conſtantinople. Then being carefull to raiſe his army, he ſent for all the Spaches from Greece (theſe are horſe-men, vnto whom the Prince giueth for wages, the poſſeſſion of certaine lands during their liues) to come to him with their armes and horſe; he demanded likewiſe of the Tartarians, Valachians and Tranſiluanians, the aide which by their confederacies they were bound to ſend him, ſo as marching into the field, and being come vpon the confines of Hungary he found that there were a hundred and fifty thouſand fighting men in his army, amongſt whom, the moſt eſteemed, were twenty thouſand Ianiſſaries, who fight on foote, being brought vp from their youth in the exercize of martiall diſcipline.

The number of the Turkiſh army.

Soliman then being arriued with his whole army before Belgrade, a City ſeated in low Hungary, he cauſed it to be publiſhed that he would enforce the Emperour to come to battaile with him, promiſing to himſelfe eaſily to vanquiſh him, threatning with inſolent ſpeeches to driue him forth of Germany, and to make himſelfe Lord of all the States of the Weſterne Empire, which (as he ſaid) belonged vnto him, as true Emperor and Lord of Conſtantinople.

Selim in with his army commeth into Hungary.

Vpon the report of the Turkes arriuall, the Emperour Charles likewiſe hauing aſſembled a mighty army from all parts of Chriſtendome, and ſuch an one as in the memory of man, the like had not beene ſeene, went and encamped before the city of Vienna: determyning there to attend the enemy.

The Emperor with a mighty army incampeth before Vienna.

All men were attentiue to ſee what would be the iſſue of this warre, eſpecially the Venetians, who vnder-hand fauored the Chriſtian party, hauing ſuffered their ſubiects to goe, as of themſelues to the Emperors army.

The effects neuertheleſſe of theſe two great armies were farre otherwiſe, then were the expectation and feare which men had, becauſe that Soliman entring very late into Hungary, beeing not able to come ſooner, as well in regard of the greatneſſe of his preparations, as for the diſtance of the way, did not directly march towards the Emperours army, but hauing onely made a ſhew of warre, and ſome few incurſions, hee returned to Conſtantinople.

Solimans retreate.

The Emperour (who had not ſtirred from before the walles of Vienna, not going forth to met the the Turkes, notwithſtanding that he had intelligence of their approches) being aſſured of their retreat, did on a ſodaine breake vp his army, and burning with an extreame deſire to returne into Spaine, after that he had left certaine Italian foot-men with his brother, and ſome numbers of Lanſquenets hee tooke his iourney into Italy, from thence to ſaile into Spaine.

The Emperors retreate.

But both the Emperour and the Turke, hauing at one time great nauies at ſea, the Venetians thought that it behooued them for the ſafety of their owne State, to arme likewiſe, becauſe they would not by any meanes bee taken vnprouided, and to theſe ends determined to augment their nauy with a good number of Gallies: wherevpon, by the Senates command, twenty gallies were ſpeedily armed in the Iſles of Candy, Zant, and Corfoù, and in the Cities of Dalmatia, ſo as their nauall army amounted to the number of threeſcore Gallies, of which Vincenzo Capel was made General, with expreſſe commiſſion to take great heed that no hurt might be done to the townes and ſubiects of the the Signory, and that the Imperialls and the Turkes might bee vſed alike as friends, by furniſhing them with Hauens and victualls, but not with armes, nor warlike munitions, the Senate reſoluing to haue firme friendſhip and correſpondency with both of them.

Now the Turkiſh Armie beeing come vpon the Leuant ſeas, conducted by Imerall, to the number of foureſcore ſaile, reckoning with the Galleys twenty leſſer veſſels, and that of the Imperialls vpon the Weſterne ſeas, which conſiſted of forty light Galleys, with certaine great ſhippes of warre, vnder the command of André Doria, beeing yet vncertaine what the Captaines deſeignes were, and what way they would take: the Generall Capel went and ſpent the time betwixt Zante and Corſou, giuing order, according to his commiſſion, that the ſubiects of the Signory might haue no harme, and to auoide likewiſe the occaſion to meete with theſe armies, that no ſuſpition might bee giuen of fauouring one more then an other. The Emperors and Solimans nauall Armie.

Imerall beeing at laſt come to Preueſa, Capello remained ſtill at Corſou, from whence he ſent one of his Galleys to viſit him; the which the Barbarian taking in good part, promiſed him that no harme ſhould bee done to the ſubiects of the Signory; and the Turkiſh fleet arriuing afterwards in the Iſle of Zante, and in other places belonging to the Republick, tooke nothing away frō them by force. As for Doria, hee departed from Sicily where hee had made long aboade and ſailed towards Greece; and vnderſtanding that the Venetian fleete lay at Zante, hee was deſirous to ſaile thither with all his Galleys, to haue ſome occaſion to talke with the Generall Capello, intending, as it was thought, and as himſelfe hath ſince then affirmed, that by cauſing the Turkes to ſuſpect the vnion of their Armies, to enforce the Venetians to ioyne with him, of which vnion hee had before written to the Senate, with great offers and hopes: and the Emperors Ambaſſador, reſident at Venice, hauing earneſtly intreated that it might be ſo, demanded of them, that if vpon occaſion the two fleetes of the Emperor and the Turke ſhould fight one with another, whether they would haue their Generall to ayde and fauour the Turkes: whereunto the Senate readily replied, that they did greatly eſteeme the Emperors friendſhip, and were well diſpoſed to entertaine and keepe it, but they were not determined vpon his occaſion, or for any other vaine hope, to breake the league with ſo mighty an enemy. Doria his ſubtile meaning. The Senates anſwer to the Emperors Ambaſſador.

Theſe two Armies then, Imperiall and Turkiſh, remaining quiet for feare one of another, did in a manner ſpend that whole ſummer without dooing any thing. At the laſt, the Turkiſh fleete beeing much weakned by the Peſtilence, began to retire towards Negrepont, to goe afterwards (as it was thought) to winter at Conſtantinople. Doria beeing emboldened by this retreat, ſailed with his Army towards Morea, reſoluing to beſiege Coron, which hee tooke after ſome ſmall reſiſtance of the Turkiſh garriſon that lay there, hee did the like to Patras, but it was by compoſition, then winter drawing on, hee retired into Sicily without executing any other notable action. The retreate of the Turkiſh Army. Coron and Patras, taken by Doria.

Both theſe Armies beeing retired, the Venetians meaning to bee no longer at ſuch great expence in vaine, did diſarme the Galleys of encreaſe, with ſome other old ones which were in the Army. Theſe things were done foorth of Italy, the which in the meane time was quiet in all places; but that the Duke of Milan reſolued to ſend his forces againſt the Captaine of the Caſtle of Mus. who beeing deſirous to aduance himſelfe by ſome nouelty, and vpon hope that the Lanſquenets would aſſiſt him, had taken certaine places from the Griſons, and did ſore threaten the citty of Coma. The Duke of Milan vpon this report, ſent Iohn Baptiſta Speciano, one of his houſhold Gentlemen to Venice, to entreat the Senate to aide him to preuent the Captains deſignes; the Senate anſwered that the Duke ought therein to beare himſelf modeſtly for feare of altering the quiet of Italy, & giuing occaſion to thoſe that were deſirous of troubles to practize other nouelties: but when need ſhould be, he ſhould find in them the ſame readines to helpe him, which he had at other times experience of. This caused that ſmall ſtirre ſoone to be appeaſed, which would haue fallen out otherwiſe, if the Venetians had taken armes. For the Griſons hauing by the aid of certaine Cantons of the Suiſſes leuied certaine nombers of ſoldiers, did enforce the Captaine of the Caſtle to an agreement, whereunto the Duke willingly conſented, ſo ſoone as he vnderſtood the Venetians reſolution, and had at laſt, by meanes of a ſumme of money, the towne of Locquaca and the Caſtle of Mus reſtored to him.

The Duke of Ferrara recouereth Modena and Regio by the Emperors ſentence.

The Duke of Ferrara did at the ſame time, by the Emperors ſentence, obtaine Modena and Regio, the which imported likewiſe, that the Pope receiuing an hundred thouſand Ducats of him by a certaine time, and reducing the reuenew therof to the ancient forme, ſhould againe newly inueſt him in the iuriſdiction of Ferrara, albeit it was againſt the Popes will, who demanding caution and aſſurance for the ſummer, fifteene Venetian Gentlemen were giuen vnto him, whom the Senate did promiſe ſhould be anſwerable for it, whervppon he accepted it. This Duke was not long before reconciled to the Venetians, who reſtored vnto him a goodly and magnificent Pallace, which hee had in Venice, it beeing taken from him by reaſon of the laſt warres, and had beene giuen vnto his Predeceſſors by the Signory.

According then to this ſentence the Emperour conſigned Modena to the Duke of Ferrara, which till then he had kept in depoſito, by reaſon whereof there had beene, for a long time, betwixt the Pope and that Duke, neither open warre or an aſſured peace, for it vexed the Pope to quit thoſe two Citties, which he had ſo much ſought after.

The Emperor is againe deſirous to talk with the Pope at Bologna.

The Emperor beeing ſpeedily come into Italy, ſent word to the Pope how deſirous he was to talke with him againe at Bologna, for diuers great conſiderations, and cheefely to renew the Confederacy, made before betwixt them, to the end to comprehend therein all the Italians, and to taxe the ſumme of money, which euery one ought to contribute, if the French ſhould inuade Italy: for hee had intelligence that the French had ſome deſeigne vpon Genoa, pretending by reaſon of their particular claimes and intereſts, that they might doe it without breaking the agreement made at Madrill or Cambray: as alſo becauſe that Genoa was not mentioned in their treaty of the laſt league, but only the ſtate of Milan and the Realme of Naples.

What was the cauſe of the enteruiew.

The Pope ſeemed to be highly pleaſed with this enteruiew, for hauing propounded to marry his Neece to the ſecond ſonne of France, and fearing leaſt the Emperor diſtaſting it, would refuſe to paſſe on any further in the marriage already determined and concluded betwixt Alexandro de Medicis his nephew, and the Lady Marguerite his naturall daughter, ſought all meanes to entertaine the Emperour and to ſatiſfie him in all things; therefore he ſent word to all the Potentates of Italy, to ſend their Commiſſioners to Bologna, where the meeting ſhould be, there for to renew the Confederacy according to the Emperors deſire.

This propoſition did for diuers reaſons diſpleaſe the Venetians: Firſt for feare leaſt the Turke ſhould ſuſpect that the renewing of the league was rather made againſt him, then for the defenſe of Italy, with whom they were to deale with great reſpect. Next they thought it to be againſt reaſon, ſo to contemne the intereſts and deſeignes of the French King, which might beget great diſcontent in him, which might turne to the loſſe and detriment of the Signory. And then, that the Emperors intention, to renew this firſt league, being only to comprehend Genoa therein, the ſame might diſpleaſe the Turke and the French: The Turke, for that he hated that Citty and Nation, from whom that fleet came which had taken Coron, and done him ſo much harme; the French becauſe that the aſſurance of Genoa would enforce them to take armes againſt them, by reaſon of the report which was already currant, how that they had an enterpriſe vpon it. And laſtly, they were in doubt that this renewing of the league was a cunning of the Emperors, to cauſe the French King and Soliman to ſuſpect the Republick, and for to reduce it to this point, not onely ſtrictly to ioyne and confederate it ſelfe with him, but likewiſe to depend wholy vpon him and his pleaſure, and altogether to follow his fortune, by declaring it ſelfe a friend to his friends, and enemy to his enemies.

of

The Venetians made anſwer to the Emperors Agents which came from Rome for that purpoſe, that they were willing to maintaine and keepe the confederacy which they had made with the Emperor, and the other Confederates, beeing deſirous of the peace and quiet of Italy. The Emperor in the meane time came forth of Germany into Italy, vnto whom the Senate ſent foure Ambaſſadors, Marco Minio, Ieronimo Peſare, Lorenzo Bragadino, and Marco Foſcare, who found him at Pontiebe, and waited vpon him thorow their State with all the honor that might bee, preſenting him with conſitures and other ſweet meates, wherein they ſpent aboue ten thouſand crownes.

The Emperour returneth into Italy.

The Emperor beeing come to Bologna, about the latter end of the yeare, the Pope ſpeedily arriued there, where were ſhewed the ſelfe ſame demonſtrations of friendſhip and familiarity as at the former time. Then comming to conferre together at the beginning of Ianuary of the next yeare 1533. to treate of important affaires, and chiefly to renew the laſt league made in the ſelfe ſame place, by reaſon whereof all the other Princes of Italy had ſent their Commiſſioners thither: Marc-Antonio Veniero, and Marc-Antonio Contaren, Ambaſſadors of the Republick, the one with the Pope, and the other with the Emperor, were called, and earneſtly intreated by theſe Princes, to perſwade the Senate to hearken to that buſineſſe, which concerned the ſafety of all men, and the quiet of Italy, which they ſo much deſired. The Pope, beſides theſe exhortations made to the Ambaſſadors, ſent Roberto Magio, his Nuncio, to Venice, albeit it was more, (according to the common report) to ſatisfie the Emperor, then for any deſire hee had there-vnto.

The Venetians are requeſted to conſent to the renuing of the league.

The Venetians had vſed all meanes poſſible to keepe themſelues from beeing called into it, by promiſing carefully to obſerue that which had beene agreed betwixt them, but beeing at laſt enformed to deliuer their reſolution, they refuſed to renew the confederacie, or to amplifie the obligations therein contained, alleadging for their excuſes (not mentioning the Freneh) how that the Turke had notice of the former made at Bologna for the ſafety of Italy, ſo that comming now to renew it, in regarde all the deſeignes of Chriſtendome were preſently meant againſt him, hee would diſtruſt it, and vndoubtedly ſuſpect that the Venetians had a hand in it. Beſides, it was ſufficiently knowne to all men, that for the ſafety of Italy, there was no need to renew the league, in regard of the meanes they had to reſiſt all attempts which ſhould bee made againſt it: for if they came by Sea, the Emperors fleete was mighty enough to hinder their approaches: as for any enterpriſes by land, the league had prouided for it, and among others, for the matter of Genoa, whither they could not come but thorow the State of Milan, which was comprehended in the league; the which experience did ſufficiently manifeſt, no man hauing ſince three yeares (that the league was contracted) dared to raiſe any ſtirres in Italy, no not thoſe who were deſirous to trouble the peace thereof.

The Venetians anſwer concerning the renuing of the league.

The Emperor beeing not ſatisfied with this anſwer, and deſirous ſpeedily to returne into Spaine, hauing already remained two moneths at Bologna, was more earneſt with the Pope to conclude one betwixt themſelues, refuting all the reaſons which hee for his part could alledge to the contrary: ſo as they began to treate treate of the Articles of the Confederacie, which beeing determined and concluded betwixt the Pope, the Emperor, and the other Potentates of Italy, namely the Dukes of Milan and Ferrara, the Cities of Genoa, Sienna, Luca, and Florence; notwithstanding that the latter was comprehended in the promises made by the Pope, it was published at the latter end of February; and by the same, each of those that were therein named, were bound to contribute to the warres, according to his strength and meanes, by gathering together in the meane time a stock of one hundred and ten thousand crownes, and monethly to furnish the like summe, if warre should happen; and in time of peace fiue and twenty thousand, for the entertainment of the Captaines and other soldiers: and at the same instant, Antonio de Leua, by a generall consent, was declared Generall of the league, with a decree, that hee should remaine in the Dutchy of Milan.

A new league betwixt the Pope, Emperor and all the Italian Potentates (the Venetians excepted).

But it was a matter truly worthy of note, that albeit the Common-wealth would not consent to this treaty, nor in any sort deale therein, yet neuertheleſſe it was named in the publication thereof, and in the impreſſion that was made of it, either to make that action to bee of more account, or elſe to cauſe the Common-wealth to bee ſuſpected, and to become odious to other Princes, as it came to paſſe: for, that impreſſion beeing carried to Conſtantinople and into England, it gaue occaſion to thoſe Princes (both of them beeing the Emperours ſworne enemies) to complaine thereof to the Senate, and to diſtruſt them. This league beeing concluded and publiſhed, the Emperour departed from Bologna, and went to take ſhipping at Genoa, where fiue and twenty Galleys attended him, vnder the command of Andrè Doria, to ſaile to Barcelona.

The end of the ninth Booke of the fifth Decade.

The Contents of the tenth Booke of the fifth Decade.

VMPIERS are in vaine appointed to end the controuerſie, betwixt the Venetians and Ferdinand. The Emperors and the Turkes Nauall armies, are at one time at Sea without meeting one another. Franciſco Dandulo is taken by Pirats and banniſhed at his returne to Venice. The Venetians take the Moore of Alexandria by night, and preſently ſet him at liberty. Soliman calleth Cariadin Barbaroſſa the Pirate to his ſeruice. Henry Duke of Orleance ſecond Sonne to Francis the French King marrieth Katherine de Medicis the Popes Neece. Great troubles in Germany by meanes of the Duke of Wittemberg. Sundry great fleets at one time vpon the Seas. The Turkes recouer Coron. The Turkiſh fleete vpon the Coaſts of Calabria. Cariadine Barbaroſſa taketh Tunis. The Death of Pope Clement the ſeauenth, and the Creation of Pope Paul the third. The Pope taketh armes for the Dutchy of Cameryne. Solimans great friendſhip towards the Venetians. The Emperors iourney into Affricke where hee taketh Goletta and Tunis. The death of Francis Sforza Duke of Milan. The French King ſeeketh by all meanes to draw the Venetians to his ſide. The Duke of Sauoy denieth the kings paſſage thorow his country. The French take Thurin, Foſſan, and Pigneroll. The Emperor commeth with his army into Prouence. The Kings enterpriſe vpon Genoa. Antonio de Leua dyeth in Prouence. The Kings deſeigne to make vſe of the Turke againſt the Emperor. Diuers wrongs and outrages done to the Venetians in Solimans countries. And laſtly the Baſcha excuſeth all theſe wrongs as done without Solimans knowledge.

The Tenth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

THe Emperor departing from Bologna to go into Spaine, being come to Cremona, wrote wery louingly to the Senate, giuing them to vnderſtand that hee had willingly admitted their excuſes, in that they would not conſent to the renewing of the league; and how that hee was deſirous to doe any thing that might content them. And ſignes of friendſhip thus continuing betwixt thoſe of Auſtria, & the Republike, both of them ſeeming to bee very deſirous to end the controuerſie which was yet vndecided betwixt Ferdinand King of the Romans and the Signory, concerning the reſtitution of certaine townes held by Ferdinand, which did belong to the Venetians, the Emperor dealing therein, they agreed at laſt vpon a third man, which was Lodouico Porro a Senator of Milan, Ferdinand hauing choſen for Vmpiers, Ierome Bulfarch a German Doctor, and the Venetians Matheo Auogadre of Breſſia, a Doctor and Knight; who being come to Trent, the Senate likewiſe ſent thither Andre Roſſe the Secretary, that he might be preſent there, and acquaint the Senate with the whole buſineſſe: But the Senate hoping afterwards to compoſe this controuerſie by friendly meanes, and by diſburſing a ſumme of mony, to recouer their fortes of Maran and Gradiſca, they commanded Giouani Delfino gouernor of Verona to goe to Trent about that buſineſſe, Yet neuer-theleſſe, both in this and other matters, ſo many difficulties were preſented, as the aſſembly brake vp, without any reſolution at all.

Vmpiers appointed with a third man, to end the controuerſie betwixt Ferdinand and the Venetians.

The aſſembly is broken vp without any concluſion.

Whileſt the Chriſtian Princes were buſied about theſe affaires, the Turke determining to recouer Coron, had prepared a mighty fleete for that purpoſe, which was ſent towards thoſe quarters. Doria to giue counterpoize to this Turkiſh army, cauſed great numbers of veſſells to be armed in ſundry places, that he might ioyne together the greateſt forces he could.

The Venetians make preparations for their ſafety.

Theſe preparations cauſed the Venetiens like-wiſe to arme the Gallies which they had diſarmed at the beginning of winter: continuing neuer-the-leſſe in their firſt reſolution, not to medle betwixt thoſe Princes, where-vpon, they ſent word to the Generall Capello, who was ſtill in commiſſion, to keepe the ſame order, and manner of proceeding as hee had done the yeare before, by reaſon whereof hee ſent Franciſco Dandulo Captaine of the Gulphe with certaine Gallies into the Gulphe, to gard it againſt Pirats, who being aſſembled in great numbers did much harme: and for the ſame purpoſe hee diſpatched foure Gallies to Zante, and to the Promontory of Mailla the Gallion which was a greate ſhipp of a merueilous building well ſtored with ordnance and ſoldiers, that place being very commodious for the Nauigation of the Venetian veſſells which ſailed into the Leuant, and him-ſelfe with the reſidue of the fleete remained neere to Corfou, ſatisfying himſelfe, according to the Senates meaning, to aſſure their owne State, and keepe that which

which belonged to the Republick from being ſpoiled and moleſted, but yet hee could not ſo well handle the matter, but that the ſubiects of the Signory did ſuſtaine much harme and many loſſes, as it often happeneth in ſuch caſes. Now Francesco Dandulo being come into the Gulph, towards the coaſt of Dalmatia with ſix Galleis deſcried from farre twelue Galleots of the Barbarians, and ſuppoſing at firſt, that they were the Gallies of the Prouidator Canalis, he held on his courſe, but beeing come within kenning, he perceiued that they were Pirates, whereupon hauing changed his mind he did put himſelfe more to Seaward, determining (as hee after-wards ſaid) to come and incompaſſe them that hee might fight with them and keepe them from eſcaping by flight, but, not acquainting the Captaines of the other Gallies with his determination, they ſuppoſed that he did put to Sea, not for to fight, but to eſcape thence, and therefore, tarrying behind, he was only followed by Marco Cornare who commanded a baſtard Galley.

The Pirates beeing come very neere them, and perceiuing their owne aduantage, by reaſon of the retreat of the other Venetian Gallies, fell vpon them and tooke them, and carried both the men and the veſſells into Barbery, and among others, the Captaine and Cornare, Theſe newes being brought to Venice, did much trouble the Senate, as well in regard of the audaciouſneſſe of thoſe theeues, as for the Captaines indiſcretion, who thorough his owne fault had cauſed the Gallies of the Signory which were very famous at Sea, to receiue ſuch an affront whereupon, ſome propounded that it was neceſſary to ſend a ſufficient number of Gallies towards the Sea-coaſts of Affrick, and cheefely to Gerbes and to Argier, there for to burne all the ſhipping they could find, and to doe other harmes in reuenge of the wrongs they had ſuſtained of that nation: but others conſidering that it would not be well done to hurt all the inhabitants of that Cuntrey with whom they traded, and thereby dut off from the Venetians their traffick and nauigations, cauſed this Councell to be reiected, yet neuertheleſſe, to free the common-wealth from diſgrace, happened by the default or ignorance of one particular perſon, Dandulo being returned to Venice, hauing firſt beene carried to Conſtantinople, and then by the meanes of Gritti, ſet at liberty, was confined to Zara, for not well behauing himſelfe in this place.

Francesco Dandulo is taken by Pirats.

Soundry opinions in the Senate concerning the reuenge of that wrong.

Dandulo is baniſhed at his returne to Venice.

There happaned beſides within a while after a more notable accident, whoſe beginning was much more dangerous, but the end farre more fortunate. Ieronimo Canalis, prouidator of the Army, departed from Corfou with twelue Gallies, to conuoy the great Gallies which were appointed for traffick into Syria and Alexandria, and to ſafe conduct them from Pirates, who did vſually ſcoure thoſe Seas; and all of them beeing come together neere to the Ile of Candy not farre from the firme land, reſolued to ſtay and caſt ankor there, where the great Gallies lay, ſome miles diſtant from the light ones; lying in this ſort, about ſunne ſet, vpon the Feaſt day of all Saints, the ſentinells which were in the caiges of the great Gallies, deſcried certaine veſſells which held their courſe directly towards them, whereof Daniele Bragadino Captaine of the great Gallies hauing ſpeedily aduertized the Prouidator, he ſuppoſed that they were Pirates, whereupon hee forthwith brauely reſolued to goe meet them, and that which confirmed him in this opinion, was, the aduertizement which he had receiued, what courſe the Turkiſh army held, the which departing from Modon to goe and winter at Conſtantinople, the Pirates had beene diſcharged.

Departing then with ſpeed, and beeing come forth a good way to ſea, hee found that he had no more then ſeauen Gallies with him, becauſe that the others remained behind, the Rouers perhaps beeing not ſo ſtrong or skilfull in ſea matters as were the firſt, or elſe the Captaines were not ſo hardy and valiant: but the Prouidator ſeeming not greatly to care for that, and performing the part of a good Captaine and ſkilfull mariner, commanded all the Gallies that were with him him, each of them like two Lanthornes to deceaue the enemies, by making them to thinke that the number of his veſſells, were farre greater then they were: then making a ſtand in their view, he ſuffered them to come forward, him-ſelfe keeping ſtill before the wind to incompaſſe them at his aduantage. They were twelue Turkiſh Gallies conducted by the Moores Sonne of Alexandria, Solimans Captaine, who, (the army being diſſolued) returned to his quarter into Barbary. This young Moore then hauing deſcried the Venetian Gallies, keeping on his way with full ſailes, was already paſſed beyond the Prouidators Gallies, either becauſe his intent was not to come any neerer to the Iſland, or elſe perceiuing ſo many Lanthornes he was afraide, and had not the boldneſſe to doe ſo.

A fight at Sea betwixt the Venetians and Turkes.

The Prouidator then enforcing the bankes of Rowers went and aſſailed them on their backes, and diſcharged the ordnance, and beating ſome of them in flanke, others in poope, hee did greately hurt them, himſelfe receauing no harme by the Turkiſh ſhot, by reaſon of the place where hee lay. The cheefe meaning of the Venetian Gallies was to inueſt the Moores Admirall Galley, where-vpon the Prouidator hauing aſſailed it, there was a fierce fight, by reaſon of the great number of Ianiſſaries that were in it, who valliantly ſuſtayned the aſſault a long time, but the Prouidator had neere him a Gallie of ſupplies, which did continually furniſh him with ſoldiers in their ſted that were ſlaine or hurt, to ſuſtaine the fight: wherevpon the Moore beeing ſore hurt, diſpayring of beeing any longer able to defend his Gallies, and meaning to caſt him-ſelfe into the Sea to eſcape to ſome other of his Gallies, was taken by the Chriſtian Rowers, and making him-ſelfe knowne, his life was ſaued, but his Galley was altogether ſpoyled, and foure others were taken, and two were ſunke, the reſt eſcaped by flight. So ſoone as the Turke perceiued the Venetian Gallies to come towards him, hee had determined to fly, but artificiall fire was throwne from the Prouidators Gallie which burnt his failes, and after-wards the Helme of theſame Gally was broken by a Cannon ſhot, whereby hee was enforced to tarry and to come to ſtroakes.

The Venetians victory at Sea againſt the Moore of Alexandria who was taken

This fortunate ſucceſſe did highly content the ſoldiors, and people of Candy, but the Magiſtrates and other men of note were ſorry for it, in regard that the veſſells did not belong to Pirates but to Soliman, a very mighty Lord, fearing that hee would take it ill, and imagine that affront to bee done to him-ſelfe, by reaſon hee was at peace with the Republique: Where-vpon it was thought fit by the Magiſtrates of Candy, and the Captaines of the Gallies, ſpeedily to ſend home theſe Callies into Barbary, and in the meane time, reſpectiuely to entertaine this young Turkiſh Captaine, and to giue him kind and curtuous language, excuſing that fault by the error of the Night.

The wiſely remedy the error commited by night.

The report hereof being brought to Venice, the Senate was extreamely greeued thereat, for the ſelfe ſame reaſons and doubts, and ſo much the more, for that the ſame yeares ſtore being very ſmal, the citty was to be furniſhed with vicalls from the Turkes country, where they had not onely obtayned licence to doe it, but had like-wiſe loden diuers ſhippes, where-vpon they feared that the ſame iniurie would bee badly diſgeſted at that time, as indeed it came to paſſe. For ſo ſoone as the Turkes officers were aduertized thereof, without tarrying for any ſpeciall commandement from the Port, they made a ſtay of the Venetian ſhips which were come thither for corne. In regard whereof, ſome propounded to elect a new Prouidator in Canalis ſted, and being thus diſmiſſed of his place, to call him home to yeeld an account for what he had done, thereby in ſome ſort to appeaſe diſcontented Soliman: Diuers others maintaining Canalis cauſe, did defend it, as a matter done by right of warre, and worthy rather of recompence then of puniſhment, ſaying that it was a deed vnworthy the Common-wealth to chaſtice, or at leaſt to make ſhew ſo to doe, their officers, that had well and valliantly behaued themſelues in their place.

The Venetian ſhips are ſtaied by the Turkiſh officers.

Sundry opinions in the Senate concerning Canalis cauſe.

This reply ouercame the former propoſition, and cauſed them to determine to ſend Daniele Federico Secretary of the Preguais to Conſtantinople, who was a wiſe and diſcreet perſon, to the end to iuſtifie by ſpeech, as well before the Baſchas as Solimans ſelfe, what had hapned, by declaring how that their Captaine was enforced to fight, perceiuing in the night ſo many armed veſſels neere to him, not knowing whether they were friends or enemies: and beſides, how that the ſodaine reſtitution of the Gallies, done the very next morrow, and the kind entertainment giuen ſince then to their Captaine could ſufficiently witneſſe their good and ſinceere meaning towards all thoſe that did belong vnto him. Ibrahim Biſcha and Gritti, ſtood them in great ſtead to cauſe Soliman to allow of theſe excuſes, but yet much more the new warre with Perſia, wherevnto Soliman directing the ayme of all his deſeignes, would attempt nothing that might diuert him from it: and thereby all matters being appeaſed at Conſtantinople, Canalis was with greater praiſe honored by all men, who dying within a while after in executing the ſame office for the Republick, the Senate in acknowledgment of his good ſeruice decreed that Antonio his ſonne ſhould during his life enioy the reuenew of the Ile of Corfou.

Soliman accepteth of the Venetians excuſes.

The Senate acknowledge Canalis ſeruice by recompenſing his ſonne.

Theſe things happened in the Venetians Army; but, that of the Emperor hauing a long time ſtayed at Naples and at Meſſina, did at the laſt boldly aduenture to releeue Coron, which was reduced to all extremity, where at the firſt, hauing had ſome hope of Victory, by reaſon of the flight and ſhamefull retreat of the Turkiſh army, it returned afterwards without any honor at all, either by the Captaines fault, or by a deſtined plague to Chriſtians, ſeeing that the baſeneſſe of the Turkiſh Captaines, did afterwards procure great hurt to Chriſtendome. For Soliman being diſpleaſed with thoſe vnto whom he had committed the charge of his fleet, taxing their ſmall experience, determined to call Cariadine ſurnamed Barbaroſſa, who of a Pirate beeing become a Prince, commanded at the ſame time in Argier, to giue him, (as he did) the whole ſuperintendence of ſea matters.

Cariadine Barbaroſſa his great experience at ſea.

Hee beeing moſt expert in marine matters, and hauing of a long exerciſed the trade of a Pirate in Barbary, had gotten a perfect knowledge of all the Chriſtians ſea places of retreat, and in Affrick likewiſe making incurſions vpon the Moores; but particularly by his defeating of the Spaniſh Galleis, whereby hee purchaſed great reputation, at ſuch time as foure yeares before, they comming vnder the command of Don Hugo de Moncada to meet Doria at Genoa, hee did aſſaile and defeate them. Wee may iuſtly ſay that this man was the firſt which taught the Turkes the meanes of well ordering a nauall Armie, beeing before then ſmally experienced in ſea matters, as thoſe who till then had encreaſed their power by armes on land: hee likewiſe was the firſt that began to vſe ſlaues in galleys, whereas before they were wont to man them with the firſt vnexperienced commers, which hath euer ſince made the Turkiſh fleetes more mighty, and more fearefull to Chriſtians. Soliman then reſoluing to make vſe of this man, would ſodainly aduertiſe the Venetians thereof, to the end that if they ſhould meet him at ſea, they might vſe him as one of his Porte, knowing very well that they hated him for the great harme which he had done them. And of a certaine, this man was afterwards an inſtrument of great calamities to Chriſtendome, and of ſundry loſſes to the Signory of Venice, as heere-after ſhall be ſeene. At the ſame time, albeit that the Pope ſeemed to bee carefull for the imminent dangers that threatned Chriſtendom, beeing neuertheleſſe more ardent then euer in his vſuall thoughts, to aduance his Nephewes and his houſe, had vſed ſome ſecret meanes with the French King, concerning the marriage of Catherine, daughter to Lorenzo de Medicis his Neece, with Henry Duke of Orleans his ſecond ſonne: for the which treaty it was concluded, that the Pope and the King ſhould meet together at Nice, a towne belonging to the Duke of Sauoy, and ſeated neere the riuer of Var, which ſeparateth Italy from Prouence.

The report of this enteruiew, the occaſion thereof beeing vnknowne, had greatly troubled the Venetians, and especially because it was added that the Emperor would be there: wherevpon they carefully obserued these Princes actions, because they would not be ouer-taken as they had beene at the assembly of Cambray, saying that by reason of Princes ambition, they were to beware of all things, and to suspect all things, but this meeting, which should haue beene in the moneth of Iuly, beeing deferred to September following, the true occasion of that enter-view was in the meane time discarded; for which there mette together at Nice, the Bishop of Faenza for the Pope; and the Lord great Maister of France for the King, which did free the Venetians from all suspition.

The Pope acquainteth the Venetians with all his desseignes.

The Popes pretences to couller his ioy conceiued by that marriage.

The Pope did afterwards aduertise them of his departure, and of the occasion thereof, and concealing those nuptialls no longer, he sought to couer it with some other shadow, saying that in this treaty, hee had not so much respected his owne particular interest, as the common good and safety of all Italy, wherein nothing did so much auaile (as the Senate had often told him) as to hold the forces of two most mighty Princes in equall ballance, to the end that the power of the one might giue counterpoize to the other: in regard whereof, fearing least the French King, being wholy out of hope, by reason of the treaty of Bolognia, of the friendship of the Italian Princes, would presently breake off from him, and that the Emperor thereby might come to command all, according to his owne pleasure, hee thought it fit to draw him vnto him by the bond of kindred; as hee had likewise done by the Emperor.

Now these nuptials, which all the Princes of Italy did suspect, were celebrated, not at Nice, by reason of the difficulty which the Duke of Sauoy made (because hee would not displease the Emperor) to grant the Castle vnto the Pope; but at Marseilles, according to the Kings desire, who thought it more honorable for himselfe, to haue the meeting in his owne Realme, wherewith the Pope was pleased, beeing desirous to giue the King all content: but that which men feared came not to passe, by reason of sundry accidents, and then by the Popes death, which happened soone after, so as Italy continued quiet, and the Venetians freed from all obligations of taking Armes againe.

Great troubles in Germany concerning the Duke of Wittemberg.

That which did greatly helpe to moderate the Popes great desseignes, were (as it was reported) the stirres in Germany, because that the Lantgraue of Hesse hauing with other protestant Princes leuied great numbers of soldiors, to restore Vldrick Duke of Wittenberg to his Estate, it was reported that they would afterwards march into Austria against Ferdinand, and that from thence they would come into Italy, the which the Germaines did very much desire: but all these troubles were soone appeased, by an accord made with the King of Romaines, against whom their principall quarrell was about the Duke of Wittembergs lands which hee possessed.

In this manner were the affaires of Italy quiet in the firme land, whereby the Common-wealth was on that side freed from care and trouble; but for the Sea, it behooued them dayly to bee at new expences, beeing very iealous of their State: so as the Republick might iustly say, that it was depriued of the benefit of a perfect peace.

Solimans great preparations for warre.

It was no more freed the yeare following, one thousand, fiue hundred, thirty and foure, from troubles and suspitions, then it had beene before, because that a great fleete was prepared at Constantinople, which was to bee commanded by Cariadine, surnamed Barbarossa, and the like was expected in the West; for the Emperour supposing that the Turkish forces would fall vppon his States, vsed all meanes to encrease his fleete, and to make it fitte and able to resist them. The French King on the other side, beeing prouoked by discontent, caused thirty Galleys to bee armed at Marseilles, his intent therein beeing not knowne. It was likewise reported, that great numbers of vessells of all sorts were armed and prepared in Barbary, not to scoure and robbe at sea, but

to

to ioyne with the Turkiſh Armie conducted by Caraaime, and among other Captaines there was a very famous Pirate called Sinam Cifut, ſurnamed the Iewe, a man very valiant and well experienced in marine buſineſſe. The Pope in like manner to aſſure his Sea townes from all incurſions and inuaſions, or for ſome other deſeigne (as it was ſuppoſed) had armed ten Galleys.

Great Fleets prepared at ſundrie times for ſundrie places.

All theſe fleetes begat icalouſie in the Venetians, and enforced them to expences by augmenting the number of their Galleys, and the ſoldiers of the garriſons in their ſea townes: whereby beeing in extreame need of helpe in theſe extraordinary expences, it was propounded in the Councell to acquaint the Pope againe therewith, to the end to obtaine leaue of him for that purpoſe to raiſe the ſumme of an hundred thouſand Ducats vpon the Clergie of their owne State. Some others of thoſe of the Councell, who had already in this buſineſſe tried the Popes rigor, were of opinion that the Senate, without tarrying for that leaue, ſhould begin to leuie that ſumme of money, or elſe to proceed therein more earneſtly with the Pope, declaring how that the wealth dedicated to the Churches of their State, was very great and ample, which beeing freed from all publick contribution, their other ſubiects were oppreſſed with ſubſidies and intollerable charges, for the paiment of their fleets and ſoldiors leuyed for the conſeruation of their liberty, and publick faculties. That it was not credible, that the holy intent of thoſe who had enriched the Churches; was, that the Republick being ruined and deſtroied, ſhould be depriued of making vſe of that which they had giuen to thoſe Churches, in caſe of neceſſity: That the Pope ſtood badly affected to their State, and to whatſoeuer concerned them, ſo as hee made difficulties vpon all their requeſts, or elſe vſed long delayes therein.

But notwithſtanding theſe prepoſitions, the zeale of Religion, and the reſpect to the Sea Apoſtolick, were of ſuch force with the Senators, as preferring it before all other profit and commodity, this propoſition was reiected, conſtantly affirming that it did not beſeeme the Republick, which was founded & encreaſed in Chriſtianity, vnder a continuall obedience and vnion to the Church and Pope of Rome, whereby it had purchaſed an immortall glory and commendation to lay her hands on Church goods, or therein to force the Popes will. That they in times paſt had great and vrgent affaires, for which they had prouided without that aid, and without enterprizing ſcandalous matters: that they were not to doubt but that he which knoweth the inward thoughtes of men, and can doe all things, would raiſe them vp aid and ſuccor by meanes to them vnknowne, much greater, and farre more profitable then that where-unto they were counſelled by an euill example, and if the Pope did ſtill continew his vſuall rigor, by ſo much the more would appeare before God and the world, the deuout and holy intent, and accuſtomed wiſdome of the Venetian Senate.

The Senates holy reſolution

The Venetians preparations for their ſafety.

This opinion being allowed, they purſued with all honor and reuerence the expedition of their requeſt in the Court of Rome, the which at laſt they obteined. By this means the Senate hauing raiſed money, they began to augment the number of their galleis, whereof Capello was ſtill Generall, and to leuy footmen to ſend to the Iſlands, and other ſea places vnder their obedience, to the end to aſſure them, expecting what would become of the preparations of ſo many fleetes. Now the Turkes whileſt their nauall army was preparing, were come by land to beſiege Coron, & did ſo ſtrictly ſhut it in, as the Spaniards that were within it, beeing impatient, and in a manner deſperate, by reaſon of the miſeries they there endured, made a ſally vpon the Turkes, which ſucceeding vnfortunatly, they were enforced to retire into the caſtle with great loſſe of their ſoldiers: wherevpon, finding themſelues by that loſſe, & likewiſe by peſtilence, to be reduced to a very ſmall number, ſo ſoone as the Sicillian ſhips arriued which brought ſupplies, the Spaniſh Captaines being out of hope to keepe that towne, embarked themſelues in the ſame ſhips, and left it to the Turkes diſcretion. Yet neuertheleſſe, it was ſuppoſed, as a mat-matter more likely, that the ſame happened by the Emperors expreſſe commandement, who perceiuing that hee would not but with great expences defend that place enuironed on all ſides with enemies, and beeing out of hope of any farther progreſſion, determined to quit it. Cariadine in the meane time hauing put to ſea with an hundred ſaile, and beeing come neere to the Venetian Gulphe, the Generall, who narrowly obſerued his actions, prepared, according as the Senate had willed him at the beginning, to retire farther in, and not to abandon the defence and ſafety of the Gulphe: but the Turkiſh fleete directing their courſe towards the Tirrhene ſea, ſailed to the ſea coaſts of Calabria, where on a ſuddaine hauing landed great numbers of ſoldiers, they did not onely ſpoile the countrey, but tooke two townes vpon the ſea-ſhore, though of ſmall conſequence.

The Turkes recouer Coron.

The Turkiſh fleet ſcoureth the Sea coaſt of Calabria.

The feare of the inhabitants of Naples and Rome at the report of the arriuall of theſe Barbarians was very great, ſo as if Cariadine had marched thither, he might eaſily haue taken them, there beeing no forces to hinder him: but the Turke hauin ſcoured and ſpoiled the whole Prouince, went vnto the Iſle of Ponze to take in freſh water, and then ſailed towards the coaſt of Affrick, chiefely to exectute his deſeigne, for which hee was come from Conſtantinople, albeit that hee had cunningly made ſhew to ſaile towards the coaſt of Spaine, that hee might on a ſodaine, and vnlookt for, aſſaile his enemy Amulcaſſe King of Tunis.

Cariadine was ſuffieiently enformed of the whole State of that Countrey, of the ſituation and ſtrong townes, and of the Kings forces, and what affection his ſubiects did beare vnto him: Wherevpon, adding to all theſe things which hee well knew, force, and cunning, hee hoped that his enrererpriſe would fall out proſperouſly, as it did. For hee gaue forth, that hee brought Roſcetta with him the Kings brother, knowing how pleaſing that name was to the people, where after ſundry exploits hee did at laſt take the Citty of Thunis.

Cariadine taketh Thunis.

The other fleetes at the ſame time did nothing worthy of memory, except that of the Venetians, which was enforced to come to ſtrokes with certaine veſſels of Malta to chaſtice their Captaine. It was Philippo Mazzo a Knight of Malta, who hauing very audaciouſly, with certaine veſſels, ſcoured not onely the Leuant ſeas, but came into the Venetian Gulph, ſpoiling & robbing both Chriſtians and Turkes indifferently, was taken by the Generall and ſent to Venice, where his proceſſe beeing by the Senate referred to the criminall Councell of the Forts, to conſider thereof, and himſelfe in the meane time walking at liberty in the Citty, not tarrying for his iudgement, eſcaped thence: then hauing againe armed three Fuſts, hee continued with great arrogancy and contempt of the Commonwealth, his former courſes: wherevpon the Prouidator hauing narrowly watched him, did in the end ſurpriſe him, and hauing diſarmed his veſſels, cauſed Philippos head to bee ſtricken off as author of all thoſe miſchiefes, ſetting all the Turkiſh ſlaues at liberty, whom hee ſent to Conſtantinople.

Philippo Mazzo a Knight of Malta looſeth his head for his many robberies.

It was ſuppoſed that this execution would haue incenſed the Emperor, who had that Religion vnder his protection, and the great maiſter of Malta; but they being aduertiſed how the matter ſtood, both of them were appeaſed.

In the middeſt of theſe affaires, the Pope who was fallen ſick at the beginning of ſummer, hauing a long time endured ſundry accidents, departed forth of this preſent liſe, at ſuch time as he was at the heighth of all his happineſſe. Hee beeing dead, the Cardinalls, who according to the vſuall ceremonies had ſhutte themſelues vp into the conclaue, did with a generall conſent, elect in his ſteed, Alexander of the family of Farneſes, a Romaine by nation, and the eldeſt Cardinall of the Court of Rome, who tooke vpon him the name of Paul the third. All men thought that hee would haue behaued himſelfe as Neuter, as hee had euer done, for the ſpace of fifty yeares or there-about that hee had beene Cardinall, and would thereby maintaine Italy in peace and quiet a long time after:

The death of Pope Clement the ſeuenth.

The Creation of Pope Paul the third.

The

the which was very pleaſing to the Venetians, as they who greatly deſired to ſee all matters brought to a ſetled quiet, and who did beſides perſwade themſelues, by reaſon of the loue which he had euer ſeemed to beare vnto them before hee was Pope, that if he ſhould leaue his neutrality hee would rather confirme the league which they were at with Clement his Predeceſſor, then practize any noueltie; therefore they ſent eight Ambaſſadors to him, namely Marco Minio, Tomaſo Mocenigo, Nicolao Tepulo, Ieromino Peſare, Giouan Badoario, Lorenzo Bragadino, Gaſparo Contaren, and Federico Reniero, not giuing them any other commiſſion, then to preſent to the new Pope their accuſtomed obedience, thinking it not fit to ſue vnto him for any thing, vntil they had better diſcouered his deſeignes in his new fortune.

The Senate ſendeth eight Ambaſſadors to the Pope.

But the Emperour beeing deſirous to know his meaning from himſelfe, being therevnto mooued by his feare, leaſt the French would ſtirre, hee did foorth-with ſound him concerning the renuing of his league with the late Pope: And the more eaſily to induce him therevnto, hee made the ſame requeſt to the Venetians, that they would againe confirme betwixt them the former Articles of their confederacy, exhorting them therevnto for the quiet of Italy, which hee knew they ſo much wiſht for, and they beeing vnited together, would bee able to maintaine and defend themſelues from all the attempts of the French, although the new Pope would not ioyne himſelfe with them: and yet neuertheleſſe the true meanes to draw him to them, at the beginning of the Papacie, was, to ſee a firme vnion and correſpondence, betwixt the Republick and him, on whom the wills of other potentates of Italy were to depend.

The Emperor ſeeketh to the Venetians.

The Venetians did not altogether approoue, nor yet reiect the Emperors motion, for they beeing in no ſort deſirous of innouation, ſaid ſome-times; That there was no need to haue it renued, and at other times ſeemed to be ready ſo to doe, when need ſhould bee. And in theſe practiſes ended the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred thirty foure.

The Venetians anſwer to the Emperor.

The Pope who did maturely conſider all theſe matters, not dooing anything raſhly, did at the beginning of the yeare following, ſhew how deſirous hee was to eſtabliſh a firme peace betwixt the Emperour and the French King, (vnto whom hee ſpeedily ſent his Legates for that purpoſe), and likewiſe in what ſingular recommendation hee had the affaires of Italy, aboue all other matters, with a particular affection to the Signory of Venice. Yet neuertheleſſe, as Princes actions are different and ſubiect to change, an occaſion was offered, which had like to haue altered this good diſpoſition of the Popes, to the great danger of all Italy.

Whileſt the Sea Apoſtolick was vacant, the nuptialls had beene ſolemnized betwixt Guido Vbaldo, ſonne to Franceſco Maria Duke of Vrbin, and Iulia the onely daughter to Iohn Varan Duke of Camerine, who ſucceeded in her Fathers State. This marriage was at the firſt allowed by the Pope, and all men thought that matters would haue gone forward peaceably, but within a while after, the Pope beeing otherwiſe perſwaded by ſome, or elſe aſpiring of himſelfe, (as it often happeneth to thoſe that are at the height of their feilcity) to greater and higher deſeignes, thought this a very fitte occaſion for the aduancement of his owne houſe, by conferring therevnto this enfeoffment of the Church for a beginning: Wherevpon hee openly declared, That hee would neuer ſuffer that the Duke of Vrbin ſhould, againſt all law and right, poſſeſſe (as hee ſayd) the Dutchie of Camerine, belonging to himſelfe alone, to diſpoſe thereof, hauing to this end rayſed great forces to hinder the fortifications which the Duke intended to make at Camerine, and the Garriſon which hee purpoſed to place there.

The Pope taketh Armes for the Dutchy of Camerine.

This declaration of the Pope did greatly diſcontent the Venetians, vnder whose protection the Duke of Vrbin was, vnto whom, and his whole house, they did beare singular affection, for the good seruices which hee had done to the common-wealth; and therefore they vsed all possible meanes to appease the Pope; as also because that the Duke of Vrbin did freely offer to haue the matter consulted and debated on by reason: but the Pope giuing no eare to their entreaties or messages, said that hee could doe no otherwise therein then hee was councelled and aduised by affaires of State, and that hee did determine without any more dissembling to recouer by force, that which had beene detained from that State: the which all men did account very strange, in regard of those times, Christendom beeing infinitely molested, both by the armes of the Infidels, and by heresies newly sprung vp in diuerse and sundry Prouinces. The Venetians therefore not to omit ought which might quench this small sparke, which was likely to burst forth into a great flame, did aduertise the Emperor thereof, earnestly entreating him therein to interpose his authoritie, to preserue and maintaine ouer all Italy the same peace and quiet which to his honor and renowne hee had so well established.

The Venetians seek to appease the strife betwixt the Pope and the duke of Vrbin.

The Emperor did willingly embrace this businesse, and hauing hotly pursued it with the Pope, did greatly moderate his former heate: But it was supposed that the same which did most of all appease him, was a proposition made vnto him by those who managed the affaires of the Duke and the Venetians, which was, to giue to his sonne Pietro Lodouico, some honorable estate in Romagnia, and to render Rauenna and Ceruia to the Venetians, to the end thereby to oblige them to take the person of Pietro Lodouico and his State into their protection and safegard, because it was not to bee doubted, but that the Venetians, in acknowledgment of such a benefit, and for their owne proper interest, desiring rather to haue a particular Lord of that State to bee their neighbour, then the Church, would employ all their forces for the maintenance and preseruation of the greatnesse of the Farnesia family: wherevnto the Pope hearkning very willingly, and hoping for some greater matter, the pursutes for the Dutchy of Camerine was for the Venetians sakes smoothered, of whom hee then seemed to make great account.

The Emperor for the Venetians sake doth maintaine the Duke of Vrbins cause.

A new practise betwixt the Pope and the Venetians.

The Emperors preparations for Affrick.

All the Princes of Italy at the same time, and especially the Venetians were in feare, and stood vpon their guard, by reason of a mighty Army which the Emperor prepared, vntill such time as they were aduertised, that it was for Affrick to recouer Thunis, and thereby to assure the kingdome of Naples, a neere neighbour to it, which Carthadine did dayly threaten to inuade. The Emperor did particularly aduertise the Venetian Senate of all his deseignes, seeming to bee very zealous for the common good of Christendom, and in particular for that of their Republick, desiring to continue the same friendship and good correspondence which was betwixt them.

This demonstration of friendship was the cause of the renuing the confederacie betwixt them, according to the same conditions which had beene concluded at Bologna, onely to shew that by the Popes death, it was neither finished nor broken off; Wherevpon, they commanded Marc-Antonio Contaren their Ambassador, that in signe of continuance of amitie, hee should follow, (which he did) the Emperor whether soeuer hee went. After that generall processions and publick prayer were made in Venice by the Cleargie, that it might please God to fauour that enterprise.

This great preparation of the Emperors Army had caused the Turkes to suspect diuerse matters, and this suspition was most of all increased in them (as it was reported) by Iohn Forrest the French Ambassador at Constantinople, thorow his reports made to the Baschaes, seeking to make them beleeue, that the Venetians did perswade the Emperour to turne his great forces vppon Greece

Greece againſt Solimans ſtate, and yet nettherthe leſſe the French Ambaſſador reſident at Venice, did offer to the Senate, in his Kings behalfe all fauour and curteſie that might be; he did likewiſe entreat them to take ſpeciall heed to the Emperors actions, and that ſuch great preparations ought verily to cauſe them to ſuſpect, and that the common rumors abroad were ſo many ſignes of the imminent dangers and preiudices which threatened the Common-wealth. Theſe offers and aduerticements did greatly trouble the Senate, who did well perceiue that they tended only to cauſe the Republick to ſuſpect and diſtruſt all men, and to thruſt it into open warre, either againſt the Emperor or Soliman, to enforce them thereby to haue recourſe to the French King to make vſe of his fauour toward the Turke, or of his forces againſt the Emperor. Yet neuertheleſſe, partly diſſembling theſe ſuſpitions, they thanked the King for his offers and good-will, for which, though at that preſent they had no need of them, the Common-wealth ſhould neuertheleſſe remaine much obliged to that Crowne: they did after-wards complaine of the bad offers which his Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople had done vnto them, cleane contrary to truth: wherupon the King did diſauow it, and aſſured them that he had neuer giuen him any ſuch commiſſions.

Soliman aduertiſeth the Venetians of what he had done in Perſia.

Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that notwithſtanding all theſe reports and bad offices done to the Venetians towards Soliman, he did ſtill loue and highly reſpect them: for at his returne from Perſia he failed not particularly to acquaint them with the proſperous ſucceſſe of his iourney, how he had chaſed away his enemies, entred Perſia, ſpoiled and ſackt the Citty of Tauris, the Royal ſeate of that Kingdome, had beene at Babilon, from whence hauing expulſed the Garriſon, he became Maiſter thereof, and laſtly that he was returned victorious to Conſtantinople: The report was, that, ſoone after his returne home, he was deſirous to leuy a mighty army: wherupon he called for the ſame purpoſe Cariadine and diuers other Captaines before him to conſult with them about the affaires of warre, thereby ſhewing that his meaning was, not to ſuffer his Army long to continue idle.

The Emperors great army for his voyage into Affrick.

The Emperor in the meane time, (the winter ſeaſon beeing paſt, and all things in readineſſe for the Voyages of Affricke) tooke ſhipping at Barcelona, where all the fleet lay to the nomber of three hundred ſaile of all ſortes, vnder the conduct of Prince Doria, with forty thouſand fighting men, not accounting the Marriners and Rowers, who were very many, being attended on by all the Spaniſh Nobility, together with the Infant of Portugall who met him at Barcelona with foureſcore ſaile of ſhippes of warre. The firſt landing of the army was in Sardinia in the Hauen of Caliers, and hauing there taken order for all warlike neceſſaries, it ſailed to Carthage: then being come neere to the land, not farre from Goletta, the army was forthwith landed, which encamped not farre from thence, knowing very well that on the taking thereof depended that of Thunis: becauſe that Goletta is a Tower enuironed with diuers Baſtions, and ſeated almoſt vppon the mouth of a Channell, through which the Sea entring in a good way, it maketh a Lake right ouer againſt it, vpon which the Citty of Thunis is ſeated, ſome twelue miles from Sea.

Goletta beſeged.

At their firſt arriuall the Turkes Garriſon in Goletta did valiantly defend themſelues; but the Emperors ordnance hauing (almoſt) ruined the Fort, it fell into the Spaniards poſſeſſion, who entring afterwards into the Lake, did without any difficulty or fight take fifty three veſſells, as Gallies, Galliots, and Fuſts, which Cariadine had left there as in a place of moſt ſafety.

Cariadine his flight.

This loſſe did ſo daunt Cariadine, as notwithſtanding that at the beginning comming forth of Thunis with his army, hee made a ſhew as if he would giue the Emperour Battaile, yet neuer-the-leſſe giuing place on a ſudaine, he retired into the Citty of Bonna, where finding himſelfe in no great ſafety, and vnderſtanding that Doria followed him, he went to Argiers.

The

The taking of Thunis and Bonna.

The Cities of Thunis and Bonna being forſaken by their Captaine, notwithſtanding that there were ſtrong Garriſons in them, did very quickly and with eaſe fall into the Spaniards hands. Cariadine eſcaping all theſe dangers, went within a while after to Conſtantinople, whither he was ſent for, and being come into Solimans preſence, who was newly returned from Perſia, he did in the beſt manner he could excuſe all that which happened, and the loſſe of the Kingdome: Soliman being ioyfull for his victories, obtained in Perſia, did pardon and receiue him to fauour, and after-wards gaue him the ſuper-in-tendence of his Army by Sea.

The Emperor on the other ſide hauing with royall bounty rendred the Kingdome of Tunis, which he had conquered, to Amulcaſſe, on condition to pay vnto him as his feodatory, an Annuall tribute of ſix Barbery horſes, twelue falcons, and twelue thouſand crownes for the paiment of a thouſand Spaniſh footmen, whom he left in Garriſon at Goletta, departed victorious from Affrick, and ſailed with his whole army into Sicily; where hauing made ſome abode in the Cities of Palermo and Meſſina, he diſmiſſed the greateſt part of his fleet, and caſſed his army, retaining no more then two thouſand Almaine footmen for his guard, and afterwards went to ſpend the winter at Naples,

The Emperor returneth to Naples.

Sundry Princes, and Princes Ambaſſadors went thither to him: the Signory likewiſe, according to their ancient cuſtome, ſent foure Ambaſſadors thither to him, namely, Marco Foſcare, Giouan Delphino, Vincenzo Grimani, and Tomazo Contaren, to reioyce with him in the Republicks name for his victories obtained in Affricke.

The death of Francis Sforza Duke of Milan.

Whileſt the Emperor was on his iourney, Franciſco Sforza, Duke of Milan, deceaſſed, without any Children of his owne to ſucceed him. The Senate after his death requeſted Antonio de Leua to haue an eye vpon that State, and to gouerne it in the name of his widdow, vntill that the Emperors pleaſure were therein knowne. The Dutcheſſe went to Naples to the Emperor, where being honorablie entertained by him, he ſeemed to be very ſorry for the Death of the Duke hir huſband; either for ſome particular friendſhip which he had borne vnto him, or elce for feare leaſt his death would breed ſome new troubles in Italy, or rather, by diſſembling it, to ſeeke thereby meanes to make all men beleeue, that for his owne part, he would lay no claime to that State.

But the Venetians were extreamely ſory for his death, who hauing ſo long a time with great expence and diſcomodity maintained warre, to the end that the ſame ſtate might be poſſeſſed by a particular Italian Lord, perceiued them-ſelues, by the Dukes death, to be throwne into new doubts and difficulties, and being depriued of their hopes, to be peraduenture enforced to renew the warre. Therefore ſo ſoone as the Emperor was come to Naples, the Venetian Ambaſſadors that followed him, did repreſent vnto him the Senates deſire, together with the State of the affaires of Italy; Earneſtly entreating him to find a meanes if it were poſſible, to maintaine that peace which himſelfe had there eſtabliſhed, and the which he ſeemed ſo much to deſire. The Emperor made anſwer, that in regard it belonged to him as chiefe Lord to prouide for that State, he did likewiſe therein deſire to giue content to the Princes of Italy, and cheefely to the Venetians: therfore he would very willingly learne of them what were beſt to be done for the ſafe eſtabliſhing of the quiet of Italy, and alſo what their meaning there-in was:

The Emperors captious anſwer to the Venetians concerning the State of Milan.

The Venetians, notwithſtanding they deſired to haue the State of Milan fall into the hands of ſome particular Lord, yet neuertheleſſe being therein ignorant of the Emperors pleaſure, beeing not willing (and it may be, not in vaine) to offend him, or any other, they continued conſtant in this propoſition, to haue ſom one inueſted therein, who ſhould be eſteemed fit and ſufficient to maintaine peace and quiet in Italy, with-out proceeding any farther: where-vppon

the

the foure departed Ambaſſadors had no commiſſion at al for this buſineſſe when they departed towards Naples, whereat the Emperor wondering, and beeing deſirous to draw the Venetians to his party,(occaſion now beeing offered), hee beganne againe to diſcourſe of that matter, concluding in the end, (as hee had at other times done) that being not yet well reſolued on whom to beſtow the State of Milan,hee would willingly know their opinions, the which hee would greatly eſteeme and reſpect in that buſineſſe.

Within a while after, there beeing ſome ſuſpition that the French did meane to ſtirre vp new troubles, the Emperor ſought to the Venetians, that as by the Popes death they had renewed the league betwixt themſelues, euen ſo to renew it now againe, by reaſon of the Duke of Milans death: that he did deſire it, the better to aſſure the affaires of Italy, and to take away all occaſion from thoſe that were deſirous to trouble it.

The confederacy confirmed betwixt the Emperor and Venetians.

The Venetians beeing of the ſame mind did therein giue conſent to ſatiſfie the Emperor, by confirming the league on the ſelf ſame former conditions, reſeruing therein, place for the Pope, and for him alſo that ſhould bee choſen Duke of Milan.

It was well aduiſed, ſodainly and freely to grant the Emperors firſt entreaties, to ſhew by that readineſſe how much they did affect him, and to auoid beſides, the occaſion of handling that buſineſſe at Rome, whither he determined ſpeedily to goe, whereof the Turkes would haue conceiued ſome ſiniſter opinion in regard of the leagues which Popes were wont to propound againſt Infidells: although of a long time they haue beene to no purpoſe.

The Pope not well conſidering all theſe occaſions, or elſe beeing ignorant of them, made ſhew to be diſpleaſed with the Venetians, for that they had ſo readily graunted the Emperors demand, ſaying, that they ought to haue tarried for his preſence, and vntill the Emperour had beene come to Rome. The Duke of Milans death had reuiued in the French King, his former claimes, and his earneſt deſire to conquer that State; wherein being reſolute, knowing how greatly the Venetians might aid him in that enter prize, he determined firſt of all to ſound their meaning, and to this end ſent the Lord of Beauais, one of the Gentlemen of his Chamber to Venice, to vnderſtand how they ſtood affected to the occaſion which did now offer it ſelf, to aſſure,(as he ſaid)and augment their State, declaring vnto them how that his King had great ſtore of money, friends and all other neceſſaries for ſuch an enterpriſe, whereby they could not but hope for a good and proſperous ſucceſſe: and if that they ſhew themſelues to be his friends and Confederates, he would very nobly recompence them.

The French Kings Ambaſſade to the Venetians concerning the buſineſſe of Milan.

The Senate ſuppoſing it to bee no fitte time to giue an eare to theſe propoſitions, made anſwer in generall termes, that the Republick had beene euer deſirous of peace, and neuer more then now, as well by reaſon of the great diſcommodities of the late warres, as for that Chriſtendome was in ſundry places afflicted with many hereſies, the which ought to bee rooted out, before any new warre were to begin: yet neuertheleſſe they did highly thanke the King for his offers, and for his confident communicating them vnto them, wherof they would ſtil be mindfull, and perhaps in time make vſe.

The Venetians anſwere to the Ambaſſador.

The French King for all this, not giuing ouer his deſeigne of ſending his Army into Italy to conquer that State, did leuie as great forces as hee could to enuade it on the ſodaine, and to that end ſent to the Duke of Sauoy, to craue paſſage thorow his country, which the Duke denying, by the perſwation (as it was reported) of the Dutcheſſe his wife, the King tooke it very ſtrangely, in regarde of the ancient alliance and neere kindred that was betwixt them, by meanes whereof, he determined firſt to enuade it.

The Duke of Sauoy denieth the Kings paſſage.

The King had ſundry occaſions to bee diſpleaſed with the Duke of Sauoy, which which did the more heate and haſten him on: for, the loane of money made by the ſame Duke to the Duke of Bourbon, a traitor to the King: his gratulatory letters written to the Emperor when he was taken priſoner: his practiſes to allienate the Suiſſes from the alliance with France: the purchaſe of the County of Aſt: his refuſall to lend Nice for the enteruiew of Pope Clement and himſelfe: the Kings claimes to the dowrie of the Lady Loiſa of Sauoy his mother, ſiſter to Duke Philibert, who died without children, the King affirming that a great part of the ſucceſſion of Sauoy did belong vnto himſelfe, by reaſon that his mother was borne of the firſt wife, and ſole ſiſter and heire to Duke Philibert, together with his freſh refuſall to giue him paſſage thorow his countrey, to march to the conqueſt of the Dutchy of Milan, all theſe things were euident ſignes of the Dukes ſmall affection towards the King: wherevpon the Duke, knowing very well that he had greatly offended him, and being out of hope to be reconciled to him, ſo ſoone as the Emperor was come to Palermo in Sicily, beeing returned from his iourney of Thunis, hee did ſecretly ſend vnto him, to craue his ayde againſt ſo mightie an enemy.

Cauſes of the Kings diſcontent with the Duke of Sauoy.

This buſineſſe could not bee ſo ſecretly carried, but that the King had ſpeedie inteliigence thereof, which cauſed him on a ſodaine to ſend his forces beyond the mounts, vnder the conduct of Philip Chabot Admiral of France his Lieutenant Generall, whom he ſent to enuade Piedmont, about the beginning of the yeare 1536. where finding the country badly prouided of defence, hee eaſily tooke the citties of Thurin, Foſſan & Pigneroll, and was beſides like to haue taken the citty of Verceill, had not Antonio de Leua who was in the Dutchy of Milan come thither to the ſpeedy reſcue thereof, ſtaying by his arriuall the deſignes and progreſſion of the French. The Emperor ſeemed to bee extreamly diſpleaſed and incenſed againſt the French King, for making warre in Piedmont, and cauſing ſpeedily a mighty Army to bee leuied, hee did ſoone hope to ouer-runne him, affirming boldly that hee would goe in perſon to aſſaile him in his owne kingdome, and within a while after comming to Rome, hee came into the Conſiſtory, where in the preſence of the Pope and Cardinalls, and great numbers of Ambaſſadors and Prelates, Dukes, Earles, Barons, and other noble perſonages, hee began to complaine of the French King, ſo as beeing tranſported with choller, hee proceeded ſo farre, as for the auoyding of greater effuſion of bloud, hee would end all controuerſies by fighting with him hand to hand, and that hee would challenge him for that purpoſe.

The French take Thurin, Foſſan and Pigneroll.

Emperor chalengeth the French King to ſingle fight.

The Pope did all hee might to appeaſe him, and had already employed himſelfe to make them friends, but all in vaine. The greateſt difficulty was, to finde a meanes which might content both the one and other, concerning the Dutchy of Milan, in which treaty, although the Venetians had an hand, (the Emperors pleaſure beeing to haue them acquainted therewith,) yet neuertheleſſe they did very ſlowly proceed in it, in regard of the aboue mentioned reaſons, which were much encreaſed by theſe new accidents of Piedmont. For the Duke of Sauoy beeing driuen from his State, went to Naples to the Emperor, to beſeech him to haue pitty vpon him, and to helpe to reſtore him to his Dutchie. The Emperor beeing mooued with pitty, was ready to make an agreement with the French King to free himſelfe from that war, and to reſtore the Duke of Sauoy to his ſtate, but not agreeing together vpon the perſons of the Duke of Orleance, or the Duke of Angouleſme, for the Dutchy of Milan, the Emperor beeing deſirous to giue it to the Duke of Angouleſme, and the French King to the Duke of Orleance, the matter remained vndecided; and the Emperor departing from Rome, after ſome ſmall ſtay in Tuſcany went, without tarrying any where, to Aſt. Hauing there aſſembled all his cheefe Captaines, among whom were D. Fernand of Toledo Duke of Alua, the Marquis of Guaſto and D. Fernand de Gonzaga, he conferred with them concerning the meanes to make warres, where of his owne proper motion, he propounded againſt al reaſon & the opinions of the beſt experienced Difficulties to accord the Emperor and the French.

Captaine

into Prouence, whereupon to that end the rendezuous for all his troopes was at Nice whither Doria likewiſe came with fifty Galliſs, to ſecond the land army, The Emperor came thither in perſon; from thence, entring into the French Kings countrey, he encamped not farre from the Citty of Aix, beeing not well reſolued what to attempt firſt, cheefely deſiring to aſſaile either Marſeilles, or Arles; and hauing ſpent much time in this irreſolution, he gaue the King leiſure to aſſemble a mighty army, who beeing come to Lyons for that purpoſe, did practiſe with ſondry Italian Captaines, who in his behalfe hauing raiſed forces neere to Mirandola, made an attempt to ſurpriſe Genoa, and to reduce it to the French Kings deuotion.

The Emperor entreth with his army into Prouence.

The Kings enterpriſe vpon Genoa.

The Emperor beeing by this meanes called away to defend his owne, perceiuing likewiſe that his army ſuſtained diuers diſcommodities, by reaſon of the bad diſpoſition of the ayre where it was encamped, was enforced to retire, without doing any thing, but only making a ſhew of his great deſire to hurt the King. But before hee came into Prouence, hee ſent Roderico D'Auales to Venice to acquaint the Senate with his great preparations of warre, and with his deſeigne to inuade France, and to entreat them by the ſame meanes to make ready thoſe forces, which they were tyed to furniſh by their Confederacy, for the defence of the ſtate of Milan: if need ſhould be.

The Emperor enforced to retire forth of Prouence.

The Senate therevpon determined to leuy ſix thouſand footmen, vnder the command of Antonio de Caſtello, Generall of the artillery, and did in the meane time anſwer the Emperor, that as it had beene ready to renew the league, it was likewiſe as diligent to maintaine that whereunto it was bound, and that for their parts they would in no ſort faile to defend the State of Milan: they did afterwards adde to theſe foot-forces fiue hundred light horſſe armed after the Burgonian manner, commanding all thoſe forces of foot and horſſe to meet by a certaine day at Azola, vpon the Breſſan territory, to paſſe from thence when need ſhould bee vppon that of Cremona: The Duke of Vrbin was likewiſe ſent for, to come in perſon to the Army: but truce beeing granted by the arriuall of the Cardinall of Lorraine, this former heate of the French ſeemed to be quenched, wherby the Venetians had no cauſe to march forth of their owne confines: yet neuertheleſſe the French king made ſhew openly to be diſtaſted of them, although he very well knew that he had no iuſt cauſe, by reaſon they did not exceed the bounds of their Confederacy, but hoping by his complaints to cauſe them to proceed more ſlowly in that wherein they were bound to the Emperor, and to abſtaine from entring into any new league or confederacy with him, he complained of all theſe matters.

The Senates anſwer to the Emperor.

Caſar Fregoza, Captaine of a company of light horſſe in Verona, departing without leaue and going to Genoa to fauour the Kings partie, was depriued of his pay, and rancke which he held, and was wholly baniſhed from their State. The King complained thereof, and of diuers other matters, and ſometimes with very bitter ſpeeches, becauſe that the Venetians went about (as he ſaid) to mar his deſeignes and enterprizes: The Emperors agents on the other ſide ſeeming to be diſpleaſed, if they ſhould caſſe certaine vnprofitable ſoldiers, ſaid, that they did it to augment the enemies army, whither they retired themſelues, which was aſſembled at Mirandola: ſo iealous were theſe two Princes one of an other, which of them ſhould haue the Republick for his friend and Confederate.

The Emperour departing (as hath beene ſaid) from Prouence went to Genoa, meaning to paſſe (as hee did) into Spaine, leauing the Marquis of Guaſto for his Lieftenant Generall in Italy in Antonio de Leuaes ſteed, who dyed in Prouence, with twenty thouſand foote-men, both of Almaines, Spaniards, and Italians.

Antonio de Leua dyeth in Prouence.

Other Ambaſſadors from the Republicke, came vnto him to Genoa, namely namely, Nicolao Tepulo, Marc-Antonio Veniero, Marc-Antonio Cornare, and Antonio Capello, and at their arriuall, he diſpatched Don Pedro Gonzales de Mendoza to Venice, to acquaint them with his ſucceſſe in warre, and with the cauſe of his returne, together with his great loue to peace, particularly rehearſing vnto them, whatſoeuer had beene treated of with the King, the firſt practiſes beeing againe renued, where the King had taken time for three moneths to reſolue him-ſelfe, whether hee ſhould accept the Dutchy of Milan for his ſonne the Duke of Angouleſme, and thereby haue him to marry with Duke Sforzas widdow. And if within the time prefixed, the King did not reſolue thereon, hee did intend to giue that State to Don Luigi Infant of Portugall, or to Emanuell ſonne to the Duke of Sauoy, wherein he deſired to know their mindes; but he added, that for the better eſtabliſhing of all theſe matters, it was neceſſary to contract a new league betwixt the Princes of Italy, for otherwiſe it was impoſſible that himſelfe alone could beare ſuch a burthen, wherevnto if they would not giue their conſent, they ſhould haue no cauſe to complaine of him, if hee were enforced to do that which would not greatly pleaſe them. The Senate beeing conſtant in their former reſolution, not to declare their meaning concerning the Dutchy of Milan, vntill they had more particular notice of the Emperors intent therein, nor yet to make any new confederacie, other then that of Bologna ſo oftentimes renued: anſwered, that concerning the new Duke of Milan, when the Emperor ſhould directly name any one, the Senate would afterwards better conſider of their particular & common intereſts, and make a more certaine reſolution: as for the new league, they alleadged the ſelfe ſame reaſons as at other times, that there was no need thereof, with the ſame regard to the Turke, who euery day grew great, and (according to common report) prepared a mighty Army for the yeare following.

The Emperor acquainteth the Venetians with that which he had treated with the King.

The Venetians anſwer to the Ambaſſador.

The Venetians did aduertiſe the Pope of what had paſſed, ſtill aſſuring him of their great affection to the peace, and ſafety of Italy, for which they intreated his Holyneſſe readily to employ himſelfe, becauſe that hauing reuiued the matter concerning the Dutchy of Camerine, he ſeemed to neglect this other important buſineſſe, ſatisfying himſelfe onely for that hee had declared himſelfe as neuter: but being at laſt earneſtly ſolicited by the Venetians, and by the imminent dangers which threatned them from the Turke, which did dayly encreaſe, as alſo for that he had vndertaken to conuoke a generall Councell, which was publiſhed to be held at Vincenza inſteed of Mantua, where it had beene firſt appointed, hee did expreſly reſolue to ſend his Legates to both theſe Princes, to treate particularly of this buſineſſe, namely, of an vniuerſall peace betwixt the Chriſtian Princes of the league againſt the Turke, and of the celebration of the Councell.

The three cheeſe points with the Pope handled with the Chriſtian Princes.

The Cardinall Triuulcio went to the French King, and the Cardinal Carracciola to the Emperor: but theſe Legations were fruitleſſe, becauſe none of theſe three points did take effect, by reaſon of ſondry difficulties whih happened. War by this meanes did in ſuch ſort kindle betwixt the Emperor and the French King; as enemies and moſt barberous nations were there-in vſed to the hurt and ruyne of Chriſtendome: where-in the Venetians like-wiſe had an hand, notwithſtanding that they had determined to remaine neuters, and to be at peace and friendſhip with both parties.

Now by that which hath beene ſaid, the deſeignes of Francis the French King may be ſufficiently diſcerned, who determining to trie all meanes to abaſe the Emperors greatneſſe, and to reuenge all thoſe wrongs which he ſaid he had receiued from him, he did at ſondry times ſound the Venetians meaning, and did by diuers meanes ſeeke to ſeperate them from the Emperor: at the laſt, the Lord of Rhodes comming from him to Venice, propounded ſundry faire hopes and promiſes to the Senate, and vſed all meanes to change their former determination to continew the league with the Emperour, but it was in vaine.

The King ſendeth an Ambaſſador to Venice, to draw them from the Emperor.

For

For the Venetians were as firme and conſtant in keeping their promiſe with the Emperor; as they were hard to be drawne to doe any thing which might diſturbe the quiet of Italy. The kings hope herein being fruſtrate, and himſelfe being mightily animated againſt the Emperor for comming to aſſaile him in his owne Kingdome; knowing likewiſe that he was to weake of him-ſelfe alone to finiſh the enterprize of the Dutchy of Milan, which was defended by the entire forces of the Emperour and the Venetians, ſuppoſed that there was nothing which would ſooner cauſe him to obtaine his deſire, then to purchaſe the friendſhip of Soliman (which he had already practized) whereby he did hope to enforce the Venetians, either to take his part, or at leaſt to abſtaine from following that of the Emperor; the cauſes being very great and many which did moue the Venetians to make high account of Solimans authority; and on the other ſide, by cauſing the Turkiſh army to paſſe ouer into Puglia, or to other places of the Emperors obedience, hee did thinke to diuert his forces and greatly to weaken his defence for the State of Milan.

The King ſendeth an Ambaſſador to Venice, to vſe meanes to draw them from the Emperor.

The King purpoſeth to vſe the Turke againſt the Emperor.

The King then turned all his deſignes towards the Port of the great Turke, where not-with-ſtanding that Iohn Forreſt was his Ambaſſador, hee did beſides, ſend thither Dom Zerafin de Gozi of Raguſa, with new and more important inſtructions, and great promiſes. Theſe two, being often in company of the Baſchas of moſt authority, propounded diuers matters, which being reported to Soliman, might eaſily induce him to grant the Kings demands: as the Emperors greatnes the which if it were not moderated, would become fearefull, or at leaſt to bee ſuſpected of all other Potentates, with diminuation, if not of their States, yet certenly of their reputation and greatneſſe: the facility of the enterprize, there being but a final ſpace of Sea for the tranſportation of the Turkiſh army from Albiana to Ottranto, and at one time to ſcoure the Sea coaſt of that country: The great diſcontent of the inhabitants of that country with the Spaniſh gouernment and eſpecially of the cheefeſt of them, who as deſperate perſons would embrace all occaſions to open the way to higher enterprizes which might abaſe the Emperors authority. Aiax Liſtibei was at the ſame time in great authority in the Port of the great Turke; holding the place and gard of firſt Baſcha, a mighty enemy to Chriſtians, and who ſince the death of Ibraim had often perſwaded Soliman to turne his forces vpon Chriſtendome. This man becauſe hee would not loſe the occaſion, and prayſing the ouertures, and propoſitions of the French Ambaſſadors, propounded them with much amplification to Soliman, vſing all meanes to incite him to the enterprize of Italy, laying before him the example of Mahomet, a diſcreet and valliant Prince, who with fortunate ſucceſſe did eaſily take the citty of Ottranto, and by his arriuall did bring that whole country to extreame confuſion opening him-ſelfe a way for the conqueſt of Italy, one of the excellenteſt countries of Europe, had he not beene preuented by death.

The meanes which the French Ambaſſadors propounded to Soliman againſt the Emperor.

Aiax Baſcha perſwadeth Soliman to make warre in Italy.

Theſe things being repreſented to Soliman, did greatly preuaill with him, who did couet glory, and was full of pride, ſuppoſing him-ſelfe to be highly honored, in that ſo great a King did ſend to craue his aide and aſſiſtance, againſt another moſt mighty Prince his enemy, and hee was like-wiſe glad that ſo faire an occaſion was offered to diuert him from the enterprizes of India and Perſia, where hee vnprofitably conſumed his army: where vpon he did on a ſudaine conſent to promiſe the French Ambaſſador, that the next ſommer hee would raiſe great forces both by Sea and Land, to enuade the Emperors dominions.

Soliman conſenteth to make warre vpon the Emperor.

But aboue all other things, ſuppoſing it to be moſt neceſſary to ſeparate the Venetians from the Emperor, he reſolued to ſend Ianusbei one of the Dragomans or interpreters of his Port, to exhort the Senate, that hee being to march with a mighty army, it would ſhew it ſelfe a friend to his friends, and enemy to his enemies, promiſing them, that he would take order that nothing ſhould be hurt which did belong vnto them.

Soliman aduertiſeth the Venetian of his determination.

The Senate did forthwith anſwere this propoſition. That the republicke had euer made great account and deere reckoning of peace with al Princes, and eſpecially with the Lords of the Ottomans family, with whom hauing of a long time contracted peace and frendſhip, with a free commerce betwixt each others ſubiects they did at this preſent retaine the ſame deſire to continue it more then euer, whereof there was no need to make any more ample declaration.

The Venetian anſwere to Soliman.

It ſeemed that Soliman was wel content and ſatiſfied with this anſwere, who was a Prince (if theſe quallities may be found in a Barbarian) of a goodly vnderſtanding, and a friend to iuſtice and honour: but diuers of his ſeruants being deſirous for their owne intereſt and particular affection to diſturbe this quiet, and to break this peace, ſetting foreward by a falſe complaint, the actions of ſundry officers of the Common-wealth, who, (as they affirmed) had borne ſmall reſpect to the maieſty and profit of his Empire, did perſwade him to permit his officers likewiſe to vſe ſome practiſes againſt the Common wealth of Venice, that at laſt the matter might be brought to an open warre; this being permitted diuers Venetian Marchants that were at Conſtantinople and other places of his Empire by reaſon of their particular affaires, were vnder ſundry falſe pretences committed to priſon and their goods confiſcate: after that, two Venetian ſhippes vpon diuers occaſions were ſtayed, the one belonging to Andrew Contaren taken vpon the Sea of Ciprus, by the Gallies of the Garriſon of Rhodes as a man of warre, and the other in the hauen of Alexandria, Soliman ſaying that he would vſe them in his moſt important affaires: The marchandize beſides which the Venetians were wont to bring forth of Syria had an impoſition layd on them of tenne in the hundred: the Bailies letters to the Senate were oftentimes intercepted, and without further diſſembling their meaning, Muſtapha, one of the cheefe Baſchas complaining of them told them, that becauſe they were ſo ſtreightly allied to the Emperor their enemy, they had incurred the hatred and indignation of Soliman.

VVrongs done the Venetians in Solimans Dominions.

This gaue him ſome iuſt occaſion to reſent it, and ſome collour of a lawfull warre, if he had beene diſpoſed thereunto, notwithſtanding that diuers other reaſons and coniectures did teſtifie vnto them the contrary, for it was not likely that the Turke being able to make warre vpon the Emperor alone, (who was not very ſtrong at Sea), and eaſily to breake his forces, would enforce the Venetians to ioyne with the Imperialls and to vnite their forces with theirs, which being mighty at Sea, would not only hinder his enterprizes againſt the ſtates of other men, but likewiſe greatly endanger his owne, knowing very well that for the ſpace of eight and thirty yeares, the friendſhip and peace betwixt them had beene on both ſides ſo carefully obſerued, and namely that Soliman had euer made ſhew, both in his wordes and actions, to deſire nothing ſo much as the Venetians friendſhips: That ſince then nothing had happened on the Venetians part, that might alter that quiet, or enforce them to take armes, ſeeing that the Senate diſcreetly meſuring the forces of the Ottoman Empire, and fitting their deſeignes and actions to the condition of the times, did with great honor and reſpect proceed in the Turkes behalfe, prouided that the dignity of the Common-wealth might not therein receiue any preiudice, temporiſing the beſt they could with ſo mighty an enemy, whom being not able to aſſaile, they thought it wiſely done to keepe him for their friend, and to expect the commodity of time, or ſome better fortune of the Common-wealth. At the ſame time Tomazo Moceniga, Ambaſſador for the Common-wealth arriued at Conſtantinople, being ſent, according to the manner to reioyce with Soliman in the name of the Senate for the happy ſucceſſe of his warres in Perſia, and for his ſafe returne home to the Citty, He hauing kiſſed Solimans hands, and preſented his vſuall guifts of rich garments, he was well receiued and entertained of all thoſe of the Port, and particularly of Aiax the Viſier Baſcha, whoe did often-times aſſure him that their Lord did beare great good-will the Republicke, and was vere deſirous to maintaine that antient peace peace and friendſhip with it, ſo long as the Venetians ſhould beare them-ſelues in his behalfe with the like offices of friendſhippe: That Soliman had euer vſed to keepe his word and promiſe, and thought they ought not feare that hee would euer doe other-wiſe. Therefore hee began modeſtly to excuſe the matter concerning Contarens ſhippe, and other things done to the Venetian Marchants and their marchandize, as matters happened without the great Turkes expreſſe commandement, and which ſhould be ſpeedily remedied. The B. ſhas excuſes.

There was then a report at that time, how that the Sophy of Perſia had taken armes, and that hee would ſhortly be in the field whereby the Turkes would bee enforced to turne their forces vpon Perſia: And that the rumor which was currant, how that the Turkes had an enterprize vpon Chriſtendome, was rather to maintaine their reputation among Chriſtian Princes, then for any deſire they had at that time to employ their forces againſt them.

The end of the tenth Booke of the fifth Decade.

The Contents of the firſt Booke of the ſixth Decade.

THE Turke maketh great preparations both by Sea and land to enuade Chriſtendome. The Venetians are enforced to arme, and to ſtand vpon their guard. The French Kings deſeigns vpon Italy. The Imperialls are afraid of the Turkiſh Army. Count Guy de Rangon commeth to Venice, being ſent thither by the French King, and is anſwered quite contrary to his expectation. Three ſundry accidents are cauſe of warre betwixt the Venetians and Soliman. The Venetians fleet is by force of wind caſt vpon the Coaſt of Puglia, where that of the turkes lay. The Venetian fleet beeing retired from Puglia, Soliman declareth himſelfe their enemy. Doria his pollicy to enforce the Venetians to ioyne with him. The Baily Canalis aduiſeth the Senate to reconcile them-ſelues to Soliman. The Venetian Marchants are ſtayed, and their goods ſeaſed on ouer all Solimans Empire. Barbaroſſa waſteth the Iſle of Corfoù. The deſcription of the Iſle of Corfoù. The Venetians determine to fight with the Turke. A league contracted betwixt the Emperor, the Pope, and the Venetians. Doria his delaies, and in the end his refuſall to ioyne with the Venetians againſt the Turkes. The Venetians are conſtant to aſſaile the Turkes, not-with-ſtanding that Doria had forſaken them. The Viſier Baſcha councelleth Soliman to raiſe his campe from before Corfoù hauing viewed the place. Soliman ſeeketh the Venetians friendſhip.

The seege raised from before Corfou. Soliman determineth to assaile Naples of Romagnia, and Maluesia. Barbarossa his incursions vpon the Venetians Islands. The Venetians take the Isle of Scardona. The Emperor although hee affirmed that hee would make warre vpon the Turkes, is suspected of the contrary. The Popes dilligence to attone the Emperor and the French King. Sundry oppinions in the Senate concerning either warre or peace with Soliman. And lastly the Emperors Ambassador goeth about to breake the Venetians Newtrallity, but in vaine.

The First Booke of the sixth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

THE Venetians by the Bashas speech, remayning irresolute and in doubt either of warre or peace, were greatly troubled, wherein the French Ambassador did by a maruelous cunning entertaine them, hoping thereby to cause them to condescend to his Kings deseignes, to ioyne them-selues with the French, and to abandon the Imperialls friendship, assuring them that if they would so doe, to shield them from all danger on the Turkes behalfe.

Sund. yreports concerning the Turkish army.

In the meane time sundry rumors were bruted in Constantinople, some affirming that those great preparations for the fleet, was to passe into Puglia, and others said that it was to enter into the Venetian Gulph, there to assaile what-so-euer it could finde to belong vnto the Emperor: others thought that it was for Barbary, according to the aduise of Cariadine Barbarossa, and others like-wise did threaten the Venetians, naming particularly the Isle of Corfoù.

These preparations were as great by land as by sea, and made with great speed, so as it was certenly thought, that hee would set forth more then three hundred saile, with great store of ordnance, warlike engins, and great quantity of all sortes of munition.

The Venetians being troubled with these preparations, and for diuers occasions suspecting the Turkes faith, not-with-standing that the league made of a long time with Soliman did still continue, resolued likewise to arme as fast as they could, supposing that there was no safer meanes to assure their affaires, then to stand vpon their gard for feare of beeing surprized. Therefore they beganne to make great prouisions for warre, and leauied on a sodaine eight thousand footemen to re-enforce their garrisons: they did trimme their old Gallies, and gaue order to build fifty new ones, they ſtayed ſome Venetians, and ſtrangers that were bound for ſondry voyages, to make vſe of them for the carriage of the munitions and other neceſſaries for the fleet; determining if dangers did increaſe to arme the number of an hundred Galleis; and for that purpoſe, they choſe for Generall according to their vſual manner, by way of lotte, in the Councell of the Pregnais Ieronimo Peſare, a man very ſkilfull in the affaires of the common-wealth, and cheefely in ſea buſineſſe, who was afterwards allowed by the great Councell. But that which among other matters did moſt troble them was the care from whence to haue meanes to furniſh the expences which they were to make, their treaſor beeing wholly exhauſted by the late warres, wherby they were to inuent ſundry extraordinary deuiſes, to get money ſpeedily. They created three Procurators of Saint Marke, which is one of the chiefe dignities in the common-wealth next to the Duke, namely Andrew Capello, Ieronimo Bragadino, Iaccmo Cornare who did each of them aide the Republicke with twelue thouſand crowns, they did afterwards entreat the Pope to permit them to raiſe two hundred thouſand Ducats vpon the Clergy of their ſtate, which the Pope making great difficultie to graunt, alledging ſometimes the Clergyes pouerty, and then that he could not beleeue that Soliman did intend to march againſt Chriſtendome, they were enforced to raiſe it ſome where elſe, and amid theſe troubles and perplexities of mind, they did not forget, following the holy and religious inſtitution of their Foreſathers, to haue recourſe cheefely to diuine aſſiſtance, whereuppon ſolleme prayers were commanded to be made in all Churches & foure hundred meaſures of wheate were giuen to the poore Friers, to pray to God that it would pleaſe him to fauour the good and deuout affection of the Councellors of the State.

to

The Venetians preparations to ſtand vpon their guard againſt the Turke.

The Senates care to furniſh meanes for the expences of warre.

The Imperialls were in no leſſe care and trouble to be aſſured of the Turkiſh forces, whereuppon they cauſed great numbers of Spaniſh footmen to paſſe into Italy, to lye in Garriſon in the Realmes of Sicill and Naples, and in other places expoſed to the enemies arriuall; they ſent word to Andrew Doria Prince of Melfi, who at the ſame time was Admiral for the Emperor on the Mediterranian ſeas, that he ſhould ſpeedily make ready his Gallies, and come into the kingdome to ioyne with thoſe of Naples Sicilly, and the religion of Malta, to command there. But theſe prouiſions being weake were not ſufficient to reſiſt the Turkiſh forces. For the Emperor was at the ſame time enforced to looke to the defenſe of his other Eſtates which the French King determined to inuade, who for that purpoſe was come to Lyons, from whence he had ſent before him into Italy fifteene thouſand Almaine and Gaſcon footmen: whervpon the Emperor, to diuert theſe deſeines, raiſed in his Cuntrey of Flanders an army of twenty thouſand footmen, and eight thouſand horſe, to enter vppon the Frontiers of France.

Imperialls affraid of the Turkiſh army

The King cometh to Lyons to go into Italy.

Now that which moſt hindered them from prouiding for the imminent dangers threatened by the Turkes, were the rumors which were ſpred abroad, how that the French had an enterprize vppon Genoa, where the Genowaies, being affrighted, did boldly tell Doria that they could not ſuffer him to abandon his cuntrey, nor to carry the Galleys from thence, which were the ſinewes of the Imperiall army, becauſe that the two and twenty ſpaniſh Galleies that lay at Barcelona were in bad equipage to put to Sea. During theſe contentions betwixt the Princes of Chriſtendome, the Turke taking his aduantage thereby (as hee had done at ſundry times to moleſt Chriſtendome, departed with his land army about the begining of March and came to Andrinople, where hauing remained a while, and ſpent ſome ſmall time in hunting whileſt other prouiſions were made for his iourney, he went from thence about the latter end of Iune, and came to Scopia a Citty of Macedon, and then tooke his way through the confines of Albania. His naual army departed at the ſame time forth of the Streight of Galipolis, to the number of more then three hundred ſaile, (as hath beene ſaid,) whereof, two hundred were Galleis, and the reſidue, Galeots, Fuſts, and other lesser vessells, vnder the command of Lusti Bascha Captaine Generall, who represented the great Turkes person: it was not certainely knowne what commission he had, nor whither he would bend his course: some said that hee was commanded to assaile the Venetians, if occasions were offerd: others affirmed the contrary, saying, That hee was commanded in no sort to touch any thing that belonged vnto them: but the common report was, that he went to inuade Puglia.

The Genouois forbid Doria to carry the Galleis out of Genoa.

The vncertaine course of the Turkish fleet, doth put the Venetians in doubt.

Doria in the meane time, being come to Ciuitauechia, and finding the Popes Gallies to be ready there wen to the Far of Messina, there to make a fleet of the Gallies of Naples, Sicill, and other places and perceiuing, that when they were all ioyned together, they were to weake to resist the Turkish forces, determined, (after that he had left the greatest part of the Gallies in places of safety) to saile towards the Leuant with a few light Gallies, which he made choyse of, to molest in some sort, (occasion being offered) any thing that did belong to the Turkes, auoyding by all meanes to meet with their fleet. The Venetians hauing notice of the arriuall of the Turkish fleet at Modon, being yet vncertaine whither, or with what commission it sailed, did, not without great doubt consult in the Senate what the Generall Pesare were best to doe, who was already arriued at Corfou with threescore and tenne Gallies.

The Generall had not till then receiued any other commissions then generall, and comformable to the Senates intention, still to remaine neuter, namely to hold amity with the Imperialls, and with the Turkes, to preserue whatsoeuer did belong to the Common-wealth from wrong, to giue victualls freely to both of them: to auoyd all occasions of suspition, and to keepe themselues farre off from the Fleets: wherevnto they added, that he should still keepe his fleet together, and not, if it were possible, leaue the Gulph to the discretion of the Turkes, least they should hinder the Dalmatian Gallies, and others which were making ready at Venice, from ioyning with them, if need should bee.

The Venetians remaine neuters betwixt the Imperialls and the Turkes

The opinions in this Councell were very different (as it often happeneth in such consultations) what he had more to doe, but at last they resolued to referre the whole matter to the dilligence and discretion of the Generall, because it was an hard matter well to prouide for the sundry accidents which might happen, according to which, Captaines did for the most part vse to gouerne themselues. They only concluded to diuide the Army, and to create another Generall, of lesse authority then Pessare, so as both of them beeing together Pessare, should haue the sole command, and the other was to remaine in the Gulph, whilest Pessare should be at Corfou, or any where else.

A second Generall created at Venice.

Giouan Vituri was by the common consent of euery one appointed for this place, who was in great account both for his wisdome and valour. This man hauing taken speedy order for his voyage, departed from Venice with some armed Gallies of the latter Gouernours, and sailed into Dalmatia, where there came vnto him, Francesco Pascalic the Prouidator, with certaine Gallies which were at Corfou, Nicholao Bondimiero Captaine of the Gulph, and Dominico Contaren Captaine of the Fusts, so that Vituri had six and forty Galleis vnder his command, besides six Fusts, and the Generall Pessare had foure and fifty Galleis, one Gallion commanded by Bertuci Contaren, and a great shippe of warre gouerned by Iacomo Armiero.

Iohn Vituri created second Generall.

Nomber of the Venetian forces at Sea.

Now within a while after there arose among the Senators a doubt almost like the former, by reason of the report that was spred abroad how that the Turkish Fleet was comming into the Ile of Corfou, and that they had already descried it from the Ile of Zante, sailing thitherwards amayne, some thinking it fit thereupon to keep the fleet diuided, others refuting this opinion, said that they ought to permit the Generall Pessare, if he should find it expedient for the Common-wealth, to make a fleet of all the Gallies; and to Command Vituri, that if Pessare should send to him for that purpose, to obey him without expecting any other expresse comcommandement from the Senate. Diuers did likewiſe reiect this opinion, for many reaſons, and propounded for the ſafeſt courſe (if that the peace with Soliman were broken) to ioyne their forces with the Imperials (who had already ſought it at their hands) and that, as ſoone as might bee; for the more eaſie defenſe of Corfoù. This propoſition being reiected like the reſt, they at laſt concluded to referre the whole matter to Peſare, who might ioyne with Doria if need ſhould be.

The French being aduertized of all theſe difficulties, and hoping to be able by new practizes to induce the Venetians to conſent to that, whereunto till then they would neuer harken, did forthwith ſend the Count Guy de Rangone to Venice, who being brought in before the councell of Tenne (the French Ambaſſadour not being preſent) who afterwards did the like a part by himſelfe, hauing preſented his letters of credit from the King, beganne with great eloquence to declare the great good will which King Francis did beare to their Republike, and how highly he did eſteeme it, then he did put them in minde of diuers and ſundry things which the French Kings had done for the maintenance and ſtay of that common wealth; from thence falling vpon the ſundry and particular accidents of thoſe times, he did perſwade them to abandon the Emperours alliance, and to embrace that of the French King, offering them from him and by his commandement the city of Cremona, and all the country of Gyradade, ſo, as by their common armies the State of Milan might be conquered, promiſing them beſides, all aide and aſſiſtance to reduce the Cities of Rauenna and Ceruia vnder their obedience, with the territories of Puglia, Otranto, Brundoſium, Monopoli, Polignan, and Trani, by which meanes they ſhould be reſtored to all that which they had enioyed before the laſt warres. But hee did eſpecially inſiſt very much vpon the miſerable condition of the time, which was to bee conſidered, promiſing to defend and ſhield them, by his Kings meanes and authority, from all thoſe perills and dangers which threatned them from the Turkes to their owne honour and reputation.

The French King ſendeth Count Guy de Rangon to Venice.

The effect of the Count Ran on his oration to the Senate.

This propoſition being vttered with great vehemency did greatly trouble the mindes of the Auditors, for on the one ſide, great and faire hopes were propounded with equall recompences, and yet not without warre, and great trauaile; on the other ſide an incertenty of peace, with as many difficulties, did preſent it ſelfe before them, the ſelfe ſame dangers remay ning ſtil in force, made far greater by the French Kings indignation, if he ſhould perceiue his friendſhip, with ſuch goodly offers to be ſo often contemned and ſet at nought.

The Senate being aſſembled therevpon, the Collodge of the wiſe men, hauing determined to tell the Count Rangon; that the Senate did firſt of all thanke him for his great and notable offers made vnto them, then, concerning the vinon which he propounded, that the King might haue perceiued by their actions paſt, what account they had euer made, and now more then euer of the Councell of France, to the which they had neuer beene wanting, nor would euer faile when occaſion ſhould be offered, earneſtly requeſting the King ſo to hold and beleeue it: one onely perſon, Marke-Antonio Cornare, a man, at that time highly eſteemed, for his eloquence and great reputation, though he were not very old, being of a contrary opinion, would haue them freely to anſwere the Count Rangon, That the common-wealth had euer vſed to keepe her promiſe inuiolably, which was a matter worthy and beſeeming a Prince, and that therefore the ſame being vnited with the Emperour by a new confederacy, could not harken to any other contrary therevnto: but they did hope that the King, as a wiſe and moſt Chriſtian Prince, and their friend, would not for all that diſcontinue the good offices which he had already begunne in their behalfe towards the Turke: and he did conſtantly maintaine this opinion by a vehement and perſwaſiue oration; wherevpon he was attentiuely heard, and commended of all men. So ſoone as he had ended, Propoſitions in the Senate for the anſwering of the Count Rangon.

Antonio Cornare repugneth the former propoſition.

Leonardo

Rangon is answered according to the opinion of Cornare.

Leonardo Eme one of the wise men of the councel, a man of authority, and well experienced in matters of importance both at home and abroad, rose vp, and began to answer to euery point of Cornares speech: But neither his authority nor al the reasons which he alleadged to the contrary, could keepe them from answering Rangon in the same manner as Cornare had propounded.

In the meane time newes were brought to Venice how that the Turkish fleet was arriued at Valona, and that passing along thorow the Channel of Corfoù, it had saluted the castle with ordnance shot in signe of friendship, according to the vse and manner of warre, that the castle had in friendly sort giuen them the like salutation: and how that Solimon had neither in that Island nor else-where committed any hostile action; but that certaine things, being forcibly taken from some of the Republikes subiects, had beene restored to them, and the Robbers, for terror to the rest, had beene hanged vpon the saile yardes of his galley. Some Senators were of opinion, that the Generall Pesare, in acknowledgement thereof, and vnder pretence of peace and friendship, should send some captaine of his Gallies to Soliman, to vse meanes to discouer some of his deseignes; but it was reiected, for feare least the Turkes would interpret it sinisterly to their aduantage, and least the reputation of the Venetian forces should therby be diminished with them, or else giue them some occasion to make some great and vnreasonable demand: but they were within a while after freed of that care, by newes that they receiued, how that Iacomo Canalis, going to Constantinople to execute the office of Baily in steed of Nicola Iustinian, and being come to Nouobazar, was by Solimans commandment brought backe to the campe who could satisfie them in all things. At this stay stood the Venetians affaires at that time, neither at open warre, nor assured peace, all matters being full of feare and suspition, when as vnluckily and vnlooked for, three sundry accidents happened which did cast the Republike head-long into warre with Soliman. The first was that of Simon Nassi the Zaratin, who commanding a Dalmatian Galley, did vnfortunately meet with a small Turkish vessel laden with victuals which was going to Valona, against which (becausse it would not obey a certaine signall according to the manner of nauigation, nor strike her sailes) he discharged a cannon and sunke it. Although this fact did greatly trouble Solimans haughty courage, and all his Bashas, yet neuertheless making shew to beare it patiently becausse he would not perhaps at that time interrupt his other deseignes, he determined to send Ianusbei the Dragoman to Corfou to complain to the Generall Pesare, how that thorow the insolency of a meane captaine of a Galley, the peace betwixt them had beene violated and infringed, and to demand to haue the author therof punished, and the dammages, amounting to more then thirty thousand Ducats, to be repaired. Vpon the neck thereof the second accident happened. There were foure captains of gallies at the same time at the gard of the channel of Corfou, to wit, Iusto Gradonico, Micaele Grimani, Iacomo de Mezze, and Ieromino Micaele: these men so soone as they perceiued those armed vessels to come towards them, which were two Gallies and one Fust, conducting the Turkish Ambassador, without taking any farther notice of them, they fiercely charged them, so as the Turkes being amazed betooke themselues to flight, and supposing that they could not soone enough escape from them, sailed as fast as they could to Cimera, a barbarous nation and enemy to the Turkes: wherevpon, they were badly entreated there, and al of them committed to prison, and among the reft this Ianusbei. This exploit did greatly discontent the Generall Pesare who in some sort to moderate the fact, did sodainely send Francisco Zene captaine of a Galley to Cimera, to vse meanes with a good sum of money to redeeme Ianusbei, the which for the Republiks sake he soone obtained without mony. This being likewise brought to Solimans knowledge, he was prouoked by some of his seruants to take speedy reuenge thereof, yet neuertheless hee would not for that time harken thereunto, but sent for the Baily Canelis to come before him, vnto whom he greatly complained

Three sundry accidents caused war betwixt Soliman and the Venetians.

Solimans discontent for the first accident.

The second accident worse then the first.

complayned of the officers of the Republike, who did not dayly ceaſe to commit deeds cleare contrary to the deſire of peace and good will, which he had at his arriuall aſſured him that the Common-wealth did beare vnto him, at the laſt he ſeemed to be content that the Baylife ſhould expreſly ſend ſome of his ſeruants to Corfou, truly and particularly to vnderſtand how matters had paſſed, whereupon he ſodainely ſent Aleſſandro Viſino thither who was then with him.

Soliman in the meane time continuing his purpoſe to aſſaile the coaſt of Puglia, cauſed great number of horſe to be landed on the territory of Ottranto, who ſcouring the whole country brought away men, women, and all ſort of cattaile, with other mouueables, filling the whole country with feare and terror.

Doria in the mean time hauing manned eight and twenty light gallies with ſoldiers and mariners, comming to ſcoure the ſeas nere to Zante and Zeffalonia, tooke diuers Turkiſh veſſels, which being laden with victuals, were going to Valona, then ſayling towards the Gulphe he arriued vpon the ſea of Corfou, at the very ſame inſtant in a manner, that Ianusbei being chaſed by the Venetian Gallies, landed at Cimera, whereby he had his part in the booty, and carried away the empty Turkiſh veſſels, which did much encreaſe the Turkes hatred to the Venetians, and made them to ſuſpect that they had ſome ſecret intelligence with the Imperials.

Doria his incurſions cauſeth the Turks to ſuſpect the Venetians.

The Generall Peſare being aduertized of Barbaroſſas departure from the confines of Zant, where he had remayned to aſſure the victuals which came from Conſtantinople to the campe, and of his ſayling towards Corfoù, did thinke it a very fit occaſion for himſelfe to make vſe of the liberty which the Senate had giuen him, to ioyne both the fleets together, wherevpon he reſolued to enter into the Gulphe and to ioyne with the Generall Vitturi, meaning neuertheleſſe by all meanes to auoide meeting with the Turkiſh gallies: But being on his way, and driuen by a contrary winde, he was carried to ſea-ward before the winde, to thoſe quarters where he was to meet with that which he had moſt of all auoided: for hauing ſailed a long time with the whole fleet, and about night being come neere to land, he was councelled to ankor there, to paſſe the reſt of the night, which was ſo darke, as they could not diſcouer a farre off, which gaue occaſion to the third accident. For it fell out, that the vantgard conſiſting of fiteene Gallies, conducted by Aleſſandro Contaren the Prouidator, did vnawares ſtrike vpon a Turkiſh galley (this was an Imperial galley, prepared for the great Turke, if hee ſhould deſire to come to ſea, and was commanded by Baſtan Rais) thoſe within it hauing, in the Italian tongue, demanded of the Venetians, whoſe veſſel that was which was ſo neere them, and they replying that it belonged to the Venetians, did aske them the ſelfe ſame queſtion, who they were, but they making no anſwer, vſed all meanes to eſcape thence, and then on a ſodaine ſhot off a peece of ordnance: Contaren being then mooued with diſdaine, and ſpurred forward by a zeale to honour and reputation, notwithſtanding that the darkeneſſe of the night would not ſuffer him to diſcerne any thing, did neuertheleſſe redouble the bankes of Rowers, and followed that Turkiſh galley, which had plaied an enemies part, and after a long fight, there being more then three hundred ſouldiers in it, he became Maſter thereof, by the death of all the Turkes, ſome few excepted who had hid themſelues.

The winde carrieth Peſare with all the Venetian forces neere to thoſe of the Turkes.

The third accident occaſioned by the taking of Solimans Gallies.

Contaren was by ſome reprehended for this deed as though being carried away by a particular deſire of reuenge, he had enterprized that which he knew to be againſt the commodity and ſeruice of the common-wealth, by executing that hoſtile act vpon the Turkes: yet neuertheleſſe others in excuſing him ſaid; That He had more then any man elſe foreſeene all thoſe diſorders; by meanes whereof, to auoide all occaſions, he demanded to haue the army conducted into Candy, ſeeing that the Turkes had paſſed as friends thorow the Channell of Corfoù.

The Generall after this exploit paſſing forwards on his way, came very nere

to

to the coast of Puglia, where they descried an infinite number of fiers, and heard at the same time sundry shot of ordnance. They thought at the first that it had beene those of the country, who hauing descried the Venetian fleet, and not knowing what vessels they were, did giue warning to the inhabitants round about to retire themselues into the strong townes: but they soone found the contrary, for it was a warning to the Turkes that were there, speedily to embarke themselues (as they did) and to fall into order of battaile before the Venetian fleet.

The Venetian fleet vpon the coast of Puglia.

Then was there great confusion in the Venetian army for the vnhoped for arriuall of the Turkish gallies; on the one side danger was very nere, and their doubt very great, whether they were best to escape by flight, or dispose themselues to battaile. Flight seemed dishonorable, and of small profit: to fight, was against the Senates expresse command, the which they were to obserue, and not on the vncertaine euent of a battaile, and to their owne disaduantage hazard the gallies, on which depended the whole defense and safety of their Estate by sea.

The confusion of the Venetian army when it saw that of the Turkes to be nere them.

Matters remayning in this confusion by reason of these irresolutions, either to abide, or to be gonne, it happened that when the Generall commanded to turne the Prowes, and to returne towards Corfoù, it was done in a manner in disorder, so as all of them preparing with speed to get forth of that danger, fiue Venetian gallies tarried behind, either because they had not soone enough turned their Prowes, or for that they were not so light as the others, foure of them fell into the Turkes hands, who soone after, by declaring himselfe their enemy, did inhumainely put the foure captaines to death which commanded them, as for the fifth which was commanded by Giouan Baptista Mirchouich of Pago, al-be-it it was farther behinde then any of the rest, did neuertheless by chance escape that danger, for carrying in her flag the cressent or half moone, they thought it to be a Turkish galley, and thereby, being not medled with, it found meanes afterward to escape to Ottranto.

The Venetian fleet loseth foure Gallies taken by the Turkes.

Now this latter exploit caused Soliman wholly to resolue to make warre vpon the Signory of Venice, who was before that time halfe-minded so to doe by reason of the precedent actions, whereby he perceiued the small affection that the Venetians did beare vnto him: his seruants likewise the more to animate him therevnto, did agrauate the matter; and afterwards, a letter of Doria written to Pesare cõming to his hands, assured him of that which he most doubted: Doria had (as it was thought) forged that letter, and found meanes to haue it fall into the Turks hands, to make them beleeue that he had some secret intelligence with the Venetians, and by that means to set them at ods; thereby enforcing them for their safety to ioyne with him, for the which purpose, passing along at the same time almost nere to Corfou, he had craued conference with the Generall Pesare, meaning expressly more then once to hold long discourse, that he might cause the Turkes to enter into some suspition.

Soliman resolueth to make warre on the Venetians.

Doria his policy to enforce the Venetians to ioyne with him.

All these exploits being knowne at Venice did greatly trouble the Senate, where the opinions neuertheless were different, some blaming the indiscretion of those who by their rashnesse had throwne the common-wealth head-long into a great and dangerous warre, contrary to the Senates intentions, others, publikely affirming the contrary said, that they had done wel and discreetly, according to the rule and discipline of sea affaires, and the reputation of their army, and after sundry other reasons propounded on both sides, they concluded to tarry for aduertizements from the Baily, to vnderstand particularly in what manner the Turke had taken those things which were past: and all their determinations against those who had offended, were deferred till then.

Canalis commanded by Soliman to send to the Venetian Senate.

The Baily within a while after, by Solimans commandement sent Alessandro Vrsino, who did wholly resolue them of all that they desired to know, and sent them word, sharply to punish those who had violated and broken the peace, and to make it apparent that whatsoeuer had beene done was not by the Senates will or

or conſent, and that by ſo doing, Aiax the Viſir Baſha, did put them in hope of the continuance of the peace. Vpon this aduertiſement they reſolued to write to the Generall to ſend the Zaratine captaine, Iuſto Gradonico who commanded thoſe Gallies that were for the gard of the Channell of Corfou when Ianusbei was purſued, with all the reſt whom he ſhould thinke had offended in that action, with their legs and hands bound to Venice: as for the Prouidator Contaren they commanded him to ſaile with his Galley to Zara, where leauing both it and his office, he ſhould come to Venice and preſent himſelfe before the Magiſtrate of the Auogario. Some of the Senators were of opinion to call home the General Peſare likewiſe, for to purge himſelfe of that matter, becauſe that all errors committed in warre are to be attributed to the Generall who holdeth the ſoueraigne authority, they ſuppoſing, that if the Generall, had puniſhed the Zaratine, all the other inconueniences would not afterwards haue happened, and that therefore he was guilty thereof: that the peace with the Turke was of ſuch importance to the Common-wealth, that all other reſpects were not to be compared to it beſides, in regard that the whole fleet was to remaine ſtil together, there was no need to haue ſo many Generals, who for the moſt part doe cauſe diſorder in affaires of importance, rather then any good gouernment.

The Senates reſolution vpon the Bailies aduertiſement

The Senate not conſenting to call home the Generall did ſend backe Vrſino to the Baily, and yet they would not haue Soliman at that time to be acquainted with that which had beene concluded againſt the Prouidator, and the captaines of the gallies, becauſe they would not haue the Turkes to thinke that what they had decreed, was done rather to ſatisfie them, then for their loue to iuſtice. Therefore they enioyned the Baily to demonſtrate the Senates ſound and ſincere affection, and how deſirous the Venetians were to continue their friendſhip and peace with Soliman; and that for the better teſtimony thereof, they would ſhortly ſend an expreſſe meſſenger vnto him with particular inſtructions of what had paſſed, and within a while after, Vincenzo Grimani, Procurator of Saint Mark, was choſen for that purpoſe.

The Senates anſwer to the Baily.

But before Vrſino came backe with his inſtructions to Valona, Soliman, who after the taking of Caſtro had beſeeged Ottranto, being ſpurred forward by diſdaine and by Barbaroſſas purſutes, notwithſtanding that he had promiſed the Baily to attempt nothing til Vrſinos returne, did neuertheleſſe determin to returne to Valona, and to turne all his forces both by ſea and land againſt the Venetians, and eſpecially to aſſaile the Iſland and fort of Corfou, it being at the ſame time very commodious for him.

Soliman reſoluеth to make war vpon the Venetians.

It is reported that Aiax the viſier Baſha, ſought by ſoundry reaſons to diuert Soliman from this reſolution, by ſhewing him that in ſo doing he would encreaſe the Imperials forces, who were deadly enemies to the Ottomans, with whom the Venetians ſhould be enforced to ioyne for their owne defenſe and ſafety: beſides, that the yeere being already very farre ſpent (for it was the latter end of Auguſt) would not ſuffer him to beginne any long or difficult enterprize: that the campe did already want victuals, by reaſon that Doria had taken ſo many ſmall veſſels laden with victuals: But Barbaroſſa being greatly incenſed for that Doria had taken and ſunke twelue of his Gallies at the Merleres, ſought to reuenge himſelfe vpon the Venetians, ſaying that it was They, who had giuen meanes, and aduiſed the Imperials to aſſaile his Gallies neere to the Channel of Corfou, and in their ſight almoſt, hauing ſecret intelligence with their enemies, furniſhing them with hauens, victuals and all other commodities, ſo as by theſe reaſons he cauſed Soliman to condiſcend to his councell.

The viſier Baſha his reaſons to diuert him from his reſolution.

Now ſo ſoone as he had reſolued to make warre vpon the Venetians, he wrote to all places of the Ottoman Empire, where the Venetians had moſt trafficke, that they ſhould impriſon their perſons, and ſeize vpon their goods, and eſpecially at Alexandria, whither three great Gallies were come vpon his word.

The Venetians are impriſoned & their goods ſeiz'd vpon ouer all the Turkiſh Empire.

Soliman

Soliman came in the meane time from La Valona to Butrintotto, right ouer against Corfou, the more commodiously to passe ouer his forces from thence into the Island. Barbarossa was already gon thither with part of the fleete and some thousand horse to spoile and scoure the country (which he did.)

The newes thereof being brought to Venice (which they had before that time suspected) did greatly trouble all men: for notwithstanding that the castle of Corfou was thought to be strong enough to sustaine all the furious attempts of the Turkes, they neuertheless feared, that they should not long be able to resist so mighty an enemy, and defend their owne State exposed in so many sundry places to his mercy. The Isle of Corfou lieth right ouer against the Venetian Gulphe betwixt the Ionian and Adriattick sea, on the North side thereof lieth the coast of Albania, from whence it is some two miles distant, and stretcheth it selfe from the West to the East in manner of a Cressent or halfe Moone, sauing that in the middest, the inward part thereof breaking betwixt the great arch maketh it like two Semicircles, it being in circuit a hundred and twenty miles; that space of sea which lieth betwixt the Island and the firme land, is commonly called the Channell of Corfou. The aire there is very good, and soile fertil enough, there being diuers goodly plaines on the Northside. The towne is seated almost in the middest of the Island, within it, vpon the sea, at the foote of an hil which in a manner doth wholly enuiron it, it is of a sufficient bignesse, and inhabited, and there were in it at the same time aboue eight thousand persons: but the castle is of no great circuit, nor capable of contayning great store of people, but for the sytuation thereof, most safe against all the assaults of enemies; it hath two fortes in a very high place vpon the point of the hill, which doe not alone beate vpon all sides of the towne walles, and castle, but discouering likewise the sea, and the vallies and neighbour Mountaines, can with their ordnance keepe any army from encamping there, but with great danger. There is no other towne or castle in the whole Island, but diuers country houses scattered here and there in the Champaine: yet neuertheless on the South side thereof, vpon an hill, there is a castle called Saint Angelo, stronger by sytuation then by art.

Description of the Isle of Corfou.

This Island had belonged to the Venetians more then an hundred and fifty yeeres, and they did carefully keepe it, as most fit for the conseruation of their dominion at sea, it being accounted the Bulwarke of Italy against the forces of Barbarians: Babon di Nalda was gouernor thereof, being accompanied with diuers Venetian Gentlemen. There was a strong garrison of Italian souldiers in the castle to the number of two thousand, and as many of those of the Island all good souldiers: and besides the Rowers of foure Gallies which were left there for the gard of the Island, great store of artillery and munition; and for the auoiding of all confusion, euery man knew what he had to doe, which made them without any feare at all to attend the arriuall of the enemies army.

The number of souldiers and munition in the Island.

The Senate fearing a long seege, and the sinister accidents which do commonly accompany it, did resolue to fight with the enemy to cause him to raise his campe, being inuited therevnto by sundry reasons, because they knew first, that so long as the Turkish fleet should remaine whole, furnishing the campe with men, of whom they had great numbers, that the Isle of Corfou and all the rest should remaine exposed to infinite dangers, not for any other cause then the long continuance of the warre, all the forces of the Republike being consumed and they in danger besides, to loose some portion of their dominions: next, that which did incite them to hazard the fortune of a battaile, was, their owne great fleet of an hundred strong gallies, with the meanes to encrease it, because they would not vnprofitably consume the great expences of such a warlike preparation: but that which did most animate them to this resolution, was their hope to be speedily releeued by the other Christian Princes, according to their offers and promises so often reiterated at what time they should enterprize any thing thing againſt the Turke, eſpecially of the Pope and the Emperor; and not to accept of them at that time, the Commonwealth ſhould ſeeme wholly to haue forgotten her owne ſafety, and that of all Chriſtendome.

The Senate determineth to fight with the enemy.

The Imperials had fifty light gallies at ſea, with as many other great armed veſſels, the Pope had foure gallies there, and the Knights of Malta ſome other. Theſe forces being ioyned to theirs, they hoped to chaſe away the Turkiſh fleet, and if they could not free Corfou from the ſeege, yet at leaſt to open a way to ſome great and notable exploit, wherevpon, hauing certaine notice that the enemies army was come to Corfou, and thereby warre declared againſt them, they determined to write to Marke-Antonio Contaren their Ambaſſadour in the Court of Rome, that in ſpeaking particularly of this buſineſſe to the Pope, together with the Senates reſolution, he ſhould declare vnto him the greatneſſe of the danger, in the common cauſe of Chriſtendome, and the ſpeed which it behoued them to vſe, againſt the common enemy.

The forces of the Imperials, and the Pope.

The Venetians remonſtrance to the Pope.

The Pope hauing vnderſtood the Senates reſolution ſeemed to be highly pleaſed therewith, ſauing that he did deſire nothing ſo much, as during his Papacy, to ſee all Chriſtian Princes vnited together againſt thoſe Infidels, who in the meane time that the Chriſtians had particular quarrells one with an other, were ſo mightily encreaſed, as they now did threaten to ruine them.

The Popes anſwer to the Venetian Ambaſſador.

Therevpon, he did not only confirme the offers and promiſes that were made before, but did likewiſe augment them, and as a moſt diſcret and well aduiſed perſon, he motioned the making of an vnion and league together againſt that common enemy, wherevnto his exhortation to all other Princes, and eſpecially to the Emperor, was of great force.

This league beeing reſolued on, it was concluded by a Generall conſent of all men to arme two hundred light Gallies, and the greateſt number of ſhips of warre and other great veſſels that they could, and in them to embarke fifty thouſand foot-men, and foure thouſand horſe; But becauſe ſome difficulties ſeemed to ariſe concerning the diſtribution of that expence, and vpon other Articles, and that the time in the meane ſpace did vrge them ſpeedily to ſend away the army to the releeſe of Corfoù; the Pope by confirming that which had beene concluded, would preſently haue the league to bee publiſhed, to giue it more force and reputation, and to inuite the other Chriſtian Princes to embrace and follow it, reſeruing the concluſion of certaine points, till he could receiue newes from Spaine.

A league betwixt the Pope the Emperor and the Venetians againſt the Turke.

It was ſollemnly publiſhed in Saint Peeters Church, where Gaſparo Contaren, the Venetian Cardinall, celebrated maſſe in the preſence of the Pope, and the whole Colledge of Cardinalls: the like was afterwards done at Venice, with praiers in all Churches, to giue thankes vnto God for that he had vnited the Chriſtian Princes againſt the Infidells: and for the execution of that which had beene concluded, the Senate ſent word to the Generalls, that leauing the Captaine of the Gulphe with foure Gallies for the guard of Dalmatia, they ſhould ſaile with the whole fleete to Brandiza: they did afterwardes make a great leauy of foot forces for to fill vp the promiſed number, then they appointed captaines for the great Gallies, and for the baſtard ones, who did very ſpeedily cauſe them to be made ready, which ſailed all of them vnder the conduct of Boudumiero, captaine of the Gallion: ſo as in a ſhort ſpace, all things were ready on the Venetians part.

The league is publiſhed at Rome, and at Venice.

The Venetians preparations for the army.

Andrew Doria, who lay at Naples, hauing intelligence of that which had beene concluded at Rome and Venice, that he ſhould meet at Brandiza to ioyne with the Venetians fleet, alleadging ſundry excuſes, ſome times that he would ſaile towards Marſeilles againſt the French nauall army, then, that he would go to Genoa, to new man his gallies, and to make prouiſion of other neceſſaries, did by all meanes prolonge his departure, notwithſtanding that Gaſparo Baſſalu the Doria delaies to ioyne with the Venetians.

Venetians Counsull at Naples did earnestly vrge it, by declaring vnto him the importance of the Isle of Corfou, which was to be preserued and defended from the danger wherein it was, in doing whereof, notwithstanding that he was to doe the Emperour seruice, he should neuertheless purchase great glory and reputation, the enterprize being executed vnder his conduct and command as Generall of the army: As also, for that he was obliged therevnto by his promise often made to the Venetians, vpon which they had not feared to commit into his hands all their forces, which were very great, and such, as the assurance of their Estate by sea, did wholly depend vpon them.

Doria his answer and departure towards Genoa.

Doria, not being mooued with all these reasons, answered that they should haue accepted his offers at that time when occasion was offered of ouerthrowing Barbarossa, when with a part of his army he passed thorow the Channel of Corfou, so, as neither the Popes letters which he wrote vnto him with his owne hand, nor the arriuall of the Emperors Ambassador at Naples, who for that purpose came thither expresly from Rome in post, could in any sort alter his determination, but he speedily departed from Naples to goe to Genoa, saying that he would acquaint the Emperor with what had passed, and there attend his commandment. The departure of Doria, and his manner of proceeding did greatly trouble the Venetians, not so much for that their hope was frustrate of being able to breake the Turkish army, as for to see themselues vnder vaine promises, deceiued by the Imperials: yet neuertheless al-be-it that Doria his departure, and the report that Barbarossa was comming into the Gulphe with an hundred gallies might haue perswaded them to countermand their Generalls not to goe to Brandiza; the Senate notwithstanding, to shew their constancy in matters determined and resolued vpon, and to preserue the reputation of their army, which would haue beene much blemished, if they should haue seemed to depend wholly vpon Doria's councels and actions, after sundry opinions, resolued to alter nothing of that which had beene determined, but made a new request to the Pope, that he would command the Count of Anguillare to saile with the Churches gallies and those of Malta to Brandiza according to their former resolution.

How Dorias departure did trouble the Venetians.

The Venetians constancy.

The Turkes in the meane time had landed fiue and twenty thousand men and thirty peeces of ordnance in the Isle of Corfou, & builded foure Caualliers round about the castle, to make them equall to those within it, and to beate downe their defenses, hauing first wasted the whole Island, cut downe the fruite trees, burned the country houses, and led away as prisoners al those whom they found in the Island which had not saued themselues in the castle, many neuertheless escaped into Saint Angelos castle, the sytuation of the place being able to gard them: Then hauing begunne the battery and perceiuing, that by reason of the long distance of the place, where they had beene enforced to build their Caualliers, for feare of the ordnance within, their cannon shot was of no great force, they were desirous to approch neerer, but they were beaten backe with cannon shot to their great harme & losse. The Visier Basha came twice from Butintrot into the Island, and being come vpon the brinke of the castle dike to view the place, reported to Soliman that the sytuation of the place, and the fortifications were such as their was no hope in a long time to doe any good there, wherevpon he councelled Soliman to raise the seege, and to retire his armies, which beganne already to feele great discommodities, as well by sickness, as by the small store of victuals that was brought thither: as also because that winter drew nere, a very vnfit season for such an enterprize, and that the longer he tarried there, the more he should loose his reputation, being afterwards enforced to discampe without any prosperous successe: that hee had by a sodaine alteration turned his forces vpon that enterprize which had beene prepared for other more easie purposes against the Emperour, and therefore that hee was not to wonder if the euent of a rash and head-long action, had not answered the fortunate fortunate ſucceſſe which was wont to follow the wiſe and diſcret councels of the Ottomans: that he ſhould ſend away his two armies by ſea and land to Conſtantinople, there to refreſh them which were much weakened by ſundry accidents, to the end they might the yeere following with better ſucceſſe enterprize ſome exploit more aſſured and generous.

The Visier Basha, counselleth Soliman to raise his seege.

Such was the opinion and councell of Aiax the Viſier Baſha, yet neuertheleſſe to preſerue their reputation, feigning ſome other deſeignes contrary to that which he ſpake; or rather enuying Barbaroſſa his greatneſſe, and ſeeking to diſgrace him by reconciling the Venetian Common-wealth to Soliman, he called for the Venetian Baily, who had ſtill followed the campe, and told him, that if his countrymen would ſatisfie the harmes and dammages, as well of men as other matters, which Soliman had ſuſteined at that ſeege, and make a demonſtration, how that whatſoeuer had happened, was not by the conſent or appointment of the common-wealth, he had ſo handled the matter, that the ſeege ſhould be raiſed from before Corſou, and his countrimen ſhould recouer peace and friendſhip, as in times before with Soliman: Ianusbei the firſt Dragoman did afterwards affirme that the ſame came from Solimans ſelfe, as that did manifeſt which ſoone after enſued, the Baily hauing leaue giuen him to ſend one of his followers to Venice for that purpoſe, who was conducted in ſafety by two Chiaus to Caſtel-nouo.

Soliman diſlodgeth from before Corfou.

But Soliman almoſt at the ſame time not tarrying for any anſwere raiſed his campe, and hauing ſhipped his ordnance and al his ſouldiers, ſailed towards Conſtantinople after that he had continued his ſeege for ten daies ſpace, and carried away with him more then fifteene thouſand ſoules into bondage. The Iſle of Paſſu very nere to Corfou, with Butrintot, ſeated on the firme land on Albanias ſide a nere neighbour to it, taſted the like harme and loſſe.

Barbaroſſa departing with the army from before Corfou, ſailed towards Preueze, Soliman not permitting him to remaine vpon thoſe ſeas with an hundred gallies to ſcoure the coaſtes of Puglia and Sicily.

It was ſuppoſed at that time, that the chiefeſt cauſe that mooued Soliman ſo ſodainely to raiſe his campe, was certaine newes from Perſia: becauſe, that two daies before this reſolution, ſome Olaches were ſpeedily come to the campe, and the cauſe of their comming not being diuulged, it was certainly thought that they had brought bad newes, that nation being wont to publiſh euery where any thing that did concerne their glory or reputation, and to keepe ſecret and conceale that which might procure them any contrary effect: but vndoubtedly, the true cauſe of his diſlodging, proceeded from the great difficulties which Aiax had diſcouered in that enterprize of Corfou.

Soliman determineth to aſſaile Naples in Romagnia and Maluceſia.

The newes of the enemies diſcamping did infinitely reioyce the Venetians, and generall proceſſions were made for it, with praiers in Churches, and ſundry almes giuen to the poore Monaſteries and other deuout places of the city. But Soliman ſeeking to moleſt the Venetians in ſundry places, had at the ſame time commanded Caſſin the Sangiack of Morea, that aſſembling all the ſouldiers round about, he ſhould beſeege Naples of Romagnia and Maluceſia.

The Republike had held vnder her dominion diuers of the principall townes of Morea, the fruitfulleſt country of al Grecia, and the moſt renouned for the great number of vertuous men that are iſſued from thence: it had loſt in the former wars againſt Baiazet Ottoman, grand-father to this Soliman, Modon and Coron; it ſtil poſſeſſed theſe two, being ſeated in a moſt ſtrong place, and filled with inhabitants that did greatly affect the Venetians.

The diſcription of Naples of Romagnia.

Naples is ſeated on a ſmall Promontory, the which comming forth from the land maketh a great and ſafe hauen, and is in ſuch ſort encompaſſed by the ſea, as of the foure parts thereof, the therd is enuironed therewith, and the land ſide hath a very high and difficult going vp, ſo as there is but one little narrow way to goe vnto the towne, which lieth betwixt the hilles ſide and the ſea; and the outward bankes are so high and vneasie, as it is impossible for the gallies to batter the walles, or to land those that are within them: the entry likewise of the Hauen hath a very narrow mouth, so as but one galley at once can enter into it, which may be easily defended by the ordnance of a little castle, seated on a small rock, in the middest of the sea, right opposite to the entry, some three hundred pacesoff, which can on all sides beate vpon the vessels that will come nere to the hauen, and yet it selfe not to be battered from the land, nor by the gallies, none but smal boats being able to come nere it, by reason of sundry points of rocks which lie round about it.

Description of Malutsia.

Malutsia is likewise seated in the same Prouince, and more neere to the Cape of Mailla, vpon a mountaine, or rather a small rock of eight hundred paces, which being diuided from the firme land, extendeth it selfe in a long and narow forme to sea wards: so as this towne being seated on an high place is enuironed on all sides by the sea, there beeing none other entrance into it but by a bridge, the waters neere therevnto not being in any sort foordable by reason of their exceeding depth, and as nature hath furnished that place with such strength and naturall safety, it hath likewise giuen it wholesome fountaines, with a good and fertill soile, and a goodly plaine on the top of the mountaine, from whence victuals may be prouided for fifty or three score men, who are sufficient for the guard thereof.

Vittore de Garzons gouernor of Naples.

Vittore de Garzons, in quality of Baily, commanded Naples, a man of ripe yeers, and of great experience, by reason of the great offices which he had borne both by sea and land. This man by his valor and good councell, and by the trustinesse of the inhabitants did not only defend the place from all perill and danger, but likewise by the sallies of his cauallery, did assure the country nere adioyning, and greatly molest the enemies.

Cassin, who for to obey Soliman was come into those quarters with as great forces as hee could raise, hauing sounded those of Maluesia both by promises and threats, returned towards Naples, and hauing perceiued the difficulty of the enterprize, and being without suffitient means to take it by seege or by assault, hee dislodged thence, and dismissed part of his army, placing the residue in garrison in the nerest townes therevnto within fixe miles of the city.

Barbarossa on the other side with three score and ten gallies, and thirty as well Galeots as Fusts giuen him by Lustimbei, hauing scoured the Islands of the Archipelago belonging to the Republike, tooke some of them which had not meanes of defense, either for want of souldiers, or for that their sytuation was not strong enough to susteine his attempts, such as were the Islands of Scyro, Pathmos, Ligina, and some likewise belonging to particular persons, as Nia, proper to the family of the Pisani, Stampallea to the Quirni, Paros very famous for marble, subiect to the family of the Venieri, with diuers others, Barbarossa pursuing his victory to the content of his souldiers vnto whom he gaue the pillage, reseruing neuertheless the best of the spoile as presents, for the chiefe of the Port, to purchase to himselfe new fauours, to the end that the yeere following hee might be permitted to scoure the seas with greater forces and more authority.

The Islands taken from the Venetians by Barbarossa.

Diuers Venetian captaines after that the enemies had raised their campe from before Corfoù, propounded, that the Venetian fleete should follow them to stop these incursions and disorders which euery man did already foresee, by that meanes to preserue those Islands, from whence they receiued many commodities, and chiefly great numbers of men for to man their gallies, yet neuertheless, they had respect to the time, and to the enemies forces, from whom they feared some sinister accident: and aboue all they especially considered the Senates intention, which was to vnite the Confederates forces, to which nothing was more contrary, then to bee farre off with the army, wherevpon they resolued (quitting this proposition) that the Generall Pesare taking with him him a great number of ſouldiers from the garriſons of Dalmatia, ſhould with certaine gallies goe and beſeege Scardona, and Vitturi with other ſome ſhould ſaile to Obrouazza.

Scardona, lieth nere to Sebenic, and therefore they thought it fit to take it, for the ſafety of that fort, and to take away the great diſcommodities which al thoſe of the country round about might receiue from thence, it being poſſeſſed by the enemy: it was circled with very weake walles, and had two ſmall caſtles: whereupon, ſo ſoone as the Venetian troupes drew nere, the Turkes that were within it, after ſome ſmall reſiſtance, did yeeld to the diſcretion of the generall Peſare, who notwithſtanding that he had determined to receiue them, on condition to giue them their liues and goods, yet neuertheleſſe, his commandement being neither heard nor obeyed in that fury, the firſt that entred it beganne forthwith to waſte and ſpoile, and the Turkes which were gon forth to eſcape into their Confines being encountred by a troupe of armed men of the country of Sibenic, were all of them cut in peeces. The Generall left Franciſco Salomone for the gard and gouernment of that place, determining at that time to fortifie it, yet neuertheleſſe hauing afterwards conſidered, the great difficulty of ſo doing, and the expenſes of entertayning a garriſon amongſt ſo many of the enemies fortes, with the hurt which would redound if it were againe recouered by the Turkes, he thought it fitteſt and moſt profitable to race the caſtles, and to ſatisfie himſelfe, for hauing taken ſuch a place of retreate from the enemies.

Scardona taken by the Venetians.

As for thoſe of Obrouazza, the Turkes that were within it, though they were but few in number, did valliantly for a time defend the place, afterwards, being enforced to quit it, they retired into the caſtle, the which whileſt the Venetians made al things ready to beſeege, the gallies were countermanded by the General, hauing had a new commandement from the Senate to ſaile with the army to Corfou, as reſoluing aboue al things to gard that place, which was of ſo great importance for them. The winter ſeaſon being much ſpent, the exploits of warre did for that yeere ceaſe, all men expecting what would be the beginning of the yeere following 1537. Soliman ſeemed to be deſirous of peace with the Venetians, whereof the Viſier Baſha by his commandement made a motion to the Baily Canalis, perſwading him to cauſe the Ambaſſadour to come to Conſtantinople who had beene already appointed for that purpoſe, vnto whom he promiſed to giue a paſport, and good enterteinment; But by how much the Turkes did vſe gentleneſſe and curtezy, contrary to their fierce and haughty nature, by ſo much the more did the Venetians ſuſpect their ſpeech and actions, doubting that vnder theſe treaties, they ſought not a firme peace, but how to ſeparate them from the Emperours friendſhip, and to breake the practizes of the league.

The Turkes of Obrouazzo re ire to the caſtle.

An. 1537.

Soliman ſeemeth to deſire peace with the Venetians.

The Venetians ſuſpect him.

The Emperor Charles on the other ſide made ſhew that all his thoughts were bent to make warres vpon the Turkes, ſo as he often times ſaid, that he greatly deſired to march againſt them in perſon, to haue a ſhare in that glory, crauing none other recompence then that, being willing to haue whatſoeuer ſhould be conquered from them, to be ioyned and vnited to the dominions of the Venetian common-wealth, the which he termed the very bulwarke againſt the Turkiſh forces, and that he might the better intend that enterprize, he had conſented to a truce with the French King in Flanders. Such in outward apparence were the diſcourſes of the Emperor and his officers in Italy, who made a ſhew to be very careful of preparing al things for the warres. Doria promiſed to haue his gallies ready in a ſhort ſpace, & to ioyne them with the Venetian fleet, aſſuring them that he would in that war do ſome notable ſeruice to Chriſtendome, and to the profit of the Signory. The Marquis of Guaſto gouernor of Milan did the like, both of the ſeeking to make al men beleeue, that the Emperor in that buſineſſe did proceed with great zeale & affection, yet neuertheleſſe, many were of opinion that theſe exterior ſhews of the Emperor were only to hide ſome other of his deſigns, & to prouoke

The Emperor in ſhew deſires to make warre on the Turke.

His officers confirme his deſire.

the Venetians in the meane time to war, who by altogether intending the league, might wholy breake it with Soliman, and thereby be enforced to ioyne with him, who was more desirous to make war vpon the French, to assure vnto himselfe the State of Milan, then vpon the Turkes.

The great signes why men did suspect the Emperor.

Sundry signes of the Emperors secret purposes were discerned: his long delay to answer the Senate concerning that which it had written to him about the league, then his refusall to make a generall truce with the French, and lastly the report which was current, how that by meanes of a Spaniard, nephew to the viceroy of Sicil, and priloner to the Turkes, he made meanes by faire promises to purchase the friendship of Barbarossa, and namely, that Barbarossa passing by the Far of Messina, at such a time as there were none to make resistance, had in no sort touched any that did belong vnto the Emperor.

The French Kings designes and end.

As for the French King, all men did perceiue how desirous he was of peace, and that the Venetians should be in league and amity with Soliman, that he might see them freed from all constraint of being vnited to the Emperor, to the end that if he should happen to make warre vpon the Emperor he might easily draw them to his party; although he did greatly desire to be friends with him, hoping thereby to obteine the Dutchy of Milan for the Duke of Orleans his second sonne, perceiuing very well that he could not get it by force, wherevpon he did willingly harken to all motions of peace that were propounded to him.

The Pope sendeth to the Emperor and the French King to make them friends.

Francisco Iustiniano by the Senates command went to him, not in quality of an Ambassador, but only as a Gentleman of Venice, who was honorably entertained and welcomed by the King. The Pope likewise to this end, sent both to the Emperor and the King, to euery of whom the King answered that he desired nothing so much as peace: and whereas he vnderstood that the Emperor propounded a meeting at Narbona, there to consult thereon, he speedily sent the Cardinal of Lorraine & the great Master of France thither, with ample instructions to conclude a peace. But all these assemblies prouing vaine and to none effect, the Venetians were greatly perplexed. For some, reiecting that which did make them to doubt and feare, did promise to themselues that being ioyned with the other Christian Princes, they should be able not only to defend their State from the Turkes, but likewise to daunt and ouerthrow their pride, wherevpon they were of opinion to embrace the league, and to continue the war. Wherevnto they were the more prouoked by an opinion that al Germany was wholy ready to take armes against those Barbarians, being incited therevnto by Ferdinand King of the Romans to reuenge himselfe on Soliman, who had a long time molested him in Hungary. Vpon this hope, time hasted away, they not answering the Bailies letters, for that they could not resolue on the motions of peace made by the Turke, and vpon the Bashas particular discourse to the Baily, the which did greatly displease the other Senators who opposed themselues against all propositions that were made of sending new commissions to Rome concerning the league, saying that it was not expedient for the Common-wealth to reiect all propositions of peace, and altogether to intend the practizes of the league: that they ought first, well to examine the conditions and State of the present affaires, and afterwards to see how they could make warre, with what forces and meanes they could continue it: that the publike treasure was so exhausted by the last warres on the firme land, as the Republike had more need of long quiet, then to enter into a new warre, more dangerous then all the former; and for to shew that their hope vpon the aide of other Princes was badly grounded, they were to call to minde, that the Isle of Corfou by Dorias meanes, who derided their designes, had beene almost lost, had not their owne forces and the sytuation of the place defended it: that they ought not stil to contemne the great interests of so many citizens, who were to vndergoe the burthen of so many subsidies, whose meanes were in the Turkes hands and who were in hope by that treaty to recouer them from them.

Sundry opinions of the Senate.

The reasons of those who desired peace with Soliman.

Diuers

Diuers other reaſons were propounded to direct them from war, which were anſwered by thoſe of the contrary opinion; how that they did not abhorre peace, but that they did in ſome ſort ſeeke to prouide for the neceſſities of the times, if they ſhould happen to maintaine warre, and that which kept them from writing to Conſtantinople, was becauſe they would not giue any cauſe of iealozie and ſuſpition to the Chriſtian Princes, fearing leaſt they ſhould after-wards grow could in their prouiſions for warre: that to make ſo greate haſt to ſend an anſwer, was to diſcouer their weakens to the Turke, and to make him become more inſolent in the conditions of the agreement: That they were not to make account of expences, in regard that they were to arme howſoeuer, and being armed to treate of peace, and not raſhly to rely vpon the faith and diſcretion of thoſe perfidious enemies.

The reſons of thoſe that were deſirous to ioyne with the league and to make war vpon the Turkes.

In this manner did the practize of the league continue, by delaying the affaires of Conſtantinople. But at the laſt, by meanes of diuers, who did not ceaſe to ſolicit them to ſend an anſwer, and not wholy to giue ouer that treaty, and to take armes, it was propounded in the Senate to write to the Bayly, ſtill to entertaine the Baſcha Aiax, and to tell him how that the common-wealth had great cauſe to complaine of Soliman, who without being prouoked had broaken the peace, and came like an enemy to enuade the Iſle of Corfoù, not tarring for Vrſinos returne, who by his expreſſe command was ſent to Venice, with promiſe to attempt nothing till his returne, that the Senate had beene euer very carefull to continew the peace and friendſhip with Soliman, whoſe enterprizes it had neuer ſought to hinder, but had inuiolably kept there promiſe with him, euer behauing themſelues as newters: If the Generall Peſaro had met with his forces vpon the coaſt of Puglia where the Turkiſh army lay, it was by meere chance, hauing beene driuen thither by force of the windes. Their drift that propounded this was, to haue the Baily by this diſcourſe to vſe meanes to diſcouer the Turkes meaning concerning peace, and if he ſhould ſee any good likelihood there-vnto, then to beginne to motion it.

VVhat the Senate propounded to write to the Baily.

This being thus propounded in the Senate, three daies were ſpent in the reſolution thereof, after-which, the matter hauing beene long debated by the cheefe Senators, two voyces wanting for the ending of it, the whole matter remayned vnreſolued; the promiſes of Princes hauing made ſuch an impreſion in all men, as they wholy relied thereon.

The propoſition taketh none effect.

Don Lopes the Emperors Ambaſſador hauing notice of this irreſolution, hoping that the Common-wealth would make a more ſtrict alliance, with the Emgeror, beganne to ſolicite the Senate (as Doria had already done) to Vnite and ioyne their nauall Armies, and to bee no longer newters, but openly to declare them ſelues enemies to the Turkes. But the wiſeſt and beſt aduiſed among them, meaning not to bee carried away by words abuſed by vaine and idle promiſes, did continue in their former propoſition, not to take armes but vpon conſtraint againſt ſo mighty an enemy, who was able in ſo many ſundry places to enuade the State of the Common-wealth, which was not alone of it ſelfe ſuffitient to make defence againſt him, and ought not to rely ouer-much on an others helpe. Therefore they determined to anſwer the Ambaſſadors offers in generall termes, and by the ſame meanes to thanke the Emperor as author thereof, aſſuring him that for diuers reſpects they could not paſſe on any father, and namely becauſe that the French and the Turkes ſeeking their friendſhippe, they had anſwered them, that they would not therein giue them ſatiſfaction, by reaſon that the Senats meaning was by ſhewing them-ſelues newters, to keepe their promiſe with all men, intending neuer-the-leſſe to remaine armed what-ſo-euer ſhould befall, ſetting alwaies before their eyes, with their owne proper intereſt, the commodity of all Chriſtendome.

The Emperors Ambaſſador vſeth meanes to breake the Venetians neutrality.

The Senats anſwer to the Emperor.

At this anſwer the Ambaſſador held his peace, not making any farther reply: but but within a while after comming into the Senate, he made another request vnto them, which was, that for feare least the French should come downe into the State of Milan, they would raise the six thousand foote-men to defend it, which they were bound to furnish by their last accord, for which the Duke of Vrbin hauing taken speedy order, who was their Captaine Generall, they replied, that there was no need to cause those troupes to march any further, which were appointed onely for the defense of the State of Milan, seeing that the French were still making warre in Piedmont, and that so soone as they should passe the riuer Sesia, it would be then time to vrge their promise, which they would in no sort breake.

The end of the first Booke of the sixth Decade.

The Contents of the second Booke of the sixth Decade.

THE Venetians doe hasten the fortification of the Islands and Sea townes of their iurisdiction. Andre Doria is chosen Generall of the Army of the league. Solimans great preparations against the Venetians. The Venetian Senate resolue to make warre vpon Soliman. The league concluded and resolued on betwixt the Pope, the Emperor and the Venetians against Soliman. The French King refuseth to enter into the league. The treaty of peace betwixt the Emperor and the French King, is broken. The Pope commeth to Nice to attone them, where truce was onely graunted. Barbarossa wasteth the Islands of the Archipelago; Hee commeth into Candy, with his retreate thence. The Senate sendeth supplies into Candy. The Sangiach of Morea summoneth the cities of Naples and Maluesia in Morea to yeeld. The Turkes, wast and Spoyle Dalmatia, whither the Senate sendeth supplies. The Turkes take certaine Castles in Dalmatia. A motion made in the Senate for the recouery of that which they had taken there. The Turkes returne doth breake that motion. The Emperor after that the Venetians had renued the league sendeth his Nauall Army to Corfou.

The

The Army of the league reſolueth to goe and aſſalt the Caſtle of Preueze. Doria fauoreth the Army of Barbaroſſa Doria is vnwilling to giue Barbaroſſa battaill. The Generall Capel complaineth for that they did not fight. And laſtly, Dorias retreat to Corfoù, to the great greefe and diſcontent of the whole Army.

The Second Booke of the ſixth Decade of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

The Venetians diligence to fortifie the Ilands againſt the Turkes.

THE Treaty of peace being wholy broken, and no hope remaining but in armes, dilligent and carefull prouiſion was made in Venice of all things neceſſary for the warre, great numbers of veſſells, and ſoldiors, munitions and victualls to furniſh the Iſlands, and other townes on the Sea coaſt. Thoſe of Naples and Maluelia made ſute to haue their Garriſons augmented, and eſpecially to furniſh them ſufficiently with victualls and munition, for want of which Naples had like to haue fallen into the enemies hands, promiſing that if they might be thus releeued, to ſuſtaine all the perills and dangers of warre, to keepe thoſe Citties vnder the Venetians obedience.

The Iſle of Candies offers to the Senate.

The Iſle of Candy made the like requeſt, where certaine troubles being raiſed and ſundry ſcandalous ſpeeches giuen forth that they would yeeld to the enemy, if hee ſhould come thither, for feare of ſacke and ſpoyle, as it had happened in the Iſlands of thy Archipelago, the cheefe townes of the Iſland ſent Ambaſſadors to Venice to cleere them-ſelues of that imputation, and to let them know that the error of ſome of baſe condition had occaſioned thoſe reports, rather by cowardize and indiſcretion, then for any euell will: and therefore they did offer to ſpend both their meanes and liues for the ſeruice of the Common-wealth, promiſing to giue ſufficient and ample teſtimony of their loyalty, earneſtly and humbly entreating them, not to forſake them, ſeeing that they were ready, and determined to make defenſe.

The Senate did willingly giue eare vnto them, and with faire ſpeeches, and great promiſes, they were ſent backe againe; where-vpon, the Generall was commanded to ſend fiue and twenty Gallies to the Iſle of Candy, vnder the conduct of the Prouidator Paſcalie, who had like-wiſe commiſſion to carry ſoldiers and victualls to Naples, and to leaue foure Gallies there for the guard of the citty. They did in like manner furniſh the Caſtle, and Iſle of Corfoù, with all things neceſſary. As for Dalmatia, ſundry companies of light horſe drawne from Greece and Croatia, were ſent thither to gard the country againſt the enemies incurſions. But that which did trouble them, was the vncertenty which way they would take, there being ſundry ſpeeches thereof: whereby they were at one time to prouide

The Venetians are vncertaine what way the Turkes would take.

for

for all the places which they held vppon the ſea, and likewiſe to aſſure Patria in Frioul, becauſe the report was, that Soliman in perſon would be in his land army which made them feare that he might come thither.

Andrew Doria choſen General of the Army for the League.

In the meane time the laſt concluſion of the league, was moſt erneſtly ſollicited, whoſe forces were ſuppoſed would be very great, which was the cauſe that no more mention was made of the treaty of peace, the which for a time lay dead. The Venetians, to pleaſe the Emperor, had choſen Andrew Doria Generall of the whole army, and the Pope, in fauour to the Common-wealth, had appointed Marco Grimani Patriarke of Aquileia to command his Gallies, a Venetian by nation, and of a noble and rich family. But there reſted to conclude the portion of their expence which each of the Confederates were to beare in that common enterpriſe, knowing very wel that the third part was to great for the Sea Apoſtolick, the Venetians being contented ſomwhat to eaſe it, and that the Emperor ſhould beare the reſt: but his Agents, notwithſtanding they ſaid that it was reaſon to eaſe the Pope, would neuertheleſſe not giue their conſent to haue him charged more then the Venetians.

The Expence diuided betwixt thoſe of the League.

The Emperour at the laſt fearing leaſt that the delay of the concluſion of the league, might breed ſome coldneſſe in thoſe who were moſt foreward to warre, and might in the end cauſe the Senate to giue eare to the propoſitions of peace, and that thereby he might be enforced alone to ſuſtaine all the Turkes attempts, did encreaſe the authority of his Agents at Rome, promiſing to be pleaſed with whatſoeuer they ſhould agree to, and cheefely concerning the difficultie about the expence, ſuffering the Pope to beare but the ſixth part, and of the reſidew, the three partes ſhould bee for him ſelfe, and the two for the Venetians.

The Venetians acquainted with Solimans preparations for warre are exhorted to peace.

Whileſt theſe treaties were made in the Court of Roome, Geneſino who at Conſtantinople ſerued as Dragoman for the Common-welth, arriued at Venice, bringing letters from the Bayley, and was enioyned by the Viſier Baſcha, and the admirall, to aduiſe, councell, and exhort the Venetians to hatken vnto peace, he did afterward acquaint them particularly with the great warlicke preparations which were made in ſundry places of Solimans Empire: he told them beſides, from Aiax the Viſier Baſcha, that he did greatly maruaile why they had not anſwered his former letters; that he did neuertheleſſe beare the ſelfe ſame good will and affection to the Republike; that a way lay open vnto them for peace, if they would ſend their Ambaſſador to the Port of the great Lord, to iuſtifie their actions paſt, and by the ſatisfaction for loſſes to vſe meanes to appeaſe Soliman, who otherwiſe was ready to make inuaſion vpon them.

The arriuall of this Dragoman and his new offers, did cauſe ſundry effects in the Senate, for it did more animate thoſe that craued warre, and ſtrengthened the other in their opinion which required peace. Therefore the Senate being thereupon aſſembled to anſwere the Baily, the buſineſſe being brauely diſputed on in the aſſembly, cheefely by Marc Antonio Cornare, who had at other times maintained in that place, That it behooued them to ioyne with the League, and to make warre: and by Marco Foſcare who was one of the Councell, and by his ſkill and long experience in the managing of publicke affaires, had purchaſed great authority; it was determined by the plurality of voices, according to the former reſolution, not to write vnto Conſtantinople at all, but onely for to make warre.

The Senate determines warre againſt Soliman.

Therevppon, within a while after, they ſent ample commiſſions to their Ambaſſadors at Rome, for the concluſion of the league, and for the ſigning to the articles thereof, on which, after a long conteſtation, they had agreed, and which were read and approoued in the Senate, beeing theſe: That there was a league and confederacy made betwixt Pope Paul the third, the Emperor Charles the fift, and the Republick and Senate of Venice, as well offenſiue as defenſiue, againſt

Soliman

Soliman King of Turkes: whereby the Confederats did promiſe, to make warre vpon the Turkes with two hundred Gallies, a hundred armed ſhips, and fifty thouſand Italian footemen, tenne thouſand Spaniards, and twenty thouſand Almans, with foure thouſand fiue hundred horſe, armed after the Bourgonian manner, to which forces were added a ſufficient quantity, of artilery, munition and other neceſſaries, which ſhould yearely be ready about the mideſt of March.

Of theſe Gallies, the Pope armed thirty ſixe, the Emperor foure ſcore and two, and the Signory of Venice as many, vnder the command of Vincenzo Capello their Generall, the Emperor was bound to furniſh all the ſhippes of warre, and the Venetians to lend the Pope Gallies ready furniſhed with all neceſſaries. Concerning the expence, it was diuided as aboue is ſaid. Ferdinand King of the Romans, was vnder-ſtood to be comprehended in that Confederacy, whome the Emperor did promiſe ſhould wholy ratifie it, and would cauſe him to leuy an army a part to aſſaille the Turkes in Hungary. The moſt Chriſtian king was therin likewiſe comprehended, ſo ſoone as he ſhould declare that he would accept of the cheefe and moſt honorable place, which they had reſerued for him: wherein the Pope was to appoint with what forces he ſhould be preſent there. That the Pope ſhould likwiſe vſe meanes to draw the King of Poland, and the other Chriſtian Princes to this Vnion: and if that any contention ſhould ariſe among the Confederate Princes concerning the League, the Pope was to decide it, and to make them friends. Andre Doria was (as hath beene ſaid) Generall by Sea, and the Duke of Vrbin for the enterprizes of the firme land.

Andre Doria, Generall by ſea and the Duke of Vrbin by land.

As for the conqueſts which ſhould bee made by the common armes, it was mentioned in a ſcedule apart, that euery of the confedrates ſhould enter vpon the ſame ſtate, which had belonged vnto him: ſo as if they ſhould conquer the Empire of Conſtantinople, it ſhould belong to the Emperor, without preiudice to the claimes of the Republike, and ſo in like manner of the reſt, but for the Apoſtolike ſea was reſerued the preeminecne of ſome State worthy the merit therof, & according to the quallity of the conqueſt that ſhold be made. Concerning other things where-vnto no man laid any claime, that euery of the Confederats might haue a ſhare therein according to the expences which he contributed towards the warres: and if they ſhould chance to recouer the Iſle of Rhodes, it ſhould returne vnder the Dominion of the Knights of Saint Iohn of Ieruſalem.

The Venetians ſeeke to draw the King of England to the league.

In this treaty there was no mention made of the King of England: The Venetians neuer-the-leſſe ſuppoſing that they might draw greate aide from that King, who was a Prince of exceeding great wealth and authority, and had in time before ſhewed great affection to their Common-wealth, went about by meanes of Ieronimo Zuccate their Secretary, reſident in his Court, to diſpoſe him to fauour the league. But the King, diſdayning the matter for that he had not beene particularly inuited to the treaty thereof, would by no meanes endure to heare of it, but did greatly complaine: for that neither him-ſelfe nor his Realme, had beene mentioned in the number of the Confederates. As for the French King, they did dayly pereeaue that he had no great deſire to enter into it, becauſe that they treated therein of encreaſing the Emperors forces, and reputation, his coriuall, and perpetuall enemy.

The French King refuſeth to enter into the League.

The Venetians then, the league being concluded and eſtabliſhed (as hath bin ſaid) commanded the Generall Capello, that if the Turkiſh fleete did come into the Gulphe hee ſhould keepe alooſe towards the Leuant, that hee might with more eaſe paſſe into Sicily, where he was to ioyne with the Confederates fleetes, as well to aſſure thoſe quarters, as to hurt the enemies, if occaſion were offered. And becauſe they would not weaken their garriſons, they did on a ſodaine leuy two thouſand foote-men, whome they ſent to the Army. Some were of opinion to referre to the Generalls diſcretion, in all cauſes, to doe that which he ſhould iudge to be moſt proffitable and conuenient for the Common-wealth, according to the occurrences of the affaires, and not to limit him what hee had to doe, which might peraduenture bee cleane contrary to reaſon, ſeeing that warre is managed by the ſight of the eye : alledging for example that which happened the yeare before, by limiting the Generall Peſare what he ſhould doe, which hath occaſioned ſundry diſorders, and at laſt the warre againſt the Turkes: yet neuertheleſſe, the other opinion was followed, becauſe they would not hinder nor delay the vnion of their Army with the Confederates.

The Senate vſeth meanes to get money to defray the expences of the warres.

Now the Senates greateſt care, was to find ready money for the great expences they were ſpeedily to be at. By means wherof it was decreed, that all thoſe who would put in any money into the publicke Treaſury, ſhould haue an annuall rent for it of foureteene in the hundred: and they did afterwards proceed ſharpely againſt the debtors to the Common-wealth, as well by the impriſonment of their bodies as ſale of their goods.

They did moreouer create three Pocurators of Saint Marke, Ieronimo Marcello, Bernardo Moro, and Iulio Contaren, in regard of ſome loane of money. As for the goods of the Clergie, they could neuer make any vſe of them: for although the Pope had permitted the Senate to alienate of Church goods by reaſon of tenne in the hundred, to the worth of a million of gold, and afterwards calling back that fauour had giuen them leaue to raiſe the ſaid ſomme vppon the reuenue of the Clergy for the terme of fiue yeares, yet neuertheleſſe, they could neuer draw a breefe from him either for the one or other, his Holyneſſe ſtill finding new ſhifts and excuſes.

In this great want of money the Senate went very ſlowly foreward in the propoſitions that were made vnto them of raiſing the ſaid ſomme, peraduenture for feare of diſpleaſing many people, and cheefely thoſe of the Champaine countrey of the firme land: wherupon it reiected a propoſition which was made (although it would haue amounted to a great ſomme) to ſell the medows of the communalties, of which there are ſtore ouer the whole ſtate, in a manner, of the Republicke on the firme land.

A treaty of peace betwixt the Emperor and the French King is broken off.

The Senate neuertheleſſe in this great neceſſity did ſpare nothing that was neceſſary for the warres. Peace at the ſame time was treated of betwixt the Emperor and the French King, which each of them made ſhew greatly to deſire, and they concluded to ſend their Agents for that purpoſe to Canus which lieth betwixt Perpignan and Narbona: but hauing ſpent all the time there in conteſtations, the aſſembly brake vp without any reſolution, by reaſon of the diſtruſt that the one had of the other, which did greatly greeue the Venetians, becauſe that by thoſe Princes diſcord, the warre againſt the Turkes would prooue more difficult, the likelihoods thereof being already diſcerned. For the Marquis of Guaſto, whom the Emperor had in the beginning appointed to ſerue in the enterprize of the Leuant, was countermanded not to ſtirre forth of Italy, and ſpeedily to augment the Garriſons in the State of Milan, ſo as all hope of agreement being taken away, the Emperor being conſtrained to diuert his forces elſwhere, for feare of the French King, he did boldly affirme, that hee could at that time doe no other ſeruice to Chriſtendome, then to ſtand vpon his owne defence againſt the Turkes & for to aſſure his owne States from receiuing any hurt from their Army.

The Emperor declareth that he would not take armes for the league.

The Pope reſolueth to goe to Nice to atone the Emperor & the French King.

The Pope beeing infinitely ſorry that the enterprizes againſt the Turkes were not foreward, and it concerning him, as the head of Chriſtendome to procure peace and vnion among Chriſtian Princes, reſolued, ſeeing that his letters and Ambaſſades had beene to no purpoſe, to attempt to preuaile by his preſence, ſuppoſing that his authority and entreaties ioyned with reaſon, might cauſe them to condiſcend to ſome honorable agreement: whereupon hauing exhorted and inuited the Emperor and the French King thervnto, he requeſted them that they would meet at Nice, whither he likewiſe offered ſpeedily to come, as to a place fitt for that purpoſe.

The

The Venetians were very glad of this propoſition, becauſe that the deſired effect of peace falling out ſucceſſfully it would much augment the forces and hope of the League, the which with-out that helpe would be very poore and weake: but on the other ſide they were very ſorry for the loſſe of ſo much time, which was to be ſpent in the prouiſions for warre, and in the vnion of the Armies: becauſe they well perceiued that the Emperor comming from Barcelona by ſea to Nice, Doria muſt needes bee imployed in that iourney, at ſuch time as he ſhould be buſied in ordering the fleet, and ſailing againſt the enemies, who were already with great forces vpon the Seas: on the other ſide they feared, that the ſame meeting would bee to no purpoſe by reaſon of the great difficulties to eſtabliſh a perfect peace betwixt theſe two Princes, in regard of what had happened on either ſide: and that the cauſe which had mooued both of them to grant the pope this enterview, was but for to iuſtifie themſelues, and to make a ſhew to all men, that they were deſirous of peace, but that the meanes to obtaine it were hard: both their iealozies beeing equally alike to purchaſe the Popes fauour, by allowing all his Councells and deſeignes: for his Holineſſe euer fearing to aduance the one of them more then the other, would not ſuffer any of them to grow more mighty by the forces and authorityes of the Sea Apoſtolicke, and eſpecially in Italy.

VVhat mouued theſe Princes to grant the enterview at Nice.

Some likewiſe did thinke, that the Pope was not mooued to procure this enteruiew only for the publick and vniuerſall good, but for ſome particular profit of his owne, hoping by the meanes of his preſence, and the meeting of theſe two Princes to inſinuate himſelfe into their fauor and to obtaine ſome matter of importance for the eſtabliſhment of the greatneſſe of his owne houſe, as the effect did afterwards manifeſt, hauing at that aſſembly concluded the marriage of the Lady Marguerite the Emperors naturall daughter, and widdow to Duke Alexander of Medicis, with Octauio Farneſe the Popes Nephew, whom the Emperor inueſted with the State of Nauarre.

Octauio Farneſe marrieth the Emperors baſtard daughter.

Notwithſtanding that the Venetians were poſſeſſed with theſe doubts and ſuſpitions, the Senate neuertheleſſe did not ceaſe to doe the duty which the time required, to teſtifie the honor and reſpect it did beare to thoſe great Princes, and cheefely to the Pope, and to this end, to manifeſt how much it deſired, according to their antient cuſtome to ayde and fauour that accord, they choſe two Ambaſſadors, Nicholao Tepulo and Marc Antonio Cornare, to be preſent at that aſſembly to make knowne the Senates good-will, and withall, how greatly it deſired peace betwixt Chriſtian Princes, and alſo for to make warre vpon the Turkes.

Ambaſſadors choſen at Venice to be preſent at the Aſſembly of Nice

Now the Pope departing from Rome in the moneth of Aprill according as it had beene determined, came to Parma, where he celebrated Palme-Sonday in the Cathedrall Church, ſtaying in that Citty and at Placentia certaine dayes, expecting the Duke of Sauoyes reſolution concerning the Citty of Nice where the aſſembly was to be made, becauſe ſome difficulties were made thereuppon, not without ſuſpition that it came from the Emperor, who was deſirous before his comming to the aſſembly to ſee what the Turkes progreſſion would be. But the Pope at laſt reſoluing not to make ſo long ſtay in his iourney, did ſet forewards directly towards Nice, where at his arriuall, the entry into the Citty was denied him, the Gouernour thereof ſaying, that he held that place for the Prince, and that the Duke his father was not to diſpoſe thereof, where vppon the Pope was enforced to retire him-ſelfe into a Monaſtery of Moncks beeing not farre from thence, whither within a while after the Citties keyes were brought vnto him.

The Pope denied entrance inth Nice.

The Emperor and the French King came ſodainly into thoſe quarters, the one being lodged at Villafranca, and the other at Villanoua beyond the Riuer Var. Yet the Pope could neuer procure them to meet in his preſence, becauſe they both deter-

Theſe two Princes refuſe to ſee one another at Nice in the Popes preſence.

determined not to grant the Popes desire in that meeting, which was to make them good friends and to establish a firme peace betwixt them, yet neuer-the-lesse he procured the prolongation of the truce, which was already confirmed, for the space of tenne yeares, hoping that in the meane space, the hatred, which was so deepely rooted in their hearts, might bee worne out; that beeing done, euery one went his owne way, the Pope towards Rome, the Emperor towards Barcelona, and the King iournied to Auignion, from thence to returne into France.

Enterview of Emperor and king at Aigues-Mortes.

But the King being come to Auignion, was aduertized that the Emperor was desirous to conferre with him; and that for the same purpose hee entreated him to come to Aigues-mortes where he would land; which the King willingly graunting, went thither, where both their maiesties did carsse each other, and the Emperor went and dined with the King in the towne, with great demonstration of brotherly friendship: Then the king went into the Emperors Gallie, where they had long conference to gether, where-vpon all men hoped shortly to see a firme peace established betwixt them, but no effects as thereof could euer since bee discerned: but on the contrary the Emperor perceiuing him-selfe to be assured, by the confirmation of the league with the Venetians against the Turkes, not alone to sustaine their attempts, beganne to make greater demands to the King, according to the treaty of Madrill, the King on the other side promising to him-selfe, to recouer the States which hee detained from him, made great warlike preparations to assaile him in sundry places, not tarrying for the expiration of the truce.

VVar renewed betwixt the Emperor and the King.

Now whilest Christian Princes stood vpon termes of making warre one vpon another, the Turke had in the winter time prepared all that which was necessary for his comming forth into the field, who like-wise remembring that which did belong to his owne religion (for those Barbarous people haue some impression of diuinity in their harts,) did before his departure celebrate with great solemnity, the feasts of Baieram, (those daies are celebrated and reuerenced by that nation euen as Easter is by the Christians) hee caused prayers to bee made in all his Mesquites for the happy successe of him-selfe and his army. Then in the moneth of March, his armies by sea and land departed from Constantinople, where Soliman was in person, and Barbarossa neere to him, who held the rancke and grade which Lasti had done not long before, who was depriued of his place of Bascha, and confined into Macedon: But the whole army being not yet well accommodated, Barbarossa in the meane time, with sixe score sayle, went to wards the Archipelago, as to an assured booty to assaile the Islands, the which beeing defended the yeare before, had as then no Garrisons that were suffitient to make defence, whereby it came to passe that Schiros, Schiaroc, Schiati, with certaine others of lesse fame being first sackt and spoyled fell into the power of the Turkes.

The Turkish feasts of Baieram.

Barbarossa spoiled the Islands of the Archipelago.

There happened a memorable accident at the Taking of Schiati; for the Islanders and those few soldiers that were within it, hauing constantly sustained the first assaults of the Turkes building vpon the assurance of the situation of the Castle, seated vpon an high place; some of the cheefe amongest them were desirous, either thorow feare or a premeditated malice, to yeeld them-selues vnto the Turkes, but fearing peraduenture to be punished for their baseneſse and treachery, if the matter should not fall out according to their desire, did runne to the Pallace where Ieronimo Memio gouernor of the place lay hurt in his bed, who by his valor giuing example to his soldiers, had beaten the enemies from the wals, whome they slew, by whose death all matters remayning in confusion among them they did by ropes draw the Turkes vp into the Castle. This cruell and Barbarous act did so highly displease Barbarossa, as in sted of recompencing those villains, lans, he did by death chaſtice their infamous wickedneſſe. Then hauing encreaſed his forces, hee ſailed into Candy to get more booty there, or elſe to view the ſtrong places of the Iſland. A worthy recompence.

The Senate vpon the report which was currant at Conſtantinople, how that the army ſhould ſaile into Candy, had carefully prouided what-ſo-euer was neceſſary for the gard of the Iſland, againſt ſo mighty an enemy, by ſending thither, mony, ſoldiers, munition & victuals, and Giouani Moro to command there, during the warre in quallity of Prouidator Generall, a man very well experienced and of great valour and diſcretion. The conſeruation of that Iſland was thought to be of very great importance, as well for the Nobillity thereof, being deſcended from a Venetian Colony, as for her richeſſe, as an ancient ſeate of Kings, as alſo for the frutfulneſſe thereof, and other great commodities which thoſe receiued from it that traded into the Leuant. This Prouidator was cheefely enioyned to exhort the Gentlemen and Knights, (for ſo are the feudataries of the Republicke termed who enioy the benefits thereof) to the defence of the Iſland, and to aſſure them that the Senate would neuer forſake them.

Now Moro being come into Candy, did aſſembly the Generall councell of all the Nobillity of the Collony in the Citty of Candace, to diſpoſe them by ſome honeſt exhortation conſtantly to attend the enemies comming.

If yee conſider (ſaid he) the quiet of your ſtate, where at this preſent, yee doe peaceably enioy ſo many goodly inheritances, ſo ſweet an aire, ſuch aboundance and commodity of all things as grow here, or elſe are brought hither from the countries neere adioyning, I doe aſſure my ſelfe that this remembrance will be of greater force with you, then the efficacy of all my words can bee able to perſwade you to doe all you can, and to be ſparing neither in expences, trauaill, nor life it ſelfe, to keepe either your ſelues, or children, from changing your preſent condition, and to fall from the toppe of ſo great happineſſe, into a Gulphe of miſery and calamities, as it is like to happen, if this Iſland falling into the Turkes power (I tremble with feare onely to thinke thereof, and to tell you of it) yee ſhould be enforced to goe and dwell elſe-where, to forſake your country, ſo great wealth, and ſo many commodities as yee here poſſeſſe; or elſe tarrying here ſtill, be ſubiect to the Tyranny of a faithleſſe and Barbarous nation. An other thing beſides your wealth doth oblige yee to defend this Iſland, one of the cheefe and moſt important members of our Common-wealth, which is, the loue and duty which you owe to our common country, from which I hope, the diſtance of place is not able to diuide you, beeing true members thereof, and not cut off from it, hauing a ſhare in the honours, fauours, and in all other her fortunes. Now your particular intereſt being, for theſe reſpects, inſeparably conioyned to ours, it behoueth mee to labour to let you ſee, the importance of the buſineſſe in queſtion, and to ſtirre yee vp to prouide thoſe remedies which may defend yee from ſuch a danger. I will then onely entreate you, not for any feare what ſo-euer, to loſe that courrage, and good reſolution which I diſcerne in you all, leaſt being diſfurniſhed of valour, and ſtrength, yee happen to vndoe your ſelues. I will not deny but that the enemies power is very great, and that wee ought not to contemne it; but I dare well aſſure you that it is not ſuch as may cauſe yee to deſpaire of beeing able to reſiſt it; but on the contrary wee are to hope, that their comming will purchace vs honor and repuration, by valliant-repulſing them from the whole Iſland. We are certainly to beleeue, that although there bee great numbers of ſoldiers in the enemies Army; yet neuer-the-leſſe they haue no ſtore of ordnance, or other neceſſary matters ſufficient to batter and force townes, whereby wee are aſſuredly to thinke, that if they doe come to this Iſland, their intention is rather to ſpoile and get booties, if by our negligence wee will ſuffer them ſo to doe, then to tarry here and make warre. And though

Moro his oration to the gentlemen of Candy.

„ they ſhould come hither to that end,what-like-lihood is there that they will buſie
„ them-ſelues in a long and difficult enterprize, perceiuing ſo many mighty fleetes
„ of the Chriſtian Confederat Princes at ſea, which may on a ſudaine aſſaile and „ fight with, either their fleete, or ſome of their townes: for they are no leſſe care-„ full for the preſeruation of their owne,then they are to offend and conquer other „ mens. I know,and am expreſſely commanded from the Senate to acquaint you
„ with it, how highly aboue all other things it eſteemeth the preſeruation of this „ State,and your ſafety,for which, they are ready to expoſe all their forces, witnes
„ the prouiſions which of it owne proper motion, it hath ſpeedily ſent vnto you.
„ You then, whome theſe dangers doe more neerely concerne, and for whom wee „ are here aſſembled,are ſo much the more obliged not to omit any thing where-
„ in you may manifeſt your loyalty, dilligence,and loue, towards both the one and „ other country: Let euery man then diſpoſe him ſelfe to ſuccour the common cauſe with his wealth,authority,and perſon; I doe aſſure my ſelfe that in ſo doing, we ſhall not onely auoyde the greateſt danger, but ſhall free the whole country, to your great glory and praiſe from the enemies ſpoiles and incurſions.

The Prouidators ſpeech is applaudea by all men.

The Prouidator had skarce made an end of his exhortation, when all of them aroſe, applauding his ſpeech,and promiſing with great offers,to employ all their power,care and dilligence in the defence of the Iſland: Hee did afterwards make the ſame remonſtrance to the people of Candy, exhorting them to their owne defence: wherevpon all of them beganne with great ſpeed to prouide things neceſſary,to arme certaine Gallies,and to aſſemble the country people, vnto whom hauing giuen Armes, they placed part of them in Candall, to encreaſe the garriſon of Italian foote-men, and the reſt were ſent to the gard of ſundry paſſages and places of importance to ſtoppe the enemies progreſſion. The Gentlemen of the Iſland and the feudataries of the Common-wealth, did proceed therein with ſuch earneſtneſſe and courrage,as the family alone of Calergians, which is one of the cheeſe and ritcheſt of the country, did raiſe more then fiue and twenty thouſand armed men.

The Candiots preparations for their defence.

Barbaroſſa purſuing his iourny came neere to the Iſland on the North ſide, betwixt Standia and the Citty of Candace, and without caſting ankor ranne along the Iſland as farre as Rettima, where making but a ſhort ſtay, becauſe that the Cities ordnance did greatly hurt him, he ſailed to La Suda, hauing there found better abiding then in any other place,by reaſon of the Hauen which is great and ſafe, whoſe entrance was then open to him, it being not fortified as it is now at this day, hee landed great numbers of his people to ſcoure and ſpoyle the Country.

Barbaroſſa commeth into Candy.

This Citty was in old time called Cidonia, and reckoned among the cheefe of the Iſland. Andre Gritti was Gouernor thereof, hauing with him about a thouſand Italian foote-men, and diuers Greekes of the citty and places neere adioyning. Theſe men perceiuing the Turkes to approch in diſorder, who had not intrenched them-ſelues, did boldly ſally forth of the Citty and aſſailled them,who being firſt beaten with the Cities ordnance,whereof it was well prouided, and being found in diſorder, they chaced, and ſlew a great number of them: Thoſe which ſcoured the country had no better fortune, by reaſon that great multituds of the Iſlanders ariſingwho were diueſly armed by their Lords commandement, went and incountered the Turkes which were loden with ſpoile,whome they fell vpon and ſlew many of them; ſo as they enforced them to giue ouer their enterprize,and to retire with ſpeed to their Gallies.

Barbaroſſa hoping for better and more fortunate ſucceſſe in another place, or at leaſt to recompence that loſſe, leauing behind him neuertheleſſe ſome memoriall of his being there,to the peaſants detriment, ſent an hundred Gallies to Sithia.

This

This place is ſeated in another corner of the Iland on the weſt ſide, beeing weake and ill prouided of defenſe notwithſtanding that a particular magiſtrate ſent from Venice doth vſually make his abode there. From thence the enemy might eaſily paſſe into the Ile of Scarpenta, poſſeſſed at that time by the Turkes and diſtant from thence ſome forty miles.

The enemy finding that place to bee abandoned, tooke away certaine peeces of ordinance and other munitions, ſpoiling all the Champaigne neere adioyning. But fearing leaſt the Venetian Fleet comming to the ayde of Candy would enforce them to come to ſtrokes, the Soldiers being ſpeedily imbarked and all the Gallies beeing vnited togeather, they ſailed towardes Negrepont, Barbaroſſa bis retreat from Candy.

The Sangiach of Morea did at the ſame time by Solimans command beſeege Naples and Maluesia. He hauing encamped before thoſe two townes, wrote to the Gouernors and people thereof that they ſhould ſpeedily yeeld, promiſing to them great rewards in to doing, and on the contrary, ſeuere puniſhment, if they ſhould continew to make reſiſtance: that Soliman had ſent him thither commanding him by no meanes toſtirre from thence vntill he had reduced both of them vnder his obedience: that their ſuccors were farre off, and their hope vaine, long to hold out, and therefore that it was beſt for them to fitte themſelues to the time and to the fortune of the van quiſher.

The Sangiach of Morea ſummoneth Naples and Maluesia to yeeld.

The Gouernours and all the people, reſoluing brauely to defend them-ſelues, as well by reaſon of the ſituation of the place as for their hope that the Venetian Army would ſhortly releeue them with victualls and neceſſary munitions; made none anſwer to his letter, but betooke themſelues more carefully to the Guard of their townes.

Reſolution of the Inhabitants.

And becauſe they in Naples wanted water, the horſſemen that were Stadiots a hardy and warlike nation, making diuers ſallies, beeing followed by the Italian Harquebuziers did prouide for that want. The Generall Capello hauing intelligence of this ſieege, and beeing very deſirous to releeue thoſe valliant and truſty defendants, did opportunely with ſix Gallies ſend them ſupplies of whatſoeuer they needed.

But during theſe exploits thoſe of Dalmatia were in like manner greatly afflicted by the Turkiſh Army, who entring into the Countrey made an horrible ſpoile there, carrying away, men, woemen, little children, and all ſortes of cattell, burning the houſes, and putting the whole Contrey in feare and confuſion: ſo as Camillo Vrſino, Gouernour of the Prouince, had thought to haue abandoned all the other Citties, and that the Soldiers ſhould retire to Zara to aſſure it, as the chiefeſt and eaſieſt to guard, fearing that to attempt to preſerue al of them againſt ſuch great nombers of enemies, would bee a cauſe to expoſe them all to great dangers.

The Turkes waſt Dalmatia

The Senate did not allow of this opinion, eſteeming much more, beſides the loſſe of ſo many Citties, this note of infamy, to haue at once without any fight giuen place vnto the enemies inſolency, and abandoned ſo goodly a Countrey: wherefore, vſing all meanes to preſerue and defend it, it determined to make a new leuy of horſe and foote, to weet, twelue thouſand footmen and fifteene hundred horſe, hoping with theſe forces to bee able ſufficiently to aſſure the Prouince: and alſo to encreaſe the Peoples affection towards the Common-wealth, and to encourage them brauely to defend themſelues, they appoynted fifteene Gentlemen who ſhould ſpeedily be tranſported thither for the guard of Zara, Sibenic and Catarra, with thirty men a peece: moreouer Lodouico Badoario was ſent vnto Zara, in quality of Prouidator General of Dalmatia, with commandement neuertheleſſe, not to goe forth of that Citty without the Senates permiſſion aud leaue: the Inhabitants like-wiſe of

The Venetians aid ſent into Dalmatia.

Dalmatia were permitted to ſend their wiues and children to Venice for feare of the enemies.

In theſe occurrences, the Prince ſhewed the Senate, how that euery man was to helpe his country in a time ſo miſerable, and alledged vnto them for example that which had beene performed and done in the laſt warres of the firme land, in which (ſaid he) the Cittizens loue towards their country, the vnion and readineſſe of their helpe, had beene of ſo great force, as in diſpight of bad fortune, they had drawne the Republike forth of ſo many calamities, and had reſtored it to her fauour, ſplendor and dignity, wherein, (God be thanked) it now continued. That the dangers preſent, were no leſſe then thoſe that were paſt, hauing to doe with an enemy, who though hee be alone and of him-ſelfe, is neuer-the-leſſe very mighty, and to be feared, whome if they did not ſpeedily reſiſt, but ſuffer all things to fall out according to his deſire, his ouerweening would in ſuch ſort encreaſe, as they were neuer to looke for any ſafety from him: that their hope of forraine aide, did dayly more and more vaniſh, the Confederates, proceeding with ſuch vncertenty, and ſlowneſſe, as they were to expect nothing from them: That their true, ſafeſt and onely defence, depended vpon them-ſelues. It did then behooue euery man to finde meanes to ſurmount his forces, and ſpeedily to releeue the Common-wealth with councell, meanes, yea and with his owne life: That the publike Treaſury would ſhrinke vnder an inſupportable burthen, vnleſſe it were ſpeedily releeued by the Cittizens; in regard that the expence alone of Dalmatia with the new prouiſions thereof, did monethly mount to more then fiue and twenty thouſand crownes: that it behooued them to glad the people who were ouer preſſed with ſorrow, and amazed, and to comfort them by the preſence of thoſe, vnto whome the conſeruation of the ſtate did belong, to ſhew that they were deſirous to be ſharers in the dangers, and troubles, which ſhould be offered. Let thoſe then (quoth hee) who were appointed depart with ſpeed, and goe to execute that which is commanded them, and let others, vnto whome ſome publike charge ſhallbe commited, freely accept thereof: He that is moued therevnto by his duty, encreaſeth his owne glory, and he that maketh none account thereof, let obedience moue him; if nothing elſe can prouoke you, yet at leaſt wiſe let neceſſity and the preſent dangers, make yee diſcreet, dilligent and ready in all things. The Princes authority, and the force of his reaſons, did confirme diuers, who would haue freed them-ſelues from taking any publicke charge vpon them.

The reſolution of the Turkes in Dalmatia.

The Turkes in the meane time, the more that they vnder-ſtood the great preparations which were made to preuent them in Dalmatia, the more they made haſt to come and aſſaile it: And for their better weakening of the Venetians defences, they reſolued at one time to aſſaile all the Principall townes, to the end that the one might not helpe the other: And hauing aſſembled great forces at Cluin, a towne vnder their obedience, they entred with foure thouſand horſe and as many foote, vpon the Territory of Zara, and beſeeged Nadin the Venetians cheefe Caſtle, ſeated vpon thoſe confines, Sebaſtiano Sagreda being Gouernor thereof, who had an hundred and fifty Italian foote-men with him; vnto whome the onely ſight of the enemies gaue ſuch feare and terror, as they baſely yeelded on condition to haue their liues ſaued, without making any proofe of their valour, or vſe of the places ſituation, and retired to Zara, whether they brought more feare then comfort, by exalting the enemies forces to couer their owne ſhame.

Nadin yeeldeth to the Turkes.

The Turkes take the caſtle of Laurana.

The like befell the Caſtle of Laurana which was commanded by Vittore Soranze with like number of ſoldiers as in Nadin, who hauing for one whole day ſuſtayned the battery, fled away and was taken by the enemies: but Zemona being abandoned by the Italian footmen, was garded and defended by certaine Sclauonians, whome ſome Venetian gentlemen of the family of the Venieri, vnto whom it did belong, had placed there.

The

The Turkes hauing put Garriſons in Nadin and Laurana, went vp and downe ſcouring the country euen to the gates of Zara, ſo as none durſt come abroad although the enemies campe lay farre off. The Cities of Antiuare, Dulcina, and Sebenic, were in the ſame trouble. The Sangiach of Scutari went with great forces of foot and horſe to Antiuare, and did encampe betwixt the ſea ſhore and the walles, and had ſent part of his forces to beſeege Dulcina.

But Bondulmiero, captaine of the Gulphe, hauing notice thereof did ſpeedily releeue the Antiuarians, the like did the Generall Capello within a while after, by ſending them ſouldiers and munition, ſo as the Baſha deſpayring of any ſpeedy or happy ſucceſſe in his enterprize, determined to raiſe his ſeege from before Antiuare, cauſing thoſe who at the ſame time lay before Dulcina to doe the like. Succors ſent to Antiuare.

As for Sebenic, part of the forces that were aſſembled at Cluin, went thither at the firſt, and after the taking of Nadin and Laurana, many ſoldiers did goe thither, who neuer came neere the city, becauſe their number was not comparable to a true army, but went ſcattering vp and downe, and ſpoiled the country. The Sibenſſans hauing intelligence of the enemies comming, reſoluing brauely to defend and keepe the towne for the Venetians, did aſſemble themſelues together in the market-place, where they all ſwore a ſollemne oth that they would not yeeld to the enemy, but endure all extremity rather then falſifie their faith. But the Turkes being not able to execute their deſeignes vpon the other townes ſo eaſily as they ſuppoſed, would not likewiſe medle with this, hauing before bent their thoughts vpon Hungary: whereupon ſo ſoone as they had reduced all their forces together, and made vp the body of an army, leauing three thouſand men for the gard of the frontiers, they marched towards Boſſina, from thence to paſſe into Hungary. The Turkes departure forth of the confines of Dalmatia did greatly eaſe the Venetians, and freed that poore people from much calamity. But as the alteration of affaires doe eaſily alter mens deſeignes, the gouernors and captaines of that Prouince, who did badly digeſt the wrongs which they had ſuſteined by the enemies, and moſt of all becauſe an infamous imputation was laied vpon them for the loſſe of certaine townes, and for ſuffering them without reſiſtance to ſcoure and ſpoile the country, made a propoſition (being deſirous to make vſe of the occaſion which did offer it ſelfe by reaſon that the enemies campe was farre off) to attempt the recouery of thoſe townes which the Turkes did poſſeſſe; whereuith acquainting the Councell of Tenne, they did affirme that the forces which were in Dalmatia, were ſufficient for the execution of that enterprize: As alſo, becauſe that if the caſtles neere to Zara were not recouered, the city would be ſtill in feare, hauing ſuch mighty enemies to their neere neighbours who not ſtirring forth of their Garriſons, did hold it in a manner beſeeged. The Sibenſſans braue reſolution. The Turkes leaue Dalmatia, and goe into Hungary. The Propoſition of the captains in Dalmatia.

Theſe propoſitions were enterteined in the Senate with great attention, where the deſire to be reuenged on the enemies cauſed the more credit to be giuen vnto them: next, the Duke of Vrbins perſwations, vnto whom the whole matter was imparted, did augment their hope, who did not only commend that propoſition, as a matter of great importance, but affirmed, that by adding fiue thouſand Lanſquenets to thoſe Italians that were in Dalmatia, and certaine numbers of Italian horſe to the Greekes and Stradiots, it would be an eaſie matter with thoſe forces to enter into Boſſina, and ſeize vpon ſome good towne, which might open them a way to greater conqueſts. That it was better and more profitable to make wat in their enemies country then in their owne, and that there were but three thouſand horſe in garriſon at Boſſina. The Senate & the Duke of Vrbin, allow this propoſition.

This aduiſe carried with it a goodly ſhew, and a certaine valour attended by profit: wherevpon they concluded ſpeedily to raiſe the Lanſequenets, and to this end Conſtantino Canazza, Secretary to the Councell of the Preguais, was ſent into Bauaria, who by meanes of Duke Lewis, a great friend to the Common-wealth, did in a ſhort time performe that he was enioyned, ſo as thoſe ſouldiers hauing receiued receiued their firſt payment, marched forthwith into Friull. Camillo Vrſino hauing in the meane time aſſembled forth of the garriſons of Dalmatia foure thouſand foot and fiue hundred horſe, and taken with him ſome peeces of ordnance, went and beſeeged Obrouazza.

The taking of that towne was of importance, it being a place of retreate for the Turkes, where they were wont to aſſemble themſelues to enuade the Venetians confines. The caſtle was neither ſtrong nor well manned, whereby the enterprize was thought to be as eaſie as profitable. The caſtle then, hauing beene battered two daies one after an other, the third day the ſouldiers went to the aſſault, where after ſome ſmall reſiſtance, they entred by the ruines of the wall.

The Venetians take Obronazza.

Vrſino being Maſter of the place, perceiuing that he could not fortifie it but with great difficulty, nor afterwards keepe it, but with much trouble, commanded it to be razed downe to the foundations. But the Turkes being aduertized thereof, came backe on a ſodaine and found the Venetians ruining off the caſtle, who being poſſeſſed with feare and terror by the Turkes vnlooked for arriuall, did forſake their worke and retired in diſorder towards their ſhips, being followed at the heeles by the Turkes, who in the end would haue broken and defeated them had not captaine Camillo de Monte the Neapolitan with certaine troupes made head againſt them, whileſt the ſouldiers were imbarked.

The Turkes arriued cauſeth the Venetians to quit Obrouazza & there other enterprizes.

As theſe deſeignes had at firſt encreaſed mens courages and hopes, euen ſo, the condition of the affaires altering in a ſhort time, there was no more ſpeech of the other enterprizes of Nadin, Laurana, Cliſſa, and Oſtrouizza, greater difficulties being dayly diſcouered concerning them, thoſe likewiſe who had ſhewed moſt heate and forwardneſſe towards the Turkiſh enterprizes, beganne by the ſame accident to grow could, and eſpecially the Duke of Vrbin, who had propounded it, did alleadge diuers impediments, ſaying that the number of ſouldiers which he had firſt craued was not ſufficient to enuade thoſe places, and withall to keepe the paſſages againſt the enemies, and that a great number would need ſo great a quantity of victuals and other prouiſions as it would be an hard matter to ſend them thither, by reaſon that they were to paſſe thorow the enemies country. In theſe perplexities of minde what was beſt to be done, opinions were very different, ſome ſuppoſing that their forces being ready, they were to be imployed for the releefe of the people, who by that meanes might hope for ſome better fortune, and not to keepe them idle: others on the contrary hauing maturely conſidered the matter, were of opinion to diſmiſſe the Lanſquenets, by giuing halfe-pay to the ſouldiers, and great gifts to the captaines to keepe them ſtil their friends when need ſhould be, and not to paſſe on any farther againſt the enemies, for feare leaſt by prouoking them, they might draw vpon themſelues the whole Turkiſh forces, to the entire ruine and loſſe of Dalmatia, ſeeing it was more expedient to quench that fire then to kindle it, in regard that all forraine aide did deceiue them. Theſe reaſons were allowed of, and the Lanſquenets were ſent home into their country.

The difficulties alleadged by the Duke of Vrbin.

The Senate reſolueth to ſend home the Lanſquenets, to paſſe on no farther.

The Turkes after this exploit returned into Hungary hauing firſt refreſhed their Garriſons, which remayning quiet the country was for a time at reſt.

All men were in the meane time very deſirous to ſee what would become of thoſe naual armies: Barbaroſſa departing from Candy retired towards the confines of Negrepont not attempting any thing, for feare of meeting with the Chriſtian armies. The Generall Capello hauing great number of gallies, one gallion, and diuers ſhips of war, the Patriarke Grimani being ioyned with him with the Popes gallies, did waite for the Spaniſh nauall army which was reported euery day to arriue, but none effect thereof was to be ſeene, conſuming to the great griefe of all men the fitteſt time and ſeaſon for Marine actions.

The Venetians naual army, and that of the Pope, ioyneth together.

The Emperor did promiſe, ſpeedily to ſend the 30. Neapolitan gallies which lay at

at Meſſina, to Corfou, and fifteene ſhips of warre with three thouſand Spaniſh foot-men conducted by Don Ferrant de Gonzaga, Lieutenant for the King in Sicily, who (becauſe the Duke of Vrbin by reaſon of his indiſpoſition could not come to the army) was to ſupply his place: he promiſed moreouer, that ſo ſoone as he ſhould come to Barcelona, he would forthwith ſend away Doria with two and thirty gallies, to ſaile to Corfou to ioyne with the other army.

Diuers things neuertheleſſe cauſed men to doubt that it would not ſo come to paſſe: firſt, becauſe that the Emperor before his going to Nice, had often ſaid, that it was impoſſible for him at one time to aſſaile the Turkes and the French, and the aſſembly of Nice being broken off without any effect, by reaſon of the French, there was no great hope in his forces. Next, his officers at Naples did not only hinder thoſe captaines whom Camillo Vrſino had ſent to leauy ſouldiers in the Kingdome for the defenſe of Dalmatia, but vnder feigned excuſes refuſed (contrary to the treaty of the league) the Generall Capello a certaine quantity of corne for the entertainment of the army. Diuers others deeds and words gaue iuſt occaſion of ſuſpition, that the Emperor ſought nothing elſe but to let time ſhip away vnprofitably, not being willing, or elſe able, to make warre vpon the Turke as he ſhould, hindring on the other ſide as much as he could, the Venetians from agreeing with them, for feare leaſt the whole burthen of the war ſhould light alone vpon himſelfe.

Mindid doubt the Emperors promiſes.

The Emperors ceſcigne.

The Emperor in the end ſeeking new meanes of aſſuring himſelfe, propounded to the Venetians the renuing of the capitulations of the league, the which although it was a ſuperfluous matter, in regard of the ſhort time ſince the agreement was made at Rome, they did neuertheleſſe ſatisfie him therein, becauſe they would not omit any thing which might ſerue for the vnion of the armies to let all men know their great deſire to purſue the warre.

The Capitulations being confirmed, the Emperor commanded Gonzaga, who was not yet gon, to ſaile to Corfou, where he arriued with the Gallies only, hauing left their ſhips behind, to the end (ſaid he) that the reſidue of the foot forces which were not yet come thither might haue ſhipping. But his ſo much deſired comming, was to no great purpoſe, becauſe that the Generalls to the Venetians and the Pope, hauing made a motion to goe from thence and to ſcoure towards the Leuant, he would not conſent therevnto, ſaying, that it was no ſafe matter for the Confederates, nor very honourable for the Emperour to execute any enterprize with ſo few forces, wherevpon he was deſirous to tarry till the arriuall of the ſhips, which he knew could not much linger.

Don Ferrant de Gonzaga commeth to Corfou.

The armies remayning in this manner at Corfou, the Patriarke Grimani being impatient of ſo long ſtay there, without doing any thing, departed thence with ſixe and thirty gallies, and ſailed toward Saint Nicolao de Ciuita, and hauing intelligence by the way, that the caſtle of Preueſe was not very well garded, he reſolued not to let ſlip ſuch an occaſion, but to aſſaile it on the ſodaine, the place being an aſſured retreate for the Turkes, when they did meane to enuade Chriſtendome: the Patriarke going on in this reſolution to aſſaile it, hoping to take it by ſome vnlooked for aſſault, and being come to the Channel of Preueſe, the galley of Paul Iuſtinian did ſhew the way to the reſt, where all of them being entred, he landed his ſouldiers and artillery in the plaine field a mile of from the caſtle, and becauſe the greateſt hope of the happy ſucceſſe conſiſted in ſpeed and dilligence, without ſpending time in making trenches and rampiers, he beganne ſodainely to batter the caſtle-walles with the artillery, himſelfe being come on ſhoare to haſten the buſineſſe, and to continue the battery without intermiſſion. But they had ſcarce begunne the battery when on a ſodaine, people from al places round about come running into the field where the Venetians lay, and the number of them hourely increaſing, grew ſo great, as our men being lodged in the ſame field without trenches or rampiers, were affraide leaſt the enemies cauallery

The Patriarke Grimani his enterprize vpon the caſtle of Preueze.

ſhould

The Patriarke ſaileth of his enterprize.

ſhould come and ouer-run them, wherevpon they reſolued on a ſodaine to re-embarke the ſouldiers and the ordnance, and without any farther attempt to returne to Corfou.

Grimani his valor and ſpeed was highly praiſed by ſome, and condemned by others, who ſaid, that he ſhould haue vſed more mature deliberation, and not raſhly to haue expoſed himſelfe to ſo great a danger, his iourney neuertheleſſe was to purpoſe, for the viewing of the ſytuation of the place, and for what-ſoeuer ſhould belong to ſuch an enterpriſe, and was the cauſe that within a while after, an occaſion of a goodly victory was offered, if the Venetians had knowne better how to haue vſed it: becauſe that Barbaroſſa hauing intelligence that the Patriarke had entred the Gulphe of Larta, did forthwith ſaile thither with all the army, hoping to find him there ſtill and to ouerthrow him.

Now newes being brought to Corfou which way Barbaroſſa directed his courſe, and that he had tarried at Preueſe, the captaines opinions were very different concerning that which was to bee done. Some ſaid it was beſt to ſend to Meſſina, whither Doria was come from Spaine, for to haſten his comming to Corfou: others, that it was not good to depart from Corfou, but there to expect him, becauſe he did meane to come thither ſhortly, it being neither for the profit nor ſafety of the Common-wealth, to abandon the caſtle of Corfou and the gard of the whole Gulphe.

Doria commeth to Corfou.

Doria at the laſt came to Corfou vpon the ſeuenth day of September, but not with all the gallies, for he had ſome of them in Spaine for the gard of thoſe ſeas againſt Pirats, and other ſome were gon into Affrick to the aide of Thunis and Goletta, there being ſome ſuſpition that the Moores & Turks of thoſe quarters would raiſe ſome tumults. At his arriual they began a new to conſult on that which was to be done, where by the General conſent of all men they reſolued to goe to Preueſe to fight with the enemies. The meaning of our men was, ſo ſoone as they ſhould come thither, to land the troupes, and to vſe al meanes to become Maſters of the caſtle, & to build a fort right ouer againſt it, to keepe the entry of the Gulph open, that it might be in their owne power to take what reſolution they pleaſed, either to enter into it to fight with the enemies army, or to ſtop the going forth thereof, and to defeate it of it ſelfe. There were in the leagues nauall army a hundred and ſix and thirty gallies, two gallions, and thirty armed ſhips. Theſe veſſels were diuided into fiue battaillions: in the firſt were all the great ſhips placed, vnder the command of Franciſco Doria, and in the other foure, all the light veſſels diuided in this maner: The Patriarke Grimani ſailed formoſt, and the General Capello laſt of all, and in the middeſt, were Doria and Gonzaga. The whole fleet ſtaied a while at the Gomenizzes, tarrying for the Emperors other ſhips, but they making no haſte to come, and the Generals hauing a proſperous winde, ſailed towards Saint Maure.

The army of the league reſolueth to goe to Preueze.

The order of the league army.

The Turkes do wonder at the Chriſtians boldneſſe.

The Turkes hauing notice that the Chriſtian army, which departed from Corfou, did ſaile directly towards them, were greatly amazed, as thoſe who thought themſelues ſafe enough in that hauen, and could not thinke that thoſe armies would ſo ſoone haue beene vnited together, or that being vnited, they would haue reſolued to ſeeke them out to fight with them: wherevpon, wondering at their ſodainneſſe, they were in great doubt what they were beſt to doe: ſome thought it a goodly matter, for that after they had ſcoured the ſeas all the ſommer, and greatly endammaged the Venetians, they had retired themſelues without any loſſe into the Streight of Gallipolis, being able (as they ſaid) by drawing the warre out in length, to conſume the Venetians, and to ſeparate the intelligence and forces of the Confederates, and by that meanes, purchaſe to themſelues a more aſſured victory: wherevpon they councelled Barbaroſſa not to ſtirre forth of the Hauen, where they might liue ſafely, by reaſon of the caſtle, and the Streight of the Channell, with commodious aboundance of all things: others with a barbarous

Sundry opinions of the Turkiſh army.

inſolency

inſolency not being able to endure that the Chriſtians who were wont to fly from them, ſhould now ſhut them vp into an hauen, made a motion preſently to goe forth with the whole army to fight with them, ſaying, that to continue ſo ſhut vp, beſides the great infamy that would redound vnto them thereby, it would not purchaſe them any ſafety, by reaſon that they might be kept in longer then they thought, and thereby be depriued of all commodities: How that Soliman would vndoubtedly commend that valliant and generous councell, rather then to endure that his enemies ſhould come and defie his army in his owne hauens and vnder his owne fortes, to the contempt of the reputation of his forces and happy fortune, and of the Ottoman Empire.

Barbaroſſa was a man valliant and couragious, and accuſtomed to the hazards of fortune, who had often fauored him, he knew likewiſe how that diuers of the great Turkes Porte did enuy his greatneſſe, and that the retreat from Corfou and the infortunate iſſue of that enterprize, whereof he had beene the chiefe author, had cauſed them to vſe ſiniſter ſpeeches of him, whereby he feared the diminution of his credit, and the loſing of the great Turkes grace and fauor: beſides, he had ſome hope, that the captaines of the Chriſtian army, notwithſtanding that they were nere them, were not fully reſolued to fight: and that which confirmed him in that opinion, was the treaties of agreement which Doria had already practized with him.

Barbaroſſa his conſiderations vpon thoſe ſundry opinions.

Theſe things made him reſolue to goe forth with the army, and promiſed him great reputation for ſuch an exploit. He had in his fleet, a hundred and fifty veſſels which vſed the oare, and a certaine number for ſaile, wherein were comprehended, diuers Galeots, Fuſts, and other ſmaller veſſels. Reſoluing then to goe forth and to ſhew himſelfe to the Chriſtian army, not to ſeeke, nor refuſe the battaile, but as a politike and well aduiſed captaine, to vſe meanes to diſcouer the enemies behauior and deſeignes, he would before his going forth with the whole fleet ſend forth fifty of his gallies, to ſound the meaning of the Captaines of the league, and to diſcerne whether their intention was to fight, and in what order they did ſet forward.

The number of Barbaroſſas fleet.

Barbaroſſa ſendeth forth fifty Gallies to diſcouer the Chriſtian army.

The Confederates nauall army did at the the ſame time ſaile towards Saint Maure; but thoſe in the tops hauing diſcouered the enemies that were come forth, aduertized the captaines, who altered their courſe, ſayling againſt them towards the entrance of the Gulphe of Larta, from whence they came: whereupon by altering their courſe the order of the fleet was likewiſe changed, ſo as the Generall Capello was in the vauntgard, who from as farre as he could deſcry the Turks veſſels cauſing thoſe of his battaillon to double the bankes of Rowers, did ſpeedily ſet forward againſt the enemies and by diſcharging diuers Canons vpon them, enforced them to returne from whence they came, the which they did ſpeedily (being come forth only to diſcouer and not to fight) as they fell into ſome diſorder, whileſt euery one of the gallies ſtriued which ſhould enter firſt to free themſelues from danger, which neuertheleſſe grew greater by their fight, by reaſon that by turning their gallies, their poopes lay open to the ordnance ſhot, being neither able to defend themſelues, nor to be releeued by their fellowes, who kept the mouth and entrance of the Gulphe cloſely ſhut vp.

The Turkiſh Gallies are in a manner put to rout by the army of the league.

Doria who ſailed in the battaile, ſo ſoone as he perceiued it, did ſet forward, all men ſuppoſing that he did it to keepe the enemies from entring into the mouth of the Hauen, who being beaten both in poope and flanke, could not chooſe but bee vanquiſhed or ſunke: But ſo ſoone as hee came nere to them, he ſent commandement thorow the whole fleet (no man knowing the cauſe why) that vpon paine of puniſhment, all his gallies ſhould forthwith retire, and being ioyned altogether ſhould ſaile to the Ducall Cape in the Iſland of Saint Maur, to the great aſtoniſhment and griefe of all men, whereupon, men did boldly and openly thorough the whole army vſe reproachfull ſpeeches againſt him, for that by his meanes meanes they had loſt the commodity of ouer-throwing a great part of the enemies fleet without the loſſe of one only man.

Doria in fauor to the enemies cauſeth his army to retire.

Being come to that place the chiefe of the army beganne a new to conſult on-what were beſt to be done: ſome were of opinion to ſend part of their gallies to aſſaile the caſtle of Lepanto, affirming that Barbaroſſa would neither himſelfe come forth nor yet ſuffer his gallies to leaue the Gulphe without vrgent neceſſity: and if he ſhould come forth, it would be in their owne power to take what aduantage they pleaſed to giue battaile; others thought it fit to returne ſpeedily to Preueſe, becauſe that the Turkiſh army not ſtirring forth of his place, they might aſſaile the caſtle, and if it did come forth they would be enforced to come to battaile to their diſaduantage, and be aſſailed before they could put themſelues into order of battaile.

This opinion was allowed, as being thought fitteſt for the honour of our army, and for the aſſurance of breaking that of the enemies: and thereupon the army of the league, departing from Saint Maur on the eight and twentith of September, ſailed forward in the ſame order as at the firſt. But the winde hauing failed them by the way, which till then had euer fauoured them, they were enforced becauſe they would not ſeparate the gallies from the ſhips to tow them with great diſcommodity and delay, by meanes whereof the Turkes had time to come forth of the Gulphe, and to order themſelues in battaile as they deſired, contrary to the opinion of the confederates: ſo as the army of the league deſcried that of the enemies in battaile, before it could come to the mouth of the Gulphe, the which came ſailing with a faire winde vp to ours.

The Turkes come forth of the Gulphe & doe put themſelues in battaile.

We haue now (ſaid Doria) cauſed the enemy to diſlodge according to our deſire, it is now in our power to fight, but certainely it behoueth vs well to conſider of it: it is a matter of very great importance, and repentance afterwards will be in vaine. We are to conſider, that by giuing battaile, we commit to the hazard of a ſhort time not onely this army, but likewiſe the whole reputation of the Confederate Princes, and if I may ſo ſay, the wealth and ſafety of all Chriſtendome; becauſe that theſe forces being loſt, where are the meanes to ſet forth an other fleet to oppoſe the enemies to ſtop the courſe of their victory? What hope is there of being able to defend and preſerue the ſea townes, without forces at ſea? Then turning himſelfe towards the Venetian Generall, he added, that it was his part, whom it moſt of all concerned, to conſider thoſe things, becauſe that the danger which threatned the State and liberty of his Common-wealth was greateſt of all other.

Doria his remonſtrance to the whole army.

Capello made anſwer, that the Senate had commanded him to fight with the enemy when occaſion ſhould be offered, and that at the ſame time ſo faire an one being preſented, he was to obey that commandement, and to beſeech God that the iuſtice of their cauſe might be accompanied with a fortunate ſucceſſe to the ſeruice of all Chriſtendome, and their owne particular commendation, and that his deſire was to be placed in the moſt dangerous part of the battaile which he would willingly accept. The Patriarke Grimani ſeemed to be of the ſame minde, notwithſtanding that in the beginning he had councelled them to goe to Lepanto.

Capello his anſwere.

Doria perceiuing that all men conſented to a battaile, Be it ſo then (quoth he) and I beſeech God to fauor our enterpriſe, and in ſo ſaying, he did ſpeedily cauſe the battails banner to be erected, and gaue order for whatſoeuer was neceſſary, ſaying that with his owne battalllon he would be the firſt that ſhould charge the enemy: All men were ioyfull when they vnderſtood this reſolution, for the great hope they had of victory, and in regard of the ſmal forces that were in the enemies army, wherevpon they imagined that they would not haue the courage to attend them, but that they made that ſhew only in brauery. The captaines in the meane time did exhort the ſouldiers to fight valiantly, ſetting before their eyes the greatneſſe and facility of the victory, the rich ſpoiles, and the immortal glory prepared

The reſolution to giue battaile reioyceth the whole army.

for

for the vanquiſher. Doria would needs ſaile formoſt with his galleys, placing Capel in the battaile, and Grimani in the rereward, to ſuccour with his battaillon thoſe parts which he ſhould perceiue to haue moſt need, he commanded Antonio Doria who conducted the great veſſels, that keeping before the light galleys, hee ſhould vſe meanes to get the winde of the enemies, that he might with more eaſe runne vpon them, and with his ordnance diſorder them, before they ſhould come too neere the light galleys. But the Turkes on the other ſide, ſeeking the ſame aduantage, vſed all meanes they could to get before the Chriſtian Army, that they might firſt aſſaile it; which Doria perceiuing, did in time draw his army towards the land, to keepe the enemies from poſſeſſing thoſe quarters. Then vpon the ſodaine, there beeing no winde at all, it was an hard matter to purſue that deſiegne, in regard that the light Galleys were with many turnings enforced to towe the great ſhips: yet neuertheleſſe, all men were ſo earneſt to the battaile, that by their induſtry this impediment was taken away, and the two great ſhips, namely the Argozy and the Gallion, were placed at the head of the Army like two ſtrong Towers, to breake the enemies firſt aſſaults.

The Turkes purpoſe broken by Doria.

So ſoone as Barbaroſſa perceiued thoſe two great ſhips comming againſt his Armie before the calme, fearing leaſt hee ſhould bee firſt enfocred to fight with them, hauing auoided it as much as hee could, began to repent his comming forth of the Gulphe of Preueze: Yet neuertheleſſe taking preſently courage, hee did euery where play the part of a good Captaine, thinking on nothing more then on fight, ſeeking all aduantages that the condition of the time and place would affoord him, and chiefly hee ſought to bend his courſe towards the cape of the Iſland of Saint Maur: wherevpon auoiding at the ſame time the meeting with thoſe two great veſſels, hee did vſe meanes by turning to the other ſide, to charge oue Army on their backs, the which being deſirous to keepe the great veſſels vnited to the light ones, could not but with great difficulty & diſorder mooue and chang their place; and therefore he did ſolicite his ſoldiers, both by promiſes and threats not to be diſcouraged; and to ſpeake truth, he did that day do whatſoener belonged to a diſcreet and valiant Captaine. He had diuided his Army into three parts, the right wing was gouerned by Trabacchio, the left by Salecca, both of them valiant Captaines, and renowned for their great experience, and Barbaroſſa was in the middeſt with the body of the battaile. Dragut a famous Pirat, went before the whole army, with great numbers of Fuſts, Galeots, and ſome light Galleys, as it were to lead the way to the reſt, and with thoſe lighter veſſels to begin the skirmiſh. The long delay and irreſolution of our men, or the ſpeed and good fortune of the enemies, the ſea beeing calme, ſo that the great veſſels could doe no ſeruice for want of winde, did giue the Turkes time and leiſure firſt to poſſeſſe that part neere to the firme land, which the Captaines of the league had determined to ſeaze on, and to driue the enemies from it, who lying in a very commodious place, and a great way off from our veſſels, lay in front of the Chriſtian Army to deſcrie how it would make vp towards them, ſuppoſing themſelues to be foorth of danger, by reaſon that they perceiued that the Captaines of the league were determined to giue battaile without thoſe great veſſels, and that it was dangerous to tow them any further on in the view of the enemies; ſo as it ſeemed that it was in their power either to giue battaile or not.

Barbaroſſa repeateth his comming forth of the Gulphe of Preueze.

The order of Barbaroſſa his Army.

Doria in the meane time beeing followed by all the light Galleys, turning towards thoſe great veſſels, had for a time not onely held our men, but the enemies in doubt what he would doe, all men expecting when he would turne the prows vpon the enemy, and begin the fight. But during this long delay, he gaue time to the Turkes to get the vantage, and to eſchew the battaile. Dorias pollicy was (as he ſaid afterwards) to beguile the enemies, who beeing vncertaine what courſe he would hold, thought it beſt to lie at ſea in the ſame place, and cloſe order which they held: whereby it had beene an eaſie matter for him, by fetching a great

The enemies got into a place of ſafety through the fault of thoſe of the league.

What Dorias purpoſe was.

compaſſe, to haue aſſailed them with his Galleys in ſundry places. But Barbaroſſa perceiuing his intent, did with great ſpeed (as hath beene ſaid) make to land-ward, keeping ſtill, as he ſailed along, the prows of his Galleys turned towards our Army, keeping as farre off as he could from our great veſſels.

The Army of the league in the meane time, to all mens wonder, ſtood immoueable to behold the enemies inſulting, and the faire occaſion which it loſt; the Generall Capell, and Grimani, began to cry out with a lowd voyce, that they were no longer to looſe time, nor the certain hope of ſo goodly a victory. Capel, preſently after, leapt into a Frigat, and was carried round about the fleet, ſtirring vp all men to battaile, beeing reciprocally welcomed and commended of all men, and being come to Dorias Galley, he ſaid vnto him, Let vs goe my Lord to charge the enemies that flye from vs; time, occaſion, and the ſoldiers cryes doe call vs forth, the victory is ours, I will bee the firſt that ſhall charge, and I tarry for nothing but the commandement to begin the fight.

Capels ſpeech to Doria to prouoke him to the battaile.

Capell was a man of three ſcore and thirteene yeares of age, of a cheerfull countenance, healthfull conſtitution, ſingular iudgement, and was reuerenced of all men for his age and great diſcretion, ioyned with a ſingular experience in marine matters, ſo as great eſtimation was made of his aduice and councell; and indeed all men were deſirous of battaile, and did ioyntly cry out, battaile, battaile, victory, victory. Doria at the laſt beeing mooued by theſe cryes, and ſpurd forward by ſhame, commanded the reſt to ſet forward, and himſelf with his battalion did paſſe on beyond the great ſhips, our army came neerer to the enemies Galleys, who were already come to the place they wiſht for, their poopes beeing towards the land, and their prows to ſea-ward: whereupon, from both parts (though a farre off) the Cannon plaid, ſo as a man would haue thought that the battaile had bin begun, and yet neither on the one ſide nor other, did the Galleys ſet forward. Doria did ſtill looke when that the Turkes, all amazed, would forſake the Galleys without fight, and ſaue themſelues on ſhoare, and Barbaroſſa perceiuing the light Galleys to bee backt by the Gallion and the Argozey, durſt come no neerer for feare leaſt the Ordnance of thoſe great ſhips would diſorder and ſinke him, but Doria hauing for a time continued in this manner, and perceiuing that his pollicy tooke no effect, and reſoluing (as his actions did afterwards ſhew) not to commit himſelfe to the hazard of a battaile, began openly to retire.

The whole army crieth out for battaile.

A beginning of the battaile a farre off.

Doria his retreat encouraggeth the Turkes.

The Turkes taking courage by the retreate of our men, did come ſo farre forward, as diuerſe of the enemies Galleys were very neere to the Gallion and the Argozey, who by reaſon of the place, wherein they were, and their greatneſſe they could not retire ſo ſoone, but a Cannon ſhot beeing made vpon the Gallion, and fire taking in a barrell of powder, the marriners and ſoldiers were in great feare and diſorder: but the Captaine prouiding a ſpeedy remedy for it, did defend them from danger, and the Turkiſh Galleys comming ſtill neerer to theſe ſhips, both of them at one time diſcharged their ordnance vpon them, ſo as euery Bullet dooing execution, they enforced them ſodainly to retire.

In this manner the whole army of the league beeing ſafe and vntoucht (ſauing a few veſſels that were loſt in the retreate) was brought to Corfou. Doria in his Galley would be the laſt that ſhould retire, thereby to ſhew himſelfe more braue and valiant, or elſe that hee had a great care of the Army: but all men knew, that it did not proceed from magnanimity of courage, or from any good will that hee did beare to the cauſe, but onely becauſe hee truſted to the ſwiftneſſe of his owne Galley, wherein he might eaſily eſcape, which Capel perceiuing, would not likewiſe depart, till the very ſelfe-ſame time that hee retired.

The Army of the league returneth to Corfou.

The end of the ſecond Booke of the ſixth Decade.

The Contents of the third Booke of the sixth Decade.

BArbaroſſa retireth into the Gulph of Larta, for feare of Sea tempeſts. How all men did condemne Andre Doria. The Confederates take Caſtel Nouo in the Gulphe of Cathara. Doria with his Galleys retireth into Sicily. The Venetians take Riſsana. The occaſions which mooued the Senate to make peace with the Turke. Gritti goeth to Conſtantinople for that purpoſe. Guy Vbaldo, Duke of Vrbin, ſonne to Franceſco Maria, is made Generall of the Venetian troopes. An Accord betwixt the Pope and the Duke of Vrbin for the Dutchy of Camerin. Barbaroſſa recouereth Caſtel-nouo. The Baſcha alledgeth Solimans complaints concerning the accord with the Venetians. Barbaroſſa giueth an aſſault to Cathara, hoping to take it. The Baſchas vnreaſonable demands vpon the agreement with the Venetians. The Emperor Charles paſſeth thorow France into Flanders, to chaſtice the Gantois. The Cardinall Farneze commeth into France, as Legat at that enter-view. The Concluſion of the peace with the Turkes according to their owne minde. The ſorrow and diſcontent of thoſe of Naples and Maluefia, when they vnderſtood that their Townes were made ouer to the Turkes. And laſtly, the Conſignation of thoſe two townes into the Baſchas hands, with the departure of diuerſe of the Inhabitants, to goe and dwell elſe-where.

The third Booke of the ſixth Decad of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

THE Army of the league beeing returned to Corfou, Barbaroſſa not beeing ſatisfied that hee had eſcaped ſhame and danger, went into the Iſle of Paxu, ſome twelue miles from thence, where he continued for a time, daring as it were the Confederates to come forth of their Hauen and fight, or elſe waiting for an opportunity to endanger them, but the Army of the league was filled with diſorder and feare, Doria his conduct beeing thought moſt infortunate, and his loyalty and counſell much ſuſpected: there was no man that durſt vndertake a deed of conſequence: if any propoſition were made, infinite numbers of difficulties were found therein, and the Galleys remaining thus in the hauen, without any military action, the Turkes after that they had braued the Chriſtian army, fearing foule weather and tempeſts, by reaſon that part of October was ſpent, retired into the Gulph of Larta.

The Turkiſh Army retireth into the Gulph of Larta.

Such was the ſucceſſe of that yeare, ſuch was the end of ſo great a warlick preparation, and in a word, that great expectation of all men came to nothing, to the great hurt and diſaduantage of all Chriſtendome, and to the particular diſhonor of André Doria, againſt whom, all men cried out, ſome taxing him of cowardiſe, others of treachery, and for that hee ſtood badly affected to the good of Chriſtendome, and particularly to that of the Venetians. Thoſe who ſpake of it more openly, did blame his ſundry immoderate affections, his intollerable ambition, his feare to expoſe himſelfe to dangers, his great auarice, wherewith he was ſome-times ſo blinded, as hee eſteemed nothing ſo much as his owne priuate gaine. The Spaniards more then all others cryed out againſt him, and eſpecially the Marquis of Aguilar the Emperors Ambaſſador at Rome, who went about to wipe out the opinion which all men had conceiued, how that the Emperor his maiſter had intelligence with him, and that by his commandement he had ſo carried himſelfe. But the Venetian Senate beeing well aduiſed, thinking it not fit to make him their enemy, in regard hee ſtill had the command of the Army, was deſirous, amid theſe publick curſes, to ſhew that they did in no ſort reſent it, nor were any whit diſpleaſed with him, but wrote him a very louing letter, to aſſure him that they beleeued, that he, as a wiſe and diſcreet Captaine, had done nothing, but with great conſideration and good councell. Yet neuertheleſſe, the imputations laid vpon him, beeing come to his hearing, did greatly afflict him: ſo as ſince his returne to Corfou, he did for many dayes liue in priuate, not coming abroad in publick, and when in his owne preſence, any mention was made of that which had happened in that voyage, hee did ſeeme to bee extreamly ſorry for it, beeing ſcarce able to keepe himſelfe from ſhedding teares, (either true or feigned,) in acknowledgment of his fault.

All men cry out vpon Doria.

Doria ſorrow for his fault.

All

All the Army of the league after that retreat, did for a time remaine at Corfou: but the Confederates ſuppoſing it to bee a diſgrace vnto them to continue ſo long in the hauen, the ſeaſon being fit for ſea actions, notwithſtanding that it was then Autumne, and the enemies beeing farre from thence, they began to propound ſundry matters. The Generall Capell did ſolicite them to ſaile with the whole Army into the Archipelago, where (as he ſaid) ſome new occaſion might be offered of fighting with the enemy, and though that ſhould not come to paſſe, yet an other notable and certaine profit might redound by that iourney, in regard that diuers ſhips that were loden going to Conſtantinople, would fall into their hands as an aſſured booty, beſides, they ſhould releeue Naples and Maluesia, and might recouer diuerſe Iſlands of the Archipelago, as eaſily as they had been loſt, from whence they might draw great commodity, and chiefly of Rowers for the Nauy, whereby double profit would redound to them, as to driue the enemies from thence, and to make aboade there by reaſon of the hauens, where with thoſe Iſlands doe abound, where the fleete might lye in all ſafety, and their abode there would make Barbaroſſa iealous and fearfull, ſo as hee would not dare to carry his fleet to Conſtantinople, and that Gulphe beeing taken from him, which was very commodious for his vſe, hee would not come forth at all, or elſe very late, to ſea the next yeare: whereby his honor and reputation would enforce him to come to a battaile.

Sundry opinions in the confederates counceil.

Others, and eſpecially Doria were of opinion, rather to go and beſiege Durazzo, thinking it a dangerous matter to ſaile at that ſeaſon vpon the Archipelago, and the labour likewiſe which ſhould be beſtowed in the recouery of thoſe Iſlands would be loſt, there beeing no ſafe nor aſſured Fort; wherevpon ſo ſoone as the Turkiſh Army ſhould ſhew it ſelfe, they would bee againe recouered: But on the contrary, they could but haue great hope of the happy ſucceſſe of the enterpriſe of Durazzo, in regard of the quality of the place, beeing of it ſelfe very commodious, a neere neighbour to Italy, and fitte for opening the way to greater exploits in Albania. But this propoſition likewiſe did finde ſundry difficulties, firſt, that there were no hauens there fitte for the Fleet, eſpecially for the ſhips, who without danger could not ride vpon thoſe ſhallow flattes: Next, that the countrey was full of Turkiſh Cauallery, who might eaſily breake the enterpriſe, the like might Barbaroſſa doe comming to Valona: ſo as it would bee no ſafe matter to land the ſoldiers, and to leaue the veſſels vnfurniſhed, hauing ſo mighty an enemy neere them: that they were to make warre elſe-where, and to moleſt the enemy in places farther off from his greateſt forces, which conſiſted in horſe and foote.

Both theſe propoſitions then beeing for theſe reaſons reiected, they reſolued to enter the Gulphe, there to enterpriſe ſome-what, which might aſſuredly, and without difficulty anſwer their deſire. The Army then departing from Corfou, ſayled to the mouth of the Channell of Catharra to beſiege Caſtle-nouo, a place ſeated on the ſea-ſhore, a little within the Gulphe, which Mahomet had certaine yeares before, taken from Cherſega: that place was ſufficiently eſteemed, not for beeing great, or of an impregnable fortification, but onely for the ſituation, commodious for diuers matters, and chiefly for the Venetians, for the ſafety of Cathara. Aboue the Towne there is a Caſtle, kept by a garriſon of Turkes, all the other inhabitants are Dalmatians or Sclauonians.

The Confederates Army commeth to beſiege Caſtel-nouo.

The fleet hauing entred the Gulph, Doria landed his footmen not farre from the caſtle, and within a while after his ordnance to batter it, giuing the particular charge thereof to Don Ferrant de Gonzaga. But whileſt they planted the ordnance, the Generall Capello beeing come neere to the Cities walls with his galleis, forth of the danger of the Caſtles ſhotte, the which comming from aboue flew ouer their heads, hee began to giue an aſſault to the Towre with his Rowers and marriners, who vſing their oares inſteed of ladders, and aſſailing it in ſundry places,did at laſt enter it,and opened the Gates to the ſoldiers : Wherevpon the Turkes did ſodainly retire into the Caſtle , but within a while after , perceiuing that they could not long hold out,they yeelded vpon diſcretion. The towne was ſackt by the Spaniards , notwithſtanding Don Ferrants prohibition , who knew that the ſpoile did belong to the Venetians , but the inſolency of that nation was ſo great,as not beeing ſatisfied with the ſpoile of the Citty,when they did meete with any of the Venetian Rowers , returning to the Galleys loden with pillage, they did take all from them , and would perforce enioy the fruite of other mens labours . Barbaroſſa beeing aduertiſed that the Chriſtian Army was gone to beſiege Caſtel-nouo,did leaue Preueze,and was onward on his way,meaning to go and releeue it, or at leaſt by the report of his comming to breake the enemies enterprize: But hauing ſailed halfe way thither , a marueilous tempeſt aroſe, in which thirty of his Galleys were caſt away and ſunck: Wherevpon hee returned with the reſt,very much beaten to Volona.

The Spaniards inſolency.

The moſt part of Barbaroſſas fleet is caſt away by tempeſt.

The Chriſtian army hauing intelligence of this loſſe, all men began to cry out and ſaid,that it behooued them to ſaile forthwith towards the enemies,who were weakened both in courage and forces, to fight with them: the Generall Capello did with great vehemency perſwade Doria not to loſe ſuch an occaſion , ſeeing it was not farre from thence to Valona, where they might aſſaile the Turkiſh fleet, which was not in ſtate to fight,beeing weakned by the fortune of the ſea, nor was able to eſcape, by reaſon that all their Oares were in a manner broken: neither could it preſume vpon the ſafety of the place where it lay , the Caſtle of Valona beeing not able to defend them,becauſe it was too farre off from the hauen. But Doria making excuſes,ſaying ſome-times that hee reſolued to goe thither , and afterwards that the ſeaſon was vnfit for ſuch an enterpriſe , with diuerſe other impediments,did make ſuch long delayes,as hee gaue Barbaroſſa time and leiſure to conduct his army in ſafety to Conſtantinople,hauing left Dragut in the Gulph of Lepanto with fiue and twenty Galleys , and a certaine number of Galeots and Fuſts belonging to Pirats, to hinder the Chriſtians nauigation.

Doria excuſes becauſe he would not fight with Barbaroſſa.

Doria afterwards alledging new occaſions,that he might be gone from thence; and chiefly the want of Biſket that was in the Army , reſolued to depart , and to carry his Army into Sicily,notwithſtanding that he was councelled and exhorted by his owne friends and countrey-men,and namely by Don Ferrant , to keepe the armies ioyned together all that winter,either at Corfou , or in ſome other commodious place,to the end they might at the ſpring put to ſea betimes , and outſtrip the enemies preparations.He left foure thouſand Spaniards for the guard of Caſtel-nouo,vnder the command of Captaine Iohn Sarmiento, notwithſtanding that the Venetian Generall entreated him,that according to the capitulations of the league,the towne might bee conſigned to him,to bee kept by his ſoldiers : but excuſing himſelf for that he had no commiſſion ſo to do,he referred that buſineſſe to the Emperor: he went about beſide to place ſix thouſand Spaniſh footmen in garriſon in the cities of Budua, Antiuari,and Dulcino,vnder coulor that he did it for the Venetians commodity,the better to aſſure thoſe townes , and to haue ſoldiers alwayes ready to make ſpeedy vſe of,at the Spring.

Do is with his galleys retireth into Sicyll.

Doria beeing gone , the Patriarke Grimani followed him within a while after, and ſailed to Ancona, where hee diſarmed the Galleys , and ſent them empty to Venice: afterwards hee went to Rome to yeeld an account to the Pope of that which had beene done. Capello in this manner remaining alone (all the other Commanders beeing gone) in the Gulphe of Catharra, went to Riſſane a ſmall towne not farre from thence, held by the Turkes with a ſmall Garriſon , which beeing ſoone yeelded vnto him , he manned with Soldiers, and made Lodouico Zene their Gouernor. Capello in the meane time, by reaſon of the toyle and trauaile which hee had ſuſteined , or rather with greeſe and diſcontent , to ſee matters

matters handled contrary to his deſire, fell into a greeuous ſickneſſe, in regard whereof hee beſought the Senate to giue him leaue to returne home to Venice to take order for his health.

The Duke of Vrbin at the ſame time beeing conſumed by a lingering diſeaſe dyed, not without ſuſpition of beeing poiſoned, to the Venetians great greeſe and diſcontent: Sollemne obſequies were made for him at Venice in the Church of the Saints Iohn and Paul.

The death of the Duke of Vrbin.

Now the occaſion beeing ſo often loſt of fighting with the Turkiſh fleet with a certaine aſſurance of the victory, and the Spaniards ſeazing vpon Caſtelnouo, did more and more encreaſe the ſuſpition which all men had conceiued of the Captaine Generalls ſmall ſincerity, or great cowardize: but ſome ſaid that he had proceeded in that manner by the Emperors will and conſent: wherevpon the Senate was greatly troubled and perplexed, for that it had vndertaken ſuch a warre againſt ſo mighty an enemy, and made their atonement with him more vneaſie by their refuſall thereof, (hauing beene therevnto inuited), vppon the weake and vncertaine hope of the aid of Chriſtian Princes, ſo as it knew not by what means to aſſure the conſeruation of their State.

The Emperor by good offices had beene diſpoſed to the obſeruation of the Articles of the league, namely, to grant a proportion of corne out of Naples and Sicily toward the entertainment of the army; to cauſe Caſtelnouo to be conſigned into the hands of the Republicks officers, and to command the Gallies to be ready in the moneth of March, that the fleets might be ioyned together: but the Emperor performing nothing of all this, did ſtill find out delayes and excuſes; for concerning the proportion of corne, his officers were firſt to haue their owne ſhare and diuiſion: for the reſtitution of Caſtelnouo, they aleadged that the Common-wealth ſhould firſt pay the Spaniards for keeping that Fort till then; and as concerning the ready expedition of the Army, in regard that the Emperor determined to be in it in perſon, it behooued them to make greater preparations, and alſo to haue more forces, and ſo conſequently a longer time.

The Emperors excuſes for not performing his promiſe.

But in ſome of theſe things, reaſon, and the effect did manifeſt, that hee did neither regard equity nor the common good: the Emperors ſpeeches were very magnificent, full of goodly promiſes, but greatly ſuſpected that he did only intend to keepe the Venetians bound, by meanes of the league, that hee might make vſe both of their armes and friendſhip, in as much as concerned his owne particular profit and comodity, and not for the wealth or ſeruice of the Republicke, by reaſon that it was knowne, how that the Eſtates aſſembled in Spaine did beſeech him not to departt forth of the Cuntrey: beſides, his want of money was ſo great, as although his meaning had beene to haue gone in perſon into the Army yet hee would not haue had meanes to haue defraied the expences of ſuch a iourney: in regard whereof all men may perceiue that it was farre more ſafe and expedient for the Signory of Venice to thinke on peace and agreement rather then on armes. That which mooued them to this Treaty, was their hope to obtaine peace on honeſt conditions, ſeeing that the Turkes did vſe them with more reſpect then they were wont, for they had releaſed the Baily forth of the Tower of the great Sea, and admitted them into Conſtantinople, and did likewiſe put them in hope (as it came to paſſe) ſpeedily to reſtore all the Venetian Marchants to their liberty, and to ſuffer them to trade in the ſame manner as they had done before, ſo as they would be bound one for another, not to depart from Conſtantinople, nor to ſend their goods forth of the Ottoman Empire.

The Emperors cheife ſtaye &c.

The Senate reſolueth to make peace with the Turke.

There came beſides to Venice a man whoſe name was Antonio de Modon, dwelling at that time in Zante, bringing letters from Ianusby his friend, which he had written to him concerning their owne particular traficke, wherein hee mentioned how that the great Turke and the Baſcha were deſirous of a Peace with the Republick: ſo as if an Ambaſſador were ſent from Venice to Conſtantinople for that purpoſe, ſome agreement might bee eaſily concluded, and that this Ianusbey did offer, (ſo that they would intreate him) willingly to employ him ſelfe therein.

with

All theſe things did mooue the Councell of Tenne to begin ſome practiſe of agreement: but to the end it ſhould bee kept ſecret, they would not for that time ſend any publick perſon to Conſtantinople, but appointed Lorenzo Gritti the Dukes ſonne for that iourney, vnder coullor of ſome affaires of his owne, and in particular for the recouery of certaine goods belonging to a brother of his, who a little before dyed at Conſtantinople. They enioyned him firſt to ſpeake of a generall truce, and that hee ſhould bee very earneſt therein, the better afterwards to come to ſome reſolution. But if the Turkes ſhould not entertaine it, then to motion a treatie of peace for the Common-wealth, by renuing the ancient capitulations, and on conditions that both ſides ſhould yeeld vp thoſe places that had beene taken during that warre.

Gritti goeth to Conſtantinople to treat of an agreement.

The French King had an hand in this treaty of truce, ſending an Agent expreſly for that purpoſe to Conſtantinople, but the ſmall hope of any peace was ſoone diſcerned, the Turke beeing not willing to haue any accord with the Emperour, wherevpon the better to turne all his forces againſt him, he had propounded and conſented to an agreement with the Venetians. But ſo ſoone as Gritti his going to Conſtantinople was publiſhed, notwithſtanding that the cauſe was kept ſecret, all men did ſuſpect the matter, how that his iourney was to treate of peace with Soliman. Don Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, Ambaſſador at that time for the Emperor at Venice, beeing come into the Senate in ſecret audience, did diſcouer this ſuſpition, and made a modeſt complaint, for that they went about to treate of peace with the common enemy, not comprehending therein the Emperor, their friend and confederate, and did afterwards ſeeke by a long and perſwaſiue oration, to diſſwade them from peace with the Turkes. They anſwered him that the Republick had more then two years ſince entred into the league, & yet neuertheleſſe it might truly ſay, that it had alone ſuſteined all the Turkiſh attempts: That they did allow of the lawfull occaſions which had held back the arriuall of the ayde of the other Confederates, at that time when they moſt needed them, that they did likewiſe beleeue, how it might eaſily come to paſſe, that by ſundry accidents the ſame occaſions might be againe offered: and yet neuertheleſſe they had euer borne and would beare great reſpect to the Confederates: that the French King had procured generall truce at Conſtantinople, by accepting whereof they did ſuppoſe to haue procured much wealth and profit to the common cauſe, whereby great commodity might redound to the league, if there were nothing elſe then the gaining of time, which the Emperors ſelfe did thinke to bee moſt neceſſary for his voyage into the Leuant.

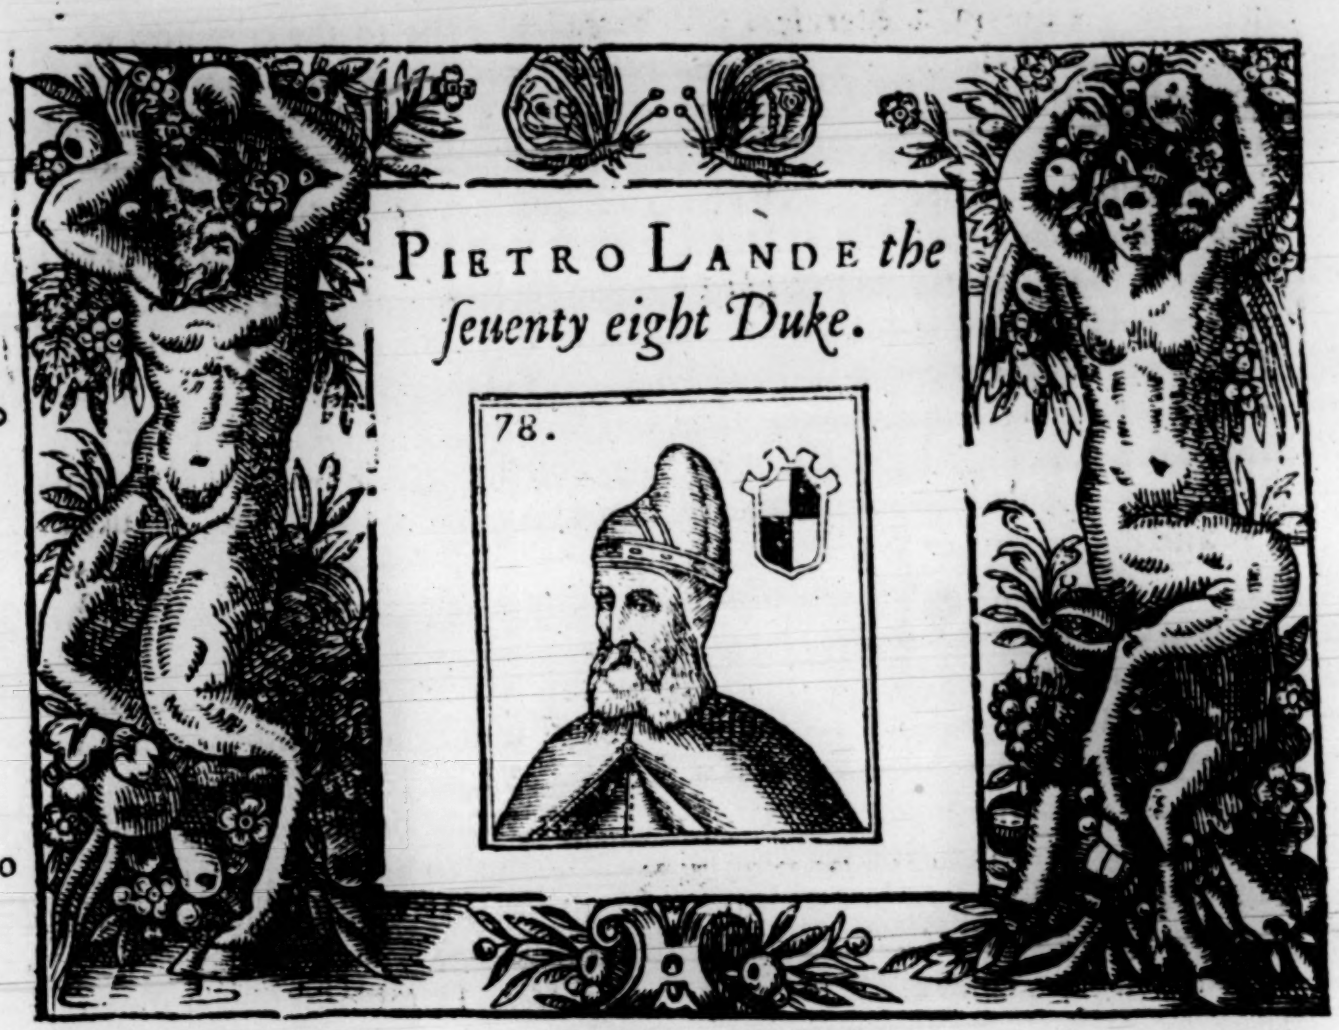
The Emperors Ambaſſador doth in the Senate complaine againſt this agreement.

The Senates anſwer to the Ambaſſador.

The like purſute was made in the Emperors Court betwixt his Maieſty and the Ambaſſador of the Common-wealth: But it was not to any purpoſe, either to haſten the Emperor to make prouiſions for warre, or to with-draw the Venetians from the treaty of peace already determined. With ſuch ſucceſſe ended the yeare 1538. about the latter end whereof, on the ſeuen and twenty day of December, Prince Gritti deceaſed, beeing foure ſcore and foure yeares of age, hauing gouerned fifteene yeares and ſeauen moneths, and was buryed in Saint Francis Church.

An. 1538.

PIETRO



PIETRO LANDE was choſen in his place, a noble man, and of three ſcore and eighteene yeeres of age. The yeere following was in a manner ſpent about the negotiation of peace, at the beginning whereof, the Venetians ſuppoſing that it behooued them onely, to truſt and hope in their owne forces for the ſafety of their ſtate, went about to encreaſe the Garriſons of their fortes, and to re-enforce their Armie, whereupon they made a great leuy of Soldiers, and armed other light and great galleys at Venice, they likewiſe ſent a commandement to Aleſſandro Contarèn the Prouidator in Candy, that hee ſhould ſpeedily arme fiue and twenty Galleys in that Iſland.

The Senate preparеth for the conſeruation of their ſea townes.

The Senate at the ſame time decreed, that foure thouſand artificers of the Citty ſhould bee enrolled, with whom, foure times a yeare, the Galleys appointed for that purpoſe ſhould bee manned, that they might all of them row together, and they did commonly call it, Regater: and ſundry ſtipends were appointed for ſuch as had continued that courſe thrice together: This was done, that they might bee aſſured by this exerciſe ſtill to haue men fit and ready to man on a ſodaine, a certaine number of Galleys.

They did likewiſe confirme Guy Vbaldo Duke of Vrbin, in the degree of Generall of their forces by land, who in his fathers life time, had ſerued the Republick, they encreaſed his place with an hundred men at armes, an hundred light horſe, and the pay of ten Captaines, with foure thouſand Ducats for his entertainement. This Duke was thought a very fitte man for the ſeruice of the Common-wealth, as well for the excellent parts that were in him, hauing from his youth beene trained vppe in martiall diſcipline, vnder his deceaſed Father, as by reaſon of his Countrey, full of good Souldiers, it beeing commodiouſly ſeated, for the eaſie ſending of them from thence to their Fortes along the Sea-coaſt: Therefore the Senate after the death of the Duke his father, did in ſigne of loue and honor, ſend Franceſco Sanuto their Ambaſſador, to condole with him for his death, and to aſſure him that the Senate would neuer neuer forget the notable seruices which hee had done to the common-wealth. But certaine moneths were spent before they confirmed him in his place, in regard of the Pope, fearing least hee would take it ill, to see them honor and entertaine a Duke that was a feodatarie of the Church, hee being at variance with him. The occasion of their strife, (as hath beene already mentioned) proceeded from the Dutchy of Camerin, which the Duke of Vrbin did enioy, by reason of his wife, the sole daughter and heire to the last Duke of Camerin, and the Pope pretended that the line masculine failing, that infeofment was to returne to the sea Apostolick. The Senate in remembrance of Duke Francesco Maria, who had deserued well of the common wealth, and for the loue that it did beare to the sonne, did earnestly employ it selfe in that businesse, fearing least it might stirre vp some new troubles in Italy, because that the Duke of Mantua, Vncle to Duke Guy his wife, did determine to defend him, not onely with his owne forces, but with those of strangers whom he did meane to call into Italy. The Pope at the last, resoluing by force to haue that Dutchy, if hee could get it by faire meanes, it was agreed that Duke Guy should referre himselfe to the sea Apostolick, and that his Holynesse should giue him a certaine summe of money in recompence, in name of dowry of the Dutchesse Iulia his wife.

Agreement betwixt the Pope and the duke of Vrbin.

This controuersie beeing thus ended, Duke Guy was confirmed (as hath beene sayd) in the pention of the Common-wealth. But to the end likewise that the Nauall Army should not bee without an Head, whilest Capell, by the Senates permission lay at Venice for the recouery of his health, who was not yet in state to execute his place, they chose in his steed Iohn Moro, Prouidator Generall at that time in Candy: but the Senate hauing notice within a while after of his death, the place of Generall was giuen to Thomaso Mocenига, a man excellently seene in the important affaires of the Common-wealth at home and abroad. Iohn Moro was slaine in Candy in a Popular Comotion betwixt the Greekes and the Italians of the Garrison, among whom hee running with his Halbardiers to appease the tumult was stricken with a stone vppon the head, whereof within a while after hee died.

The Turkes great preparations for the recouery of Castel-nouo.

These were the preparations of the Venetians, whilest the Turkes did speedily make ready their fleete, beeing not able to digest the losse of Castel-nouo, as men that were alwayes wonte (to the great losse of all Christendome) to winne and not to loose: therefore resoluing before all other things to attempt the recouery of that place, thereby to repaire their honor which that accident had bereft them of, they made great preparations of men and warlike engins, sufficient for a farre greater enterprise.

Dragut in the meane time, whom (as hath beene said), Barbarossa had left in the Gulphe of Lepanto, departed thence with thirty vessels both Galleots and Fusts, all well armed, and beeing come into the Isle of Paxu, did there barre the Christians free Nauigation: for hiding himselfe in Saint Nicholas Hauen, foure miles off from Corfu, hee often sent his vessels to scoure the channell of Corfou, and to take those ships which should arriue in that Island: but the Prouidator Pascalic beeing not able to beare that indignity, determined to goe forth with twelue of his best Galleys, against certaine Turkish Galleys, which were come neere to the land: but the enemies not tarrying for him, fled towards the Gulphe of Larta, to deceiue the Prouidator, and to make him thinke, that there were no other Vessels of theirs at Paxu: but as the Prouidators Galleys, giuing chase to those Galeots, were come farther to Sea-ward, they discouered Dragut, who comming forth of Paxu, with the residue of his Galeots and Fusts, had put himselfe forward to Sea, to take the aduantage of the winde, that hee might the better bee able to encompasse the Prouidator, who then perceiuing the danger, whereinto hee should runne by gooing any farther forward, did sodainly hoist did ſodainly hoiſt ſailes, and turned back towards Corfou, beeing ſtill purſued by the enemies veſſells, which comming very neere to them, cauſed three Venetian Gallies, who feared that they ſhould not be able to eſcape by flight, to runne on ground vppon the Sands of Meſſanga twelue miles off from Corfou, where they did beat themſelues in peeces, all the men within them, with their goods; eſcaped, one only Galley, belonging to Antonio Canalis, whoſe ſaile yards were broken and thereby vnable to follow the reſt, was taken by the enemies.

Draguts policy to encompasse the Venetian Galleys.

This ſucceſſe hauing made the Turkes more bold and inſolent, they went with thoſe veſſells into the Ile of Candy, where landing vpon the territory of Canea, they burnt and ſpoiled the Countrey; but great numbers of Stadiots and feudataries of the Iſland being gathered together, did charge them ſo fiercely as hauing ſlayne diuers of them, they did enforce the reſt to returne to their Gallies Gritti the ſame time returned from Conſtantinople about the beginning of Aprill, hauing made great haſt in his iourney: hee reported how that by the meanes of Ianuſby hee had beene brought into the preſence of the Viſier Baſcha, who although hee entertained him very curteouſly, did neuertheleſſe firſt of all greatly complaine, of the hoſtile actions which ſundry officers of the Republike had executed vpon the Muſulmans, which the Signory had left vnpuniſhed, then proceeeding farther hee told him how badly hee did digeſt their manner of proceeding againſt the great Lord, and all thoſe of his Port, hauing neuer vouchſafed to make any anſwer to the propoſitions of agreement which hee had ſet downe vnto them. Gritti vpon this diſcourſe ſuppoſing that the Turkes were not at that time much diſpoſed to peace, had craued a ſuſpenſion of armes, on all ſides, for threee monethes, to the end that in the meane time they might treat of an agreement, which hauing obtained, hee did at the ſame time publiſh as hee paſſed along vpon the Frontiers; ſo as the Turkiſh troopes encamped before Sa ona to take it, that they might afterwards goe and beſeege Spalatia, did ſodainly retire vpon this publication.

The Baſcha complaineth to Gritti againſt the Venetians

Truce for three monethes betwixt the Turkes and Venetians.

The newes of this truce did not greatly pleaſe the Venetians, diuers fearing that his ſuſpenſion of armes for ſo ſhort a time might rather tend to cauſe ſome diſtruſt in the Confederate Princes, then procure any peace: therefore the opinions in the Senate, touching the purſute of this buſineſſe, were ſundry & different, where after long diſputation it was reſolued to ſend an Ambaſſador to Soliman to treat of peace, and Petro Zene was choſen to that end. And whileſt he was preparing for his iourney, and the accuſtomed preſents, Gritti was diſpatched to Conſtantinople to carry news of the Ambaſſadors election, and to vſe means to prolong the truce, and to begin, as occaſion ſhould be offered, to motion peace, being expreſly inioyned, therein to imploy the fauor and Councell of the Lord of Rincon, Ambaſſador for the moſt Chriſtian King at the Port of the great Lord, who had very earneſtly oftentimes offered himſelfe to deale in that buſineſſe: but it was afterwards perceiued that hee did more harme then good, by making the matter more difficult, to the end that the King his maiſter might at the leaſt be choſen vmpier of their controuerſy, and might reconcile them to Soliman, and thereby oblige them to him-ſelfe and diſioyne them from the Emperor.

Petro Zene is choſen Amb. of ſador to goe to Soliman.

The French Ambaſſadors deſeigne.

At the ſame time that Gritti arriued at Venice, the new Generall had receiued the Standard of the Common-wealth and was ready to depart to his charge, but beeing not yet gon forth of the Hauen, his departure was deferred, ſuppoſing that his proceeding on his iourney might cauſe the Turkes to ſuſpect that this negociation of peace was feigned, and by that meanes might returne to inuade the confines of the Republique, which newly began to liue at quiet: but to the end that the Army in the meane time ſhould not be without an head, the ſame power and authority which the Generalls by Sea were wont to haue, was giuen to the Prouidator Contaren.

The Ambaſſ. Zene within a while after departed from Venice being ſufficiently in-inſtructed what hee had to doe, but being come to the Serraglio of Boſſina, and falling greeuouſly ſick, hee dyed there within a while after, whereof the Senate beeing aduertiſed by Petro Franceſchis his Secretary, they choſe Thomas Contaren in his ſteed, a man of foure ſcore and foure yeares of age, but greatly eſteemed for his wiſdome and particular knowledge in the Turkiſh affaires, with whom hee had a long time conuerſed vpon ſundry occaſions. Hee was enioyned to depart within foure dayes, and in the meane time they ſpeedily aduertiſed Gritti, and the Secretary of the new election, to the end hee might acquaint the Baſcha therewith, with whom Gritti his propoſition, concerning a generall truce, was to no purpoſe, the Turkes ſtill continuing their preparations, determining to recouer Caſtel-nouo rather by force then by agreement. Barbaroſſa was already gone thither with an hundred and fifty ſaile of all ſorts, and with great ſtore of Artillery: the Beglerby of Grecia was at the ſame time gone thither with a great Cauallery: ſo, that beeing contented to make an agreement with the Venetians, they did likewiſe make no great difficulty to prolong the truce with them for the whole moneth of September. The report of this treaty beeing diuulged, men did diuerſly diſcourſe thereof; interpreting it according to their owne paſſions: the Pope neuertheleſſe among others did greatly commend the Venetians, for that they had in ſuch ſort prouided for the ſafety of their ſtate, ſeeing that the other way would rather haue hurt then profited them. Now Barbaroſſa purſuing his iourney, did in no ſort hurt any thing that did belong to the Venetians, ſaying, That his meaning was to obſerue the truce with them, but that the Emperor was not comprehended therein, whereupon he was deſirous to beſiege Caſtel-nouo, which was held by the Imperials: The Spaniards that were within it beeing dannted by the arriuall of the Army, and great numbers of Turkes, did offer that to the Venetians which they had before ſo brauely refuſed, namely, to deliuer Caſtle-nouo to them; but the Senate anſwered, That the ſame offer was out of time, that they had oftentimes requeſted that the Capitulations of the league might be obſerued, and that according thereunto, that the ſame place might be deliuered to them, and that at the ſame preſent, beeing enforced to a treaty of peace, they neither ought or could doe any thing that might interrupt it.

Truce is prolonged with the Venetians.

The Spaniards not being able to keepe Caſtel-nouo, offer it to the Venetians.

Barbaroſſa then in the moneth of Auguſt, beeing come into the Gulphe of Catharra with ninety Galleys and thirty Fuſts, did caſt anchor ſo farre off from Caſtel-nouo, as the Artillery within it could not offend him, and ſafely landed his troopes, with foure ſcore peeces of ordnance of all ſorts. At the ſame time in a manner, Vlaman Sangiach of the Prouince came thither with great numbers of foot and horſe, which encamped round about the towne, thoſe within it not being able by their ſallies to hinder their encamping. The Turkes hauing begun the battery in three places, did ſo well continue it, and did afterwards aſſaile it in ſuch ſort, as all thoſe of the towne, after they had brauely defended themſelues, being taken and ſlaine, Barbaroſſa made himſelfe maiſter of the place, who after the taking of Caſtel-nouo went to Riſſane, which was yeelded vnto him without contradiction, by Lodouico Zene, the Garriſon being not ſtrong enough to defend it: Barbaroſſa ſent to Matteo Bembo Gouernor of Catharra, to will him to deliuer that place vnto him, with whom hee ſought occaſions of quarrell, that hee might aſſaile that towne.

Caſtel nouo is taken by Barbaroſſa.

In the end, after ſundry complaints that his runne-away ſlaues were retyred thither, with other feigned matters which hee alleadged, hauing layde aſide all reſpect of the truce, hee did audaciouſly ſend word to the Gouernour to deliuer the Citty of Catharra into his hands, otherwiſe hee would come and take it by force, beeing commanded by Soliman to ſeaze vpon that Forte, and on what-ſo-euer the Signory did poſſeſſe in thoſe quarters: therefore hee ſhould not doe well to attend and waite for his owne ruine, but to prouide

Barbaroſſa ſummoneth the Gouernor of Catarra to deliuer the towne vnto him.

in

in time for the ſafety of himſelfe and people; that he would giue leaue to as many as would depart thence, ſo to doe, and good entertainment to ſuch as would abide there.

Bembo not being daunted with theſe ſummons, although hee did not looke for them, vſed ſpeedy meanes to prouide all things neceſſary for the defence of the towne, and to ſtirre vp the Citizens and ſouldiers to a braue reſiſtance; then hee anſwered Barbaroſſa, that hee did greatly wonder, and ſo would likewiſe all the world beſide, at his audacious demaund, the which beeing wholly againſt all reaſon, hee could not imagine to proceed from Soliman, who was euer wont to keepe his word and promiſe, and that therefore hee did ſo much relie vpon the iuſtice of his owne cauſe, as hee did determine to keepe and defend that towne, committed vnto him by his Country and Commonwealth. The Gouernors anſwer to Barbaroſſa.

Barbaroſſa made no reply to this anſwere, but cauſed part of his Gallies to ſet forward, the which being inconſiderately come neere to the forte, were to their great hurt and loſſe beaten backe by the Artillery: Barbaroſſa beeing the next day come thither with the reſidue of the army, was likewiſe repulſed by the ordnance; and hauing landed great numbers of ſouldiers farre of from the caſtle, thoſe which went by the way of the hill, comming very neere vnto the walles, were ſo hurt by ſmall peeces of ordnance which were planted vppon the higheſt place of the caſtle, as beeing diſordered they made all poſſible haſte they could for to returne towardes their Gallies: but vpon thoſe who went on the land ſide where the Church and Monaſtery of Saint Francis ſtandeth, with whom Barbaroſſa was in perſon to view the place, the Stradiots with certaine Harquebuziers on horſe backe made a ſalley, and enforced them to retire to their loſſe, and to ſaue themſelues on the toppe of the next hill whither the horſe-men could not follow them. Barbaroſſa doth in vaine giue aſſaults to Catarra.

Barbaroſſa hauing well viewed and obſerued the caſtle, and the reſolution of thoſe within it, brauely to defend themſelues, deſpayring of beeing able to take it, hauing ſtayed there one day longer without enterprizing any thing, determined to raiſe his campe and to returne to the mouth of the Gulphe; whether being come, and leauing a ſtrong Garriſon in Caſtel-nouo, hee did wholly depart forth of the Gulphe of Catharra: it was then thought that hee would goe to ſcoure the ſea-coaſts of Puglia; and by the way hee paſſed by the Channell of Corfou, where in ſigne of friendſhip hee was ſaluted with certaine Cannon ſhot from the caſtle, and preſented from the Gouernour with freſh cates, and certaine garments, which hee did very willingly receiue with great thankes, and kinde ſpeeches.

The report of the taking of Caſtel-nouo, and Barbaroſſa his enterprize vppon Cathara was not very pleaſing to the Senate, fearing, that their army beeing deuided, the enemy would make ſome other attempt vppon their State. At the ſame time whileſt that the Turkes did batter Caſtel-nouo, Andrew Doria departing from Sicily was come to Caſopa, from whence hee ſent word to the Prouidator Contaren, who lay at Corfou, that a faire occaſion was offered to ouerthrow the enemies, whileſt they hauing forſaken their Gallies were buſied in battering Caſtel-nouo, therefore hee did aduiſe him for to ioyne both their fleetes together: the Prouidator hauing anſwered him (the better to ſound his intent) that hee would bee ready to releeue Caſtel-nouo, and to execute any other enterprize, ſo that all the forces might bee ioyned together with hope of profit: Doria making no replie at all vnto this anſwere, retired to the hauen of Brandiſſa. Doria his propoſition to the Prouidator Contaren. The Prouidators anſwer to Doria.

The Ambaſſador Contaren in the meane time iournyed towards Conſtantinople, whither beeing come and brought into Solimans preſence who had graunted him audience, all the time that hee was deliuering his commiſſion, Soliman held his hand vpon his breſt, ſignifying (as his ſeruants interpreted it) a troubled minde, yet neuertheleſſe hauing quietly heard him, hee told him that hee was welcome, not making any other anſwere to his negociation, referring him (as the manner is) vnto his Baſhas: with whom Contaren afterwardes conuerſing, and beginning more particularly for to explane his commiſſion, ſo ſoone as they heard him to motion the yeelding vppe on both ſides, of places taken in that warre, they anſwered on a ſodaine that hee was not to ſpeake any more of that; how that their Lord was greatly animated againſt them, and eſpecially for their league made with the Emperour againſt him, whereby hee was ſo farre off from harkening to any reſtitution, as on the contrarie they were not to hope to obtaine any thing of him, vnleſſe that they did render vnto him the Citties of Naples and Maluefia, with whatſoeuer the Signory did poſſeſſe on the ſea of Conſtantinople, as farre as Caſtel-nouo, by meanes whereof all cauſe of warre ſhould bee taken away for after times, and a firme peace eſtabliſhed betwixt them: they demaunded moreouer, to haue Soliman recompenced for his expences in that warre, hauing beene by them drawne to it perforce, and not mooued therevnto by any auarice, but for his owne honour, knowing very well that they had granted as much to the Emperour, a farre meaner Prince then hee.

The Baſhas demands to Contaren.

The Ambaſſadour declaring that hee could not grant any of their demands, told them that his commiſſion did not extend ſo farre, that the Commonwealth ought verilie for to deſire peace, ſo farre forth as it might ſtand with her honour and dignity, the which it would euer maintaine and defend by armes, and that for himſelfe, hee beeing but an actor of the Senates will and pleaſure, neither could nor would ſay or doe any other thing, but that hee would acquaint them at Venice with the whole matter; intreating them in the meane ſpace that the ſame buſineſſe might bee delayed till ſuch time as hauing written thither he might vnderſtand the Senates reſolution therevpon.

The Ambaſſadors anſwer to the Baſhas.

The Baſhas did put him in hope that the buſineſſe might haue a proſperous end, ſo that the Venetians would grant part of their demaunds: how that their cuſtome was to craue much to obtaine little: therefore they did aduiſe him to returne backe in perſon to Venice, particularlie to acquaint his ſuperiours with the whole buſineſſe, that they might afterwardes come to ſome new treaty, and that his returne would bee in a very fit time to bee preſent at the nuptials of the great Lords daughter, and at the circumciſion of one of his ſonnes.

Contaren vpon theſe words, notwithſtanding that ſo many iourneys and delaies were tedious to him in regard of his yeeres, and the important buſineſſe that was in hand, yet neuertheleſſe ſuppoſing that if he ſhould ſtay any longer at Conſtannople, after this leaue giuen him, it would put the Turkes in hope to obtaine their demands, hee reſolued to depart, hauing firſt very ſpeedily aduertized the Senate of all that which had paſſed.

The Ambaſſadors departure did greatly trouble the Senate, together with the difficulties made vpon the accord: for the found it a very hard matter alone and of themſelues to make warre vpon ſo mighty an enemy: that their hopes grounded vpon other mens forces, although weake and to ſmall purpoſe, were by that negociation wholly loſt: on the other ſide, to accept peace on ſuch vniuſt conditions would to much blemiſh the Republikes reputation, and by quitting ſo eaſily their townes, and giuing away their money, was nothing elſe but to cauſe the enemies who by nature are inſolent, to demand greater matters.

The Senates doubt vpon thoſe newes.

During theſe irreſolutions Cæſar Cantelmo came to Venice, who hauing beene already ſent (as hee ſaid) to Soliman from the moſt Chriſtian King, about the negociation for the truce, at his returne into France, had informed the King of the whole matter, wherevpon hee returned againe by his his commandement to Conſtantinople for the ſame buſineſſe.

The French Ambaſſador comming into the Senate, told them that the King his Maiſter did expreſly ſend that gentleman to Conſtantinople, about the affairs of the Venetian Common-wealth, and from him to deale in the negociation of peace, and therefore he was come to Venice to receiue their commandements therevpon, being by the King enioyned to execute them as though they were his owne. The Lord Iohn Franceſco Valerio a Venetian Gentleman, did affirme the very ſame, who having remained a long time in France, had beene very familiar with the chiefe Lords of the Court, who did often acquaint him with matters of importance: this Gentleman did teſtifie the Kings loue and hearty affection towards them and his readineſſe to ſend other Agents to Soliman, if the Senate ſhould diſlike of Cantelmo; exhorting them to truſt to the King, and to his loue towards the Republike, the totall ſumme of this negociation: that there was no better nor ſafer way then that to reconcile them to the Turke, with more honour, and leſſe loſſe.

The French Kings loue towards the Venetians.

They were aduertized at the ſame time that an enteruiew was practiſed betwixt the Emperour and the French King: the cauſe thereof was the iourney which the Emperour determined to make into Flanders, to chaſtice thoſe of Gant who had rebelled, reſoluing to goe thither through France, and to talke with the King, and to treat with him (for ſo it was reported) about ſome good agreement, that being good friends they might afterwards ioyne their forces together againſt the Turkes.

The Emperour deſireth paſſage through France to goe into Flanders.

The enteruiew of theſe Princes furniſhed all men with matters of ſundry diſcourſe, and chiefely the Venetian Senate, where it was a long time debated whether they ſhould continue the treaty of peace with the Turke, in regard of matters offered, and the hard conditions propounded by Soliman: On the other ſide, ſome were of opinion to embrace the occaſion of Cantelmo his voyage, and the Kings offer; if they ſhould refuſe it, it was to bee feared, that his Maieſty would take it in ill part, thinking that they made ſmall account of him or his friendſhip: that they were at leaſt to entreat that Gentleman on the Kings behalfe to inſiſt vpon the Generall truce, which beeing graunted, would greatly ſerue, for the fitneſſe of the time and the quiet which thereby would ariſe, to enioyne him beſides, to aſſure the Turke, that the Senates intention was none other then to procure a firme peace vpon honeſt conditions.

Sundry opinions in the Senate.

Others propounded that it was beſt to ſend a ſpeedy meſſenger to Contaren to command him for to tarry in that place where hee ſhould meet with him, and there to expect a new commiſſion which the Senate would ſend him, according to the progreſſion of the affaires: others thought it fit to proceed to the election of a new Ambaſſadour, or elſe to referre the whole buſineſſe to the Bayly Canalis, who was at liberty, and able to negociate: but theſe men were not of opinion to make vſe of Cantelmo in this negociation, nor to impart any thing vnto him: that he was a Neapolitan, banniſhed from his Country, who beſides the Kings deſeignes and intereſts, quite contrary perhaps to thoſe of the Republike, had his owne likewiſe a part, which might hinder and not further the good ſucceſſe of that buſineſſe: That their ſafety and publike dignity did not permit them to diſcouer vnto ſuch men any iot of the Senates intention, the which they were to ſuſpect, and not without cauſe, that hee was very deſirous to know rather to croſſe then to further it: that the Emperour ſought all occaſions to breake this purſute of peace, which did ſo much trouble and anoy him; and the French King vpon hope to recouer the State of Milan, was ready to content him in all things.

To all theſe conſiderations they added an other, which was of no meane conſequence, which was, that becauſe the harueſt of the ſame yeere had beene euery where, and eſpecially ouer all Italie, verie badde, wherewith the Dearth of victuals in Venice.

City of which was to feed an infinite number of perſons, was greatly troubled, ſo as the people, who were wont to fare delicately, and to eate none other bread then that which was made of wheate, were enforced to feed on all ſorts of graine, and in hazard likewiſe to want them, vnleſſe they might bee brought from forraine countries (Venice hauing no corne territory of her owne) a thing which did greatly trouble the Senate; wherevpon, the better to prouide for a matter of ſo great importance; ſome ſaid that the friendſhip of the Turkes was very neceſſary: and others thought it fit to haue recourſe to the Spaniards to get proportions of wine and graine from their countries: whereby it fell out that the ſame ſubiect ſerued for a foundation whereon to build the two ſundry opinions.

Cantelmo departeth from Venice without any commiſſion.

In this manner was the time ſpent without any certaine reſolution, ſo as the Ambaſſador Contaren hauing continued his iourney, and receiued no new commandement from the Senate, arriued at Venice, and Cantelmo departed thence without any commiſſion.

Theſe irreſolutions gaue the Emperor ſome hope, who eſpied al occaſions to breake the negociation of peace with Soliman, and once more to draw the Venetians to confirme the league, therefore ſuppoſing that there was nothing which could better further his intention, then to make them beleeue that he was friends with the French King, and that being thereby freed from all other lets, he would employ all his forces vpon the enterprize of the Leuant, and that the French King would aide and fauour the league, determined to ſend ſome noble perſonage to Venice, perſwading the King to doe the like, to acquaint the Venetians with the enteruiew, and to diſcouer ſomewhat of their intentions.

The Emperour and French King ſend to the Venetians to diuert them from peace with the Turkes.

The Marquis of Guaſto who was gouernor of Milan for the Emperor, and the Lord of Annebault Marſhall of France, and Generall for the moſt Chriſtian King in Piedmont, came to Venice vpon the tenth day of December. Their entertainment was magnificent, as well in regard of the Princes greatneſſe that ſent them, as for the quality and nobility of the perſons, great numbers of Senators went to meet them with the Bucentaur, and ſeuen Gallies; then they were lodged in a goodly pallace, and their expence defraied by the Signory. Their firſt audience was giuen them in the great Hall, where the great Councell is held, in the preſence of many people, where there were no other ſpeeches vſed but complementall and of entertainment.

The Marquis of Guaſto his ſpeech to the Senate.

„ Returning at an other time into the Senate in ſecret audience, the Marquis of „ Guaſto began to tell them, that he was ſent by the Emperor Charles to acquaint „ them, as his truſty and inward friends, with the enterview which he determined
„ in France with the French King, and in Flanders with King Ferdinand his bro„ ther and the Queene his ſiſter, who did then gouerne thoſe countries for him, aſſu-
„ ring them that in the ſame aſſembly of Princes, affaires would be handled con„ cerning the common good of Chriſtendome, and the particular profit of that „ Common-wealth, which the Emperor did as much deſire, as that of his owne „ Eſtates. And that now ſeeing they were ready to aſſaile the Turkes with very „ great forces, the Emperour was deſirous to know the Senates will and intention „ therein, what prouiſions they would iudge to be neceſſary, and what they would „ haue him to doe for his part, for the better mannaging of his deſeignes: that
„ the peace with the French King, although it were not eſtabliſhed, might neuer„ theleſſe be held for done, in regard of the mutuall diſpoſition and good cor-„ reſpondence betwixt thoſe Princes: whereby all men were certainely to be„ leeue, that they would both together turne their armes (beeing freed from all „ other lettes) vpon the Infidels: but becauſe the greatneſſe of the buſineſſe did „ likewiſe carry with it length of time, and for that the time of yeere was already „ to farre ſpent to make ſuch great prouiſions, the Emperor thought it fitteſt for „ the time preſent to ſtand vpon the defenſiue rather then on the offenſiue with

the

the enemies, wherein he would not faile to haue as great a care of the ſafety of his friends States as of his owne.

The Lord of Annebault ſpake in a manner to the ſame effect, proteſting his Kings good will and deſire to the peace and profit of all Chriſtendome. It was no hard matter to diſcerne wherevnto all theſe practiſes tended; and what the Emperours true deſeignes were, namely to feed the French with a vaine hope of reſtoring vnto them the Dutchy of Milan; and the Venetians, by propounding vnto them to make great preparations for warre againſt the Turkes, not caring very much to performe theſe things, but onely thereby to winne time, by being aſſured of the armes of the French, diuerting the Kings thoughts from warre, and of thoſe of the Turkes, by oppoſing againſt them as a Bulwarke the States and army of the Venetian Common-wealth.

Anſwere was made to the Marquis and to the Lord Annebault how that their arriuall was very pleaſing and acceptable, as well for reſpect to the Princes which ſent them, as for their owne perſons, for which, and for the honour and friendſhip which they did beare to the Common-wealth, they did infinitely thanke their Princes. the newes of the good correſpondence, and certaine hope of peace betwixt ſuch mighty Princes, had much reioyced them, and ſo much the more, by how much greater the profit was which al Chriſtendome might receiue thereby. But as concerning the declaration of their meaning and intent towards the preſent occaſions, it might be ſufficiently knowne by their actions, ſeeing that they had ſo ſoone at the firſt taken armes, many times refuſed all propoſitions of agreement, and liberally furniſhed all expences requiſite, without niggardize, neither had they refuſed to execute all enterprizes how dangerous ſoeuer: how that for their parts, they had already for the ſpace of three yeeres borne the whole burthen of the warre: and being at that time inuited by thoſe hopes, they were ready againe to expoſe themſelues: yet neuertheleſſe all men might well perceiue that they were not able alone to hold out long againſt the power of ſo great an enemy: therefore what could they ſay more? Their neceſſity beeing knowne vnto all men: how euery one knew that Barbaroſſa lay in the Gulphe of Lepanto with foureſcore ſaile, intending (as it was reported) to winter there, whereby the whole world might perceiue to what daunger the whole State of the Common-wealth was expoſed, and by conſequent that of all Chriſtendome, vnleſſe the nauall armies might bee euerywhere ready by the month of February, to diuert his deſeignes: all which things were very exactly to bee thought vppon and conſidered, and ſpeedily remedied.

The Senates anſwere to the Ambaſſadours.

This anſwere without any reſolution at all was thought fit for their propoſition, and the condition of the times: and without proceeding to any more particular negociation, the Ambaſſadours of the Emperour and the King returned home into their countries.

The Pope on the other ſide hauing had notice of theſe Ambaſſadours comming to Venice, was diſpleaſed therewith, becauſe that the enteruiew was reſolued on, without his knowledge and conſent; not that hee did any way diſtruſt the Republike, beeing very well aſſured that it would euer runne the ſelfe ſame fortune as did the Sea Apoſtolike: but becauſe hee greatly feared, leaſt all that outward ſhew of honour and friendſhip ſhould couer (as at other times) ſome important practize againſt the liberty of Italy: whereupon, hee did by all good offices ſolicit the Venetians, that their might bee betwixt the Sea Apoſtolike and their Common-wealth a ſound and perfect intelligence and correſpondency, and he for his owne part would not any way faile for to prouide all poſſible meanes to beate backe all the daungers which might happen.

Three cauſe of the Popes doubt and diſcontent.

The Emperor hauing intelligence of theſe ſuſpitions of the Pope, fearing leaſt his discontent might be some hinderance to his deseignes, did on a sodaine send Luigi Dauila to Rome, and caused the French King to send the Lord of Saint Iust thither, to acquaint the Pope with that enterview in France and for to iustifie their actions. The Pope by the arriuall of those Ambassadors was greatly satisfied, and the better to demonstrate it, he determined to send his Nephew, the Cardinall Farneze, into France, to the end that as Legat to the See of Rome, he might be present at the assembly of those Princes, fauor the conclusion of peace, and offer the Popes authority, with all the Churches treasure, for the enterprise against the Infidels. The Senate in demonstration of the friendship and respect which it did beare to those Princes, did appoint two Ambassadors to be present likewise at that enteruiew, namely Antonio Capello, and Vincenzo Grimani, both of them Procurators of Saint Marke, who were enioyned by the Senate to thanke the Emperor and the French King for the friendship and honour which they had shewed to the Common-wealth, by acquainting it with what they determined to doe; next to praise and commend their intentions, and to incite them to prouide for the dangers of Christendome, and lastly to excuse them for that they had sent an Ambassador to Constantinople, being enforced therevnto, because they had not sufficient forces to resist the enemy.

The Pope sendeth the Cardinal Farnese Legat into France.

At the same time an Ambassador came to Venice from the King of Hungary, to request the Senate to make a firme alliance with him for the common defense of both their States, and to exhort them besides to continue the treaty of peace with the Turkes, in regard the Emperor would neuer be at peace with the French, so long as he could haue the Estates of the Venetian Republike, and the Realme of Hungary for his Bulwarke: for the which aduertisement they thanked his King, and for that present delt no farther with him.

An Hungarian Ambassador cometh to Venice.

But although the Pope did offer his forces to maintaine the warre, and exhorted the Senate to prouide dilligently for the conseruation of their States and defense of Christendome, yet neuertheless he did not dissemble the suspition which he had conceiued of the Imperials, and the smal hope he had in their aide: whereupon, he did often times affirme, that being assured that the Venetian Senate, as most prudent and well aduised, would neuer make peace with the Turke, vnlesse they were enforced therevnto by very vrgent necessity: euen so, the occasions being once knowne to be such, he did commend their counsell, which knew how to fit it selfe to times and necessity.

Now about the same time the Senate receiued letters from the Bayly Canalis, who aduertised them that great and magnificent triumphs were preparing at Constantinople for the nuptials of the great Lords daughter, married to Rustan Basha and for the circumcision of two of his children, and to that end they expected some from Venice, and that the Basha did greatly desire, that according to the vsuall custome, some Ambassador of theirs might come to the Porte, to haue an occasion to reuiue the treaty of peace.

The Senate being assembled thereupon, and a proposition being made to elect an Ambassador to send to Soliman, all of them with one voice and consent embracing the businesse, did choose Lodouico Badoario, a Senator of great authority, and one of those who had most of all perswaded the Senate to an accord with Soliman, offering himselfe, if neede were, to goe thither for that purpose.

Lodouico Badoario is chosen Ambassador to goe to Soliman.

They did then enioyne him first of all to procure the negociation of the Generall truce, according to the former instructions of the Ambassador Contaren, continued by the French Kings Agent: then to motion the restitution of all those places possessed on either side during that warre; and if hee could not obtaine that, then to treate of a finall peace, by renuing of the ancient capitulations: giuing authority for to offer some fiue or sixe thousand Ducats a peece for the Cities of Naples and Maluesia, and to promise three hundred thousand thouſand Ducats for the expences that Soliman had beene at in that warre. This was the Senates commiſſion. But the councell of Tenne, who at that time did Soueraignly treate of the moſt ſerious affaires of ſtate, without communicating them to the Senate, to the end they might be more ſecretly managed among fewer perſons, added another more ample commiſſion, namely to haue power, if hee ſhould perceiue the treaty to bee wholy deſperate, to ſurrender vnto them the townes of Naples and Malueſia.

What the Senate did enioyne the Ambassador.

Theſe Senators, who were of the ancient and beſt experienced in the gouernment, did very well know how greeuous, and inſupportable that warre had bin vnto them: how that Naples and Malueſia were farre off from them, and therefore hardly to be releeued and eaſie to be beſeeged by the enemy, whereby they had beene in danger oftentimes to haue beene taken, in regard of their want of many things: So as they would ere then haue fallen into the enemies hands, had not the truce protected them. That the Common-wealth was at the ſame time in great danger, where-vpon it was diſcreetly aduiſed, to caſt away ſome-what, although it were deere and pretious, to conduct it ſafely to the Hauen of peace, forth of the rockes of that dangerous warre: That it was a Maxim confirmed by many experiences, that time, in the Negociations with the Turkes doth breed danger, and the concluſion of matters, by delaies, haue euer had a bad and difficult ſucceſſe.

The Emperor commeth to Paris.

This happened about the latter end of the yeare, and at the beginning of the next which was 1540. the Emperor came to Paris, where the king entertained him with all poſſible ſignes of honor and friendſhip. Chriſtophero Capello, Ambaſſador at the ſame time for the Signory in France, did acquaint both of them with the Senates anſwer to the Marquis of Guaſto, and the Marſhall D. Anibault, wherevnto the Emperor anſwered, that although for his owne part hee did reſolue to make warre vpon the Turkes, yet neuer-the-leſſe hee could not ſee, in regard of the ſhortneſſe of the time, how they might ſatisfie the Republcks deſire: and therefore that it would be to more purpoſe, at that preſent, to obtaine a generall truce, during which they might haue time to prepare forces, conuenient for ſuch an enterprize, and that he in the meane time, would not omit to doe whatſoeuer lay in him for the common ſafety of their Sea Eſtates. The moſt Chriſtian King did at the ſame time make great proteſtation for his good will, ſaying, that hee would let men know, that his intention neuer was to diuert the common good of Chriſtendome, but that he was ready ſpeedily to embrace peace, and concord with the Emperor, that he might afterwards vndertake a warre, more proffitable and neceſſary, but that the preſent time would not permit him to treat of thoſe buſſineſſes, becauſe he would not mingle graue and ſerious matters among feaſts, and ioy for the Emperors arriuall, the negociating whereof might breed difficulties and diſcontents, where-vpon, they had referred the whole buſineſſe to the aſſembly of Flandets.

1540.

The anſwers of the Emperor & the French King to the Venetian Ambaſſador.

Capello hauing acquainted the Senate with the Emperors and French Kings anſwers, they were found to be very generall, ſo as no certaine hold could be taken thereon; neither of peace betwixt themſelues, not of warre againſt the Turkes; where-vpon they reſolued more earneſtly to perſue the treaty of peace already begun: and did write to Badoario, who ariuing at Conſtantinople about the middeſt of Aprill, began to treat according to his commiſſion with the Baſchas, therein vſing the fauour and aduice of the French Ambaſſador. But at the beginning of their negotiation, great difficulties did ariſe, not that the Turkes were vnwilling of an agreement, but becauſe they hauing notice of the ſecret commiſſion, giuen to Badoario, and thereby being growne more inſolent, as well in regard of the feare and deſire of peace, which they diſcouered to be in the Venetians, as for that they were aſſured to obtaine what-ſo-euer they demanded, began forthwith to proteſt that they would not harken to any other propoſition, vnleſſe that

The Senate reſoluth on peace with Soliman.

(beſides beſides the Ilands of the Archipelago and the Caſtles of Nada Laurana which they already enioyed) the Citties of Naples and Malueſia might bee freely ſurrendred to them, and reſtitution made for the expences of the warre.

Badoario is greatly p.r-plexed.

The Ambaſſador beeing amazed at theſe demands ſo ſodainly and obſtinately made, and ſuſpecting the truth of the matter, did for certaine daies giue ouer that negociation, incertaine of himſelfe what he were beſt to doe, on the other ſide he was drawne from it, when he conſidered how that by continuing this treaty and conſenting to the Turkes demaunds, he ſhould put them in hope to obtaine other matters. Hauing ſpent certaine daies in this perplexity, Barbaroſſa ſeeming to be deſirous that he ſhould go foreward with the treaty of agreement perſwaded him not to giue ouer his enterprize, offering to aid and fauour him, and although he opened him a way to be a better hope, yet neuertheleſſe by continuing the Treaty he found no alteration in the Baſchas, wherevpon he was enforced in a ſhort time by little, and little, to conſent to that which was reſerued till the very laſt, namely to giue ouer, beſides the Townes which they already poſſeſſed, the Citties of Naples and Malueſia, and to pay vnto them within three yeares towards the expences of the warres, the ſumme of three hundred thouſand Crownes. Then were the antient Capitulations renewed and confirmed, together with diuers other particularities concerning the eſtabliſhment of the peace.

Peace concluded with the Turkes according to their owne mindes.

The report of this agreement beeing brought to Venice, although euery man deſired it, the Republick being in great diſtreſſe by reaſon of the diſcomodities of the warres, and the dearth of victualls, and at ſuch a ſtay as it had need of, being reſtored by peace, was neuertheleſſe badly welcomed, when men vnderſtood the particularities thereof, many blaming that Councell for hauing bought peace at ſo deere a rate, by the giuing away of ſo goodly a portion of their ſtate and ſo great a ſomme of money, wherewith they might haue beene ſtill able for a time to haue maintained the war: others did taxe the Ambaſſadors ignorance, or to much feare, who by a precipitate reſolution had yeelded at the firſt to the Turkes demands. and had ſuffered himſelfe to be carried away by lateſt remedies, reſerued for the ſafety of moſt deſperate matters. But theſe firſt motions beeing vaniſhed, and the State of the affaires more maturely conſidered on, with the reaſons which had mooued thoſe wiſe Senators to conſent thereunto, all men did reſt ſatisfied and very well contented, prayſing their good aduiſe and wiſedome.

The Traitors which bewrayed Badoarios commiſſion to the Turkes, are diſcouered.

Within a while after, the trechery of certaine perfidious perſons was diſcouered, wherby the intention and honor of the Ambaſſador Badoario was preſerued. The traitors were Conſtantine and Nicholao Cauazzo of the order of Cittizens, who entring into the Councell of Tenn and into that of the Preguais in quallity of Secretaries, receiuing penſion of the French King did accquaint him with the affaires of greateſt importance of the Common-wealth: with them Maffeo Leone, of the order of Senators, was ioyned, who by reaſon of his place had acceſſe into both of the Councells: beſides Auguſtino Abondio, and Franciſco Valerio had a hand in that trechery. Theſe men being diſcouered by meanes of certaine letters found in the Cabinet of Abondio, where-in matters of State were mentioned, three of them, to wit, Nicholao Cauazzo, Abondio and Valerio, retired vnto the Pallace of the French Ambaſſador; as vnto a place of franchiſe.

Force is offered to the lodging of the French Ambaſſador.

This retreat of theirs hauing cauſed the Senate to thinke very badly of them, the officers were forth-with ſent to apprehend them, where ſomme reſiſtance beeing made, they were enforced for to bring a ſmall Barke thither, with two great peeces of Ordnance in it to ſpoile and batter the houſe houſe,where-vpon the traitors were deliuered to them,and being committed into the hands of the officers of Iuſtice, and their proceſſe made, they were hanged in the market place of Saint Marke. Conſtantine Cauazzo and Maffeo Leone,leauing the Citty betimes, had leaſure to eſcape to ſome place of ſafety: They were proclaimed thorrow the Citty three ſeuerall daies,with promiſe of a good ſumme of mony to any that could take them aliue or dead.

The traitors are puniſhed.

The King ſeemed to be much diſpleaſed, for the violence offered to the Ambaſſadors lodging,ſo as for certaine moneths ſpace he denied audience to Giouan Antonio Veniero Ambaſſador to the Signory, vntill that one day being at the Campe before Perpignan,and being deſirous to here newes from Conſtantinople,he called for him,and complained(but very modeſtly as though,he were halfe reconciled)for that his Ambaſſadors houſe had beene forced,vſing theſe ſpeeches among others, what would you haue ſaid, if the like had beene done vnto you? Venier made this ready anſwer. If God ſhould ſend into my houſe, and vnder my power,a traitor to your Maieſty, I my ſelfe would lay hands on him, and deliuer him vnto you,being wel aſſured if I ſhould doe otherwiſe,that the Signory would ſharpely reprehend me.

The French king complaineth to the French Ambaſſador.

The Ambaſſadors braue anſwer.

During the negociation of the treaty of peace,albeit that the Generall Mocenigo was abroad with a great fleet of Gallies, yet neuer-the-leſſe hee executed no warlike exploit, for feare leaſt he ſhould hinder the agreement, but onely ſailed vp and downe, entertayning the time, and hauing intelligence that Dragut lay neere to the Iſle of Zante with great numbers of Fuſts, and other veſſels belonging to Pirats and robbed all thoſe that hee met with, hee ſayled thither-ward to meete and fight with him; But he hauing a farre off deſcried our Gallies, and hauing a faire wind,tooke another way and eſcaped, and after wards not daring any more to returne into thoſe ſeas, he went into the Weſt, where hee was taken by Ianetin Doria,with eight of his veſſells.

Now after the concluſion of the peace, the Generall before he would goe to Dalmatia to diſarme the fleet, went to Naples of Romagnia,and Malueſia, to acquaint thoſe people with the ſucceſſe of the buſineſſe concluded at Conſtantinople,and the Senates reſolution, to quit thoſe townes to the Turke. It is not to be imagined how greeuous theſe newes were to the people, being as loth to tarry there as to go from thence: For to liue vnder the Turkiſh tyranny,ſeemed a very hard matter vnto them: To depart thence like-wiſe, and for euer to abandon their country,goods, houſes and ſepulchers,was a greeſe almoſt intollerable.

The ſorrow & greeſe of thoſe of Naples and Malueſia when they vnderſtood the conditions of the peace.

The Generall then to comfort them,(the whole people of Naples, being aſſembled in the market place) ſpake to them in this manner.

"The fatherly loue wherewith the Common-wealth hath imbraced and receaued you from the beginning vnder her rule and protection,and then gently gouerned you for a long time,may very eaſily perſwade you, that the ſame which I am now enioyned to deliuer vnto you, (which perhaps yee already know) how that this Citty and Malueſia your neighbour, are by an agreement made at Conſtantinople,to be deliuered to Soliman, hath beene done rather vpon extreame neceſſity, then by any free or voluntary will. Diuers things may make you ſee how deerely the Republike hath euer loued you, and eſpecially in theſe laſt warres, in which for your releeſe it hath readily expoſed part of her forces to great dangers: it hath furniſhed you with mony,ſoldiers and victualls, for feare leaſt yee ſhould fall into the enemies power, who with barbarous cruelty would haue bathed their hands in your blood, (as they threatened to doe) and made this Citty deſolate: hath in aword, not to come to this laſt point to leaue her deere and welbeloued ſubiects,vnder a tyrants power, made great prouiſions of Armes, beene at exceſſiue expences,and at laſt, vndergone for a time, the inſupportable burthen of warre. But what greater ſigne of loue, can the Common-welth ſhew vnto yee in this preſent affliction,then to promiſe,(as it doth)vnto al thoſe who are willing to"

The generall Mocenigo his oration to the people of Naples.

» to depart, to giue them another fit dwelling place wherein they may ſafely liue » vnder her protection, and to helpe, fauour and nouriſh them. The ancient Sages
» ſaid, how that the ſame place may be truly termed a mans Countrey, where hee » liueth well: but what better thing is there, or more to be deſired, then to liue vn-
» der the moderate gouernment of a good Prince? yee ſhall remaine vnder the go» uernement of the Common wealth, wee will find yee out a dwelling place in an » other Countrey, where yee may liue, if not ſo commodiouſly as heere, at leaſt-
» wiſe more ſafely, and free from the continuall dangers and alarmes of the Turks,
» to which I may truly ſay that yee were dayly expoſed. Diuers nations, their » numbers waxing ouer great at home, haue of their owne free-will departed from » their natiue Cuntrey, haue followed fortune, ſeeking by armes for new and vn-» certaine habitations. In miſeries and calamities to haue a certaine and aſſured » refuge carrieth with it ſuch a comfort, as a man doeth often-times remember » things paſt with greater contentation. Without all doubt our cheifeſt deſire » hath beene, to haue ſtill liued at peace, not to haue had the enemies to come and » beſeege this Citty, not to haue purpoſed to take it by force, or if this ſhould
» happen, to haue had greater forces to reſiſt and repulſe their attempts. But ſe-
» ing neither the one or other was in our power or yours, what other thing is ther
» now to be done in this State that we ſtand, but for vs to performe the duty of a » good Prince, Father and Paſtor of his people, to defend, vnder our ſafeguard and » protection, your perſons, ſeeing that we cannot preſerue, and beare from hence
» the houſes and walls of this Citty; and for you, to comfort your ſelues with the » loue of your Prince, to fit your ſelues to time, and to make vſe of neceſſity: your » perſons ſhall be preſerued, your poſterity ſhall encreaſe, and of you, beeing va» liant fathers, ſhall be borne generous Children: who knoweth but that ſome of » them may one day reuenge your wronges? ſo great is the change of humaine
» affaires, whereunto the greateſt Empiers are no leſſe ſubiect then the meaneſt » things on earth. It is certaine that the Common-wealth will euer retaine the » ſame will and deſire to take armes againſt theſe enemies, ſo ſoone as it ſhall per-» ceiue the Chriſtian Princes ſo well vnited together, as it may hope for ſom com» modity thereby, and bee able to doe ſome notable ſeruice to Chriſtendome.
» Therefore as it is neceſſary, ſo is it great diſcretion, and a gallant reſolution to » ſeeke to liue in ſafety, and ſtill hope for better and better.

» Whileſt the Generall did thus comfort them, all men did ſhed warme teares, being no leſſe moued by loue, then by greefe and ſorrow.

Naples and Maluefia are conſigned to the Turke.

The Generall after-wards did make the ſame remonſtrance to thoſe of Maluefia, whereby the poore people beginning by little and little to bee reſolued, the greateſt number of them prepared for their departure, carrying with them their beſt and deereſt wealth: And ſo within a while after, in the moneth of Nouember the treaty of peace beeing confirmed and ratified, the Prouidator Contaren came thither with twenty Gallies and diuers other Veſſells of all ſorts, in which hauing imbarked the artillery, munitions, ſoldiers, & thoſe inhabitants who were willing to depart, with their bagage, conſigned, (as it was decreed) thoſe two townes into the hands of Caſsin Baſcha of Morea, who came thither with ſmale forces.

All matters being in this ſort pacified, the Generall and the Prouidator did diſarme, leauing only abroad the ordinary number of Gallies for the gard of the Gulph. But ſo ſoone as the Prouidator Contaren came to Venice, he was called into queſtion by Petro Moceniga, Auogator for the common-wealth, to anſwer (according to the Senates decree made three yeares before) for that which hee had done in Puglia when he ſanke the Turkiſh Gally; but the matter being debated in Senate, and diuers Senators defending Contarens cauſe, the Commandement of the Auogatore was declared to bee of none effect, and Contaren was wholy acquitted, in regard of the worthineſſe of his good ſeruices done, during the time of that warre. No other thing worthy of Memory hapned during this yeare 1540. which was made notable by the peace concluded with the Turkes, which continued for the ſpace of thirty yeares.

the

The end of the third Booke of the ſixth Decade.

The Contents of the fourth Booke of the ſixth Decade.

THE occaſion of the warre of Hungary. Soliman determineth to make warre in Auſtria. The French king reſolueth to make vſe of the Turkiſh forces againſt the Emperor who had broken promiſe with him. The Imperialls doe murther Rincon and Fregoſa going in Ambaſſage from the moſt Chriſtian king to Soliman. The Emperor granteth the Interim in Germany. The Senate deny the Pope the holding of a Councel at Vincenza. The Accord betwixt the Turke and the Venetians is confirmed. The Venetians are diſcontented becauſe there was not a particular Duke of Milan. An Enteruiew betwixt the Pope and Emperor at Luca. The French King being incenſed againſt the Emperor doth at one time prepare three armies againſt him. Maran is taken from Ferdinand. A league betwixt the Emperor and Henry King of England againſt the French King. Barbaroſſa with his Army aideth the French King. Enteruiew betwixt the Pope and the Emperour at Baſſet. The Turkiſh Army in Hungary. Maran by agreement remayneth to the Venetians. The Engliſh men take Boloin. Peace betwixt the Emperor and the French King. Trruce graunted betwixt the Emperor and Ferdinand on the one ſide, and Soliman on the other. The Pope giueth Parma and Placentia in title of Dutchy to Petro Lodouico. And laſtly the great contentions betwixt the Emperor and the French King, which were the cauſes of the quiet of Italy.

The

The fourth Booke of the sixt Decade of the History of Venice.

PEACE being in this manner concluded betixt Soliman and the Venetians (as hath beene said) and the Venetians hauing elsewhere no warre with any Christian Princes, they did hope after so many toyles and trauaills of warre, to see an age full of peace and felicity. For Soliman made shew, that hee was disposed to make a generall truce for a long time with the Princes of Christendome. Wherein the French Ambassador did much good, who assured them that he held the totall resolution thereof in his owne hand, and that which made them to giue more credit to his speeches, was because though the fleet were ready to set saile, yet Barbarossa his iourney was held doubtfull, and beside, no preparation at all for a land army was made, which might giue cause of suspition of any enterprize.

The great hope of a long peace.

The Emperor on the other side and the French King had confirmed the truce, formerly made at Nice, and shewed to one another sundry good offices of loue and reconciliation: For whilest the Emperor stayed in France in his iourney towards Flanders, hee remained for a time with the King, which gaue hope to all men that those Princes hauing trodden all hatred and rancour vnder their feet did determine to liue in peace and quiet. But the new accidents which did happen (as humane affaires are subiect to change) did alter the State of things, and altogether breake of all hope of peace.

The cause of the warre of Hungary.

For Iohn King of Hungary beeing deceased, and leauing a young Child by his wife Isabell, daughter to Sigismond King of Poland, and Ferdinand King of the Romanes; saying that the Realme belonged vnto him and not to the child, by vertue of a late agreement made with that King, made hast to get it by armes, and hauing to that end raised great numbers of Soldiers, he entred, vnlookt for, into the Kingdome, and seazed on Alba Regalis, Visgrade, Peste, and other townes of Hungary, and at the same time he sent Ieronimo Alasco to Constantinople to treat with Soliman that hee might obtaine the Kingdome after the same manner as King Iohn had held it: but the Queene, widdow to King Iohn, had likewise sent thither, procuring by meanes of a sollemne Ambassade of the cheifest Barons of the Kingdome, the aid and succor of the Turkish army to keep the Kingdome for hir Sonne, which by the selfe same armes had beene maintained for the Father. Soliman seemed to bee greatly displeased therewith, and by so much more, as he supposed to haue receiued a double iniury from Ferdinand, for enuading a state recommended vnto him, and vnder his protection, and for crauing that by his Ambassador which he went about to take by force. Wherwith being greatly incensed, he did not only cast from him that good inclination which he seemed to beare to peace and concord, but for the reuenging of this Soliman incensed against Ferdinand determineth to make warre in Austria.

iniury

iniury determined to aſſaile Ferdinand with great forces both by Sea and Land, and at the ſame time to keepe the Emperor ſo buſied as he ſhould not be able to helpe his brother : Therefore hauing reuoked that which hee had treated with Rincon the French Ambaſſador concerning the truce, hee ſent him backe to his King to tell him that hee had changed his minde, reſoluing altogether vpon warre.

The Emperors reſolution contrary to his promiſe.

The troubles of Flanders were in the meane time appeazed, the Emperor hauing rigorouſly puniſhed the Gantois for their rebellion, to giue feare and terror to others. This being done ſooner then was expected, was cauſe, that the foundations of peace betwixt him and the French King were not ſurely laid, and finding himſelfe freed of that let which hindred him, hee reſolued in no ſort to quit the Dutchy of Milan. On the other ſide, Solimans hatred to the houſe of Auſtria, did augment the French Kings courrage, hoping to make vſe of his mighty aide, and thereby to reuenge the wrong which he had ſuppoſed he had done to him by contemning his friendſhip.

The King reſolueth to vſe the Turkes aide againſt the Emperor.

Rincon then being come to Venice did acquaint the Senate particularly with all what-ſo-euer had beene done, and of the Turkes great warlike preparations, the which he preſumed to be able to diſpoſe of at his Kings pleaſure, and crauing after-wards a conuoy for his ſafe paſſage into France, Mercurio Bue was commanded to attend vpon him with his company of light horſe as farre as the confines of their State. And becauſe there were but three moneths limited him for his returne to the Port of the great Lord, the King hauing ſpeedily diſpatched him, and returning onward on his way to Venice, from thence to paſſe to Conſtantinople, hee was neere to Pauia, vpon the riuer of Po, aſſailed, taken, and murthered, together with Cæſar Fregoſa, by certaine Spaniſh footmen, and by the commandement (as it was thought) of the Marquis of Guaſto.

Rincon and Fregoſa being ſent Ambaſſadors to Soliman are murthered.

This deed, did more then can be imagined incenſe the French King, for that during the truce they had ſo vilanouſly ſlaine his ſeruants, & that the Emperour not being ſatiſfied (as he ſaid) to haue deceiued him with words, hauing at firſt put him in hope of peace, and that hee would reſtore the Dutchy of Milan to him, after-wards to bee ſo ſlacke therein, hauing appeaſed the troubles of Flanders, and beſides, to haue iniuried him contrary to the law of Nations, by the trecherous murther of his ſeruants. He complained hereof and cauſed to be publiſhed al a broad that hee would bee reuenged thereof; hee wrot to all Forraine Princes, giuing them to vnderſtand that he had not broken the truce: Then he did particularly aduertize Soliman thereof, to whome he ſent Captaine Polin, enioyning him to goe firſt to Venice, to feele how they ſtood affected to the Emperor, and to acquaint them with his iuſt occaſion to take armes for the reuenge of ſuch an iniury, and after-wards, to offer vnto them for his owne part what-ſo euer hee could doe for them at Conſtantinople, by imploying his credit and authority ſo long as he ſhould continue there in quality of Ambaſſador.

The kings complaints againſt the Emperor.

Polin hauing executed his commiſſion, and crauing of the Senate that hee might paſſe on ſafely, a Gallie was giuen him for his tranſportation to Raguza.

The Emperor at the ſame time was in Germany, where at Ratisbon hee held a Diet concerning matters of Religion, wherein nothing beeing concluded he graunted to the Proteſtants an interim, ſo as euery man might vſe the ſame ceremonies which before hee had done; and vpon report of the Turkes great warlike preparations, who were already come into hungary (Soliman being there in perſon) where they had defeated Guillan of Rocandolf, Lieutenant Generall to King Ferdinand, perceiuing that in regard of his own honour, being in Germany and ſo neere a neighbour to that deſeate, all men expected when he would march againſt the Trukiſh forces; he, the better to free him-ſelfe from it, determined to vndertake the enterprize of Argier, thinking it to bee eaſier then that againſt the great Turke, to the great amazement of all men which did ſee him to attempt an enterprize nothing ſo honorable as the other: but hee did it vpon hope that paſſing along by Italy he might take the King vnprouided, and make ſome attempt vpon him, deſiring rather to leaue his owne patrimony in prey then to omit any occaſion to be reuenged on the King, whom he knew he had greatly wronged by the murther of his Ambaſſadors: but he found that the Lord of Langey, Leiutenant for the King in Piedmont, had dilligently prouided for all matters. Such were the State of affaires and ſuch were the deſeignes of Princes concerning Peace and warre. The Venetians thought it fit in thoſe ſtirrs to beare them-ſelues with great conſideration and vigilancy, and to keepe themſelues neuters, and free from all danger of beeing offended. They very well knew how important a matter the loſſe of Hungary was, as well for Chriſtendome, as becauſe thereby the Turke, their common enemy, would grow more mighty. But what hope was there of any happy ſucceſſe? King Ferdinand was not ſtrong enough of himſelfe to reſiſt the Turkiſh army: the Emperor reſolued not to hazard his forces againſt the Turkes in his brothers defenſe. Germany, badly affected to the houſe of Auſtria, would enterprize nothing which might augment the power and authority thereof: and on the other ſide the widdow Queen Iſabell and the King hir ſonne, young and without meanes to defend that Kingdome, and enforced by neceſſity not onely to make vſe of the Turkiſh ayd, but wholy to depend vpon them. The Venetians notwithſtanding that they knew all this, did neuertheleſſe determine to be Spectators of all theſe miſeries, and to auoid all occaſions that might cauſe the Turkes to ſuſpect any ſiniſter affection towards them, beeing not deſirous to prouoke them to take armes againſt the Signory.

The reaſons that moued the Venetians to keep themſelues Neuters.

Whileſt theſe affaires were thus carried the Pope entreated the Senate to grant, That according to that which had been concluded at Luca, betwixt him and the Emperor, the Councell might be held at Vincenza, the yeare following 1542. but the Senate ſuppoſing that it would greatly hurt them, by reaſon of the Turkes, made an excuſe, ſaying, that at that time when they had warrs with the Turkes, they could willingly haue granted it, but that now, Soliman would thinke that the Venetians went about to ſtirre vp the Chriſtian Princes againſt him, and by that meanes they ſhould draw ruine vpon them-ſelues, for a ſmall and vncertaine hope of a great good: As alſo becauſe they knew very wel that the cheefe Prelates did intend to make the Chriſtian Princes friends, before that they would aſſemble the counçell. This excuſe was ſtrengthened by an accident newly happened, which gaue ſuſpition that the Venetians ſtood badly affected to Soliman: it was thus, two Turkiſh Galeots going from Barbary toward Conſtantinople, and ſuſpected, by reaſon that they fled from our fleet, to be Pirates, were taken by the Prouidator of the Sea: the greateſt nomber of the Turkes were ſlaine, and all the Chriſtian ſlaues within them were ſet at liberty: the Turkes tooke this in bad part, and eſpecially Barbaroſſa, vnto whom thoſe veſſels did belong, who beeing greeuouſly incenſed thereby, threatened to bee reuenged.

The Senate refuſ ed to haue their Councell held at Vincenza.

The Senate ſpeedily excuſing the matter, did at laſt obtaine that their might be a treaty concerning the making of amends for it, and the buſineſſe beeing delayed, and Barbaroſſa being by time and ſundry good offices appeaſed, the ſtrife was ended by meanes of a ſumme of money to the content of both parties, the Venetians reſoluing to continue their freindſhip with Soliman who ſent Ianuſby to Venice to cauſe the Prince and Senate to confirme the agreement made at Conſtantinople by the Ambaſſador Badoario, who was likewiſe enioyned vpon enteaty of the French to diſpoſe the Venetians to contract aliance with their King.

The Turkiſh Ambaſſador was honorably entertayned, and his demands attentiuely tiuely heard: as concerning the confirmation of the Treaty of peace,he was therein ſpeedily ſatisfied:But to his propoſition of fauoring the French they anſwered, how that they were at peace and friendſhip with the French King, intending to continue the ſame : But they they could not as then doe any thing which might enfore them after-wards to take any armes againſt other Princes: how they were aſſured that Soliman being a moſt wiſe and iuſt Prince, would like wiſe allow of their lawful reaſons and excuſes. This anſwer being reported to Soliman by Ianuſbey,was allowed by him,and vnderſtanding by the ſame man,the Venetians firme deſire faithfully to obſerue the agreement,he was very glad of it,and ſeemed to be deſirous to performe the like towards them. This is all which paſſed at that time betwixt Soliman and the Signory of Venice: But as concerning the Chriſtian Princes, they dealt with them with no leſſe reſpects, ayming ſtill at this, not to offend any one, nor to fauour any one, not yet to doe any thing contrary to their neutrality. The Venetians for ſundry reaſons were greatly diſpleaſed with the contention betwixt the Emperor and the French King, they were likewiſe diſpleaſed for that the Treaty of placing a new Duke in the State of Milan was broken,a matter ſo often promiſed to them, and treated of not long before with the French king at the enteruiew of Paris: and to ſuffer the Emperor peaceably to enioy that ſtate, was nothing elſe, (as the wiſeſt and diſcreeteſt Senators had a long time before foreſeen)but to ſupport the Emperors immoderate greatnes,to the great preiudice of the liberty of Italy,and yet for al that,to depart from his confederacy,and to enter into a new war,the conditious of the times, and the Common-wealths neceſſity would not permit them. They were greeued beſides, for that the Turkes being ſollicited by the French againſt the Emperor,had determined to march with their army to the hurt of Chriſtendome: yet neuer the-leſſe they onely buſied them ſelues,in furniſhing their ſea townes with ſoldiors,munitions, victualls, and all other neceſſaries, in re-enforcing and augmenting their army not medling with the affaires of other men. Each of thoſe Princes did vſe meanes to diuert the Senate from the reſoluion of their neutrallity, by propunding ſundry meanes vnto them of new agreements.

Peace confirmed betwixt the Turkes & the Venetians.

The Venetians are greeued for that there is not a Duke of Milan.

The Venetians are ſolicited to leaue their neutrality.

The Emperor was ready come into Italy, reſoluing to paſſe into Affricke,notwith-ſtanding the Pope diſſwaded him from it, ſetting before him his brothers danger: His Captaines like-wiſe propounded vnto him the doubtfull euent of the enterprize of Argier, being to attempt it in the Autumnall ſeaſons of the yeare, which is commonly ſubiect to diuers alterations, and in a place filled with all diſcommodities. Yet neuer-the-leſſe,conſidering the great forces of the Turkes, and how farre they were able to enter, (which was a pollicy to draw the Venetians to another Treaty by altering the former capitulations)he did propound vnto them a new confederacy for the ſafety of Italy againſt the incurſions of thoſe Infidels,aſſuring them that the Pope, King Ferdinand his brother,and diuers other Princes ſhould enter into it:But the Senate reſoluing no more to enter into thoſe dangers, excuſed it ſelfe from harkening thervnto,and being more earneſtly ſollicited,they wholy refuſed that propoſition, eſpecially when they heard that the Pope had no great inclination there-vnto,by reaſon of the ſmale hope he had (being wiſe and well aduiſed)to bring that buſineſſe to a fortunate end, as alſo becauſe he hauing diſpoiled Aſcanio Colona of all his Eſtates, by reaſon that hee had beene rebellious and diſobedient to the Sea Apoſtolike, would auoide all occaſions of reſtoring them againe vnto him, as hee well perceaued that hee ſhould bee enforced to doe, by making a new league with the Emperor, who for his owne honor could not forſake a man that had ſo well deſerued of him, and that had beene cheefe of his faction in Italy: beſides, aiming at an other matter, he was deſirous to continew in his neutralitiy, to the end that he might obtaine firſt to haue the ſtate of Milan deliuered into the hands of Octauiano Farneſe as Guardian thereof, and to yeeeld to the Emperor and the French King a certaine homage, til ſuch time as they ſhould find out ſome more aſſured meanes of Agreement:wherin he preſumed that the Venetians would interpoſe their authority. The Venetians perceiuing that they proceeded ſlowely in that buſineſſe, and with ſmall hope, beeing deſirous not to giue the Turkes any occaſion of ſuſpition, did abſtaine from it, notwithſtanding that they were diuers times ſollicited by the Emperor, to ſend their Ambaſſadors to Luca where the Pope and hee were to meet. In all other matters they had neuer failed in their duty to the Emperor. They had giuen paſſage through their ſtate to the Almaine footmen leuied for the iourney of Affrick, and ſo ſoone as they vnderſtood of his comming into Italy by the way of Trent, they appoynted foure Ambaſſadors, to weet, Iohn Antonio Veniero, Nicholao Tepulo, Marc Antonio Contaren, and Vincenzo Grimani, who entertained him very honorably vpō the Verona territory, and attended vpon him ſo long as he remained vpon their State, which was for the ſpace of two dayes; for beeing come to Peſcara he entered the Mantuan territory, from whence afterward, he went to Milan, from thence to Genoa, and then to Luca where hee met with the Pope, with whom hauing made ſome ſmall abode, he purſued his iourney for the enterprize of Affrick, which ſucceeded badly, as it had beene foretold: for hauing landed his ſoldiers vppon the ſands of Argier, he found more reſiſtance in the Garriſon of the Citty then hee did expect, and did beſides receiue great hurt by the Arabian horſemen, procured by the Turks, who comming vpon them with great celerity, and fighting in a new and vnuſuall manner with our ſoldiers, did preuent all their deſeignes and the buſineſſe beeing drawne forth in length, great harme happened: for their aroſe ſo terrible a tempeſt at Sea, as the ſhips beeing not able to ride at Ankor, by reaſon of the force of the wind, ſom of them were driuen on ſhoare, and the others to Seaward in the mideſt of the tempeſt, So as hauing loſt diuers of his veſſells, and the reſidue beeing ſore bruſed and beaten, the Emperor was enforced to giue ouer his enterprize. Diuers men of note dyed in that voyage by diſeaſes and bad ayre, and among others, Marin Iuſtiniano Ambaſſador for the Signory, who by the Senates command had ſtill followed the Emperor, and Doctor Nicholao de Ponte, who at that time was gouernour of Vdina, was ſent in his place During the Emperors iourny, the French King was not at quiet who being mightily incenſed (as hath beene ſaid) againſt the Emperor, thought on nothing but meanes how to be reuenged of theſe wrongs which he had offered him: therefore by meanes of his Ambaſſadors whom he ſent to Luca to meet the Pope, he had earneſtly entreated his Holineſſe to declare the truce made at Nice by his owne meanes and authority to be broken and infringed, by the murther of Fregoſa and Rincon, the better to let all men ſee the iuſtice of his cauſe: But reſoluing by all meanes to preuaile by force, he did with greater vehemency reuiue his former conceits to preuent the Emperor by meanes of the Turkes aid and friendſhip, whereupon he determined to ſend back Polin to Conſtantinople to treat in particular of the comming of the Army againſt the Emperor and as he paſſed along to vſe new meanes to draw the Venetians to his party.

The Senats refuſeth to make any new alliance.

The French King is incenſed againſt the Emperor.

Polin then beeing come to Venice from thence to paſſe to Conſtantinople, he with the Biſhop of Montpellier, ordinary Ambaſſador to the King, came into the Councell of the Tenne, according to the vſuall cuſtome of ſecret audiences, where they diſcharged their commiſſion from their Prince: Polin. ſtriuing very much by a long oration to perſwade the Senators by a new aliance to embrace the Kings friendſhip. But all his diſcourſe and goodly reaſons could not preuaile with the Senators to make them alter their opinion, or to draw them to any new alliance, thereby to entangle them in a new warre. Therfore that buſineſſe being referred to the Senate their reſolution with a generall conſent of them all was like to that of the councel of the Tenne, to giue the ſame anſwer to the French Ambaſſadors as was made to Ianuſby: How that the Comnon wealth did deerely account of the French Kings friendſhip, the which Polin ſolicieth the Venetians to make a league with the French King.

The Senates anſwere to Polini.

for

for their parts they would euer conſtantly and inuiolably maintaine: yet neuer-the-leſſe; they determined to liue at peace with other Princes,& not to enterprize any thing which might procure war betwixt them. Polin after this anſwere being inbarked in the Venetian Gallies ſailed into Albania,and from thence purſued his iourny towards Conſtantinople, with a certaine aſſurance to cauſe the Turkiſh army to march whither he would deſire: but the deſeignes of the French tooke none effect for that yeare, either becauſe it was already to far ſpent to make great preparations,and to execute all at one time, or elſe becauſe Soliman had ſetled all his thoughts vpon the enterprize of Hungary, making account to goe thither in perſon with a farre greater army. The French King in the meane time reſoluing on warre had raiſed three armies, the one conducted by my Lord the Daulphin went to beſeege Perpignan, the other commanded by my Lord the Duke of Orleance marched to enuade the French County and Luxembourg: the third greater then any of the reſt, by reaſon of the ſupplies of the Duke of Cleaues,gouerned by the Duke of Vendoſme Prince of the blood of France,entred Flanders by the country of Artois. But all theſe forces did by the report of ſuch great prouiſions more amaze then hurt the Emperor: becauſe that the Daulphin finding Perpignan to be ſuffitiently fortified by the Duke of Alua, returned without any notable exploit, the Duke of Orleans on the other ſide, did but ſcoure and waſt the country: Wherevpon the French King perceiuing all his deſeigns were to no purpoſe, did greatly taxe Soliman and the Venetians becauſe they had not taken Armes to fauour his party whileſt the Emperor was buſied elſe-where.

The French king at one time raiſeth three armies againſt the Emperor.

The King being thus diſcontented, was the more incenſed againſt the Venetians thorow the bad offices of the Biſhop of Montpellier his Ambaſſador,ſo as Polin being informed of his Maiſters diſcontent,did openly in all places oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Venetians affaires, ſcandalizing the Baily and the Common-wealth: and becauſe he hoped to haue the Turkiſh army the yeare following, at his kings deuotion,he ſaid,that it being once ready,he would make the Venetians feele,to their loſſe, what great force his Kings purſuts and authority had againſt them.The cauſe of the kings diſcontentment proceeded from that which is aboue-mentioned, for that they went armed and in troupes to the houſe of the French Ambaſſador, to take the three traytors that had retired them-ſelues thither, who after ſom reſiſtance being deliuered ouer into the hands of iuſtice,were forthwith executed: whereof, the Ambaſſador hauing aduertized the King otherwiſe then the matter was handled,his maieſty ſhewed both by word and action to be highly diſpleaſed with the Venetians:but afterwards hauing truly vnderſtood their manner of proceeding therein, hee ſent the Prothonotary Monluc to Venice, to excuſe him, if by meanes of a falſe report hee had ſiniſterly conceiued of the Common-wealths friendſhips,proteſting vnto them that he would neuer more remember any thing that was paſt, but eſteeme them as his good and truſty friends: within a while after he cauſed the ſame Prothonotary to return to Venice(who by his commandement went to Rome,to acquaint the Pope there-with)to remaine there as ordinary Ambaſſador, in the Biſhoppe of Montpelliers place, who was called home at their entreaty & to pleaſe them.Another accident happened at the ſame time which did greatly troble the Common-wealth as well for it owne particular intereſt,as for the reſpect to other Princes which was the ſurpriſing of the towne of Maran vpon King Ferdinand,vnto whome it had bin giuen by their laſt agreement. Bertrand de Sacchia a ſubiect to the Venetians hauing of his owne proper motion ſeazed on Maran, perceiuing himſelfe not ſtrong enough to keepe it called Petro Strozzi to his aid who was baniſhed from Florence, who ſpeedily came thither with a great troope of ſoldiers aſſembled in haſt, and hauing entred it, did forthwith erect the French kings baner,ſaying that they held it for the king,threatning thoſe of the town to deliuer it ouer to the Turkes, if they were not ſpeedily ſeconded by ſom Prince or other,rather then to returne it into the hands of Ferdinand.That,as the begining to a great war was very troubleſome to the Venetians.

The King is diſpleaſed with the Venetians.

Polin his practiſes againſt the Venetians.

Miranis taken from Ferdinand.

For on the one ſide they conſidered how that Ferdinand might ſuſpect that they were conſenting therevnto, the cheefe Author of that trouble being one of their ſubiects: on the other, they knew not what to thinke, in regard thoſe that had ſeazed on it did ſhield themſelues vnder the name and authority of the French King, being ignorant of his meaning therein: But that which did moſt trouble them, was their feare leaſt that towne ſhould bee deliuered to the Turkes, it being but foure and twenty miles of from Venice, wher being once ſetled they might howerly at their pleaſure make incurſions vpon the land, by meanes of the lake which is a very neere neighbour to it.

The Venetians doubts vpon the taking of Maran.

The Senate then determining ſpeedily to prouide for thoſe inconueniences, cauſed proclamations to be made: That none of their ſubiects on paine of bodily puniſhment, ſhould carry victualls, or other releefe to thoſe of Maran: They did beſides, commit to ſafe and ſure keeping, the father and wife of Sacchia who were at Vdina, that they might haue in their power, a ſufficient pawne to bridle his audatious raſhneſſe: yet neuer-the-leſſe they did ſtill entertaine thoſe of Maran, with faire and gentle ſpeeches, putting them in hope to end all matters to their content, for feare leaſt Ferdinand comming with a great Army, and they diſparing (without aide) of being able to reſiſt him, ſhould receiue a Turkiſh garriſon into the towne. The Venetians in this diuerſity of ſuſpitions reſoluing not to medle therein, but onely ſo farre forth as neceſſity ſhould enforce them, did abſtaine from doing any thing, that might incenſe the Princes intereſſed in that buſineſſe.

Vpon theſe newes Ferdinand ſent the Biſhoppe of Trent to Venice to requeſt the Senate to aid him with veſſells for the recouery of Maran, concealing that which concerned the French King: The Senate anſwered, that it was very deſirous, as a louer of iuſtice and equity, that Ferdinand ſhould recouer Maran which had beene ſo trecherouſly ſnatcht from him, and therefore it was ready to giue paſſage to his troupes and to furniſh them with victualls: yet neuer-the-leſſe, they were in hope that all matters would bee ended in friendly ſort. And queſtioning with the French Ambaſſador there-vpon, he anſwered that the King would no otherwiſe diſpoſe of Maran, then ſhould ſtand with the Senates good liking, and therefore he deſired to know their meaning therein: The ſame Senate replied that his King was ſo diſcreet, as he needed no other mens councell; but that their deſire was to proceed by ſuch meanes as might preſerue vnion and concord.

The Senats answere to the French Ambaſſador.

The Senats answer to Ferdinad.

During theſe Treaties time ran on, and thoſe which continued in Maran (Sacchia hauing beene driuen from thence by his owne fellowes, who going forth of the gates, to accompany the German gouernors wife, who went to get mony to pay their ranſome, returning backe, was ſhut forth) waxing more bold and inſolent began to build a Fort at the Hauen of Lignare, fiue miles of from Maran, that they might haue a ſafe place of retreat, when they ſhould come forth, (as they oftentimes did) to ſurprize and rob ſuch veſſels as paſſed along that way. The Venetians thinking it a diſgrace to ſuffer a deed of ſo great conſequence did ſodenly reſolue to beate it downe and ruine it: The charge thereof was committed to Bernardo Sagreda, who ſpeedily and fortunately executed it. This reſolution made them to obtaine that certaine Imperiall gallies, ſent for the recouery of Maran, did not enter into the Gulphe: for the French King being aduertized of their going thither prepared other ſome to goe to the ſame place, to the releeſe of Maran, which would haue beene a great preiudice to the Venetians to haue ſeene both thoſe fleets in their Gulph, but both the one and the other, at the Senats entreaty, refrained from comming thither.

The Venetians raiſe the fort of Maran.

The affaires of Maran remayning thus doubtfull, the French King and the king of Romans, had in the meane time begun to treat of an agreement about that towne, in which new difficulties daily ariſing, Storffi and thoſe within Maran, ſeemed deſirous to deliuer vp that Fort rather to the Signory of Venice then to any other

other Princes whatſoeuer, proteſting that vnleſſe they did ſpeedily agree amongſt themſelues, they would treat and deale with the Turkes.

Ferdinand although he truly knew the Venetians integrity, or elſe beeing deſirous to diſſemble the ſuſpition which he had conceiued, knowing that their friendſhip and aide might greatly auaile him in that buſineſſe, did chooſe two Commiſſioners to end the controuerſie, heretofore often mentioned, concerning the intelligence and obſeruation of the treaty of Trent: They came to Venice: Franceſco Contaren, and Franceſco Sanuto, choſen in former time for the ſame buſineſſe, were deputed by the Senate thereunto, who conferring together, and with them the Emperors Ambaſſador as a louing vmpier, matters ſeemed to be brought to a good paſſe, and in a manner to an agreement, if they could haue found meanes to haue compoſed the controuerſie, about the townes of Belgrad and Caſtel-nouo, engaged heretofore with other caſtles by the Emperours of the houſe of Auſtria to the Duke of Saxony, whereon, and vpon the quality of the engagement hauing a long time inſiſted, the whole buſineſſe remained vnreſolued on.

The controuerſie betwixt the Venetians and Ferdinand is put to compromiſe.

This aſſembly was broken off by reaſon of the rumors ſpred abroad at the beginning of the yeere 1543. of the great prouiſions for warre made in ſundry places, and chiefly at Conſtantinople, to enuade Hungary and Auſtria, and to ſcoure all the ſea-coaſts belonging to the Emperour. The French King hoping by meanes of this army, raiſed in his behalfe, and at his entreaty, to breake the Emperors deſignes and forces, had likewiſe raiſed a great army as well of his owne ſubiects as of Swiſſes, to vphold the Duke of Cleues rebellion and to aſſaile the Emperor in diuers and ſundry places: who on the other ſide determining to reuenge the wrongs and iniuries receiued from the French, and eſpecially to chaſtiſe (as he ſaid) the audaciouſneſſe of the Duke of Cleues a feudatary of the Empire, for taking armes with his enemies againſt him, did aſſemble the Dyet of Princes and free townes according to the cuſtome of the country, where hee procured them to make warre on the French King, and the Duke of Cleues, at the common charge of all Germany: and for the augmenting of his forces, he reſolued to ally himſelfe with Henry King of England, notwithſtanding that the ſame King had repudiated his Aunt Queene Katherine, and ſhaken off the yoake of the Romiſh Catholike Church, that they might both of them together make warre vpon France.

An. 1543.

Great prepa-rations for war on all ſides.

The Emperor allieth himſelf with Henry King of England.

King Henry did eaſily agree to the Emperors motion, beeing diſtaſted of the French King, for fauoring Iames King of Scots his enemy.

The Pope in the meane time and the Venetians did ſtill continue in their neutrallity, meaning as much as in them lay to maintaine the peace of Italy. The Pope neuertheleſſe being for ſundry reaſons diſpleaſed with the Emperor, made ſuite to the Venetians to contract a more ſtrict alliance together for their common ſafety, propounding at that time termes tending wholly to peace, and not to depart, but vpon conſtraint, from their neutrallity, but determining neuertheleſſe, as it was perceiued by ſundry ſignes, to draw the Republike afterwards to ſome new confederacy with the French King.

The Pope goeth about to make a liance with the Venetians.

The Senate continuing the accuſtomed anſwers, and telling the Pope how that there was not any cauſe to mooue them to renue their alliance, which might (not without ſuſpition to Princes) rather haſten then preuent the miſchiefe to come, made an excuſe, ſaying, that it could not make any new agreement with any one, for feare leaſt the Emperour would be incenſed againſt them, who had ſo often ſought vnto them for new confederacy, to the which they had neuer conſented. But they were moſt of all troubled to ſee the Turkiſh army to depart from Conſtantinople, whereof men ſpake diuerſly; notwithſtanding that the Turkes did promiſe them in no ſort to meddle with any thing which did belong to their Common-wealth, and that captaine Polin, who was to goe along with it, had aſſured them of the like, who by his Kings commandment had changed his his minde. Yet the Senate not relying ouer much on all theſe promiſes, determined likewiſe to arme the number of three ſcore Gallies, and to appoint a Generall ouer them, which was Stefano Tepulo, a man very famous for his rare vertues and deſerts: whereof they forthwith aduertized all Princes, to the end that the making ready of their fleet, might not make them to ſuſpect that they had any ſiniſter meaning; ſaying that the Republike had armed certaine Gallies for the defenſe of their owne ſubiects, and for the gard of their ſea-coaſts: and they commanded their Generall to viſit the Iſlands vnder their dominion, and all their forts vpon the ſea, to giue order and prouide for all things neceſſary, with expreſſe charge to auoide all occaſions that might giue the Turkes any cauſe of diſtruſting their friendſhip towards them: whereinto they very well knew that Doria would haue oftentimes cunningly drawne them.

The Senates anſwer to the Pope.

The Venetians doe arme for their owne ſafety and defenſe.

The Turkiſh nauall army in the meane time conſiſting of ſixe ſcore ſaile departed from Conſtantinople vnder the command of Cariadine Barbaroſſa, captaine Polin going along with him, and comming to Negrepont where it made ſome ſtay to take in ſouldiers and other neceſſaries, it ſailed to the Hauen of Figara, and from thence directed their courſe towards the Weſt, and hauing paſſed the Far of Meſſina, came neere to Calabria, where landing certaine of his troupes, he tooke the city of Regio, and after he had ſpoiled it and ſcoured the country round about (the caſtle ſtill holding out) he did re-embarke his people, and held on his courſe towards France, and by the way, he tooke in water at the Iſle of Ponze, and next at Oſtia vpon the Riuer Tiber, whereby Rome was in alarme, but Polin did by letters aſſure the Gouernor of the towne, that no harme ſhould bee done to any one vpon the coaſt, then hoyſing ankors, and ſtill coaſting along the Riuers of Tuſcany and Genoa, he arriued in the Hauen of Tolon, where finding two French Gallies, hee was by them conducted towards Marſeilles, whither the Kings other foure and twenty Gallies came.

The Turkes take Regio in Calabria.

Barbaroſſa his fleet at Marſeilles.

Barbaroſſa went on ſhore where hee was magnificently entertained in the city together with great numbers of Ianiſſaries, Polin riding poſt to finde the King and to receiue his commandements, whom Barbaroſſa was enioyned wholly to obey, did ſpeedily returne to the army, which being encreaſed by ſixteene French Gallies, and certaine ſhippes wherein were ſixe thouſand foote-men, hee departed from Marſeilles and ſailed with a faire winde to the hauen of Villafranca to beſeege the city of Nice which the Duke of Sauoy then poſſeſſed, which had euer belonged to the crowne of France.

The Artillery and ſouldiers beeing landed, the City for certaine daies was battered, whereby it was enforced to yeeld without being ſacked: but the Marquis of Guaſto hauing victualled the caſtle, and Barbaroſſa being diſwaded from makeing any longer aboade there, Autumne being very farre ſpent raiſed his campe and returned with his whole fleete to the hauen of Marſeilles.

Barbaroſſa taketh the city of Nice and then returneth to Marſeilles.

Now the Venetian fleete beeing truely aduertized what courſe the Turkes held, and how that Ianetin Doria was gonne into the Leuant, did entertaine time in the Gulphe, the Generall thinking it more ſafe and proffitable to prouide for that which concerned themſelues, and to auoide occaſion of meeting with the others, that he might take away all ſuſpition of being deſirous to helpe or hinder their deſeignes.

The Emperor at the ſame time reſoluing to goe into Germany to ſtirre vp that country againſt the French King, hauing firſt cauſed the Eſtates of Spaine to accept the Prince Don Philip his ſonne for their King, came to Barcelona where finding Doria with forty Gallies and certaine ſhips he imbarked himſelfe with the Spaniſh fantery, and came to Genoa. Vpon the report of his arriuall in Italy, the Venetians choſe foure Ambaſſadours, to wit, Carlo Moroſin, Gabriele Veniero, Lodouico Faliere, and Vittor Grimany, to meet him as he paſſed through their State and to entertaine him by the way.

The Emperor returneth into Italy.

The

The Pope in the meane time hauing promiſed other matters to himſelfe, ſeeing that the confederacy propounded to the Venetians had taken none effect, reſolued to talke with the Emperor, determining firſt, better to aſſure his owne affaires, as well for temporall matters as for Religion, and his Pontificall dignity in the councell which was to be held at Trent a city in Germany: and next, meaning once more to try if the Emperour would quit the Dutchy of Milan to Octauio Farneze for a certaine ſumme of money, which he perceiued the Emperour ſtood in great need of, by reaſon of the warres he had in hand: but concealing for that time thoſe his ſecret deſeignes, made ſhew, that the cauſe which mooued him as the common father and head of Chriſtendome to embrace the Emperor paſſing along ſo neere him, was to exhort him to peace with Chriſtians, and to warre againſt the Infidels; and to try if his preſence in that buſineſſe would be of more force then his exhortations made by his Legats ſent to the Emperor into Germany, and into France to the moſt Chriſtian King.

The Pope deſeignes to confer with the Emperor.

Now the Pope hauing acquainted the Venetians with his departure from Rome and going to Bolognia, alleadged no other reaſon of his iourney then the former, wholly concealing the negociating concerning the Dutchy of Milan, thereby to feele if he could diſcouer any thing from them concerning it, for, on the one ſide he knew that the ſame treaty was pleaſing vnto them, but on the other, it behoued them to proceed therein very reſpectiuely in regard of the aboue mentioned matters. The Senate continuing the old reſolution not to meddle with theſe negociations, did vnfeignedly commend the Popes good and holy meaning, with his reſolution in ſo honeſt and important a buſineſſe for the common good of all Chriſtendome, not paſſing on any further to any other conſideration.

The Pope ſeeming to bee greatly deſirous of that enteruiew did not ceaſe to purſue it, notwithſtanding that hee was alone in that negociation, and that the Emperour alleadged diuers difficulties and lets, who making no great account of him, made ſhew that he did not much affect him, either becauſe hee was diſtaſted of him, the Pope hauing not openly ſhewed himſelfe his friend as he ought to haue done, by reaſon of the honour done by the Emperor to him and his houſe, hauing by the marriage of his daughter preferred it to ſo many other noble alliances: or elſe becauſe he did ſuſpect the truth of the matter, how that the Pope would recommence his ſuite, that the Dutchy of Milan might be made ouer to Octauio Farneze, the which he reſolued not to quit to any man whatſoeuer: and therefore he was deſirous to eſchew all occaſions of diſcontenting the Pope, and of prouoking him to embrace the French Kings friendſhip, by refuſing his demand.

The Emperor refuſeth to confer with the Pope.

But the Pope ſuppoſing it would greatly blemiſh his greatneſſe and dignity, if he ſhould let the Emperour paſſe thorough Italy without ſeeing him, had to that end ſent, firſt, Petro Lodouico his ſonne to Genoa, and then the Cardinall Farneze his Nephew, to entreate him that the enteruiew might be at Bolognia, and vpon his Maieſties excuſe that he was not willing to come ſo farre backe and to delay his iourney, he determined to come farther forward euen to Buſſet, where it was concluded they ſhould ſee one an other, which was a towne very diſcommodious and ſmally frequented belonging to the Palauicins: but this enteruiew had no better ſucceſſe then all men expected, nothing being there concluded, either for the Churches ſeruice or the particular profit of the Farnezes. For the Emperor continued his reſolution to make warre vpon the French King, and the Duke of Cleues, and as for Milan, becauſe he would not flatly deny it, hee told him that he could not diſpoſe of that State, vntill he had aequainted the Princes of the Empire therewith, whereby he might eaſily perceiue that he did meane to appropriate it to himſelfe.

The Pope and Emperors enteruiew at Buſſeti is to no purpoſe.

The enteruiew being diſſolued which onely laſted three daies, the Emperour purſuing his iourney entred vpon the Venetians State, where the foure aboue mentio-mentioned Ambaſſadors met with him, and did honourably entertaine him, furniſhing him with whatſoeuer he needed either for his owne perſon or his houſehold, ſo long as he continued vpon their territories, wayting vpon him as farre as the confines of Trent, making diuers offers vnto him in generall in the name of the Common wealth, not mentioning any negociation till they were ready to take their leaues of him, and then they beſought him to be a meanes to his brother for a diſpatch concerning the agreement of Trent which they had taken vpon them. From Trent the Emperour went to Vuormes, and from thence to Spire, to be nerer to that which he had determined to doe, hauing ſtill reſident with him Daniele Bouricci Secretary to the Common-wealth, the Ambaſſador de Pont remayning ſicke at Trent, who being returned to Venice for the recouery of his health, Bernardo Nouagera was choſen in his ſtead.

The Turke maketh warre in Hungary.

Warre was at the ſame time much kindled in Hungary whither Soliman being come in perſon with a mighty army (hauing firſt ſcoured and waſted the country) had beſeeged the city of Strigonium, from whence he ſent an Ambaſſador to Venice to acquaint the Senat with his iourney and deſeignes, and alſo there to vnderſtand newes of his fleet, which at that time lay in the hauen of Villafranca at the enterprize of Nice, whereof the Senate aduertized him, and withal did infinitely thanke him for the honor he did them by acquainting them with his actions and deſeignes. This demonſtration of friendſhip from the Turkes did ſerue them for two purpoſes, firſt to continue peace betwixt them, and next, to encreaſe their reputation with other men. Therefore Soliman hauing againe ſent an other Ambaſſador to Venice to aduertize them of his progreſſion in Hungary, the Senate reſolued in reciprocall manner to render him the like demonſtration of honour and friendſhip, by ſending an Ambaſſadour to him. This charge was committed to Stefano Tepulo (hee hauing giuen ouer the place of Generall) who at the ſpring was to goe to Conſtantinople to Soliman (who was come thither from Hungary) to reioyce with him in the Common-wealths name for his fortunate ſucceſſe, and to make ſhew at his Porte of a correſpondency of loue and frindſhip.

A Turkiſh Ambaſſador commeth to Venice.

The affaires of Maran were not yet appeaſed, but on the contrary much more enkindled, as well in regard of the French, who did meane to keepe and defend it, as for the Almaines who determined to haue it by force: ſo as beſides foure hundred foot-men which the Lord of Senei brought thither, the French King ſent great troupes of horſe and foot: on the other ſide the King of Romaines hauing cauſed certaine companies of Lanſequenets to paſſe the mounts at Pontieba, vnder the command of Iohn Baptiſta Sauella, did beſides aſſemble all the ſouldiers on the neereſt places of his Dominions to make a bodie of an army, and to beſeege it. The Senate had giuen free paſſage through their State both to the one and other, to ſhew that they had no hand in that buſineſſe: they were neuertheleſſe diſpleaſed for that one Fuſt and two Brigantins had beene armed at Trieſte which entring into the Hauen of Dignana had begunne ſtreightly to ſhut in thoſe of Maran on the ſea ſide: wherevpon, to ſuffer them to ſtay their, beſides the drawing of many others thither, would ſeeme greatly to preiudice the Republikes claime to that Hauen, and ſhew ſome partiality, by ſuffering them to offend Maran from that place: the which they determyning not to ſuffer, becauſe they would proceed modeſtly therein, did entreate Ferdinand and the Emperour likewiſe to cauſe thoſe armed veſſels to depart forth of the Hauen, ſending thither at the ſame time an armed galley to hinder their incurſions, till ſuch time as they ſhould receiue an anſwere.

Sharp war about Maran.

During theſe treaties, Iohn Franciſco de Pacis a Florentine came to Venice, to offer vnto the Senate in Stroſſi his name the fort of Maran for ſome honeſt recompence, proteſting that vpon their refuſall, he ſhould be enforced to negociate with ſome other great Prince, whom he knew would gladly accept it: Stroſſi reſoluing

A motion made to the Senate for the hauing of Maran.

reſoluing in no ſort to render it to Ferdinand, but rather to get ſome great ſumme of money for it, by contracting with the Turke: that the French King had left Maran to bee diſpoſed of at Stroſſi his pleaſure, to make his profit thereof, in recompence of the good ſeruices done by him to the crowne of France.

The Senate thereupon was greatly perplexed, either to accept or refuſe it. It deſired to auoide all occaſions of contention with Ferdinand, who might ſuſpect that they had ſome intelligence with Stroſſi: and to ſuffer that place ſo nere a neighbour to Venice to fall into the Turkes hands, would be very dangerous, not only for the Common-wealth but for all Chriſtendome. Being then mooued with feare of ſuch a danger, they reſolued to harken to Pacis propoſition, and to that end two Senators were appointed, Antonio Capello, and Franceſco Contareno, to treat with him vpon the particularities of the agreement: where after ſundry conteſtations the compoſition was made in this manner: that Stroſſi for conſigning Maran into the Venetians hands, ſhould for recompence receiue fiue and thirty thouſand Ducats at one entire payment. This being thus concluded, Aleſſandro Bondimiero was ſodainely choſen Prouidator of that place, who going along with Pacis, with ſome few foot forces, was brought into it, and Stroſſi hauing conſigned the towne to him, the whole people with great ioy did forthwith take the oth of obedience to the Republike of Venice.

Agreement betwixt Stroſſi and the Venetians concerning Maran.

The Venetians did afterwards acquaint the Emperour and Ferdinand with the cauſes which had mooued them to embrace that neceſſary reſolution: that their actions in two yeeres ſpace, that the towne had beene offered vnto them, could yeeld ſufficient teſtimony of their integrity, during which time they had not only refuſed to giue an eare to their often propounded offers, but had giuen paſſage, victuals, and other commodities to Ferdinands troupes for to recouer it: that they had likewiſe conſidered, how that place was of no great importance to Ferdinand, neither for the States confines, nor reuenew thereof: but on the contrary of great expence, accompanied with extreame danger for all his States if it ſhould haue fallne into the Turkes hands, as vndoubtedly it would haue ſo happened, if they ſhould haue refuſed Stroſſi his offer.

The Venetians excuſes to the Emperor and Ferdinand, concerning Maran.

Theſe reaſons being cunningly deliuered to thoſe Princes by Bernardo Nouagera, and Marin de Canalis, Ambaſſadours for the Signory, the one with the Emperor, and the other with King Ferdinand, did in ſome ſort appeaſe them, both of them hauing at firſt taken the treaty concerning that place in bad part: and then the quallity of the times did greatly helpe to make thoſe Princes capable of the reaſons by them alleadged: by reaſon that a Dyet had beene publiſhed at the beginning of the yeere 1544. Where all the chiefe Princes and Lords of Germany were to meet to treat of affaires of great conſequence, to make warre vpon the French, and to reſiſt the Turkes attempts: for all the thoughts of the Emperour and the King of Romans tended only to thoſe two ends; hoping beſides (as a matter which they much deſired) that the Venetians perceiuing ſo many Princes and free townes of Germany leagued againſt the Turkes, would enter into league with them, and abandon that of the Turkes; this was the vſuall talke among Courtiers. An. 1544.

Now the Emperor was greatly afraide leaſt that the Venetians, vpon the leaſt diſcontent giuen vnto them from himſelfe, ſhould quit his alliance and embrace that of the French King, who had ſo often ſought to them for it; aud his feare was at the ſame time greater then euer, in regard of his hope (being ioyned to the King of England and the Suiſſes) to moleſt France more then euer he had done, perceiuing himſelfe to be freed from the care of releeuing Italy, which would be peaceable ſo long as the accord with the Venetians ſhould laſt.

The Emperors and French Kings practizes to draw the Venetians to their party.

The French King on the contrary hauing the ſelfe ſame conſiderations, did hope to defend his owne Realme by troubling Italy, with the warres of Naples and the Dutchy of Milan, to conſtraine the Emperour to diuide his forces, and

to

to send part of them to the aide of those countries, and to that end did againe vse meanes to draw the Venetians to his party, and supposing that the quallity and reputation of the man might greatly further the businesse, he caused the Cardinall of Ferrara to goe to Venice to that end, who was honourably entertained there, and comming into the Senat in secret audience (as he had desired) he beganne in substance to declare vnto them what the Emperours designes were; who only aspired to a sole Monarchy, and especially to that of Italy, the which he might with ease attaine to, did not the French King counterpoise him, who being their louing and trusty friend, did by him entreat them to enter into league with him, and speedily to send their nauall army into Puglia, where they should finde the country disfurnished of Garrisons, and all the people at their deuotion, who did openly hold the Spaniards for their enemies, and he in the meane time, for the safety of their State, offered alwaies to haue fifteene thousand men ready in Piedmont, or in any other place that they should thinke fit.

The Cardinall of Ferrara exhorteth the Venetians in the French Kings behalfe.

The Senate according to the custome, did not at that time giue the Cardinall any answere to his proposition, but the businesse being afterwards debated in the councell, they answered him, That as the Republike did highly esteeme and deerely reckon of the French Kings friendship, it did likewise determine still to embrace and cherish it: but it neither could nor would (being now at peace with other Princes, and in want of diuers things by reasons of the last warres) enter into trouble and expence by a new warre.

The Senates answere to the Cardinal.

The King supposing this answere to be no flat denial (so desirous hee was to draw the Venetians to his party against the Emperour) within a while after the Cardinals returne to Rome, imagining that the speech which the Pope had vsed in his behalfe would be of force to alter the Venetians mindes, caused Bartholomeo Caualcanti, who was banished from Florence, to goe from Rome to Venice, to acquaint the Venetians with the Pope's great affection towards the affaires of France, and to reuiue the negociation of the league, not long before propounded; although the King by dissembling it, to make the offence and sorrow seeme lesse, for that so many of his attempts had not taken effect, did protest that Caualcanti his going to Venice proceeded from the Cardinals sole and onely motion.

A new practize to draw the Venetians to the league with the King.

Caualcanti was a man of great iudgement, and an excellent Orator (as his workes that are published doe manifest) who made a long and excellent discourse to the Senate, contayning the selfe same substance that the Cardinall had before vttered: but the Senate being firme in their resolution did stop their eares to his speech, till they heard him speake of peace betwixt the Emperour and the French King, with all men so much desired.

The Pope to hasten the matter, sent two of the chiefest Cardinals, to wit, Moron to the Emperour, and Grimani to the French King, exhorting the Venetians to send their extraordinary Ambassadours, as they had done at the assembly at Nice, to the end that the exhortations both of the one and other might be of greater force to perswade them to so good a matter; and worthy the piety of any Christian Prince.

Two Legats sent to those Princes to procure peace.

The Senate although it desired to see peace and concord betwixt those Princes, did neuertheless know that it behoued them to gouerne themselues moderatly therein for diuers reasons, hauing oftentimes had experience of the bad offices done vnto them, by sinisterly interpreting in the Courts of Christian Princes, their sound and sincere actions, and that the selfe same interpretations had beene diuulged at Constantinople vnder false collours, to their preiudice, yea, euen in Solimans hearing, and satisfying themselues with doing their duties by their ordinary Ambassadors, they were desirous to eschew that vaine and dangerous apparance. These Ambassadors acquainting the Senat with what was done in the Court of those Princes, reported, that they were very much enclined to peace,

peace, not ſo much for any deſire they had to be good friends, as becauſe they were weary of the warres: for the French being on the one ſide aſſailed by the King of England who comming to Calais with a mighty army did in perſon beſeege Bullin, and on the other by the Imperiall army, which after a long ſeege had taken the city of Saint Deſier vpon Marne, was very deſirous by peace to free himſelfe from ſo many diſcontents: the Emperour on the other ſide, wholy wanting money for the continuing of the warre, and fearing the loſſe of that which he held in Italy, by reaſon of forces raiſed in the Kings behalfe neere to Mirandola. Doubting likewiſe the ſucceſſe of that warre in regard of the great numbers of Swiſſes which went to the Kings aide, and being very deſirous to ſee the Duke of Sauoy reſtored to his State, who vpon his occaſion had beene deſpoiled thereof, the which could not be done but by agreement, was very willing and deſirous of it: but each of them did looke when ſome other would motion the buſineſſe.

The Engliſh do beſeege Bullin.

The French Queene offered to employ her ſelfe therein, who was the Emperors ſiſter, hauing cauſed Don Gabriel de Guzman a Spaniſh Frier and her Confeſſor to goe to her brothers campe, to motion the matter to the chiefe of the army, ſuppoſing therein to doe a pleaſure to her husband and brother both at once.

A Spaniſh Frier beginneth the treaty of peace betwixt thoſe Princes.

This treaty then begunne by Guzman after ſundry goings and commings from one campe to an other did ſpeedily take effect. Therefore, there being aſſembled the Admirall of France and the Secretary Bayard, which Granuelle and D. Ferrant de Gonzaga to conclude in their Princes names on the conditions of peace, it was decreed; that on either part thoſe townes which had beene taken ſince the treaty of Nice, ſhould bee redeliuered; that all particular controuerſies which might ariſe therevpon ſhould be decided in the city of Cambray by Commiſſioners therevnto appointed: that the French King ſhould aide the Emperor with a certaine number of horſe and foote whenſoeuer hee ſhould make warre vpon the Turke: that the Duke of Sauoy ſhould be reſtored to his State, certaine places thereof excepted, to the which the French King laied ſome particular claime: and for the better aſſurance of this accord, the Duke of Orleance, the Kings ſecond ſonne ſhould marry the Emperors daughter, or one of his Neeces, daughter to Ferdinand, according as he ſhould thinke fit, (who within foure monthes was to reſolue himſelfe therevpon) and yet with a different dowry; for marrying with the Emperors daughter the whole Low-Countries were promiſed him for her dowry, and for the Neece the Dutchy of Milan. The Venetians as friends to them both were comprehended in that peace, who had ſo diſcreetly behaued themſelues during thoſe warres, as both the one and other of them were ſatisfied and pleaſed with their proceedings: the like did not happen to the Pope, of whom the French did greatly complaine, becauſe that hee hauing made a ſhew to fauour their party, had not aided them at their greateſt need: the Imperials on the other ſide did accuſe his deſeignes, ſaying, that if hee had not openly declared himſelfe for the French King it was not for want of loue, but for feare of the Emperors forces; ſo as his Legat had much to doe to get him to be comprehended in the peace: but becauſe it was ſaid to be made for the common good of Chriſtendome, it was requiſite and neceſſary to haue him therein named, as the chiefe of Chriſtians.

The Capitulations of the peace.

Both ſides complaine of the Pope.

This peace happening at a time and after ſuch a manner when all men leaſt expected it, gaue occaſion to men to diſcourſe diuerſly thereof, ſome thinking that it would continue, becauſe the King did thereby purchaſe vnto himſelfe, either the Dutchy of Milan, or Flanders, with the whole Low-Countiers, others beeing of a contrary opinion did imagine that the ſame accord would bee of none effect at all, by reaſon whereof the Emperour, who would not ſee the Realme of France to bee any way ruined by the Engliſh (which was the cauſe of the agreement) would not likewiſe endure to ſee it grow great and floriſh by peace, and by the purchaſe of ſo many goodly dominions. The Venetians for all that did not let to reioyce therefore both by bonefiers and other demonſtrations of ioy, yeelding ſollemne thankes to God for that he had inſpired the hearts of thoſe Princes to imbrace peace.

Diuers opinions concerning this peace.

Barbaroſſa in the meane time departing from Villafranca to returne towards Conſtantinople, and ſayling alongſt the coaſt of the Realme of Naples, he ſpoyled and waſted the whole country, and chiefly the Iſles of Ischia and Lipari, which with a barbarous cruelty he did miſerably ruine; from thence ſayling to Corfou, and ſaluting the caſtle as a friend, he receiued the accuſtomed preſents, not ſuffering any harme to be done to the inhabitants of the Iſland. Captaine Polin was in that fleet with fiue Gallies and other veſſels, who hauing brought the Turkes as farre as Lepanto, returned with all his veſſels to Marſeilles.

Barbaroſſa his cruell ſpoiles as he returned home.

The Turkes were diſpleaſed at the newes of this peace betwixt Chriſtian Princes, thinking it be done, the better to breake their deſeignes vpon Hungary or Tranſiluania, for which they had already made preparations; but they went about to conceale their diſcontent for the better maintenance of their reputation, being wont to contemne Chriſtians; and therefore not giuing ouer their former determination they cauſed to be giuen out that they were making farre greater preparations then at any other time before, to march at the ſpring againſt the States belonging to the houſe of Auſtria: and yet neuertheleſſe, the report at the ſame time was, that if the Ambaſſadors of thoſe Princes did come to that Port, they ſhould be entertained and willingly harkened to: for by their law they can not deny audience to any that come to ſue for peace and friendſhip with their great Lord: the report of theſe great preparations, cauſed the Emperor and Ferdinand expreſſly to diſpatch their meſſengers to that Port to treat of peace and agreement: and for their ſafer going to worke, they cauſed the French King firſt of al to ſend one of his ſeruants to ſound Solimans diſpoſition therevnto, and withall to craue a paſſe-port for their Ambaſſadors.

The Emperor and Ferdinand doe ſend Ambaſſadors to treat of agreement with the Turkes.

The King did willingly entertaine this buſineſſe, as well to free himſelfe of that he was tied to by the treaty of peace to aide the Emperour when he ſhould make warre vpon the Turke, as in ſome ſort to wipe out that blot, for which men taxed him; that a moſt Chriſtian Prince had made vſe of the armes of Infidels againſt Chriſtians: wherevpon, his Ambaſſadour paſſing by Venice, did tell the Senate by his Kings commandement, that he had to none other end entertained the Turkes friendſhip, but only to make vſe of it vpon ſuch occaſions for the good and profit of Chriſtendome.

This Ambaſſador being come to Conſtantinople found Soliman diſpoſed to whatſoeuer he demanded, and the paſſe-port which he craued being deliuered to him (which was at the beginning of the yeere 1545.) Ioronimo Adorni, did in Ferdinands name goe to Conſtantinople; the Emperor hauing to that end appointed Doctor Girardo, cauſed him firſt to goe to Venice, where he, and the Prothonotary Monluke, ordinary Ambaſſadour for the French King with the Signory, did imbarke themſelues in the Venetian Gallies for Raguza, and from thence went to the Port of the great Lord. Before their departure from Venice they had entreated the Senate that their Baily might haue an hand in that buſineſſe, the which was granted, and commandement ſent to him ſo to doe, but that he ſhould doe it ſo cunningly as the Turkes might not conceiue any ſiniſter opinion, whereby any harme might redound to the Common-wealth, or profit to themſelues.

An. 1545.

Theſe Princes Ambaſſadours come to Conſtantinople.

They treated at the ſame time in Venice of compoſing the ſtrife betwixt King Ferdinand and the Republike, as well for the execution of the ſentence of Trent, as for that which happened ſince concerning Maran, where after great conteſtation they did at laſt conclude for the buſineſſe of Trent, to ſend Commiſſioners thither thither to decide it, but for Maran it was referred to the Emperors councell: one of the chiefe conditions was that the Venetians ſhould giue to Ferdinand three-ſcore, and fifteene thouſand Ducats, the which (all other controuerſies being ended) they promiſed to pay in three yeeres, and at three equall payments.

Commiſſioners decide the controuerſie betwixt Ferdinand and the Venetians.

This accord although it tooke none effect, was maliciouſly interpreted by ſome, who vſed to ſow diſcord and contention, telling Soliman that the ſame treaty was made againſt him in Ferdinands behalfe, vnto whom the Venetians promiſed that ſumme of money to leauy ſouldiers. Theſe falſe reports being iuſtified and the truth of the matter knowne, Soliman was ſatisfied therewith: wherevpon the Senate thought it fit not to giue him any more cauſe of ſuſpition: and therefore they wrote to their Baily, willing him no more to viſit the Ambaſſadors, nor to make any more publike demonſtration of dealing in their buſineſſe, the which he did exactly obſerue, yet neuertheleſſe ſome times when he had any ſecret conference with the Baſhas, he did not let to doe all good offices which might further the concluſion of the accord: wherein becauſe the Republike had no other aime but the common peace and quiet, they ſolicited the Baſhas that it might be mentioned in the treaty, that the Emperor and Ferdinand ſhould not attempt any thing in Italy during the truce.

Soliman is ſ ſly informed of the Venetians.

Ruſtin hauing heard this propoſition, and ſeeming to be deſirous to performe any thing for the particular profit of the Signory, ſayd, that by all meanes it was particularly to bee inſerted in the treaty of the accord, as the friend of the great Lord, and expreſſe mention was made, how that during the truce the Venetians State ſhould in no ſort be moleſted by the Princes, comprehended in the agreement, who doing otherwiſe it ſhould be vnderſtood to be broken with Solimans ſelfe: yet neuertheleſſe, it was thought that the Venetians had oppoſed themſelues againſt that truce then handled, ſeeing that they could not procure peace, which cauſed the Emperor for that purpoſe to returne from Trent to Venice his Ambaſſador Mendoza, who not diſſembling this ſuſpition, and aſſuring them of the Emperours hearty affection towards them, entreated them from him to fauour the treaty of truce, which was already (as hee ſaid) well forward at Conſtantinople, and which for the Republikes ſake might eaſily bee effected, promyſing to haue it comprehended in the treaty as their good and louing friend.

This did the rather mooue the Venetians to ſolicite a ſuſpenſion of armes betwixt thoſe Princes, in regard, that beſides other commodities, they were to receiue thereby great aſſurance, and reputation, by being declared friends to both parties, enioying the benifit of peace which they were to hope for by ſuch an agreement. It was thought that the Emperor did not ſo earneſtly purſue the concluſion of the league, for any diſtruſt not to be aſſiſted by Germany againſt the Turkes; but becauſe he perceiued himſelfe to be enforced to take armes againſt the chiefe Lords and States of that country, who hauing pell mell ouerturned all matters ſacred and prophane to the great contempt of the Church of Rome, and the Maieſty of the Empire, went daily vp and downe practizing nouelties by a manifeſt rebellion, ſo that the Emperour, who from the beginning to draw them to his party had conſented againſt the Popes minde, that the councell ſhould be held in the city of Trent, to the great aduantage of the Almaines, did afterwards repent him of it, knowing that therein he had done no great good ſeruice to Religion: that he had broken with the Pope, and nothing preuailed with the Almains, wherevpon he ſought to moderate the conditions with which it had beene publiſhed.

VVhat did mooue the Emperor to ſolicit truce with Soliman.

The Venetians on the other ſide perceiuing that the aſſembly of the councell (though they would not openly hinder it) was not pleaſing to the Pope, as being made in an vnfit time and place, and by meanes not beſeeming the dignity and authority of the ſea Apoſtolike, would not ſend their Ambaſſadors thither.

Concerning the accord treated of at Conſtantinople, of which al men hoped for a proſperous end by meanes of a long truce of many yeeres (certaine difficulties ariſing about the reſtitution of ſome few caſtles in Hungary) it ended by a ſhort ſuſpenſion of armes for one yeere, with an intent neuertheleſſe (as Solimans ſelfe did ſay, and write to the French King) that after the matter ſhould bee well debated in Ferdinands Court, the Ambaſſadours might returne to the Port the next yeere following with new Commiſſions to ſtrenthen the peace with a longer terme.

Truce for one yeere betwixt the Emperor, his brother, & Soliman.

In the meane time a new Contention aroſe betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians about the confines of Dalmatia, where the Sangiacks of Boſſina and Cliſſa being deſirous to diſturbe the peace for their owne particular profit, or elſe to ſpoile the country, or to receiue ſome preſents of the Venetians, would haue vſurped a great part of the territory of Zara, ſaying, that a country containing nine and forty villages did belong vnto them, as dependances of the caſtles of Nadin and Laurana, which by the laſt accord remayning to the great Lord, they ſaid did likewiſe belong vnto him with all their territories: wherevpon they forbad the inhabitants of thoſe places vpon grieuous penalties, to acknowledge any other Lord but Soliman.

Contention betwixt the Venetians and the Turke.

This new trouble did greatly vex the Venetians, the country in queſtion being of great importance, both for it ſelfe and for the preſeruation of the city of Zara, and although their reaſons were vnreaſonable, in regard that Nadin and Laurana, ſmall caſtles, had no territory belonging vnto them, but did with the other villages nere adioyning depend on Zara, the chiefe city of the Prouince, yet neuertheleſſe fearing leaſt the ſtrange and inſolent proceedings which the Turkes are wont to vſe in ſuch buſineſſes (who hold it for a law, that the whole country whereon the horſe of the great Lord hath once trod doth belong vnto them) might occaſion longer ſtrife, had recourſe to Soliman, who referring the deciſſion of that controuerſie to the Sangiac of Cherſega, and to two Cadis (theſe men are ordinary iudges in law) was deſirous to haue whatſoeuer they ſhould ſet downe to be executed, who were to meet in the ſame place with the Commiſſioners of the Signory. The Senate did for that purpoſe chooſe Lodouico Rayniero who handled the buſineſſe ſo wiſely and diſcreetly with the Turkiſh officers, as the whole territory in queſtion was quietly adiudged to the Republike of Venice.

A tyrannicall law of the Turkes.

The ſame yeere deceaſſed Prince Landi, leauing behind him a great and ſingular reputation to haue well and wiſely gouerned the Common-wealth for the ſpace of ſixe yeeres and eight monthes, and lieth buried in Saint Antonies Church. Franceſco Donato was choſen in his place.

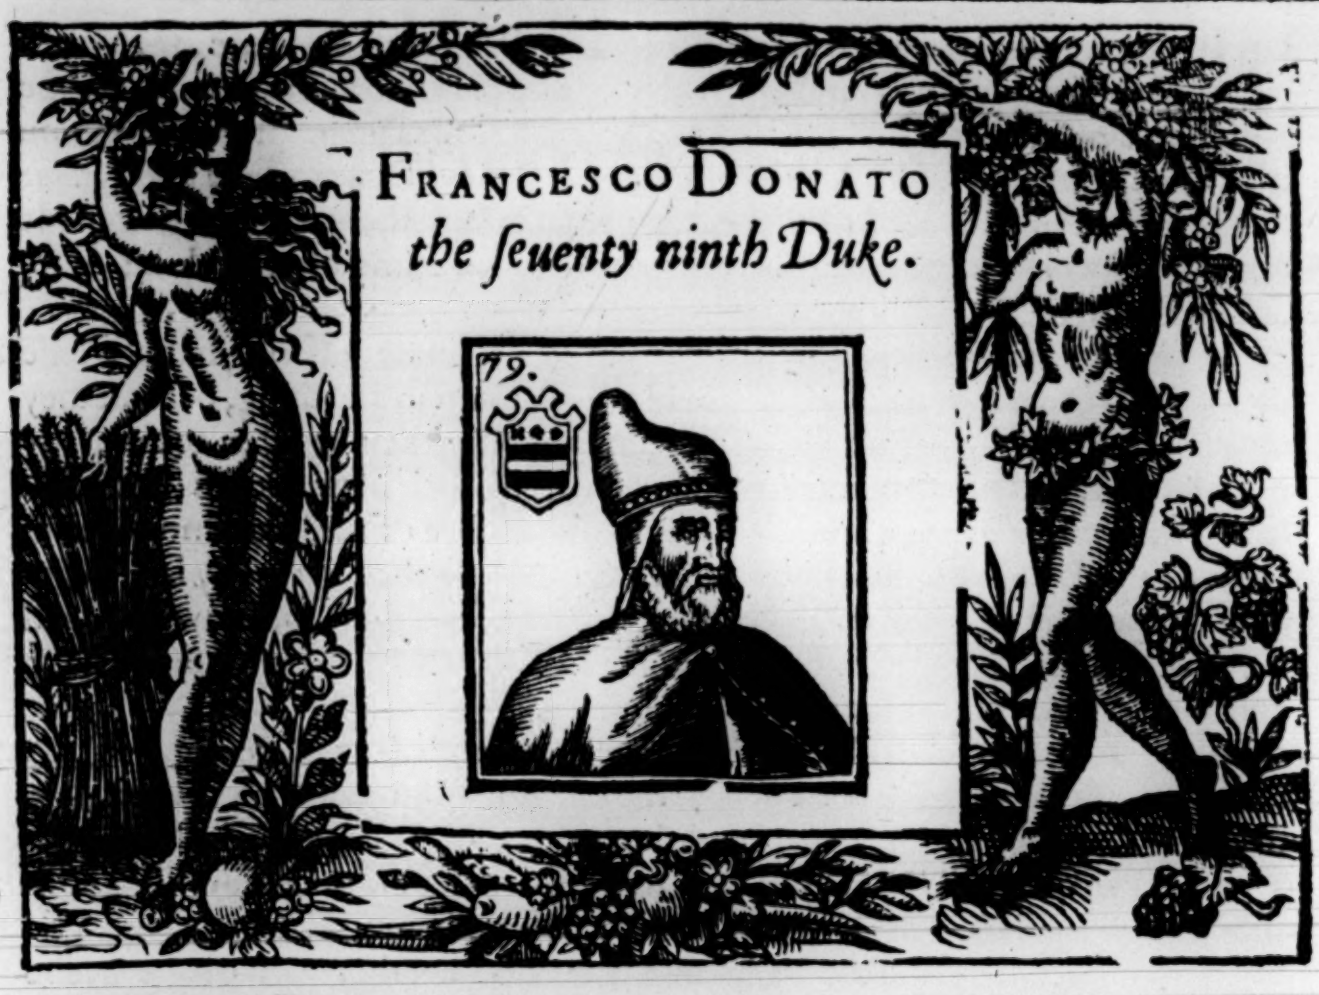
FRANCESCO



ABout the beginning of the yeere 1546. all thoſe that deſired the peace of Italy were afraide, leaſt it would be ſhortly ſhaken with new troubles, becauſe that the peace betwixt the Emperor and the French King (the principall Articles thereof taking none effect) was ſo badly aſſured, as there wanted nothing but a fit time to take armes. An. 1546.

The French King by the ſodaine death of his ſonne the Duke of Orleance hauing not obtained the Duchie of Milan promiſed vnto him, by meanes of the marriage, had not for all that loſt his deſire to recouer it: the Duke of Sauoy likewiſe could not be reſtored of his State, the King ſtill detayning it vpon ſundry pretences, hoping to enforce the Emperor to ſome other conditions by the reſtitution thereof, ſeeking thereby to obtaine his deſire.

The Pope giueth Parma and Placentia in tit'e of Dutchy to his ſonne Petro Lodouico.

An other new matter happened in Italy which gaue cauſe of feare of ſome new troubles: for the Pope perceiuing al his deſeignes to fal out contrary to his deſire for the aduancement of his houſe, hauing cut off from the Churches demaines the cities of Parma and Placentia, which Pope Iulius the ſecond had annexed therevnto, gaue them in fee to Petro Lodouico his ſon, on condition to pay a yeerely rent of eight thouſand crownes to the Church, and in recompence thereof to make ouer to the ſea Apoſtolike the Dutchy of Camerin, and the Signory of Nepi wherwith his ſon Octauio had beene inueſted. This Ceſſion did ſo much diſpleaſe the Emperor, as he could by no meanes be induced to giue the Pope the inueſtiture of thoſe two cities which he demanded, hauing beene in former time incorporated into the Dutchy of Milan.

The Emperour refuſeth to inueſt Petro Lodouico in the Dutchy of Parma and Placentia.

This refuſal of the Emperor had equally incenſed both the father and the ſon: ſo, that Petro Lodouico would willingly haue embraced the firſt occaſion offered againſt the Emperour: and the Pope, diſtruſting both the Emperour and the French King, reſolued by all meanes to maintaine and defend what he had done concerning the erection of the new Dutchy in the perſon of his ſonne, who diſcourſing with the Venetian Ambaſſadour told him, into what danger Italy was like to fall, ſo ſoone as the French King ſhould be at peace with the King of England, which at that time was treated of; and that the Emperor, if he could not at the Dyet of Ratisbon draw the Proteſtant Princes to his deſire, would bee enforced to make warre vpon them: therefore he did exhort the Senate to ioyne with him a firme and ſound intelligence, as it behooued them for their common intereſts, and for a greater aſſurance, he cauſed the new Duke to ſend Auguſtino de Landes his Ambaſſador to Venice, who acquainting them with the new grade and dignity which he had lately obtained, did in his name offer both his State and perſon to the ſeruice of the Signory.

The new Duke his offers to the Venetians.

The Senate did very louingly thanke him for his offers, offering him the ſelfe ſame, but in generall termes, which could not tie them to any thing, becauſe they would not thereby giue his Holineſſe any hope by their meanes to raiſe any troubles in Italy: then, prouiding for the defenſe of their owne States, and foreſeeing what might happen, they tooke into the ſeruice of the Common wealth Guido Vbaldo Duke of Vrbin, in quallity of Generall of their forces by land, with a yeerely penſion of fiue thouſand crownes, and fifteene thouſand crownes for an hundred men at armes and a hundred light horſe, which he was bound to haue continually ready for the ſeruice of the Signory.

But the troubles wherein the Emperor and the French King were engaged, was cauſe of the ſafety of Italy; becauſe that the one, notwithſtanding all his attempts could not get Bolloigne from the Engliſh: and the other hauing called the Proteſtant Princes to the Dyet of Ratisbon, to treat of affaires concerning Religion, although he were there in perſon, could not induce them to decree or conclude any thing: but whereas at the beginning it ſeemed that they would haue beene ſatisfied to haue had the councell held in the city of Trent, whither they promiſed to ſend their Doctors to treat of matters concerning faith, and afterwards to hold and embrace what there ſhould be decided: they did then craue firſt of all to haue a nationall councell held in Germany, and if afterwards it ſhould happen to be referred to that of Trent, that the aſſembly might on all ſides be free, with diuers other exorbitant and vnreaſonable demands. This cauſed the Pope no more to feare the councell, and to aſſure the State of Parma and Placencia to his ſonne, the Emperor, Princes and people of Germany, hauing turned their thoughts to other matters, determining to end that controuerſie by armes.

The Emperors and the French Kings difficulties were cauſe of the peace of Italy.

The end of the fourth Booke of the ſixth Decade.

The

The Contents of the fift Booke of the fixth Decade.

THE Venetians goe about to diuert the Pope from taking armes againſt the Proteſtants. The Venetians grant paſſage thorow their Territories to the Pope and the Emperors Soldiors, who were the Proteſtants partakers. The Venetians refuſe to lend mony to the Duke of Saxon and Lantgraue of Heſſe. The Proteſtants take the Caſtle of Chiuſa to ſtop the Italians paſſage. The cauſe of the loſſe and ouerthrow of the Proteſtants. What the Venetian Gentlemen are, with their prerogatiues. The commotion of the Sienois againſt the Spaniards. Petro Lodouico Duke of Parma and Placentia is murthered. The Death of Francis the firſt, French King. The death of Henry the eight King of England. The occaſion of the new warre betwixt the French and the Engliſh. Horacio Farneſe marrieth the daughter of Henry the French King. The Venetians being ſolicited by the Pope and the French King againſt the Emperour, continue Neuters. The Popes great perplexities. Soliman takes armes againſt the Perſian, making truce with Chriſtian Princes. Contention betwixt the Emperor and the French King concerning the Truce with the Turke. Controuerſy about the Place wherein the councell ſhould bee held. The death of Pope Paul the third with the election of Pope Iulius the third. Horatio Farneſe committeth him-ſelfe and his family into the French Kings protection. Great warre in Italy concerning Parma and Placentia. The Publication of the Councel of Trent. Pietro Strozzi his pollicy to reuictuall Parma. The German Princes Treate with the French King againſt the Emperor. The French King being incenſed againſt the Pope forbiddeth the Annates in France. The Turkes warre in Hungary and Tranſiluania. All Germany in league againſt the Emperor and his brother. Ferdinand to free him ſelfe from the warre with the Turkes, offereth to pay him tribute for Tranſiluania. And laſtly the murther of Frier George, Cardinall of the Sea Apoſtolike.

The

The fift Booke of the ſixt Decade of the History of Venice.

The Venetians reſolue to diuert the Pope from medling with the Proteſtants

THE Pope perceauing the Emperor to be diſtaſted of the Proteſtants (as hath beene ſaid) began to heate him more, by promiſing to aid him with great numbers both of horſe and foote paid by the Sea Apoſtolike. The Senate from the beginning vſed meanes to appeaſe the Pope, and to diuert him from medling in that warre, the which it thought could bring no good to Italy, and there was ſmall hope to preuaill by force in matter of Relligion : For all the free townes of Germany hauing declared them-ſelues for the Proteſtant Princes, fearing that the Emperor, vnder other pretences, went about to ſubiugate them, Germany on the other ſide ſtanding badly affected to the Pope, and Court of Rome, it was to be feared, and not without cauſe, that the ſame fierce and warlike nation would by reaſon therof make incurſions into Italy, where they that had in no ſort delt in that buſineſſe were to ſmart for it : Or if the Emperor ſhould happen to quell Germany ; hee by that victory growing more mighty, both in forces and reputation, his greatneſſe would proue fearefull to the Princes of Italy. But the Senate knowing him to be reſolute therein, and that being prickt forward by two mighty ſpurrs, Feare, and Hope, concerning the affaires of ſtate, of his own greatneſſe, and that of his houſe, he would not embrace any councell contrary to his owne opinion, did forbeare to ſpeake vnto him any more concerning that matter, but vpon the Pope and Emperors motion vnto it about that exterprize, by their Ambaſſadors, it made a modeſt anſwer, becauſe it would not vainely offend the Emperor, without praiſing or diſpraiſing it, being not willing to giue any occaſion to be requeſted to aide him. Yet neuertheleſſe it was certainly reported, that the Common-wealth had promiſed at the concluſion of the league at Rome, to giue paiment for fiue thouſand footemen, which was moſt falſe.

The Senats anſwer to the Pope and the Emperor.

The Venetians grant paſſage to the Pope and Emperors troups.

The Venetians being deſirous, in ſome ſort, to content theſe Princes in any thing which was not of expence, and being intreated ſo to doe, did promiſe free paſſage to the Popes ſoldiers, who being aſſembled at Bologna to the number of twelue thouſand footmen, and fiue hundred horſe, were to paſſe thorrow the Territory of Verona to goe to Trent: the like was done to the Emperors forces, who for their mony were furniſhed with victualls and other neceſſaries. The beſt and braueſt ſoldiers of all Italy were in the Popes Army, whereof Octauia Farneſe his Nephew was Generall, who was a yong Lord of great hope : But that of the Emperor was compoſed of ſundry nations ; namely of diuers Almans, drawne forth of the patrimonial States of the houſe of Auſtria, frō thoſe of the Dukes of Bauaria and Cleues, and the Marquis Albert of Brandenbourg, who did follow the Emperors party, ſo that the whole number of his forces were forty thouſand footemen and fiue thouſand horſe.

The number of the Emperors Army.

The

The Proteſtant Princes made preparations at the ſame time, the cheife of whom were Iohn Fredericke Duke of Saxony one of the Electors of the Empire, and Phillip Lantgraue of Heſſe, who, ſaying that they would defend the liberty of Germany, which Charles went about to vſurpe, (as they ſaid) did draw vnto their parts diuers of the greateſt Lords and Citties of Germany, as the Duke of Wittemberg, the Count Palatin another Elector, with the Common-wealthes of Argentine, Vlmes, Francfort and Norimberg, the Citty of Auſbourg hauing a long time before declared it ſelfe in their behalfe: all which hauing reſolued to hold a diet at Vlmes did ſend their Ambaſſadors and Commiſſioners thither, to treat particularly of the preparations for warre, where the concourſe of all Germany was ſuch, as they leuied a very great army of foureſcore thouſand footmen, and tenne thouſand horſe, with which forces they promiſed vnto themſelues to be able to ouercome thoſe of the Emperor, and to driue him forth of Germany, in regard hee was not able to aſſemble Germaine forces comparable to theirs.

Who they were that took part with the Proteſtants.

The number of the Proteſtants Army.

They feared none but forraine ſoldiers, and eſpecially the Italian Fantery, leuied by the Pope: whereuppon, to ſtoppe their paſſage, they did write louingly to the Venetians, and by putting them in mind of the antient freindſhip betwixt the Germaine nation and them, they entreated them not to giue paſſage to thoſe through their territories, who came only to offend them, and to ſerue the Emperor, who went about to bring Germany into ſeruitude. The Senate anſwered that it did hold their freindſhip deere, which they had euer embraced, & generaly that of all Germany, but, their Countrey being open and Champaine, they could not ſtoppe the ſoldiers paſſage but with great forces, which they were wont to employ but againſt open enemies. Within a while after, they receiued particular letters from the Duke of Saxony and the Landgraue of Heſſe, which acquainting them with their deſeignes, and how that for their owne defenſe they had beene enforced to take armes, did erneſtly entreate them to lend them a certaine ſumme of money. The King of England did greatly fauour his demand, by his Secretary reſiding at Venice, who preſented his letters; (that King being diſtaſted of the Emperor): but the Senate making ſtill one anſwer, ſaid, that it did hold thoſe Princes for their good and truſty freinds, and did wiſh them all proſperity and aduancement, but that they could not ſatiſfie their requeſt without offending other Princes with whom they were in league and freindſhip, which they did mean to maintaine, and that (theſe reſpects excepted) they did greatly affect the Germaine nation. Thoſe of Auſbourg likewſie hauing by their letters and by an expreſſe meſſenger recommended their Marchants to the Senate, (many of whom were retired to Venice, and greater numbers comming daily thither for feare of thoſe trobles), were kindly anſwered, that their Cittizens, with all others of any other Citties of Germany, which came to Venice, ſhould be very welcome and vſed as their owne Cittizens, as they had beene in former times. Now Whileſt either party was buſied in making preparations for warre, and that already great numbers of ſoldiers raiſed in Italy were ready to march, a rumor was ſpred abroad how that both ſides were at peace and become freinds, the Capitulations whereof beeing vnknowne, and no Poſtes beeing ſent abroad into all places to publiſh it, did ſufficiently manifeſt that it was nothing ſo, yet neuertheleſſe theſe ſodaine newes did amaze the Venetians, conſidering that ſuch great numbers of ſoldiers which at that time filled all Italy, were ſufficient to affright other mens ſtates which were vnfurniſhed of force, whenſo euer they ſhould bee deſirous to turne their Armes vpon any other enterprize. The Pope hauing intelligence of the Venetians doubt, and fearing leaſt the Senate would determine, for their ſafety, to league themſelues with ſome other, with a reſolution cleane contraty to his deſeignes, did enter into a long diſcourſe with the Ambaſſador for the Signory, telling him how that for the Common good hee had euermore beene carefull of the peace and quiet of Italy, with a particular deſire to aduance what

The Pro teſtants ſuite to the Veneti ans.

The Senates anſwere to the Proteſtants.

The Duke of Saxon and the Landgraue of Heſſe their ſuite to the Venetian Senate. with their anſwer.

The Venetians gentle anſwer to thoſe of Auſbourg.

The Venetians are in ſome doubt ſeing ſo many ſoldiers in Italy.

whatſoeuer did belong to the ſafety and greatneſſe of the Venetian Common-wealth: wherefore he willed him to aſſure the Senate of his good meaning, that they might continew their ſound intelligence with him, ſeeing that thereby they ſhould preſerue one anothers ſtates in ſafety, yea and all Italy beſide; that he was deſirous at that time to reuiue that diſcourſe when he was armed and out of danger to be outraged, to let them know that it was not feare, but a true and zealous loue that mooued him ſo to diſcourſe with him, and to open vnto him the ſecret of his thoughtes.

The Popes diſcourſe to driue the Venetians from their ſuſpition.

The treaties of peace being broken, and the Armies on both ſides in the field, the Proteſtants ſeeking to do that of themſelues, which they could not obtaine of others, namely to ſtop the Italians paſſage which were comming againſt them went to ſeaze vpon the Caſtle of Chiuſa, a place in the County of Tiroll, ſeated among the mountaines, by which they ſuppoſed that the enemies would paſſe; but the Pope and Emperors Armies, keeping the way that leadeth neerer to Iſpruch, entred the Dutchy of Bauaria and from thence went to Ratiſbon, where the Emperor with his other forces expected them.

The Proteſtants take Chiuſa.

The two armies as well that of the Emperor, as the enemies, continued a long time idle, each of them watching for ſome aduantage, notwithſtanding that they were oftentimes ſo neere together, as ſundry great ſkirmiſhes were many times made in one an others view, without comming to battaile, which the Emperor, being wel aduiſed, did as much as in him lay ſeeke to auoid, the better to draw the buſineſſe out in length, and to defeat the enemies, (who were many heads of ſeuerall minds, by temporizing, the which he did.

The occaſions of the enemies loſſe.

For the ſoldiers and the townes beginning to looſe their former great opinion of beeing ſoone able to vanquiſh and defeate the Emperor, and to feele the diſcomodities of tedious contributions towards the wars, King Ferdinand hauing on the other ſide entred Duke Iohn Fredericks State with a mighty army, accompanied by Duke Maurice of Saxony his enemy, there aroſe ſuch a confuſion and amazement in the enemies Campe as ſuffering diuers Caſtles to be taken before their faces, and their Army diſſoluing of it ſelfe, the Emperor might in a ſhort ſpace contrary to his expectation giue an end to that dangerous warre. For hauing by theſe fortunate euents, purchaſed great fame, and reputation, diuers of thoſe Proteſtant Princes and free townes returned to their obedience and begged pardon: ſo as in a few monethes ſpace, he wonne a great part of the Contries of thoſe great Lords and mighty Common-wealthes, the which he had ſcarcely hoped to be able to haue done in a long time and with great labour and trauell.

The Cardinall Farneſe commeth to Venice

This Warre thus ended, winter being already come the Emperor diſmiſſed the Popes troopes, which being diſbanded returned back into Italy. The Cardinall Farneſe, the Popes nephew, who had beene his Legat in that Army, returning towards Rome was deſirous as he paſſed along to ſee the Citty of Venice, where hauing notice that they made preparations for his entertainment, he determined to goe thither in priuate, where he was ſo well receiued and entertained of all men both in publique and priuate, as he departed from thence well ſatiſfied and contented. The Farneſes not long before at the Popes requeſt, had beene receiued into the number of the Venetian Gentlemen, in all places ſo highly reckoned of, both for the ancient gouernment of the Common-wealth, and for the name of liberty which they haue euer inuiolably maintained together with the dignity and command of great dominions: And becauſe occaſion is now offered by the way to ſpeak ſumwhat of this nobility, we wil breefly make ſome mention thereof.

Who be Venetian Gentlemen with their Prerogatiues.

The Venetians do call thoſe Gentlemen that haue a ſhare in the gouernment of the Common-wealth, that is to ſay, thoſe that haue authority to elect the publick magiſtrates, and may themſelues likewiſe bee elected: this authority is giuen them from their birth, ſo as who-ſo-euer is borne of noble parents, is noble

and

and may at a certaine time and manner limitted by the lawes, enter into the great councell, where the ordinary election of Magiſtrates is made. Into this ranke are receiued, either thoſe who hauing beene the cheefe inhabitants of the Citty, and moſt famous for vertue and wealth, haue from the beginning had the mannaging of publike affaires: or alſe thoſe who for ſome notable and worthy act, done in ſer- of the Common-wealth, are at ſundry times, and for ſundry accidents, admitted therevnto: who for the moſt part haue beene of the cheefe and nobleſt families, of ſome other place: or ſome others vnto whome by ſpeciall grace and fauour, this title of Nobillity hath beene giuen: Wherein neuer-the-leſſe they haue carried them-ſelues very moderately, it being graunted but to Lords of great Eſtate, and in this manner were the families of Eſte and Gonzaga, with ſome others of the cheefe of Italy, admitted there-vnto; namely, Henry King of France and Poland, being at Venice, in the yeare 1574. and among other honors receiuing the title of a Venetian Gentleman, did ſeeme to be highly pleaſed, and ſatiſfied with that guift. Beſides, all thoſe that deſcend from them, who haue beene once receaued into this degree, haue the ſame preeminence, and to the end it may continually be the better maintayned in it perfection, they do curiouſly ſearch out the pedegrees of thoſe who are to enter into the great councell, not only the nobillity of the father, but like-wiſe whether they bee borne of lawfull matrimony, and of no common woman, but of ſome honorable degree and condition, wherof a regeſter is kept by one of the cheefe magiſtrates, termed the Auogario of the Common-wealth. But to returne to our hiſtory, the Emperor Charles was in all places highly praiſed, and commended for his fortunate ſucceſſe, and for breaking the enemies army: Duke Fredericke and the Landgraue, were yet vnuanquiſhed, who deſpayring, as authors of al thoſe troubles, of obtaining the Emperors fauour, did ſtill continew in their rebellion: and yet for all that men might perceiue that they could not long reſiſt the forces of ſo great and victorious a Prince. The Pope calling to mind by himſelf, whatſoeuer was paſt, perceiued how much more proffitable it had beene for him to haue followed the Venetians councell; whoſe wiſdom he highly praiſed, for he ſaw no proſperous ſucceſſe of any thing that he had taken in hand; The councell lay open as before, the Emperor doing it to content the people of Germany, although by reaſon of the warre certaine Prelats were gone home againe: That Pietro Lodouico was in no great fafery, in regard the warre was ſo ſonne ended, the which he thought would haue continued longer, with diuers other matters which diſcontented him, and gaue him cauſe to complaine. The Emperor on the other ſide made his complaints, ſaying that he had broken promiſe with him, becauſe the warre being not yet ended, which hee had begun thorow his perſwaſion, he had countermanded his troupes, leauing him ſtill entangled in Germany, betwixt two mighty enemies, the Duke of Saxony, and the Landgraue of Heſſe; the which he much amplified, to draw the Pope to a new contribution of mony, or that hee might haue leaue to make vſe of the wealth of the Churches of Spaine, which he had often craued, or elſe to make his victories ſeeme greater by exalting the enemies forces; ſo, as they made him more proud, and encreaſed in him his deſire to rule, eſpecially after that he had in battaile vanquiſhed and taken John Fredericke Duke of Saxony priſoner, and enforced the Landgraue to craue his pardon: wherevpon entring in triumphant manner into the Citty of Ausbourge, he there held a Diet, where he obtayned whatſoeuer he demanded for his owne proffit and commodity. Yet neuer-the-leſſe, in the middeſt of all theſe proſperities his mind ſtil ran vpon the affaires of Italy, how he might keep to himſelfe the State of Milan, whither he ſent great ſtore of ordnance, which he had taken from diuers Lords of Germany, with great numbers of Spaniſh foot, as thoſe in whom he repoſed moſt truſt, and him-ſelfe going thither afterwards, cauſed the oth of allegiance to be made vnto him-ſelfe, and to him whom he ſhould appoint for their Prince, (meaning his Sonne Philip) who for that purpoſe was ſhortly to paſſe

The Popes complaints againſt the Emperor.

The Emperors complaints againſt the Pope

The Emperor returneth to Milan.

paſſe into Italy: yet neuer-the-leſſe he procured an agreement with the Swiſſes, whereby they were bound to maintaine and defend the State of Milan. He had moreouer placed foure hundred Spaniards in Siena, for the gard of the Citty with an officer of his owne, who in diuers matters vſed great authority, and went about to build a Caſtle there, that he might afterwards make him-ſelfe abſolute maiſter thereof, vnder collour of the commotions of the people and nobility, who being not able in the end to endure to ſee them-ſelues brought into bondage, had driuen the Spaniards forth of the citty, and committed diuers other outrages againſt the Imperiall Maieſtie; he did likewiſe vſe meanes to ſeaze on the towne of Piombino, to take it from the true Lord vpon ſundry pretences, promiſing to recompence him with ſome other place, hoping to make vſe of the commodiouſneſſe of that place, being ſeated on the ſea of Tuſcany, and fit for his other deſeigns: But his ſeaſing on the Citty of Placentia, together with the death of Petro Lodouico, did more then all the reſt amaze euery man, and eſpecially the Pope: & for the ful accompliſhment of the Emperors happineſſe, there died at the ſame time, not long one after another, the two greateſt and mightieſt Kings of Chriſtendome, Francis the firſt of that name French King, and Henry the eight King of England; ſo, that all things ſeemed to fauour him, and to fall out according to his deſire, ſeeing that thoſe two great and mighty Princes, being taken away, who were his enemies, and enuious of his greatneſſe, hee remained alone of him-ſelfe in a manner Iudge and Vmpier of all matters, with a ſoueraygne authority.

The Sienois riſe againſt the Spaniards.

The Emperors deſeigns in Italy.

The death of Petro Lodouico the Popes Sonne.

The death of Francis the firſt French King & Henry the eight King of England.

Henry Daulphin of France ſucceeded King Francis his Father, not onely in the crowne, but in the ſelfe ſame affections and deſires, in no ſort to giue way to the Emperors fortune. The Senate were greatly greeued with King Francis death, where-vpon they choſe two Ambaſſadors, namely Vittore Grimani and Mateo Dandulo, who were in all haſt to goe into France to the new King, and according to the cuſtome to bewaile with him his fathers death, and next to congratulate his comming to the crowne, and to aſſure him that the Venetian Republike was diſpoſed and reſolued to continue peace, and friendſhip with him, as it had done with his Father the late King. As for Henry King of England, Italy was not ſo much greeued for him, that Kingdom being farther off: the Venetians alone bewayled him, by reaſon of their ordinary commerce, and trafficke into that realme, for which, they kept an ordinary Ambaſſador in England. Edward the ſixt of that name ſucceeded his Father Henry, who was yong and gouerned by the cheefe Lords of the Kingdome, vnto whom the Senate ſend Dominico Bollano for their Ambaſſador, who found them very willing to continue friendſhippe and vſuall trafficke with the Venetians, promiſing to giue kind vſage to as many of their nation as ſhould come into thoſe parts.

Henry the Second French King.

The Senate ſendeth Ambaſſadors to the new Frenh King.

And to Edward the Sixt, King of England.

The French King was deſirous at the ſame time to make warre vpon the Engliſh for diuers reſpects, but eſpecially for the towne of Boloign. Thoſe which feared the Emperors to much greatneſſe, were ſorry that the French King ſhould buſie him-ſelfe in that warre, which made him to forget the affaires of Italy, and to ſuffer the Emperor freely to purſue his owne deſeigns, but the Pope was more diſcontented then any other, as he that for his owne particular intereſts, and not for the common good, did determine by the armes of the French to abate the Emperors greatneſſe: therefore hee reſolued to ſend the Cardinall of Saint George into France, vnder collour (as it was giuen forth,) to cauſe the French Prelates to come to the councell publiſhed at Bolognia: But in effect it was for other ends, namely to incite the French King to turne his deſeigns againſt the Emperor, and to ſtoppe his pregreſſions, offering him for that purpoſe all ayde and friendſhip.

The Cardinall Saint George is ſent Legat into France.

King Henry did willingly harken to this motion, as one deſirous to execute ſome

ſome great enterprize, and who would not omit any occaſion whereby he might hope to purchaſe glory by ſome generous action: wherein the Pope, by meanes of his forces, was thought to be a very fit Inſtrument for the affaires of Italy, as well in regard of the commodiouſneſſe of his State, as moſt of all for his authority: whereupon the King beeing eaſily perſwaded to harken to this propoſition reſolued to ſtrengthen his intelligences in Italy, and to purchaſe friends there, and among othere, he ſent for Perro Stroſſi into France, whom he forthwith honored with the order of S. Michell, which at that time was a great honor, and giuen to none but noble perſons, or to ſuch as had well deſerued of the Crowne of France: this man was highly eſteemed for his excellent witte, and alſo for that he was an enemy to peace, and greatly followed by the bandetti of Florence and others, which was a ready means to trouble the affaires of Italy. The King did likewiſe fauour the reuolt of the Sienois promiſing to aid them in the defenſe of their liberties. But together with the Pope (for the vnion betwixt them was already confirmed, Horatio Farneſe ſonne to Pedro Lodouico hauing married King Henries daughter) he was likewiſe deſirous to draw the Venetians to that league and Vnion, becauſe hee would attempt nothing againſt the Emperor in Italy, but that which he was ſure would take effect.

Pet o Stroſſi ſent for into France to trouble the peace of Italy.

Horratio Farneſe marrieth King Henries daughter.

The King to this end ſent his Ambaſſador to Venice, ſo did the Pope his Nuncio, who ſuppoſed to find the Venetians more ready to condiſcend to their demandes, then they had beene in times paſt, in regard of the Emperors dealings, and eſpecially for the Villany committed vpon the perſon of Petro Lodouico who had beene murthered by certaine Placentine Gentlemen, by the conſent (as it was reported) of D. Ferrant of Gonzaga, Lieutenant to the Emperor in Italy, who preſently after had ſeazed vppon the Citty of Placentia, leauing great numbers of Spaniards in Garriſon there in the Emperors name who by that meanes went about to take away an other mans rightes not by open force but by deceit.

Gonzaga excuſeth him concerning the death of Petro Lodouico.

Gonzaga knowing that the Venetians would ſuſpect and think ſtrangely of that deed, did ſpeedily ſend Giouan Baptiſta Schizze, a Senator of Milan to Venice, to acquaint the Senate with what had beene done, and by quallifying the matter to aſſure them that he was not guilty thereof; but that he could do no leſſe, beeing ſent for and ſought vnto by the Dukes murthererers who preſently came to him to Milan, to haue him goe and receiue that Citty in the Emperors name the which he did, but till ſuch time as hee might receiue newes what the Emperors pleaſure was therein: but his deeds were contrary to his worps; for ſo ſoone as he entred the Citty, he cauſed the building of the Caſtle, which the Duke had already begunne, to be ſet foreward, and cauſed the nobility and people to take the oath of aleadgeance to the Emperor, and made ſpeedy preparations to goe and beſeege Parma, notwithſtanding that Octauio Farneſe complained in vaine that ſo great an iniury was done vnto him he beeing the Emperors ſonne in law.

This ſtirre being in very deed of great importance had cauſed the Venetians to make prouiſions for the defenſe of their townes: therfore they made Stephano Tepulo Prouidator Generall on the firme land, to the end that in that office hee ſhould prouide for all their ſoldiers, viſit the Forts belonging to the State, and take ſpeedy order for what ſoeuer ſhould be needfull: They did beſides, call home the Duke of Vrbin Generall of their Army, who was then at Rome, about his marriage, not long before concluded with Virginia, daughter to Duke Pietro Lodouico, Farneſe They wrote afterwards to Antonio de Caſtello, who ſerued them as maiſter of their Artillery, and a man of great credit, that he ſhould make haſt to the Citty of Breſſia, to augment the ordinary Garriſon that lay there; the Prouidator Generall did the like at Verona and in all other townes of importance, the Venetians ſuppoſing that all places were full of deceit and trechery. Things ſtanding at this ſtay, the Pope and the French King did daily more erneſtly ſolicite the Venetians, openly to declare themſelues without any more delay, and not to deferre deferre the remedying of the present mischiefe till it were too late. The Senate for all that did not make haſt to take armes againſt a moſt mighty Prince their neighbour, who at the ſame time exalted to the very height of his proſperous greatnes, becauſe that the common-wealth was not ſo weake and low brought, as whoſoeuer thoſe ſhould bee that were deſirous to aſſayle it, might thinke their enterprize eaſie; nor yet ſo mighty as it was able to keepe others in awe, and thereby gaue them cauſe to goe about to abate their greatneſſe: ſo as the condition thereof was farre different from that of others, becauſe it might without any feare of beeing aſſayled by the Emperor, expect that which time, and the alteration of affaires might procure it; which might (as it often happeneth) open a way to ſome better and ſafer courſe. Whereupon, after that the matter had beene well debated in open Councell, the Pope and French Kings demands were anſwered after one maner, and yet apart, how that the Senate did infinitely praiſe their care of the common ſafety, together with the prouiſions which they had made, for the mainetainance and defence of that which did belong vnto them: that they would follow and imitate that Councel, and haue a watchfull eie on the defence of their State, ſuppoſing that remedy alone to be ſufficient for that time, to free them from all feare and dangers: and therefore, they did not thinke it neceſſary to enter into a more ſtrict and particular vnion, whereby they might ſtirre vp and prouoke thoſe that were deſirous to trouble their peace.

The Pope and French King do ſolicite the Venetians againſt the Emperor.

The Senates anſwer to the Pope and French King.

Although this anſwer did not greatly pleaſe the Pope and King, they did neuer-the-leſſe diſſemble it, becauſe they would not altogether eſtrange them from their friendſhip, and looſe their hope of ſeeing them one day (hauing changed their minds) to bee ioyned with them. Wherupon, commending the graue and mature Councell of that Senate, they ſaid, that when they ſhould haue a further inſight into the Emperors intention, which could not bee long concealed, together with the ſuſpition which all men had conceiued of his ambition, they would then on a ſodaine reſolue with true and firme foundations to aſſure that which concerned themſelues and the whole State of Italy. Now notwithſtanding this reſolution of the Venetians, & that their hope of their good ſucceſſe in their own enterpriſes was for the moſt part loſt, the deſire neuer-the-leſſe of taking armes againſt the Emperor was not diminiſhed, neither in the Pope nor French King: and being not able in the meane time, by reaſon of ſundry difficulties, to come to open force, yet diuers ſecret practiſes were broched betwixt the French and the Farneſes in ſundry Citties of Italy, & cheefly at Genoa, Siena & Millan, Citties infected with the humors of diuers factions. The yeere following 1548. was in a manner ſpent in ſuch like buſineſſes & ſecret practizes, & conſpiracies of Princes againſt one anothers States & yet without any effect of importance. For although the French King was deſirous to trouble Italy, that he might altogether keepe the Emperor buſied there, and yet neuer-the-les, he thought it a weake and feeble thing to build his hopes vpon the Popes friendſhip, who was very old and poore, & one already in the graue. & perhaps not very firme & conſtant to maintaine war, if the Emperor ſhould propound vnto him (as it was likely he would by reaſon of his alliance with Octauio Farneſe) ſome means of agreement: he did likewiſe perceiue, that the Venetians being not wel reſolued to take arms, were ſtil deſirous to remaine neuters, & were ſo ſtrongly vnited with the Emperor ſince certen yeares, as he thought it an impoſſibility to bee able to diſioyne them, beſides, he was deſirous to purſue the war with ſ Engliſh, hoping by reaſon of the contẽtion in Englãd betwixt the Gouernors of the yong King, not only to keepe Scotland, which he hoped one day would fall to his eldeſt ſon, by the mariage of the Infanta of that kingdom, but likewiſe to win & recouer the towne of Bouloigne, by means wherof, although he continued his ſundry practizes, not only with the Pope, concerning Parma, but likewiſe at Genoa & Siena, for the alteration of the gouernment of thoſe townes, depending on the Emperors authority, yet neuer-the-les hee made no preparation to put his deſiegnes in execution, nor declared himſelfe openly the Emperors enemy.

Sundry practiſes in Italy.

An. 1548.

The French Kings doubts and deſeignes

The

The Pope on the other ſide beeing extreamly deſirous to reuenge the wrongs which the Emperor had done him, and to reſtore the Citty of Placentia to his houſe, did greatly doubt, whither it were beſt for him to proceed therein by armes, or by way of agreement: ſome-times hee hoped that the Emperor as Lord of ſo many great States, although hee did for a time ſhew himſelfe ſterne and ſeuere, would not in the end depriue Octauio his ſonne in lawe with his children deſcended from that mariage, of that State, and reduce them to a priuate fortune and condition, for which hee had more then once ſent expreſſe meſſengers vnto him, to entreat him to deliuer the Citty of Placentia to Octauio, and to forbeare to moleſt him any more about the poſſeſſion of the Citty of Parma: but at the ſame time that hee ſent theſe Ambaſſadors, hee dealt with the French King, to take Duke Octauio, with the Citty of Parma, into his protection againſt the Imperiall forces.

The Pope is greatly perplexed.

The Pope in this ſort beeing toſſed vp and downe, reſolued, (for the ſatisfying of the Emperor and the Almaines, with whom hee was at oddes in regard of the Councel which he would haue had to be kept at Bologna, and others at Trent) to ſend the Biſhop of Fane his Nuncio to the Emperor, and the Biſhop of Verona at the ſame time for his Legat into Germany, with power and authority to grant the Almains ſundry things which they craued for ſome alteration of the ordinary cuſtomes in the Romaine Church, the which the Emperor had iuſtly lookt into, the better to bridle that nation, after that he had granted them the Interim: and in the meane time, for an anſwer to the Pope, hee fed him and the Duke Octauio likewiſe, with ſundry hopes, without any certaine reſolution; propounding ſundry kinds of agreement vnto them, ſome times that hee would recompence him with ſome other State in an other place: then he ſaid that he would firſt ſee who had moſt right to that State, either the Church, or the Empire: at other times likewiſe, ſeeming to bee diſcontented, inſteed of ſurrendring Placentia, hee demanded to haue Parma deliuered to him: in a word, thoſe which beſt knew his inward meaning, did ſuppoſe that he went about by thoſe incerteinties to entangle the Pope in perpetuall doubts, hauing already determined with himſelfe by no meanes to quit the Citty of Placentia, as beeing very commodious for the State of Milan, but ſought to prolong and giue time, and to keepe himſelf from beeing enforced to take armes, waiting for the Popes ſodaine death, that he might in the meane time be able to execute his other great deſeignes. Now whileſt the Chriſtian Princes, enemies to peace, did in this manner vex themſelues with ſundry thoughts, their Eſtates were by meere chance, and vnknowne to themſelues, freed from the aſſaults of the Turkiſh armes, becauſe Soliman was deſirous to lead his Army appointed for Hungary againſt Perſia, beeing therevnto prouoked by a deſire of glory which hee hoped to purchaſe by the defeate of Tamas forces. This cauſed him more willingly to grant the truce for which Ferdinand had ſent an Ambaſſadge to him to Conſtantinople, which was confirmed for fiue yeares, on condition that Ferdinand ſhould pay him a yearely tribute of thirty thouſand Ducats, for the lands which he poſſeſſed in Hungary. The Venetians in this agreement were on both ſides mentioned, which procured them much ſafety and reputation, eſpecially by that wherein it was expreſly ſaid, that none of thoſe that were mentioned, ſhould during the time of the truce, trouble the peace and quiet one of another. There hapned certainly at the ſame, a matter worthy of note, which was, that our Princes diſtruſting one another, did of themſelues, by diminiſhing their owne reputation, encreaſe the authority and pride of the common enemy. For the Emperor craued that the French King might be mentioned in that agreement, and enioyned to performe that which the late King Francis his father had promiſed him, and on the other ſide, the King did earneſtly labour to haue it expreſſed in that treaty, that the Emperor, during the time of the truce, ſhould not make war vpon any Chriſtian Prince, & the matter went on ſo far, that although

The Pope to ſatisfie the Almains ſendeth a Legat into Germany.

Solimans Army againſt the Perſians.

Soliman maketh truce with Chriſtian Princes.

Strife betwixt the Emperor & French king.

the treaty was in a manner concluded: King Henry did with ſpeed ſend the Lord of Cottignac his Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople to croſſe the accord, ſaying, that the Emperor had not conſented to the truce for any other end, but that hee might with more eaſe make warre vpon him, whereby Soliman was to be aduiſed and not ſuffer the Emperors power ſo much to encreaſe, who would neuer haue entertained the truce, had hee not thought to profit himſelfe thereby. The Lord of Cottignac vſed the ſame ſpeech at Venice as he paſſed along, exhorting the Senate to vſe meanes that this treaty, without that clauſe, might be of none effect, which the Venetians making ſmall account of, he went forward to Conſtantinople, where finding the truce to bee concluded and finiſhed, hee did neuertheleſſe obtaine letters from Soliman to the Emperor, and to Ferdinand, written very imperiouſly, but with a ſtile fit for a great and iuſt Prince; how that hee had willingly granted the truce, with an intent that there ſhould bee a ſurceaſe of armes on all ſides, betwixt thoſe who were friends to either party, and therefore if any of the Princes, mentioned in the accord, ſhould goe about to moleſt one another by armes, hee would giue ayde and ſuccour to the party offended, againſt the diſturber of the peace.

Soliman ſendeth Imperious letters to the Emperor.

The French King in this buſineſſe had diuerſe ſuſpitions of the Venetians, who beeing deſirous ſpeedily to conclude that accord, wherein they were to bee mentioned, had without caring for the King their friends intereſt, too much fauoured the Emperor and Ferdinands party: and on the other ſide, the Emperor complained of them, ſaying, That they had firſt giuen that councell to the French King, and afterwards fauoured it at Conſtantinople, to the end he might be more ſtrictly enioined to be at peace with the French King, by reaſon that they were deſirous to take away all occaſion of warre in Italy, which was ſo highly diſpleaſing vnto them. At the ſame time, the diſcontents betwixt the Pope and the Emperor were much encreaſed, and men did already perceiue great ſignes of warre betwixt them two, by reaſon that the Emperor continued in his reſolution, that the Councell ſhould bee ſpeedily held (according as it had been publiſhed) in the Citty of Trent, as well to ſatisfie the Almains who deſired it, as becauſe hee ſuppoſed that his reputation would be impaired, if the Councell already publiſhed at Trent by his authority, ſhould contrary to his pleaſure bee held elſe-where: & on the other ſide, the Pope no leſſe conſtant in his opinion, would haue it to be kept at Bologna, whether diuerſe Biſhops and Prelates by his commandement were already come, but although the Pope had commanded the Imperials to depart from Trent and to come to Bologna, ſaying, That the Emperor without all doubt, was Protector of the Councell, but that hee had no authority to conuoke it, did neuertheleſſe, tarry ſtill at Trent, obeying the Emperors authority and command, who on the contrary ſent to the Prelats that were at Bologna, and to the Popes ſelfe, making great proteſtations: and to haue more apparence on his ſide, hee cauſed the Cardinal of Trent, of the family of Madrutis, a Prince of the Empire, to go to Rome, where he proteſted that he would not allow any other councell, then that which had bin publiſhed to be held in the citty of Trent, and if they ſhould go about to croſſe that, and thereby be cauſe of infinite other miſeries, he did requeſt to be acquitted of it before God and men. Theſe things being very greeuous to the Pope, and hapning preſently vpon the neck of the bad ſucceſſe of Parma, did greatly trouble him: yet neuertheleſſe his hope of agreement with the Emperor did make him proceed more ſlowly therein. But during theſe delaies and prolongations, Octauio beeing impatient of ſtaying any longer for the euent of the buſineſſe, concerning the recouery of Parma, after that he had attempted in vaine to reduce it vnder his obedience, his entry into the Cittadel hauing bin denied by Camillo Vrſino, who commanded the citty, did on a ſodain determine by a precipate councell, to throw himſelfe into the armes of the ſame Spaniards of whom he had receiued ſo many wrongs, that he might be able (as the Emperors Ambaſſodor at Rome

Contention concerning the place where the Councel ſhould be held.

Rome had craftily perſwaded him) by meanes of their Armes to get that Citty: at which ſtrange action the Pope greatly wondering, and by reaſon of the greefe thereof, together with his weakneſſe and great age keeping his bed, hee beeing foure ſcore and foure yeares old, did within a few dayes after depart out of this mortall life, after hee had with great commendations gouerned the ſea Apoſtolick fifteene yeares, hauing euer ſhewed himſelfe a good and diſcreet Prince, and a louer of good and vertuous people, and aboue all other things, hee had for a time remained neuter betwixt thoſe Princes beeing very deſirous of peace and quiet. The Popes death did put the Italian Princes in great feare, that it would be cauſe of the diſquiet of Italy, ſeeing that the French and the Imperials did in diuerſe places leuy forces, meaning (as it was thought) to recouer the Citty of Parma, which Camillo Vrſino did ſtill poſſeſſe, but with a very weake garriſon and ſmall prouiſion, for the maintenance of the warre, who would not obey the letters and commandements of the colledge of Cardinals, who had willed him to conſigne that Citty into the hands of Octauio Farneſe, who promiſed to keepe it for the future Pope. This feare of troubles encreaſed by reaſon of the long time that the Cardinals ſpent in the creation of a new Pope, for the two factions of Cardinals, French and Imperials, did obſtinately ſtriue one with another.

The death of Pope Paul the third.

Parma is kept by Camillo Vrſino.

The Venetian Senate in theſe long diſputations, according to the cuſtome of their anceſtors would not meddle therein, but ayming onely at the common good, did write to the colledge of Cardinals, exhorting them to chooſe a Pope that might bee for the wealth and commodity of Chriſtendome. The Venetians as well aduiſed, haue neuer ſought to haue Cardinals partiall on their ſides, nor haue medled in the creation of Popes, although they had as much intereſt therein as any other Prince, for they beeing in the number of the chiefeſt Potentates of Italy, there is no doubt but if they were deſirous to haue a hand in it, that their faction would be one of the ſtrongeſt: but they conſidered the great miſchiefes which the Common-wealth might receiue by ſuch friendſhip and intelligence with particular perſons in the Court of Rome, and how that this word faction hatcht at Rome about Eccleſiaſticall dignities, might afterwards ſlippe among them and infect the Common-wealth: and this is the reaſon why they haue abſtained from it. Now after a long ſtrife, Giouan Maria Cardinall of Monte, was for his ſanctity created Pope, who was borne at Mont S. Seuerino in Tuſcany, a man who obteining the dignity of Cardinal, not by fauour of Nobility, or help of kindred, was reputed to be very vertuous, and eſpecially to be a man newter: the Venetians being very ioyfull for this election, were perſwaded, that he depending no more on the Emperor then on the French King, they might procure him to hold them both for friends, and mediate likewiſe betwixt them, and eſpecially in Italy, a firme peace. Wherevpon the Senate did ſpeedily write to Matteo Dandulo their Ambaſſador at Rome, to congratulate Pope Iulius (for ſo the new Pope would be termed, who was the third of that name) with great demonſtration of friendſhip and entire affection: then within a while after, determining to ſend a ſolemne Ambaſſage to him, to preſent their vſual and due obedience, foure of the chiefe Senators were choſen, namely Philippo Tron, Franceſco Contaren, Marc-Antonio Venieri, and Nicolao de Ponte. But the effects did in no ſort anſwer the hope which men had conceiued of this new Pope, and eſpecially in that all men did expect & deſire, namely, that he would appeaſe the troubles, & prouide for the quiet of Chriſtendom, and for the ſafety of Italy. For addicting himſelfe to buildings and other vaine matters, he ſeemed to contemne ſerious things, and ſuch as beſeemed the ranck & grade which he held, and the miſerable condition of thoſe times, in which Chriſtendome was in diuerſe places much afflicted. For notwithſtanding that peace enſued betwixt France and England; all men did neuertheleſſe, perceiue that the ſame peace was the beginning of a farre greater warre. For Henry the French King beeing greedy of Fame, and finding himſelfe freed from

The Cardinall de Monte is choſen Pope, and called by the name of Julius the third.

The Senate ſendeth Ambaſſadors to the Pope.

the warre with the Engliſh, hauing recouered the towne of Bulloigne, could not long liue in quiet: for Horatio Farneſe comming into France to entreate his Maieſtie to take his houſe, himſelfe, and brother into his protection, and to defend and keepe the Citty of Parma, things which had beene already motioned by others, he was very kindly welcommed, and the King did embrace his protection vpon certaine conditions, beeing deſirous to diſturbe the peace of Italy, whereby he might afterwards haue a more open occaſion to take armes againſt the Emperor, hoping more-ouer (although the matter fell out very diuerſly) that it would open him a way, either to vnite himſelfe more ſtrictly with the Pope, or at leaſt to diſioyne him from the Emperor, by taking vpon him to defend a vaſſall of the Church, whom the Emperor went about to oppreſſe and ruine, the Popes entreaties beeing of no force to make him deſiſt from his enterpriſe; by meanes whereof, fire was already much kindled in the heart of Italy.

Horatio Farneſe putteth himſelfe and family into the French King's protection.

King Ferdinand on the other ſide, hoping vnder coullor of ſome contention betwixt the Barons of the Realme of Hungary, and certaine rebellion hapned in Tranſiluania, to bee able to impatronize that Prouince, departed from Auguſta (vpon ſundry promiſes of ayde which the Emperor had made to him, the better to induce him to quit the ſucceſſion of the Empire to his ſonne Philip) and went into Auſtria, where he had already aſſembled a Dyet to leuy men and money for ſuch an enterprize: it was beſides reported, that Soliman at his returne from Perſia to Conſtantinople, could not endure, that the young King of Hungary, who was vnder his protection, ſhould be ſo diſpoiled of part of his dominions: as alſo for that hee accounted the fiue yeares truce to haue beene broken by Doria, who had taken certaine places from him in Affrick, held by Dragut, which he had manned with Spaniſh Garriſons: ſo, that all theſe things beeing exactly conſidered, were preſages of great warres.

Preſages of great warres.

Theſe accidents did greatly diſpleaſe the Venetians, and by ſo much the more, as they were in hope to prolong the truce for a longer time, Soliman beeing come to Conſtantinople, beeing willing to ſhew how deſirous hee was to continue friend to the Venetians, ſent a Chiaus to Venice, to acquaint them with his returne from Perſia, & with his happy ſucceſſe, extolling (according to the manner of that nation) all his exploits done there, ſaying, That in regard hee found the Perſians ſtronger then he expected, his attempts had not ſucceeded to his deſire. The Senate, beeing deſirous ſtill to enterteine Solimans friendſhip, reſolued to do the like by him, and to ſend an Ambaſſador to his Port; whereupon Catherin Zene was appointed to that end, who although he was foure ſcore and foure yeares of age, did not refuſe to vndertake ſo long and tedious a iourney for the ſeruice of his coun rey: His Ambaſſage was to great purpoſe, for by his wiſdom he cauſed to be troden vnder foot the complaints which the Turkes made for the death of Saba Raiis, ſo often reiterated, whereupon, Soliman promiſed that it ſhould neuer more bee remembred.

The Turke ſendeth an Ambaſſador to Venice.

Catherin Zene is ſent Ambaſſador to the Turke.

An. 1550. In this manner was the yeare 1550. ſpent, famous of it ſelfe ouer all Chriſtendome, it beeing the yeare of Iubilee, but it was more noted by the publication of the Councell of Trent, whither ſpeedily from all places diuerſe Prelates began to come: then there hapned a great dearth of corne, which was in a manner generall, but greater in Italy then in other places: whereby it behooued Princes to open their treaſures for the reliefe of their poore ſubiects, and in particular the Signiory of Venice, who prouiding with ſingular bounty and affection for the neceſſity of the people of the Citty, and other their ſubiects, gaue great guifts to ſuch as brought corne to Venice, to prouoke thoſe of forraine countries to doe the like, which was afterwards diſtributed among other Townes of their obedience.

A Generall dearth.

An. 1551. The yeare following 1551. did open great warres ouer all Italy, whereof the Pope by his irreſolutions, rather then of malice, was the chiefe Author, who by little little and little falling from his firſt reſolution, did publiſh monitories againſt Octauio Farneſe, (of whom not long before himſelfe had taken vpon him the defenſe and tuition) accuſing and curſing the French Kings protection of the citty of Parma, although that (according to the common report) when hee was made acquainted therewith, hee ſeemed to allow it, or at leaſt in no ſort to contradict it. Hee did not conſider how that by his ordinary reuiling of the French and the Farneſes, he did enforce them to league themſelues more ſtrictly together, and to augment their forces, which hee hauing no meanes to reſiſt, in that hee had not prouided in time, was enforced to haue recourſe to the Emperor, who for the very ſelfe ſame matter of Parma was diſpleaſed with him.

The Pope not thinking there on, cauſeth great warres in Italy.

Hee was by little and little falne into theſe inconueniences, by the craft of the the Imperials, (vnknowne to him,) his owne ſeruants, in regard of their particular profit, not caring to let him know the truth, giuing credit to the diſſimulation of other men, and enterteining him in the meane time with vaine ſuſpitions: whereby, without knowing it, he had in a manner giuen ouer his neutrallity, and had giuen occaſion of diſturbing that peace, for which hee had ſo much ſought to purchaſe fame and glory. The Venetians had often dealt with his Holyneſſe for the appeaſing of theſe troubles, fore-ſeeing the long and dangerous warre that might proceed from them, hapning then in a bad time for Italy, in regard of Solimans great preparations to enuade Chriſtendome by ſea and land: and by putting him in minde, that it was his duty, as the common father, to mediate peace betwixt Princes, and in no ſort to ſhew himſelfe partiall, but neuter, as he had determined at the beginning, they cauſed him to conſent to procure ſome accord: Whereupon within a while after, hee ſent the Cardinall of Medicis to Parma, who was brother to the Marquis of Marignan, and kinſman to the Duke of Parma, offering to giue him the Dutchy of Camerin and Nepi in recompence of Parma, the which ſhould remaine to the Church, whereof hee forthwith aduertiſed the Emperor, aſſuring him that the Venetians councel had made him to reſolue thereon: the Pope, ſuppoſing that the Emperor would eaſily condiſcend to that agreement, as well becauſe it was reaſonable, as for feare likewiſe, that by refuſing it, he ſhould league himſelfe againſt him, and augment the French faction in Italy, which would bee dangerous for the kingdome of Naples, in regard of the great troubles raiſed there at the ſame time.

Propoſition of an agreement about Parma.

It was thought that the Emperor was willing of himſelfe to haue granted it, but that he was altered by his ſeruants and officers, and eſpecially by Don Diego de Mendoza his Ambaſſador at Rome, and by Don Ferrant de Gonzaga Gouernor of the State of Milan, ſhewing therein (as it was openly ſpoken) their particular hatred to the Ferneſes. But the Pope perceiuing that it did not pleaſe the Emperor, and not daring for feare of his forces to diſpleaſe him, fell to his former reſolution, to purſue the Farneſes by Armes, who beeing already ſtrictly allyed to the French King, would no more accept of that offer. Warre then beeing kindled in Italy, the French King hauing ſent ayde to the Farneſes, and the Emperor to the Pope, it increaſed in ſuch ſort, as the Pope entring into ſome diſtruſt of the Emperors deſeignes and actions, deteſting openly his officers manner of proceedings, repented for what hee had done, and ſought occaſions to with-draw himſelfe from him: Wherevpon hee determined to ſend his nephew Aſcanio de la Cornia to the French King, to perſwade him to lay downe Armes, and to conſent to ſome agreement, by putting him in minde of the difficulty of his enterprize, defending a Citty ſo farre off from his kingdome: not long after, hee ſent Achilles de Graſſis to Venice, whoſe comming, although it ſeemed to be only for the iuſtifying of his actions, and in counter change of ſo many good offices which the Venetians had done to him, was neuertheleſſe to entreat them to bee a meanes to draw the French King and the Duke to ſome agreement; which the Senate did not greatly deny, ſo as they might ſee any hope of beeing able therby

Who hindred the Emperor from allowing of that agreement.

The Pope ſeeketh meanes of agreement with the French King.

to

to aduance the common good. Now Aſcanio beeing returned from France, reported that the King had vſed many goodly ſpeeches, and ſeemed willing of agreement, and had likewiſe cauſed Octauio to giue conſent that Parma ſhould returne to the Church, prouided that the Emperor would doe the like by the Caſtles and ſtrong Townes which hee held vppon the Parmeſan; and that hee would not with-draw his forces from Parma, till ſuch time as hee were well aſſured, that it ſhould neuer more returne vnder the Emperors power: Wherevpon ſundry difficulties ariſing, all men perceiued that the propoſition tended onely to draw the buſineſſe out in length, and to weaken the affaires of warre, rather then to any firme peace: ſo as at laſt, al their care on either ſide, was to ſtrengthen themſelues with ſoldiers and other neceſſary things for warre.

The warre continueth in Italy.

The King ſtill ſent troopes into Italy vnder the command of the Duke of Neuers and other Captaines, cauſing Pietro Stroſſi to make an other leuie of ſoldiers in Mirandola. The Pope and the Emperor did the like, ſo as thoſe two Armies, Eccleſiaſticall and Imperial, beeing ioyned together, amounted well neere to fifteene thouſand footmen, with great numbers of horſe, of whom Don Ferrant de Gonzaga was Generall: but Stroſſi his wit and dilligence was to bee admired, who on a ſodaine going forth of Mirandola, entred vppon the Bolognois, ſcouring and waſting the Countrey with ſuch terror, as the Pope beginning to ſtand in doubt not onely of Bolognia, but likewiſe of Rauenna and other places in Romagnia, was compelled to call his forces foorth of the Parmeſan, and to command them to goe ſpeedily to the Bolognois, to the reskew of their fellowes, whereof Stroſſi taking aduantage, did with great ſpeed march towards the Parmeſan, and entred with great numbers of footmen, and ſtore of victualls into Parma; in regarde whereof, the aſſailants beeing out of hope to take it of a long time, did perceiue that the warre would long continue.

Stroſſi his pollicy to victuall Parma.

The Venetians in the meane time looking warily to all matters, and not willing by any means to depend on any but on themſelues, determined to leuy foure thouſand foot, and fiue hundred light horſe, with whom hauing encreaſed the garriſons of their frontier townes, and cauſed moſt of their beſt Captaines to goe thither, they were watchfull for the guard of whatſoeuer did belong vnto them. The Duke of Florence on the other ſide, beeing greatly obliged to the Emperor, did openly fauour his party both with men and money, not with any intent to feed this fire, which hee would willingly haue ſeene quenched, but becauſe hee would not haue him thinke ſiniſterly of him: for he likewiſe, with the other Princes of Italy, did not allow of the behauiour of the Emperors officers, nor yet of his deſiegnes, ſuſpecting them very much, and eſpecially in regard of a new Caſtle which he had lately built in Sienna, which was commonly termed, Il Ceppo della Toſcana.

The Duke of Florence taketh the Emperors party.

As for the Duke of Ferrara, although as a vaſſall to the Church, it behooued him to beare himſelfe diſcreetly in that buſineſſe, yet neuertheleſſe following his owne paſſion, hee did ſecretly ayde the French faction: Wherevpon, the Imperialls, to keepe all ſuccours from the beſieged on that ſide, did ſeaze vpon Briſſelles, and on two other ſmall Caſtles of the Dukes, ſeated on the frontier: Wherewith the Duke being greatly mooued, ſent Ieronimo Serafino his Ambaſſador to Venice, to craue (as he ſaid) the Senates aduiſe, after what manner hee ſhould behaue himſelfe in ſo miſerable a time, reſoluing to follow their councell, and eſpecially in their neutrallity: but finding himſelfe too weake of himſelfe to doe it, hee feared, vnleſſe hee were releeued, to bee enforced, for the conſeruation of his owne State, to ioyne himſelfe with ſome one or other, and to deale otherwiſe then hee deſired.

The Duke of Ferrara craueth aduice of the Venetians how to behaue himſelfe in thoſe troubles in Italy.

This demand was thought to be very ſuſpitious and ful of cunning, they ſuppoſing that the French went about by this meanes to ſound their meaning, the better to draw them to ſome confederacie, or at leaſt to diſcouer ſome-what of their interior purpoſes: wherupon the Senate was of opinion to anſwer him in generall termes. Now it had aboue all thinges deſired the peace of Italy, and that to thoſe ends it had vſed al poſſible means with the Pope, and others beſides, according as it had ſeene occaſion: but hauing nothing preuailed therein, they were at leaſt reſolued to keep themſelues in peace and in their ancient neutrality, and the better and more honorably to doe it, and with greater aſſurance, other men being armed, they thought it fit to arme; and by prouiding for that which concerned them, had together taken care for the preſeruation of the Dukes ſtate, in regard of the particular affection they did beare him, and for their owne intereſt likewiſe, being in manner inſeparable with his by reaſon of the neere neighborhood of their States. This anſwerenot ſatiſfyieng the French, they reſolued to diſcouer themſelues more plainely to the Senate, ſeeing that all men knew that they did meane to enterprize ſome matter of conſequence vpon Italy, for which Lodouico Alemani beeing ſent to Genoa, had vnder ſundry pretences attempted to raiſe his faction there, and craued in the Kings name, that it might pleaſe the Genouois to lend him their hauen, for his fleet to lie in ſafety, where hee might land thoſe troops which he intended to ſend into Italy. Now the Cardinall Tournon beeing at the ſame time at Venice, whither he came from Rome, vpon the Popes commandement that all the French Cardinals ſhould leaue the Citty, King Henry wrote vnto him that he ſhould in his name expoſe to the Prince and Senate in open Councell, the State of the affaires of Italy, the occaſion and intent, for which, and with which he had reſolued to ſend his troopes to the aid of Duke Octauio, and to defend his cauſe, That hee thought he ſhould performe: a noble part, and worthy a great Prince, and which in particular ought to be pleaſing to the Princes of Italy, to defend an Italian Prince, weake, and vniuſtly oppreſſed by the violence of other men, who had caſt himſelfe into his armes and protection: that he could hardly be perſwaded that the Pope would hinder the defenſe and preſeruation of his owne vaſſall with an other mans armes and aid, ſeeing he himſelfe was able to giue him ſmall releefe: and that beeing ſo defended he could leaſt of all beleeue that the other Italian Princes would croſſe him in going about to moderate the Emperors greatneſſe, and curbe his vnmeaſurable deſires, aiming (as all men did plainly ſee) to rob weake Princes of their States, and to bring Italy into bondage: that the matter it ſelfe was able to giue ſufficient teſtimony that his deſeignes tended to none other ends, ſeing that he ſtood vpon thoſe termes, that without needing the Citty of Parma, poſſeſſing ſo many townts in Piedmont, the paſſages lay open to himt through which hee might march againſt the State of Milan: but, becauſe hee then knew, that his actions were ſiniſterly interpreted, he was reſolued to giue ouer that enterprize: yet neuertheleſſe he could not be perſwaded but that the Venetian Senate, beeing ſo great and wiſe a Prince in Italy, on whoſe authority all others were at laſt to depend, would be mooued with theſe troubles which drew after them ſundry others of very great importance: that he did excuſe that which the Pope had done as falling out by conſtraint, rather then of ſet purpoſe, being incompaſſed with feare in the mideſt of the Emperors power and armed forces, as alſo in regard of the Councel already publiſhed, with very dangerous deſeignes, the Hereticks of Germany being come to it: but when his Holineſſe ſhould be aſſured that other men would aid him, it was not then to be doubted but that hee would embrace ſome other reſolution; ſeeing that to quit the Emperors friendſhip in ſuch a caſe might rightly be termed, a ſetting of himſelfe at liberty. The Senate gaue the King thankes and did highly commend his generous deſeigne of defending ſuch as are deſtituie of helpe: yet they were in good hope that by an accord already treated of with the pope, who did not reſiſt it thoſe buſineſſes might in ſom ſort be compoſed. The King notwithſtanding, continued the war although contrary to his deſire he found none in al Italy Octauio Farneſe excepted, whom he

of

A diſcreet anſwer of the Venetians to the Duke of Ferrara.

Inſtructions ſent by the French King to the Cardinall Tournon to be propounded to the Venetian Senate.

The Senates anſwer to the Cardinall Tournon hee might bee assured did fauour him, but resoluing to declare him-selfe afterwards more openly against the Emperor, hauing sent other forces into Piedmont, hee did vnlookt-for cause diuerse places to bee assailed which were kept by the Imperialls, some of which hee tooke, hee did at the same time proclaime warre by sea, commanding the Prior of Capua brother to Pietro Strossi Admirall of the French Galleys, that scouring the seas hee should fight with the Emperors vessels: whereby it happened within a while after, that Doria with his Galleys conducting Maximillian King of Boheme and his wife from Barcelona to Genoa, he hardly escaped the French fleet, yet neuertheless some of his vessels that lod'g behinde were taken and brought to Marseilles. But the Kings treaty with Duke Maurice of Saxony, Albert Marquis of Brandenbourg, and other Princes, and free Cities of Germany, was of farre greater importance, all these beeing meruciously distasted of the Emperor, though vpon sundry occasions, some beeing not able to digest the wrong done to the Landgraue, whom the Emperor kept prisoner contrary to his promise, and others, beeing prouoked against the Emperor, for matters of Religion.

The Germaine Princes treate with the French King against the Emperor.

King Henry resoluing vpon this league, and hauing imparted it to Giouan Capello the Venetians Ambassador resident with his Maiesty, hee did assure him that hee would in person goe into Germany, earnestly entreating him to follow him thither, to the end, (as it was supposed) that hee might haue occasion to practise some confederacy with the Venetians, or at least to keepe the Emperor in perpetuall iealouzie and suspition. The Senate, although it had determined not to enter into any farther allyance with the French, did thinke it against reason to deny the King that, as well to shew their good meaning towards him, as in regard of the profit and commodity which the Republick might receiue thereby, to the end that the Emperor, who by reason of Parma and Placentia, and other his actions, which all Italians did greatly suspect, might know, that a more strict alliance might bee easily contracted betwixt the French and the Venetians, to the great danger and preiudice of his Estates in Italy. The Pope in the meane time beeing mooued with these troubles, and considering that himselfe hauing beene the motiue thereof, by reason of Parma, all men did blame him for the warre which hee had raised in Christendome, and whose successe beeing different, himselfe was to beare a part in it, determined to send two Cardinalls to those Princes, as Legats from the sea Apostolick, to weet, Verale to the French King, and Carpi to the Emperor, to exhort them to lay by all hatred and malice, and all desire of making any more warre one vpon another: how that the taking of Tripoli, and diuerse other great warlike preparations of the Turkes for Christendome, ought to excite them to firme peace and friendship.

The Pope by his Legate goeth about to attone the Emperor and the French King.

But the flame was already growne so great, as all his exhortations could not quench it, although the French King for his part gaue some hope thereof, and had within a while after sent the Cardinall Tournon to Rome, to prosecute the treaty of accord, and that the Venetian Senate was entreated to haue an hand therein: yet, all men might perceiue that hee was more disposed to warre then to peace, and that all his practises tended to draw the Pope to his party, and to make him a companion in the war which he intended against the Emperor, who on the other side, suspecting these treaties of peace, had re-enforced his army that lay at the siege of Parma, thinking that it would greatly blemish his reputation, if during these practises, they should surprise and take him vnprouided. The Pope on the other side, being in great doubt & feare for that hee was disioyned from the Emperor, and vncertaine of the friendship of the French, knew not what to resolue vpon, yet neuertheless beeing mooued by the Emperors great power, and already tied vnto him by a particular confederacie, thought it best to make shew of that was not, and in no sort to seeme to doubt of his friendship. Hee did afterwards create diuerse Cardinals at his deuotion all Imperialls, vsing in open

Consistory

Conſiſtory very bitter ſpeeches againſt againſt the French King, deteſting ſundry of his actions, and eſpecially his alliance and friendſhip with the Turkes, ſo as the King beeing out of hope to haue him for his friend, diſmiſſed his Legat from his Court, and called home the Lord of Termes his Ambaſſador at Rome, threatning both the Pope and the whole Romaine Court; forbidding his ſubiects to ſend any more to Rome for Bulls concerning benefices, ſaying, That it was againſt reaſon to make warre on his kingdome with his owne money.

The King incited against the Pope forbiddeth annates.

At the ſame time a very great and mighty Turkiſh Fleet departed forth of the Hauen of Conſtantinople, commanded by Sinan Baſcha, and Ruſten the viſier Baſcha with diuers other Captaines of authority and experience. Vpon report thereof, the Senate did augment the number of their forces with ſeauen and forty Galleis, as beeing vncertaine what way the Turkes would take, and Stefano Tepulo was for the ſecond time choſen Generall. But the Turkiſh Fleete ſayled peaceably through the Channell of Corfou, and held on it courſe towards Sicely, where the Baſcha was deſirous to know of the Viceroy, what account the Emperor made of reſtoring the townes which Doria had taken in Affricke the yeare before, and beeing anſwered that hee did meane to keepe them, to take away thoſe places of retreats from Pirats, who did ordinarily ſcoure thoſe ſeas, hee landed great numbers of ſouldiers, who tooke and ſackt the City of Auguſta, carrying away with him ſtom that Sea-coaſt great number of priſoners, whom they made ſlaues, from thence the Fleet ſayled to Malta, which they hauing begunne to batter, and finding the interprize to bee very difficult, hee did on a ſodaine re-e nbarke his Souldiers and Artillery, and went to Goze, a ſmale Iſland eyght miles diſtant from Sicely, the which was likewiſe ſpoyled and waſted, and the Caſtell taken by force, although it was man'd with a ſtrong Garriſon: from thence ſayling into Barbary, it ſtayed before Tripoli, which after ſome ſmall battery was yeelded by the Knights of Malta, that commanded there, who with ſome of the cheefe inhabitance of the towne eſcaped into the French Galleis which followed the Turkiſh Fleet, great cruelty beeing vſed vppon thoſe that tarried behind, contrary to the promiſe made vnto them.

A great Turkiſh fleet at Sea.

The courſe held by the Turkiſh fleet at Sea.

This is all which the Turkes did at ſea, but at land on the parts of Hungary and Tranſiluania, the Chriſtians were ſtrongeſt, for King Ferdinand by the helpe of Giouan Battiſta Gaſtalda, Sforza Palauicin, and other his Captaines, made himſelfe maiſter of all Tranſiluania, and of the County and Citty of Temiſuar: the which lands although they belonged to yong King Stephen, and to the widdow Queene his mother, were neuer-the-leſſe vnder Solimans protection, who firſt ſent the Baſcha of Buda and after him the Beglerbey of Grecia, with great numbers of horſe to driue Ferdinands troopes from thence, but all their attempts were for that time to no purpoſe. A certaine Frier, called George, who ſerued the young King, did by his authority and good councell much further that enterprize, by whoſe aduice, not-with-ſtanding that the cheefe of the kingdome were of a contrary opinion, aduiſing the Queene to tarry for the Turkiſh ſuccours, which were expected, ſhe all amazed reſolued to quitte Tranſiluania to King Ferdinand, and in recompence thereof, to take the Dutchy of Opelia, hee promiſing her to giue his Daughter in marriage to the King her ſonne, ſo ſoone as hee ſhould bee of age: ſo that Ferdinands ſouldiers hauing fortified themſelues in Tranſiluania and Temiſuar, could not bee driuen from thence by the Turkiſh ſuccors that came thither afterwards, who beeing compelled by the extremity of winter, did wholy giue ouer the enterprize, and returned with ſmall credit and reputation.

The Turkes make warre in Hungary and Tranſiluania

Ferdinand doth peaceably enioy Tranſiluania.

In regard of the ſelfe ſame commodity of winter, all exployts of warre ceaſed in Italy, notwithſtanding, that Parma and Miranda were ſtill beſeeged without any further progreſſion.

The yeare following 1552. the Emperor Charles and Ferdinand his brother were were threatned with great warres, whereby they were to defend their owne States and dominions. All Germany in a manner was banded againſt Charles, the Almaines hauing reſolued in a Dyet to driue him by force forth of all Germany, and to elect a new Emperor, becauſe he (as they ſaid) had done diuerſe things to the preiudice of the Empire, and againſt the liberty of Germany. King Ferdinand was likewiſe greatly perplexed, by reaſon of the great warlike preparation which Soliman made to enuade Hungary and Tranſiluania, the which hee knew not how to reſiſt, deſpairing of all ayde from the Emperor his brother, as well for that hee was buſied elſe-where, as alſo in regard of the diſcontent betwixt them, becauſe Ferdinand would not quit the ſucceſſion of the Empire to Philip ſonne to the Emperor, and his Nephew: therefore ſeeking by other meanes to prouide for the ſafety of his owne, he vſed meanes to appeaſe Soliman, by offering to pay him an other yearely tribute of thirty thouſand Ducats for Tranſiluania, as he already did for thoſe lands which hee poſſeſſed in Hungary.

All Germany is banded againſt the Emperor and his brother Ferdinand.

Ferdinand to free himſelfe from war with the Turke offereth to pay him tribute.

In the meane time, the better to aſſure himſelfe againſt the rebellions and commotions which were then made, & all intelligences which the Turkes might haue vpon thoſe newly conquered countreys, hee cauſed good guard to bee kept, and that all ſuch as went and came too and fro, ſhould be narrowly obſerued: whereby he diſcouered that Frier George, who at his entreaty had beene made Biſhop of Varadine, and afterwards Cardinall, beeing ſpurd forward by new ambition, had ſecret intelligence with certaine Baſchus, and did fauour the Turkes party, aſpiring to appropriate that Prouince to himſelfe, vnder Solimans protection: this beeing verified, he determined to put him to death, & hauing giuen charge thereof to Sforza Palauician he with one more entered on a day into the Cardinals Chamber to entreat him to ſigne a paſſe-port, and whileſt hee was ſubſcribing it, both of them fell vpon him and ſlew him.

Friar George the Cardinall is murthered.

The news thereof beeing brought to Rome, the Pope, and the whole Colledge of Cardinals were greatly offended with it, wherevpon King Ferdinand, with all thoſe who had beene conſenting to his death, were excommunicated: but the King offering to iuſtifie himſelfe, and to prooue, that if hee had not dyed all Chriſtendome would haue been in danger to haue receiued great loſſe, he alone, at the Emperors intreaty was abſolued, and none of the reſt.

The Venetians preparations when they heard how the Turkes armed.

Now the report of Solimans great warlike preparations at Conſtantinople, which were making ready againſt the Spring tiime, did hold all men in doubt; becauſe they did not certainly know for what place that Army was deſtin'd, nor what Solimans deſiegnes therein were. It more troubled the Venetians then any elſe, in regard of the great expences and perplexities of minde which the comming forth of thoſe fleetes from Conſtantinople had procured them, cauſing them ſtill to bee well prouided: therefore they choſe Stephano Tepulo for their Gerall the third time, they did re-enforce their Garriſons in the Iſlands and other ſea townes, they cauſed certaine Galleys to be armed in Candy, and to haue ſtore of them they ſpeedily commanded new to bee built in the Arcenall. The Senate appointed twenty Captaines for their Galleys, and the great Councell as many Lieutenants, to the end all matters might bee well ordered, and that their fleete, if need were, might be encreaſed with the number of an hundred Galleys.

The end of the fifth Booke of the ſixth Decade.

THE

The Contents of the ſixth Booke of the ſixth Decad.

THE French Kings great Army where hee was in perſon to back the Proteſtants of Germany againſt the Emperor. The French take the Citty of Metz. The Proteſtants great forces. The French King ouer runneth the Countrey of Luxembourg. The Prince of Salerno commeth into France, to incite the King to the enterpriſe of Naples: The Emperor is enforced by the Proteſtants to retire and eſcape by flight. Peace betwixt the Emperor and the Germaine Princes. The French King ſoliciteth the Venetians againſt the Emperor. The Almaines doe band themſelues againſt the French King, for the citties of Metz, Thou, and Verdun. The Emperor beſiegeth Metz. The Spaniards are driuen from Siena. The death of Edward the ſixt King of England. The election of Pope Paul the fourth, of the family of Caraffa. Siena is ſurrendred to the Emperor. The Pope declaring himſelfe for the French King, is aſſailed by the Duke of Alua. The Duke of Guiſe commeth into Italy with great forces. Peace betwixt the Pope and the Spaniards. The death of the Emperor Charles the fift, of his two Siſters, and of Mary Queene of England. Peace betwixt the French King and the King of Spain. The death of Henry the ſecond French King. The death of Pope Paul the fourth. The Creation of Pope Pius the 4. The Cardinall Caraffa with three of his kinſmen are put to death. The Ouerture of the Councell of Trent. Charles the ninth French King. Strife betwixt the French and Spaniſh Ambaſſadors in the Councell, is appeaſed by the Pope. A ſtrange matter happening at Rome. And laſtly the death of the Emperor Ferdinand.

The ſixth Booke of the ſixth Decad of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

ALL theſe great warlike preparations made by the Turkes, could not cauſe the Chriſtian Princes to make peace among themſelues, but on the contrary it ſeemed that the French King was more prouoked thereby to moleſt the Emperor, whileſt he ſaw him buſied in anſwering the Turkiſh forces. For continuing in his determination to paſſe into Germany, hee perſwaded himſelfe that the Emperor, beeing aſſailed in ſo many ſundry places, and eſpecially by the Germaine Princes, who had all conſpired againſt him; would, to free himſelfe from ſo many dangers, condiſcend to ſome accord, by ſurrendring vnto him ſome State or other in Italy or elſe where, to which the crowne of France laid ſome claime.

Metz is taken by the French.

Hauing then aſſembled forty thouſand footmen of ſundry nations, and foure thouſand horſe, he marched towards the countrey of Lorraine, whither the Conſtable of Montmorencie beeing already gone before, had ſeazed on the Citty of Metz, an Imperiall citty, which was gouerned by the Biſhop and ſome principall townſmen, and the King comming thither afterwards, was very honorably entertained. Hee remained for a while with his Armie in thoſe parts, to ſtop the Flemiſh troopes leuyed by Queene Mary, ſiſter to the Emperor, from hindering his deſeignes, or till the confederate Germaine Princes ſhould ſet forward, who had already begun their enterpriſe proſperouſly, the Citty of Ausbourg beeing at their deuotion, and paſſing ſpeedily forwards without delay, thorow the Duke of Bauarias countrey, had greatly amazed the Emperor and King Ferdinand, who were then at Iſpruch, ſo, as they preſently reſolued to retire to ſome place of ſafety: but beeing afterwards encouraged, and hauing fortified certaine narrow paſſages of the Mountaines, thorow which the enemies were to paſſe vnto them, they determined not to ſtirre from thence.

The French King commeth as farre as the Rhine in fauor of the Proteſtant Princes.

The French King beeing aduertiſed of the Emperors amazement, with that of Ferdinand his brother, and of their enemies progreſſion, thought it beſt not to let ſlip the occaſion offered, the Emperor beeing weake both in courage and forces: Wherevpon he reſolued to march towards the riuer Rhine, to encourage their confederates, and to fauour their enterpriſe, intending likewiſe to paſſe on farther if need ſhould bee. But beeing come to the riuers ſide, hee receiued news that made him turne back againe: for the Confederates thinking themſelues ſtrong enough to expell the Emperor, and deſiring to keepe forraine forces forth of their countreys, for feare of receiuing ſome diſcommoditie thereby, thought it fit that Duke Maurice ſhould write to the King, how that they had already agreed with the Emperor, whereby they had obteyned their deſire, and that there remained nothing more for them to doe, but to thanke him moſt hartily for the great pleaſure hee had done them, for the which all Germany

ſhould

ſhould owe a perpetuall bond and remembrance to the Croune of France. Theſe newes did trouble the King, who ſaw his hope fruſtrate beſides the trauaile and expences of ſuch a iourney: yet neuertheleſſe beeing vnwilling to keepe his troopes idle he marched toward the Dutchy of Luxembourg, where he conquered diuers places of importance, and among others, the Caſtle of Monualier, accounted the key of that countrey, in which the Count Manſfelt was taken, who was Gouernour thereof for the Emperor. Then propounding to himſelfe other important deſeignes, he determined to faſhion himſelfe in ſome ſort to the Pope that he might diſioyne him from the Emperor, wherby he obtained at laſt, that for Parma and Mirandola, there ſhould be betwixt the Sea Apoſtolicke, and the Croune of France a ſuſpention of Armes for two yeares.

The King [illegible] poſſeſſeth the Dutchy of Luxemburg

During theſe practiſes the Prince of Salerno came to the Kinges Campe, who propounding vnto him the enterprize of Naples, his Maieſty did willingly harken vnto it, entring into diſcourſe with him what forces would be ſufficient, and what meanes were to be vſed for the execution of that enterprize: for which the Prince hauing made great offers to the King and promiſed diuers matters, grounded chiefly vpon the peoples deſire to ſhake of the Spaniſh yoake, and to caſt themſelues betwixt his armes, the King concluded that he ſhould be the cheiſe of that enterprize.

The Prince of Salerno commeth into France.

The enterpriſe of Naples propounded to the King.

This Prince leauing the Realme of Naples by reaſon of ſome contention betwixt him and Don Pedro de Toledo the Viceroy, and for hatred to the Emperor, becauſe hee maintained his enemy againſt him, came to Padua, where for a time he remained, & then determining to be reuenged of his wrongs and of the ſmall account the Emperor made of him, hee reſolued to goe into France: but he was deſirous firſt to paſſe by Venice to conferre with the Senators concerning his deſeignes, that he might the better informe the King of their meaning, conferring the propoſition that he intended to make vnto him. And beeing brought vnto the Senate, he began with a long and eloquent ſpeech, to ſet forth the occaſion which then offered it ſelfe to them, for the recouery of thoſe Townes and hauens which they had in former times poſſeſſed on the coaſt of Puglia, & for aſſuring themſelues againſt the Emperors greatneſſe; going about thereby to ſound their meaning, concerning ſuch an enterprize, if the French King ſhould propound it vnto them: ſeeing that the Neopolitans were tired with the Spaniſh gouernment, and wearied with the Viceroyes pride and tyrany, who was not only backt and maintained by the Emperor, but highly reconed and eſteemed of him, and cheifly in regard of the inquiſition which hee went about to bring into that Kingdome, to the perſecution and ruine of the Nobility; who beeing no longer able to endure ſuch bondage, were reſolued to embrace any other party whatſoeuer, rather then to continue vnder the Emperors obedience, who did ſo contemne and ouer-maiſter them That the ſelfe ſame reaſons had beene already repreſented to the French King, who tooke great compaſſion of their miſery and calamtiy: and had likewiſe as a magnanimous Prince freely embraced their protection, and promiſed to aid them in all he might, which hee had put off til ſome other time that he might performe it with ſuch an army as hee deſired. Therefore (added this Prince) it behoueth the Venetian Senate more then any others to liſten to that enterprize, as an Italian Prince, a louer of liberty, and moſt potent at Sea, and one that may lay iuſt claime to ſome part of that Kingdome: that there was no alliance more profitable to their Commonwealth then that of the Crowne of France, as thi ges paſt could giue them ſufficient teſtimony, and in particular, the King then beeing, who did ſo deerely loue their Republique, as it might hope to obtaine any thing how great ſo-euer it were. But what greater commodity, (ſaid he) can bee hoped for, then that which now offereth it ſelfe? And what greater trouble and vexation of mind can there happen vnto the Emperour, then that where-in hee is preſently

The Prince of Salerno his propoſition to the Venetian Senate.

» wrapped by the warres of Germany, and by the preparations where-with the » Turke threatneth his brother Ferdinand? But aboue all other thinges the mature » iudgement and wisdome of the Venetian Senate, ought to be well aduised, and » not to suffer the Neopolitans, destitute of all aid and succour, to cast themselues » headlong by constraint and necessity into a wretched resolution, not only hurt-
» full to themselues but much more to others, by hauing recourse to Solimans pro» tection who was vpon the point of sending a very mighty army into the field
» they beeing determined so to doe for their last refuge. All these reasons and remonstrances would not preuaile with the Senators, none amongst them beeing of opinion to accept their offers, whereupon the Prince was dismissed, with this answere, That they did much lament the discommodity of the time, and particularly his owne toyles and sorrowes, extenuating the importance of the businesse, which merited a long and more mature deliberation: yet neuertheless this Prince going afterwards (as hath beene said) into France, and acquainting the King with his deseigne, he heard him, and resolued to execute that which hee had propounded. At the same time as the French King did ruminate in his mind certaine doubts concerning that enterprize, he receiued newes which did confirme him to execute it; namely the vexations and trobles wherevnto the Emperor was reduced, which were such and so great, as he verily seemed to be forsaken of that good Genius which had euer waited vpon him in all his actions with wonderfull prosperity. Duke Maurice and the other Confederates holding on their way towards Ispruch, and beeing come to the pace of Chiusa neere to Fussen, (which was strong and narrow), in the conseruation whereof the Imperialls had placed their cheefest hope by stopping the enemies passage) they forced and tooke it, opening themselues thereby a way to march to Ispruch without any contradiction.
The Emperor, and his brother Ferdinand about midnight receiuing newes of the losse of this place, hauing but fiue hundred horse with them, did sodainly leaue Ispruch, went towards Persenon, and from thence into the County of Ti-roll: then hauing inteligence that the enemies were at Ispruch meaning to march on farther they againe iourneyed through sharpe and steepe mountaines, and tarried in no place till they came to Villac, where they continued in great feare and suspition, being aduertised by such as came forth of Italy, that they had seen great numbers of horse & foot in the contrey of Frioul, which made them to suspect that the Venetians, joyned with the French Kings & Almains, had assembled those forces to ouerrun them. This suspition proceeded from the passengers who had seene great numbers of horse which the Sauorgnians had assembled in those partes neere to the Castle of Osoff to meet the Count Gazuoles, and to entertaine him at their Castle, who was going to the Emperor.

The Senates answere to the Prince of Salerno.

The Pace of Chiusa is taken by the Protestants.

His maiesty had by so much more giuen credit (as men are easily drawne to beleeue that which they desire or feare) to these reports, in regard of the pur-suites and practizes of the Prince of Salerno; so, as being councelled whilest hee remained at Ispruch, to goe into Italy, he seemed not to allow of that Councell:
considering with himselfe that there was small safety in passing through the Venetians State: and yet they had neuer lesse will to hurt him then at that time, hating to take aduantage on the aduerse fortune of a great Prince their freind and Confederate, notwithstanding that certaine Germaine Princes had solicited them to take armes against him, offering them tenne thousand footmen and two thousand horse, which the Senate would neuer accept of: but hee being afterwards informed of the truth of the matter by Dominico Morosin, who in quality of Ambassador had stil attended vpon him, he did commend it, & highly thanked the Senare for their loue & good meaning toward him in so hazardous a fortune.

His maiesty then perceiuing that in his greateſt desaster the Spanish footmen whom he expected were not arriued turned all his thoughtes vpon peace: and to to this end, the Confederate Princes holding a Diet at Possonia, King Ferdinand went went thither in perſon to treate of the conditions of peace: But the Proteſtants deſiring to make vſe of the time, to abaſe the Emperors authority and to preſerue the liberty and priuiledges of the Princes and free Citties of Germany, made very vnreaſonable demands: where vpon the Emperor, ſometimes being enforced by neceſſity, and ſo many miſeries, did for their ſatiſfaction grant their demands, and at other times againe, recalling his vſuall courrage and inuincible conſtancy, he ſaid that he would rather endure all hazards of Fortune, then grant things vnworthy of himſelf and his Imperial dignity. In the end ſtanding firme for the matter of Religion, not to innouate any thing in the Citties, which had accepted the interim, nor like wiſe to ſubmit to the decrees of the new Diets, that which appertained to the prerogatiues and authority of the Empyre, hee condeſcended, by accepting the accord to the inlargement of the priſoners, and granted a generall pardon to the rebells. Theſe troubles had put the French King and Prince of Salerne in great hope, to be able to execute the enterprize of Naples: in which they ſuppoſing that the Venetians could doe more then any others, the Prince of Salerne returned to Venice, where he and the Lord of Selua, Ambaſſador for the King, made new & more earneſt practizes, to draw the Common-wealth into a league for that purpoſe: They declared whatſoeuer they thought might incite the Senate to hate the Emperor, and on the contrary they forgot nothing which might ſerue to inſinuate the French King into their fauour, and to extoll him as well in regard of his great forces as for his loue and affection towards the Republick: And becauſe they perceiued the Senate to bee reſolute to perſiſt in their neutrality, the Lord of Selua embracing the matter with great vehemency: ſpake thus.

Peace betwixt the Emperor and Germaine Princes.

The Prince of Salerno returneth to Venice from the King.

My Lords doe you not perceiue, that it lyeth not in your power to diuert the King from this enterpriſe, hee beeing wholy inclined therevnto, either alone, or in your or others company, and whatſoeuer your reſolution is, theſe Princes are to ſtriue together for their fortune; to which ſide ſoeuer it ſhall incline, it is to bee feared that your newtrality will not bee able to defend your State, and that which belongeth to you, expoſed to infinite dangers, beeing equally hated of the victor and vanquiſhed: of the one, becauſe that when you had meanes to aſſiſt him, you did not reſpect his miſery, nor vouchſafed to doe it: of the other, for that enuying his wealth and proſperitie, you would not ioyne with him. And what can my King preſume eyther of you, and of your ſo ancient (as you terme it) and deere friendſhip, if to your owne profit and commodity yee accept not his offers, full of affection and good will, and grant not his honeſt and iuſt demands? What hope may hee haue of your friendſhip in aduerſity, if you make ſo ſmall account of him in his proſperity? What fitter or more commodious occaſion can you expect for the aduancement of your Common-wealth, or for your aſſurance againſt the Emperors redoubted power, if you reiect that which is now offered? How often vppon leſſe occaſion, haue your Anceſtors and your ſelues, to the immortall praiſe of your Senates magnanimity taken armes? Perhaps you thinke that my King, beeing now able, to his great aduantage, to make an accord with the Emperor, and refuſing ſo to doe, will without you at ſome other time, hearken to it to his owne diſaduantage and yours: or peraduenture ſome hope, that the Emperor recouering his former greatneſſe, will remember this good office, for that you beeing ſued vnto, would not take armes againſt him: but vndoubtedly it is more like, that hee according to the cuſtome of all Princes, and in particular, following his owne naturall inclination, will make more account of his owne intereſt and particular profit, then of all duties and good offices done vnto him: Florence, Siena and Genoa, may ſerue you for examples, whom, in recompence of their good ſeruice, hee hath wholy depriued of their liberties.

The Oration of Selua the Frech Kings Ambaſſador to the Venetian Senate.

Theſe reaſons were great in ſhew, but being neerly examined, it was perceiued that they were not well grounded hauing no firme foundation: and therefore after that the Senate had maturely conſidered the matter, as well that which concerned their newtrallity, as the time of yeare already farre ſpent, and vnfit for any great enterprize either by Sea or Land, they concluded with a generall conſent to anſwer the Prince, and the French Ambaſſador, thus. That the Senate did infinitly thanke the King and Prince, for their loue and affection towards the proffit of the Commonwealth; and that it would perpetually remember it: but the Venetians hauing for many yeares beene at peace with all Princes, they thought it not a fit thing to breake it vpon no occaſion: that in any other matter the Senate would ſtriue to ſatiſfie the Kings deſire, vnto whom, and his Realme likewiſe, it wiſhed all health and proſperity.

The Senats anſwere to the Prince of Salerne and the French Ambaſſador.

After this anſwer the Prince continuing his propoſitions, did in the Citty of Chioggia aſſemble diuers of the French faction, to determine with them on fitteſt meanes for the enterprize of Naples. There met the two Cardinalls, Ferrara, and Tournon, the Lord of Termes the Kings Lieutenant in Italy, Selua the Kings Ambaſſador at Venice; The Duke of Somma, with other Dukes of the realme of Naples, and certaine other Lords, vnto whom the Prince hauing repreſented the buſineſſe very eaſie, the Aſſembly did not ſo finde it, in regard of diuers great and euident difficulties: the which hauing like-wiſe beene well examined by the King, he wrote to the Prince and to his Ambaſſador, not to motion it to the Senate: but they had already done it, as hath bin ſaid: whereby the Senates anſwer and reſolution was the more commended by all men.

The enterprize of Naples being found very difficul: is reiected by the King.

Whithin a while after, matters beginning to turne and change, the French King was aduertized how that the Almans had forſaken his alliance, and were banded againſt him, becauſe he had ſeazed vpon three Imperiall citties, Metz, Thou, and Verdun: that Queene Mary hauing raiſed an army of Flemmings had beſeeged Heſdin: and how that his owne army on the contrary did dayly decay, by reaſon of the contagious ſickeneſſe which was crept into it: whereby he was enforced to leaue the contry of Luxembourg and by breaking off the corſe of his victories to ſend a great part of his forces to winter at home, in their owne houſes, and to leade the reſidew to the frontiers of his Kingdome, to gard it; and in the meane time tenne thouſand Spaniſh foote-men came and ioyned with the Emperor.

The Almans band themſelues againſt the French King concerning Metz Thou, and Verdun.

The Marquis Albert of Brandenbourg, who in the beginning held the kings party, changing his mind, turned with his forces to the Emperors ſide, ſo as by example, diuers of the cheſeſt of Germany did the like, who at the firſt had made ſhew to fauour the King: after-wards they fell at ods with him, becauſe he would not graunt their demands, which were altogether vnreaſonable.

The Emperor being moued by theſe new accidents, reſolued without any more delay to go in perſon with his forces to beſeege the Citty of Metz, notwith-ſtanding that winter drew neare, and that the Caſtle of the Citty, which was great both by ſituation and arte, and excellently well manned with diuers good Captaines, did diſſwade him from that enterprize, together with his owne ſeruants, who were of a contrary opinion: For that action being made out of ſeaſon, had no proſperous ſucceſſe: for after that he had extreamely trauelled his Army, and loſt great numbers of ſoldiors, he was enforced to retire, hauing done more hurt to him-ſelfe then to his enemies. In the meane time an other fire, which had a long time layne raked vp in aſhes, began to breake forth in Italy; for the Siennois being not able to endure the ouer cruell and ſeuere gouernment of the Spaniards, reſoluing to driue them forth of their Citty, ſent meſſengers to Rome to acquaint the French Agents there with their reſolution, crauing their aide and fauour therein, promiſing to keepe their city for the French King. This offer offer, for which diuers ſecret practizes had beene already made in France was willingly entertained, and commandement was forthwith giuen to certaine foot companies of the Kings that lay at Parma and Miranda to goe thither, and preſently after, the Lord of Sanſac went thither to encourage the people, to whoſe aide other forces being brought by the Count Pettillan, the Spaniards were driuen forth of the towne, their fort raſed, and diuers other indignities were committed (ſuch force hath the peoples liberty not being reſtrained by lawes or power of the Magiſtrate) to the diſgrace and contempt of the Emperor, they tore in peeces his Enſignes, brake his priuiledges, and trod his armes vnder their feete, the which did make the matter more odious, and did the more incenſe the Emperour againſt them, who being deſirous not to delay his reuenge vpon the Siennois, nor to ſuffer the French to haue an other place of retreat in Italy, did command Don Petro of Toledo, Viceroy of Naples, to march ſpeedily into Tuſcany with fiue thouſand Almaine and Spaniſh footmen, ſeeing that the Realme of Naples was in no danger to be enuaded, and that he ſhould attempt to reduce Sienna vnder his obedience.

The Emperor ſendeth the Viceroy of Naples againſt Sienna.

It was ſuppoſed that the deſeignes of the French, ſucceeding proſperouſly, would greatly hurt the Emperour. For although the French did publikely ſay that they had taken the defenſe of the city vpon them, to free it from the tyranny and oppreſſion of the Spaniards, and to reſtore it to her former liberty and ſpendor, yet neuertheleſſe, they plainly made ſhew of their meaning therein, in regard, that refuſing all motions of agreement that were propounded, they went about to place their Garriſons in that city for their owne behoofe, and in other places depending thereon, and to leauy forces in Italy for their owne deſeignes: wherevpon the French King craued of the Siennois, that in recompence of their liberty they would declare themſelues friends to his friends and enemies to his enemies. Now the Viceroy being deſirous to execute the Emperors commandement, hauing obtained paſſage through the Churches territories (the Pope ſaying that he had giuen him leaue, by reaſon hee had no meanes to hinder him) entred with his army vpon the Siennois territory, and ſpoyling whatſoeuer he met with, he tooke certaine weake places by a voluntary reddition: for the ſtronge townes were well fortified with men, victuals and all other neceſſaries, ſo that the Imperials would haue ſpent much time in winning them; wherein the Viceroy being very wilfull, beſeeged Montalcina, becauſe if that fort ſhould hold out, Sienna being well prouided of all things would be in leſſe danger. But the Siennois doubt to be ſeuerely puniſhed by the Emperour if hee ſhould take their city, did mighily encourage them to their owne defenſe, together with the hope to bee ſoone rid from the Imperiall army, by reaſon of the Turkiſh and French forces, which were to come into the Realme of Naples.

The Kings demand to the Siennois.

The Viceroy of Naples ſpoileth the country of the Siennois.

The Venetians had done all they could to quench this fire kindled in Italy, fearing, like men that ſaw their neighbor houſes on fire, that it might fall vpon theirs; but by their valor and diſcretion they auoided it. In the meane time a famous Pirate called Muſtapha Biſo ſcouring their ſeas, entred the Adriatticke Gulphe with diuers Fuſts, ſpoyling and robbing whatſoeuer he met with vpon the coaſt of Dalmatia, Criſtofero Canalis Admirall of the Gulphe went forth to meet him with certaine Gallies, and incountring with him, he did brauely aſſaile him, and hauing ſunke all his veſſels, he tooke this Muſtapha, and ſtruck off his head vpon the ſide of his Galley.

Thus ended the yeare 1552. the enſuing yeare was full of warre as well in Tuſcany, as in Piedmond and Picardy, the Emperor making great preparations of men and money to renue the war with the French, that he might recouer his reputation which he ſuppoſed to haue loſt at the ſeege of Metz. At the ſame time, Petro Zene being chiefe of the councell of forty, communicated to the councell of Tenne, that it was neceſſary to reuiue the remembrance and execution of the laſt will will and testament of the Cardinall Zene, who in his time, hauing beene very rich, had left a goodly and honorable Legacy of a yeerly rent of two thousand one hundred Ducats, to the Prince, Signory, and Senate, to forraine Ambassadors, to the Clergy, and diuers others, as is more at large mentioned in his testament, on condition that all of them should be present at the seruice yeerely celebrated in the month of May in Saint Markes Church by his appointment: the which being granted did procure great magnificence to the memory of that great Prelat, and gaue much content to the whole family.

An. 1552.

The counsell of Venice reuiseth the memory and execution of the last will and testament of the Cardinal Zene.

At the same time great troubles arose in England by the death of yong King Edward the sixth, whom his sister Mary succeeded in that Kingdome.

The death of Edward the sixth King of England.

Prince Donato in the meane time, after that he had repaired and embellished the Ducall palace, after the same manner as it is to be seene at this day, and by his example animated diuers Senators to doe the like, departed forth of this life to the great griefe of all men, in the seuenth yeere and sixth month of his principallity, and lieth buried in Saint Maries of Serui.

MARC-ANTONIO TREVISAN sonne to that Dominico Treuisan who was so renowned for his great seruice done to his country, succeeded him after the accustomed manner: He was a man of such integrity and holinesse of life, as they had much to doe to perswade him to accept the dignity; for being a good man and brought vp from his youth in all simplicity, he knew not what ambition did meane. At the last being enforced by his friends, he consented to their pleasure, with as great humillity and modesty as could be desired; so, as being feared and honoured of euery one, he maintained iustice without any parciallity. He found the Republike at peace both at home and abroad, by the discreet gouernment of his predecessors, who had cut off all occasions of warre with forraine Princes, continuing still Newters.

The Duke of Florence sendeth forces against the Senois.

In the meane time, Cosmo Duke of Florence hauing declared himselfe against the Siennois, sent Gionan Giacomo de Medicis, Marquis of Marignan, with Italian & Spanish

Spaniſh forces to aſſaile them. The French King being incenſed there at commanded Pietro Stroſſi his Lieutenant Generall in Italy to beſeege the city of Florence to vſe meanes to take it, and to reſtore it to her former liberty, expelling the Duke: but the Marquis preuenting Stroſſi came with his forces vnlooked for in the night to aſſaile the city of Sienna, and hauing at his firſt arriuall giuen in vpon one of the Gates, the allarme was ſo hot, as euery man ranne thither, whereby he was repulſed and enforced to retire, but with no loſſe of courage, for in his retreate he ſeized on a fort builded with in a Harquebuze ſhot from the walles, which the Lord of Termes had cauſed to be made there for the defenſe of the city, and fortifying himſelfe therein, he could not be driuen thence by any meanes that the Siennois, or Stroſſi could vſe, who vpon the report thereof came ſpeedily to Sienna, where for the ſafety of the city he cauſed an other fort to be built betwixt that of the enemies and the Gate, forth of which they did vſually come to skirmiſh.

Stroſſi after that, marching into the field with certaine troupes, ſurprized Rodolfo Baillon aud Aſcania de la Corne who were going vpon an enterprize againſt Chiuſi, whom he put to rout, ſlew Baillon, and ſent Aſcanio priſoner to the King, who did ranſomleſſe ſet him at liberty.

Thus paſſed this yeere 1553. which was full of warres in ſundry places, the next enſuing was not exempted from it, and yet the Venetians were no way touched therewith being ſpectators of other mens games, they themſelues hauing no hand therein, though warre was very neere them as well in Tuſcany, as in Parma and Mirandola, and afterwards in the Iſle of Corſe againſt the Geneuois the Emperors partiſans. In this manner did the city of Venice enioy an aſſured peace on euery ſide, when on a morning Prince Treuiſan being at Maſſe in the Hall of the Heads, died ſodainely of a faintneſſe that tooke him, proceeding (according to the common report) from to much abſtinence, hauing gouerned eleuen monthes and ſeuen and twenty daies, hee lieth buried in the Church of the Saints Iohn and Paul. An. 1553.

FRANCISCO

FRANCISCO VENIERI a man of ſixty foure yeers old was vpon the eleuenth of Iune choſen in his ſteed. The Republike likewiſe was in his time at peace, whileſt fiers of warre flamed in all places neere vnto them, and that no Prince or common-wealth of Italy but felt the miſery thereof, the armes of the French and the Imperials ranging euery where abroad.

An. 1554. In this ſort was the yeere 1554. ſpent, which in ſundry places was full of warre, deſolation, fiers, ſmoke and aſhes: in the yeere following

An. 1555. The death of Pope Iulius the third. diuers alterations of State were ſeene. For firſt, Pope Iulius the third deceaſed on the three and twentith day of March, whom the Cardinall Marcello Ceruin ſucceeding, who was a Tuſcan by Nation, death within a while after buried both his name and memory.

The election of Pope Paul the fourth. Giouan Pietro Caraffa a Neapolitan, called in former times the Cardinall Theatin, was choſen in his place, who being termed Paul the fourth, did at his entrance put all men in great hope of a good reformation in the Church, and of a generall peace, to which he being not able to induce the Emperor and French King, warre beganne to kindle more then before. Sienna after a long ſeege did, through want of Victuals, yeeld to the Imperials, and yet vpon honorable compoſition which was partly performed, but not altogether.

The Emperor Charles reſigneth all his States to his ſoane Philip, and to his brother Ferdinand The Emperor Charles at the ſame time bending vnder the burthen of worldly affaires, and being diſcontented to ſee that great good fortune which had euer accompanied him in all his haughty enterprizes, to giue place to that of the French King or elſe being touched with ſome remorſe of conſcience for hauing beene the occaſion of ſo much bloudſhed in Chriſtendome, in regard of the length of the ſad precedent warres, ſent for his ſonne Philip forth of England to Bruxels, and reſoluing to quit the Empire, his owne Kingdomes, and honours of this world, did by authenticall letters of the fiue and twentith of October, reſigne vnto him all his Lands and Signories, enioyning all his Eſtates and ſubiects to acknowledge him their true and lawfull King, determining to withdraw himſelfe (as he afterwards did) into a Monaſtery in Spaine, hauing likewiſe renounced the adminiſtration of the Empire to King Ferdinand his brother, and recommended him by letters to all the Princes and Potentates of Germany.

Truce granted and ſoone broken Philip then according to his fathers earneſt exhortation, ſeemed very much to encline to peace, but in regard of the great difficulties which were found therein on either ſide, truce was granted for fiue yeeres, that in the meane time they might haue leiſure to conclude a peace, but this truce likewiſe was as ſoone broken as concluded, being ſuppoſed to haue beene but a falſe baite to delay the prouiſions of the French in Piedmont, whileſt the Duke of Alba ſhould ſet forward, wherevpon warre beganne againe more hotly then before, to the great griefe of all men, which continued the yeere following 1556. in which Prince Venieri being ill diſpoſed of his perſon, and ordinarily ſicke, departed forth of this mortall life, hauing gouerned two yeeres, one month, and one and twenty daies, and is buried in Saint Sauiors Church.

An. 1556.

THE Senate being afterwards aſſembled, according to the vſual manner, did in his ſtead elect Lorenzo Priuli, a man wiſe and learned. At the beginning of his principallity the plague beganne to ſhew it ſelfe, which within a while after ceaſed by the dilligence and induſtry of Petro Moſto the Senator, deputed at that time to the office of La Sanita. The peſtilence was followed by a dearth and want of victuals, proceeding from a ſuſpition that the ſickneſſe ſtill con tinued, by meanes whereof ſtrangers did no more bring any thing to the city.

The Pope an enemy to the Spaniards.

At the ſame time Pope Paul the fourth a bad friend to the Spaniards, did impriſon in Caſtle Saint Angelo, the Cardinall Santa Fior, Camillo Colonna, Iuliano Cæſarin, and the Abbot of Breſegna, all of them enemies to the houſe of France, for ſecret aſſemblies which they made in Rome in the houſes of Marc-Antonio Colonna and that Cardinall Marc-Antonio eſcaping went to the King of Spaine, who preſently commanded the Duke of Alua to releeue them.

The Duke of Alua taketh diuers townes from the Pope.

This Duke being Viceroy of Naples, was greeued to ſee the Pope openly to purſue the Roman Lords Spaines partizans, and being deſirous to obey the King his Maſters commandement, marched into the field, and tooke from the Pope neere to Rome, Agnane, Pilaſtrina, Segna, Tiuoli, and laſt of all Oſtia, whereby he did cut off victuals from the Romans, he on the ſide, and the Colonneſſi on the other keeping the Pope in this manner ſhut vp within the circuit of his walles.

The Venetians being entreated by the Pope vſe meanes to pacifie the Duke of Alua.

The Pope made meanes to the French King, ſending the Cardinall Caraffa his Nephew vnto him, his Maieſty wrote to the Marſhall Stoſſi who then lay in Tuſcany to march thitherwards and to expect aide which the Duke of Guiſe ſhould bring him. His Holineſſe did likewiſe ſend to Venice to moeue the Senate to aide him. The Senators being greeued for the Popes troubles, and deſyring to haue him at quiet, ſent Phœbe Capello, a very wiſe & diſcreet Secretary to the Duke of Alua, to pacifie the matter if it were poſſible.

Philip King of Spaine in the meane time perceiuing this warre to be backed by by the French, and that thereby it was likely to prooue more dangerous in regard of the intelligences and partiallities which they had in Italy, did receiue Duke Octauio of Parma into fauor, restoring to him the city of Placentia and all other places nere adioyning which he had seized: in regard whereof, this Duke embraced the Spanish party, to the Popes great discontent, who said, that a Prince feudatary of the Church, as he was, ought not to make an accord with his enemies without his leaue, whereupon, he caused him to be cited to Rome, together with the Cardinal Farneze his brother.

Octauio Farneze restored to his Dutchy.

The Duke of Guise about the same time came from France into Italy, which was at the beginning of the yeere 1557. with fifteene thousand footmen, eight hundred men at armes, and twelue hundred light horse, to aide the Pope against the Imperials, with whom within a while after Strossi, Monluc and others, (who by the Kings commandement were gonne before to Rome with six hundred horse and fiue thousand foot) ioyned themselues.

An. 1557. The Duke of Guise commeth into Italy.

Vpon the report of the arriuall of these forces, the Duke of Alua had retired himselfe to the frontiers of the Realme of Naples, by his retreat opening a way to Rome for the Duke of Guise, who presently went thither, vpon hope to finde great forces ready there, according to the accord concluded betwixt the Pope, the King, and the Duke of Ferrara, but finding none at all there, he went into La Marca, where the Marquis of Montebel came vnto him with the Churches forces, and from thence they marched into the Realme of Naples where they stayed not long, by reason that the aide came not which the Cardinall Caraffa had promised to the King, and because the French army for want of pay did dayly decrease, and on the contrary, that of the Duke of Alua did encrease: whereupon, the Duke of Guise returning to La Marca, and afterwards going to Rome to talke with the Pope, perceiuing the small meanes his Holinesse had to make warre, and the great pursuite made by the Duke of Alua, hee aduized him to harken vnto peace and agreement with the Spaniard, resoluing to returne into France. For at Rome hee receiued letters from the King bearing newes of the losse of the battaile of Saint Laurence, and of the taking of Saint Quintins by the Spaniards, with commandement presently to returne into France; the Duke of Guise being willing to obey, tooke his leaue of his Holinesse, and went forward on his iourney home-ward, the Pope determining to follow his councell.

The losse of the battaile of Saint Lawrence, and the towne of Saint Quintins.

During this warre against the Pope, The Venetians and Cosmo Duke of Florence, had solicited King Philip and the Duke of Alua, to make an accord with his Holinesse, either of them answered that they had not taken armes to take from him any thing that was his, but only to defend the Realme of Naples, and that they had made warre in an enemies country to defend their owne subiects; and therefore so soone as his Holinesse should leaue his confederacy with the French, and the resolution of making himselfe master of the Realme of Naples, they would yeeld him the obedience due to the soueraigne pastor of Christendome, and would restore whatsoeuer they had taken from him during that warre: to which the Pope giuing eare, the Cardinall Caraffa with certaine others went to the Duke of Alua to treat of peace, the which was easily granted with restitution on all sides of places taken in the warre, the Duke of Ferrara being therein comprehended.

The Spaniards demands vpon the treaty of peace with the Pope.

Peace betwixt the Pope and Spaniards.

The Senate to mediate this agreement, sent Marc-Antonio de Franceschis thither, who was Secretary to the Common-wealth, a very wise and discreet man, who stirred not from thence till the finall conclusion thereof. In the meane time two hundred Turkish Gallies returning from the coast of Calabria, did cast anchor at La Valona, and did in no sort hurt the lands belonging to the Venetians.

Within a while after the two sonnes of Soliman, Selim and Baiazet, tooke armes armes againſt one an other in Aſia, and becauſe the father did moſt fauour the elder brother Selim, the other was enforced to haue recourſe to Tamas King of Perſia, who in hatred to Soliman did willingly aide him, and giuing him great forces, the two brethren ioyned their battaile, which continuing a day and a night, Selim was victor, his brother being fled from the battaile hurt, and more then forty thouſand Mahometans one either ſide ſlaine in the place.

Warres betwixt Solimans two ſonnes.

The Senate on the other ſide being ſtill deſirous to continue their ancient cuſtomes and alliances, ſent Gionan Capello Knight, and Bernardo Nouagera Ambaſſadors to the Emperor Ferdinand to congratulate his promotion to the Empire (as hath beene ſaid) and Paulo Tepulo to King Philip.

This was at the latter end of the yeere: the next, 1558. bred great warres both in France, Piedmont and Tuſcany, together with the death of Princes and Princeſſes. For ſo ſoone as the Duke of Guiſe returned into France, hee executed the enterprize of Calais, a long time before determined of, and reduced vnder the Kings ſubiection the country of Oye, and all the forts which the Engliſh held there: the Duke of Neuers on the other ſide tooke diuers places in the country of Luxembourg, as Herbemont, the forts of Iamoigne, Chygni, Roſſignoll, Villeneuſe and diuers others.

An. 1558.

The taking of Calais.

This happy ſucceſſe did change the French mens ſorrow into gladneſſe (their hearts ſtill panting for that red and bloudy battaile of Saint Lawrence) and chiefly at Court, where the ioy was doubled, in regard of the marriage of Francis Daulphin of Viennois with Mary Steward Queene and Inheretrix of Scotland, daughter to Iames the fifth and Mary of Lorraine, daughter to Claude Duke of Guiſe, and that of Charles Duke of Lorraine, with Claude the younger daughter of France. This ioy was accompanied with an other, by reaſon of the taking of Thyonuille, which after a long battery of fiue & thirty great peeces of ordnance, was yeelded vpon compoſition. Great preparations for warre being after this manner dayly made, Almighty God tooke pitty on the people and raiſed vp Mediators of peace betwixt thoſe two great Kings, the which at that time tooke no effect, in regard of the great difficulties which were preſented. But the death of Charles the fift happening in Spaine, and that of his two ſiſters, Elenor Queene Dowager of France, and Queene Mary Dowager of Hungary, who accompanied him, Mary Queene of England died ſoone after, which procured the accompliſhment of the peace, turning the bitterneſſe of the precedent warres into a pleaſing ſweetneſſe of accord, by meanes of the alliances made the yeere following 1559. For as the Commiſſioners of both Kings did treat together, the death of Charles the fifth happening in September, and that of Queene Mary of England in Nouember, altered the place and time of that concluſion.

Francis Daulphin of Viennois marrieth the Queene of Scots.

The French take Thyonuille

An. 1559.

Peace was concluded in the caſtle of Cambreſis, by meanes of the marriages of Philip with Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter to King Henry, and of Philibert Emanuel Duke of Sauoy with the Lady Marguerite the Kings only ſiſter, who rendred backe to the Spaniard whatſoeuer he had taken from him, and to the Duke, Sauoy and Piedmont, and to the Genevois Corſica. But whileſt the nuptials of the Kings daughter and ſiſter were celebrated at Paris with all ſports and delights that might be imagined, this pleaſant Commedy was turned into a mourn'full and lamentable tragedy, by King Henries death, who being at tilt ſtricken into the eye with a ſplinter of a Lance, died, the eleuenth day after his hurt.

Peace concluded betwixt the French and Spaniſh Kings.

But to retutne to the Venetians, great numbers of pirats did at the ſame time ſcoure the Adriattick ſea, and by their vſuall ſpoiles and incurſions did great harme on the ſea coaſt of Dalmatia and Hiſtria. Matteo Bembo, a diſcreet perſon and well experienced in many matters and Generall of the Venetians nauall army, came forth of the Gulph of Corfou with twelue Gallies, and with great ſpeed purſued thoſe Rouers, gaue them chaſe, and did greatly moleſt them, who eſcaping into the Hauen of Durazzo, thoſe of the [illegible]

Hiſtorie

The Pirates pursued by Bembo saue inconsolues in Durazzo.

their behalfe, Bembo being incenſed thereat, not regarding the peace which the Venetians had with Soliman, diſcharged his Cannons vpon the cities walles where ſome of the inhabitants were ſlaine and yet he could not ſeize on the Pirats. The Turke tooke this battery and manner of proceeding in very bad part, and determined to reuenge it: the Venetians, conſidering the loſſes and harme that might ariſe if they ſhould breake peace with ſo potent a Lord, did appeaſe him both by preſents and excuſes, baniſhing Bembo from their State, being not able to apprehend him, that they might giue him an exemplary puniſhment, which did the more coole and appeaſe Soliman. On the other ſide by the death of Mary Queene of England Elizabeth her ſiſter, obtained the crowne. To Henry the ſecond ſucceeded Francis the ſecond Daulphin of Viennois his eldeſt ſonne of the age of ſixteene yeeres. At the ſame time died Pope Paul the fourth, who being extreamly hated of the Roman people, as well for the behauiour of his Nephewes, as for the Inquiſition which he had eſtabliſhed in Rome, before he had ſcarce giuen vp the ghoſt, the people aroſe, and being led by the chiefeſt of thoſe that beene iniured by him, ranne to the palace of the Inquiſition, from whence with their ſwords hauing driuen the Monkes, they opened the priſons and ſet all the priſoners at liberty: the like did they to all the other priſons in Rome, then they went to the Capitoll, where finding the brazen Statue which the Romans had erected in honour of the Pope at the beginning of his papacy in regard of the good offices he had done them, they brake it in peeces, and drag'd the head diuided from the body through the dirt and mire of the city, that done, they threw it into Tiber.

The death of Pope Paul the fourth.

A Popular commotion in Rome.

Venetian Ambaſſadors to the French King.

The Venetians ſent their Ambaſſadors to the new French King to congratulate (according to their manner) his comming to the crowne. Nicolo de Pont Doctor and Knight, and Bernardo Nouagera were appointed to that end: and within a while after the Prince falling ſicke deceaſed, to the griefe of all men, in regard of his integrity and learning: he was buried in Saint Dominikes Church in the monument of his anceſtors. Then by the example of former times, they choſe Ieronimo Priuli brother to the deceaſed Duke, a man very famous and of great Maieſty.

AT

AT the beginning of his gouernment, Giouan Angelo de Medicis a Milanois, brother to the late Marquis of Marignan was choſen Pope to the great contentment of all the Romans, taking vpon him the name of Pius the fourth, which was at the latter end of the yeere 1559. who to make his actions conformable to his name, pardoned the people of Rome the commotion and mutiny made by them againſt his predeceſſor: then ſeeing all Chriſtendome at peace, he tooke order that the generall councell begunne at Trent, and broken off afterwards, by reaſon of the warres, ſhould be reuiued. And although he was by nature meeke and gentle, yet neuertheleſſe beeing enforced, by the great complaints made vnto him againſt his predeceſſors Nephewes, who during their vncles Papacy had committed infinite extortions, hee impriſoned Charles and Alphonſo Caraffi Cardinals, the Duke of Palliano brother to Charles, and two others of their nere kinſmen, who, their proceſſe hauing beene made, and conſidered by Iudges deputed to that end, being found guilty of ſundry bad crimes, the Cardinall Charles was ſtrangled in Caſtle Saint Angelo, and forthwith buried, the Duke of Palliano with his other kinſmen were beheaded in the tower of Nona, and ſhewne afterwards in publike, and Cardinall Alphonſo as leaſt culpable, was ſent home to his owne houſe by meanes of a pecuniary amends which hee paied, and the office of Chamberlaine was taken from him.

The creation of Pope Pius the fourth.

The Cardinall Caraffa and three of his kinſmen are put to death.

About the ſame time died that famous Prince Andrew Doria, being foure ſcore and thirteene yeeres of age, famous as well for the great enterpriſes he executed, as for reſtoring the city of Genoa, his natiue country, to the liberty it enioyeth at this day.

The death of Andre Doria.

The Venetians in the meane time beeing vnwilling to bee ſurprized, if they ſhould happen to be enforced to take armes, receiued into their pay Sforza Palauicin Marquis Cortemajor a very famous captaine: then they ſent Ieronimo Grimani, Ieronimo Zene, and Marc-Antonio de Mulla Ambaſſadors to Pope Pius the 4. an inward friend to the Common-wealth, who entertained them very louingly: and hauing giuen them audience in the Chamber of Kings, hee did greatly commend the Republike, promiſing to fauor and augment it with all his power, who being deſirous to roote out hereſies, which on euery ſide troubled the Catholike Religion, did by his briefe cauſe the Generall councell to be publiſhed at Trent in the Octaues of Eaſter of the yeere following, exhorting the Prelats to come thither and Chriſtian Princes either to come or ſend their Ambaſſadors.

The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the Pope.

The ouerture of the councell of Trent.

In this manner ended the yeere 1560. wherein Francis the ſecond French King deceaſed, and Charles Maximillian Duke of Orleance his brother ſucceeded him in the Kingdome of France, being twelue yeeres of age, and was called Charles the ninth.

An. 1560. Charles the ninth French King.

In this meane time the ouerture of the councell ſtill continued at Trent, whither the Pope ſent ſeuen of the chiefe of the Colledge of Cardinals famous both for learning and good life, namely, Hercules Gonzaga of Mantua, Ieronimo Seripand the Neapolitan, Giouan Moron of Milan, Staniſlaus Hoſius a Polander, Lodouico Simonete a Milanois, Marc-Sitic a German, and Bernardo Nauigera a Venetian. The Emperor likewiſe ſent his Ambaſſadors thither, who were Sigiſmond Thuonius Archbiſhop of Trent, and Antony Muglitius of Morauia, Archbiſhop of Caſurgia. Thoſe of the French King were, Regnard Ferrier a very learned man, and well ſeene in the tongues, and Lewis of Saint Gelais, Lord of Lanſac, Knight of honour to the Queene the Kings mother. For Philip King of Spaine there was Claudio Fernandes Earle of Lunel a very noble perſon: and for the King of Poland Valentine Herbutus a Polonois.

The Cardinals ſent by the Pope to the councell.

The Venetians sent thither Nicolo de Ponte, and Matteo Dandulo, men much renowned for their singular learning and knowledge in many matters: they were accompanied by Antonio Milledonna the Secretary, a man of so rare & excellent a wit, as being employed in some actions in that holy assembly, he made him selfe to be admired of all men.

Toward the latter end of the same yeere the last Session of the General Councell was held at Trent, and about the beginning of the yeere following, that which had there beene concluded, was sollemnly published, and sent to Rome to Pope Pius the fourth, who in the open consistory of Cardinals accepted and ratified it, commanding it to be receiued ouer all Christendome.

The Venetian Prelats that were present at the councell of Trent.

At this councell were present, diuers great Prelats of the Venetians State, aliborne at Venice, namely, Bernardo Nauagera Cardinall, and Legat in the councell, in stead of Seripand who died there, Giouan Treuisan Patriarke of Venice, Daniele Barbaro chosen Patriarke of Aquileia, Pietro Lande Archbishop of Candie, Marco Cornare Archbishop of Spalatra, Philippo Moceniga Archbishop of Cyprus, Antonio Coceo Archbishop of Corfou, and afterwards clarke of the Chamber, Lodouico Pisani the Bishop of Padua and afterwards Cardinal, Georgio Cornare, Bishop of Treuiso, Iulio Contaren Bishop of Bellun, Tomaso, Bishop of Cap-Histria, Giouan Francisco Commendune Bishop of Zant and Cefalonia, and afterwards Cardinall, Pietro Barbarico Bishop of Cursoles, Pietro Contaren Bishop of Bassus, Dominico Bolano Bishop of Bressia, Federico Cornare, Bishop of Bergamo, André Moceniga, Bishop of Himosia, Ieronimo Treuisan Bishop of Verona, Ieronimo Ragazzone Bishop of Famagosta, Matteo de Priuli, Bishop of Vincenza, Francisco Contaren, chosen Bishop of Baffus, Giouan Delfino Bishop of Torcelles, and Ieronimo Vielmo, Bishop of Citta-noua, all men of singular knowledge, and admirable learning.

At the beginning of the councell there arose a controuersie (which did greatly trouble the Pope) betwixt the Ambassadours of France and Spaine, about precedency, each of those Kings beeing desirous to haue their Ambassadoars to take the chiefest place next to the Emperours Ambassadour: King Philip sent word to the Pope, that his pleasure was to haue the chiefe place assigned to his Ambassadour, or otherwise, hee gaue him to vnderstand, that hee would not onely call home his Ambassadour from the Councell, but likewise all his subiects: King Charles protested against it, saying, That if they went about to doe him that wrong to take from him the place and ranke which his predecessors had euer held, as well in regard of their nobillity and antiquity, as for the great benifits which the Church of Rome had receiued from them, hee would not onely call home his Ambassadours, but himselfe, together with his whole Kingdome, would depart from the obedience of the sea Apostolike.

The Pope ends the controuersie betwixt the Ambassadors of France and Spaine.

The Pope to preuent the inconueniences that might arise thereby, did decree, by the aduise of the consistory of Cardinals, That the French Ambassadour should keepe his vsuall ranke and place, and that hee of Spaine (to giue some satisfaction likewise to that King) should sit in the middest of the Cardinals below the Priests, and aboue the Deacons, by meanes whereof the whole matter was pacified.

A strange accident at Rome.

About the same time there happened a very strange accident at Rome, the like whereof had neuer before beene seene, which was thus: certaine young men of verie good place, beeing prouoked by a vision, which they said they had receiued from Angelles, how that to the Pope then liuing an other diuine Pope should succeed him, who should bee the onely Monarke of the world, commanding both the Spirituall and Temporall iurisdiction, and should bring all men to the knowledge of the true God, and they being desirous to haue it

it ſodainely come to paſſe, not tarrying till the Pope ſhould die his naturall death, reſolued to diſpatch and kill him, whileſt (as his manner was) hee ſhould giue audience, and one of their number called Benedetto Accolio tooke vpon him to ſtrike him, as hee ſhould read a ſupplication that hee would preſent vnto him, but when it came to the execution, ſo great feare and amazement ſeized on him, as hee withdrew himſelfe all trembling, wherevpon, one of the conſpirators fearing leaſt that they ſhould bee diſcouered, went preſently to the Pope and opened the whole complot to him, ſo as they were all apprehended, and publikely executed.

The Venetians chaſe away the Pirats.

In other places great numbers of pirats ſcoured the Adriattick ſeas, ſo that nothing could eſcape their hands, comming euen as farre as Chioggia. The Venetians diſdayning theſe incurſions, ſent Chriſtofero Canalis againſt them, who departing cheerefully from Venice with foure Gallies, did ſo narrowly purſue them, as he tooke part of them, whom he forthwith hanged, and chaſed away the reſt, ſo as by that meanes the nauigation was aſſured.

Maximilian Emperor in his fathers ſtead.

Toward the latter end of this yeere the Emperour Ferdinand died, whom his ſonne Maximilian, before crowned King of the Romans, ſucceeded, who ſo ſoone as his fathers funeralls were ended, did forthwith march againſt the Tranſiluanian, to reuenge the wrongs which he ſaid he had done him in his Realme of Hungary, determining hotly to purſue him, but the Tranſiluanian being backt by the Turke, enforced the Emperour to retire.

The end of the ſixth Boke of the ſixth Decade.

The Contents of the ſeuenth Booke of the ſixth Decade.

THE great hurt cauſed by the Inquiſition after the manner of Spaine. The Venetians beeing ſolicited by Pope Pius the fourth to receiue it, doe excuſe themſelues becauſe they would not trouble their Dominions with it. The death of Pope Pius the fourth with the election of Pope Pius the fifth. The death of Soliman before Zighet, which is concealed by Mahomet Baſcha. Selim ſucceedeth Soliman. The ceremony which is vſed in bringing Ambaſſadours into the preſence of the great Lord, with the forme of the oth which hee vſeth to make. The firſt motion of the enterpriſe of Cyprus by the Turkes. And laſtly Selims reſolution to inuade the Iſle of Cyprus.

The ſeuenth Booke of the ſixt Decade of the History of Venice.

An. 1565.

The great harme with the Inquiſition doth after the manner of Spaine.

THE Pope being deſirous at the beginning of the yeere 1565. to pluckvp by the roots al hereſies forth of Italy, & to diue into the very ſecret thoughts of men, fearing leaſt that Prouince ſhould embrace hereſies like others, did throw it head-long into very great and difficult Labirinths, which had almoſt cauſed an inteſtine warre in the country. For he procured King Philip to eſtabliſh the Inquiſition after the manner of Spaine in Milan, namely this ſharpe ſharpe and cruell inquiſition, by which the conuicted do looſe both liues and goods, to the great hinderance and vndoing of their heires.

Now King Phillip hauing written to the Senate of Milan that his pleaſure was to haue the Inquiſition of Spayne receiued into the Citty, all the People began to mutine, and take armes againſt the Spaniſh officers that went about to introduce it: which the Senate of Milan perceiuing made anſwer to him that brought the Kings commandement, that they were ready to obey whatſoeuer his Maieſty ſhould pleaſe to command, and that they would take order to haue his will performed in euery point: yet neuerthe leſſe they were not of opinion to haue that commandement to take place as then, in regard of the Kings profit, as well becauſe thoſe rigorous lawes were needleſſe in Milan, by reaſon that the Inquiſitors would know all matters, though diſtinct and diuided, from al cuſtomes and lawes as alſo for that the Citty of Milan, and all Italy in generall did deteſt that new manner of proceeding, which might in the end breed much hurt: That it was not good, eſpecially in theſe times, ful of miſeries and calamities, to put good men and a warlike people into deſperation, for feare of the miſcheeſes which might enſue thereof, which could in no ſort profit his maieſty. This diſcreet anſwere of the Milan Senate, did change King Phillips determination, who reuoking his Edict, did greatly aſſure and confirme the Milanois.

The Senate of Milans anſwer to the King of Spaine concerning the Inquiſition.

The Pope perceiuing that his deſeigne had taken none effect at Milan as he deſired, he did by letters exhort the Venetians thereynto, entreated, and in a manner went about to enforce them to embrace that nouelty. The Venetians beeing wiſe and diſcreet, after they had maturely conſidered the buſineſſe, together with the great danger they were like to incurre, if they ſhould permit ſuch cruelty to take place in their Townes and Citties (in regard that the Realme of Naples for the ſelfe ſame matter, had in a manner reuolted from the Emperor, and the Milanois had brauely impugned it,) they being vnwilling openly to ſeeme to deny the Pope, nor likewiſe to grant his requeſt ſo dangerous vnto them, delayed as much as they could to make him an anſwere.

The Venetians anſwer to the Pope.

But his Nuncio ſtill vrging them more and more to grant the Popes demand, the Senate was aſſembled for that buſineſſe, where after ſundry opinions had beene propounded, they dilligently conſidered the diſcomodities which might ariſe vnto them by means of the Popes wrath and indignation, if they ſhould refuſe him, who being already not very wel affected to the Common-wealth, would be the more enflamed againſt them: On the other ſide they did repreſent before their eyes, how that the wretchedeſt of al others was a ciuill and domeſtick war, whereby the Republick did weaken her owne forces, which were ſooner raiſed, then pacified.

Therefore the Senate, all this being well examined, made the Pope an anſwer full of meekneſſe and humility: how that it was of opinion by rigorous and ſharp puniſhment to extirpate all execrable hereſies: but that it was not ſeemely to deprine children, guiltleſſe of that crime of their fathers ſucceſſions, ſeeing that they had Citties very zealous of Catholick Religion, which had no need of ſuch great rigor and iuſtice: yet they would take order, that thoſe who ſhould be conuicted of Hereſy ſhould abiure their errors, or elſe, ſhould be puniſhed with death according to the manner of their Iuſtice.

The Death of Pope Pius quartus, and the election of Pius quintus

About the latter end of this yeare dyed Pope Pius Quartus in the ſixth yeare of his Papacy, vnto whom ſucceeded, at the beginning of the yeare 1566. Frier Michaell Giſeleo of the order of Saint Dominick, called the Cardinal Alexandrine, who tooke vpon him the name of Pius Quintus

The death of Soliman before Zighet.

Soliman lying at the ſeege of Zighet, and beeing inraged to ſee a handfull of Chriſtans ſo brauely to reſiſt the great numbers of his ſoldiers, this diſdaine and rage did ſo alter him, as it brought him to a flixe, which killed him on the fift day of September: but his death was in ſuch ſort concealed by Mahomet Baſcha, who next next him was the cheifest man in the Army, as the Turkes knew it not, fearing (as it was likely) that the newes of the great Lords death, would be the cause of the ruine of the whole Army, Selim his sonne succeeded him in the Otoman Empire.

The Venetians send Ambassadors to Selim the new Emperor.

But to returne to the Venetians, of whom our meaning is cheifly to speake, certaine monethes after that this new Emperor of Turkes was installed in his Empire, and that from all parts Ambassadors were sent vnto him to congratulate his happy comming to the Crowne, they appointed Marin Caballo, a nobleman, and excellently well seene in the knowledge of diuers things, being both learned and ritch, to goe and reioyce with him likewise in the Common wealthes name for his aduancement to the Empire, and afterwards to confirme the ancient Articles of peace and alliance which they had made with his father Soliman: the which that hee might obtaine with more ease, hee tooke along with him the presents which Ambassadors were wont for to carry to the new Emperors. But whilest he prepared for his iourney, it happened, that one called Iohn Miches a Iew by nation, a great fauorite of Selims, a man of an euill disposition, and who had turned Turke, for a certaine wonderfull pollicy, did continually sollicite Selim against the Duke of Necsia, (one of the Islands Ciclades, descended from the race of Crispes, and was the one & twentieth Duke of that Island) to bereaue him of his Principallity, hoping (as it came to passe) that he being driuen thence, easily to obtaine it for himselfe.

A mischeuous practise of a reuoulted Iew.

This Duke beeing aduertised of the practises which were wrought against him, went to Constantinople to iustifie his cause, where, knowing that the fauour and friendship of the great Lords Councellors is bestowed on such as giue most for it, he carried with him fifteene thousand Crownes to bestow among them, hoping by that money to winne those of the Councell to his side, but at his arriuall the laid hands on him, and being committed to prison, he lost at one time both his money, and all the wealth he had.

At last beeing set at liberty as innocent, and hauing committed no fault at all, he could neuer afterwards recouer his principallity, so as beeing reduced to extreame pouerty he came to Venice. The Venetians taking pitty on that honest man, who by the mallice and enuy of that Iew was fallen into such misery and calamity, and not through his owne fault, were very liberall to him: the like did the Pope when he came to Rome.

By this time Marin Caballo, who was appointed by the Senate (as hath beene said) to goe Ambassador to Selim, was ready, who departed from Venice, and with a faire and gentle wind sailed towards Constantinople, where at his first arriuall he treated (according to the vse) with the cheife of the great Lords Councell: (for no stranger is admitted to speake with the Emperor, till such time as his demaund be determined and concluded by them) but he had much to doe to obtaine that which he demanded, those Councellors feigning that Selim the new Emperor refused to confirme their aliance, which was only to draw greater guifts from them, which they did: for the Ambassador hauing giuen them many other great presents he did at length procure the Councellors, to consent to the conditions of peace and freindship: then hee was brought in by the Captaine of the Port, and led by the Armes to kisse the Emperors hand, the like did diuers young Gentlemen which had accompanied the Ambassador: but they were led in another fashion: for two Turkes held each of them by the armes, and brought them as prisoners, who did not Kisse the Emperors hand, but his knees, that doon, they returned, and went backward, their faces being still turned towards the Emperor. These young Gentlemen being led forth of the roome, not any Christian remained in Selims Chamber, but only the Ambassador, who spake breefely vnto him in this manner.

The Ceremony of bringing Ambassadors to the great Lord

As

As much greeſe (moſt gracious Emperor(as our Venetian Common-wealth, highly affected to the Ottomans, hath receiued by the death of Soliman that glorious and moſt wiſe Emperor, euen ſo much ioy and contentment hath it, to vnderſtand that the diuine power hath raiſed you to ſuch a dignity and placed you in the throne belonging to the famous and moſt iuſt family of the Ottomans. For it is moſt certaine that the ſoule of Soliman doth at this preſent glory, not only for that it did ſo much ſurpaſſe all men in good hap and glory for high enterpriſes, in wiſdome and knowledge of diuers things, for being meeke and gentle to the humble, liberall to his freinds, and faithfull to his allies; but much more for leauing you his ſonne behind him, farre more excellent then himſelfe. For hee hauiug beene euer inuincible, and hauing neuer giuen place to any man, is not only at this preſent ioyfull, but likewiſe accounteth himſelfe more honored for being ſurmounted and ouercome by his ſonne in all vertues belonging to an Emperor. The excellency of ſo many great Emperors your Aunceſtors doe inuite vs, nay rather doe enforce vs, (moſt mighty Emperor) to expect as much from you, the glory of the Ottomans, the high attempts of your progenitors, euery where ſo much renowned doth draw vs thereunto, and the fame of your fore fathers, continued for ſo many yeares without intermiſſion doth confirme it to vs. Theſe things beeing thus, the Venetian Senate hath ſent mee hether to confirme and eſtabliſh the ſame friendſhip and alliance which hath euer beene betwixt the Ottoman Emperots & our Republicke, and this amity with your moſt excellent maieſty, ought to bee ſo much the more pleaſing vnto you, by how much it is more ancient, confirmed by ſundry good offices on either part, and continued for ſo many yeares. For in very deed all worldly things doe by long tract of time corrupt and grow weake, and ſtill new things are found beſt, but freindſhip which is a ſacred & diuine thing, and which can not be but among good and iuſt men, the older it is, ſo much more perfect and durable is it. Our Republick then being mooued by theſe reaſons, doth continually pray vnto Almighty God for your health and proſperity.

The Venetian Ambaſſadors Oration to the Emperor.

The Ambaſſador hauing ended his ſpeech, Selim ſwore a ſollemne oath, and ratifyed that which was written in his Patents ſealed with his ſeale. The forme of Selims oth was thus, I ſweare & promiſe by the eternall God creator of Heauen & Earth, by the ſoules of the Seauenty Prophets, by mine owne ſoule, and thoſe of all mine Aunceſtors, to obſerue from point to point all the rightes of alliance and freindſhip maintained vntill this preſent, and to keepe them ſacred and inuiolable, in the ſame manner as they are confirmed by my ſeale. Selim as the Ambaſſador was taking his leaue, anſwered him in few words badly poliſhed, but yet full of all curteſie and humanity.

Selim ratifieth the Venetians alliance.

Gaballus departing from the great Lords Pallace, and mounting his horſe, was conducted by the Ianiſſaries (vnto whom before hee had audience he had giuen guifts) to his owne lodging; then preparing for his returne to Venice, the Baſchaes of the Councell vſed him with great curteſie and liberality, giuing him ſumptuous garments, Terra Sigillata; Balſamum, and diuers other pretious things; ſomtimes likewiſe they doe vſe to feaſt and banquet one an other.

The forme of the great Lords oath.

At the ſame time ſuch numbers of Pirates, did ſcoure the ſea-coaſts of Dalmatia, as men could not liue ſafly in their own houſes they did not only rob thoſe whom they encountred at Sea after the maner of Pirats, but did likewiſe come on ſhore, putting all to fier and ſword, killing old men and young Children: carrying away with them Men, Women & Cattail. The Venetians were not able to indure that inſolency, but did on a ſuddaine arme forty Gallies vnder the command of Hermolao Tepulo, whereof theſe Pirates beeing aduertized, departed ſpeedily from thence, and left the Prouince in quiet. In the meane time Ieronimo Priuli dyed, hauing governed eight yeares, eleuen monethes and foure dayes, and was honorably buried in Saint Dominicks Church in the monument of his Aunceſtors.

The Venetians do purge the Seas of Pirats.

PIETRO

PIETRO LOREDANO, a renowned and excellent Senator, was choſen in his ſteed on the 26. of Nouember, all men hoping that his gouernment would procure great commodity to the common-wealth, and ſo ended the yeare 1567. Not long after the Arcenall of Venice was ſet on fire, which was feareſull for the noyce it made, it beeing heard many miles off: after which followed an intollerable dearth, ſo as for the peoples relieſe they were enforced to imploy the munitions which were reſerued for the fleetes.

The Arcenall of Venice, burnt.

Theſe two inconueniences happening one after an other in the citty, did prouoke the Turke to make an attempt vpon the Iſle of Cyprus, beeing vrged therevnto by Iohn Miches, who of a Iew beeing become Turke, could doe much with Selim (as hath beene ſaid). This man, the better to perſwade him to the enterprize of Cyprus, did acquaint him with the aduertiſement which he had receiued from the Iewes at Venice, how the Arcenall had beene burned on the third day of September 1569. where all the munitions had beene for the moſt part ſpoiled and loſt, together with the great dearth which had followed that loſſe, wherewith the citty was ſtill afflicted.

The firſt motion of the enterprize of Cyprus for the Turke.

Selim who long before then had beene deſirous to ſeaze vpon that Iſland, and to take it from the Venetians, and who for that purpoſe, had in the yeare 1567. ſecretly ſent to the Duke of Sauoy, to incite him to recouer that Iſland, which did of right belong vnto him, promiſing him all ayde and ſuccour, and to make him quiet poſſeſſor thereof; but the Duke giuing no eare therevnto, hee himſelfe reſolued to haue it by all meanes. As alſo becauſe he beeing deſirous to build a Meſquite (for no great Lord is truly proclaimed Emperor, vntill hee haue builded one, and endowed it with reuenues) was diſwaded from it: their Muſti, (who among them is as the Pope with vs) ſaying that hee could not doe it, till hee had made ſome great enterpriſe againſt Chriſtians, to the augmenting of his religion and Empire, and hauing made a conqueſt, to endow it with the wealth thereof, it beeing no way lawfull for the great Lord to build a Meſquite with the reuenue of the Empire, or that of the Caſnata (which is like to the Chamber of accounts in France) but onely with that of the countrey conquered by him.

Hee

He hauing along time debated theſe reaſons with him-ſelfe, did at laſt reſolue to communicate the matters to his Baſchas. And departing from Conſtantinople in the moneth of Nouember, the third yeare of his Empire with his cheefe Baſchas to ride on hunting, (the Turkes terme it the councell on horſe backe) hee began to acquaint them with that enterprize.

Selim communicateth the enterpriſe of Cyprus to his Baſchas.

Mahomet as Viſier Baſcha began cunningly to diſwade him from it, as well for the loue he did beare to Chriſtians, as for the great profit which he ordinarily receaued from the Venetians, telling him that vpon what occaſion ſoeuer hee was moued to take armes, either for Religion, Empire, or for glory, he ought by no meanes to breake with the Venetians, whoſe friendſhip had been euer proffitable for their nation: That he ought rather to attempt to releeue the Moores of Granado, as a matter more beſeeming the greatneſſe, wherein by the grace of the great Prophet Mahomet the Ottaman Emperors were ſeated, not to abandon the defence of thoſe, who by an holy and conſtant reſolution had neuer forſaken the Mahometan religion: That it was likewiſe neceſſary for the power and ſafty of his Empire, & for the glory which Selim ſeemed ſo much to deſire, not to ſuffer any one Potentate to grow too great, but preſently to abaſe thoſe which might make head againſt the power of the Ottamans, ſuch as was that of the king of Spaine, which though it would be a difficult enterprize, would neuer-the-leſſe be full of glory and great hope. Therefore he beſought him to acknowledge and make good vſe of that great occaſion which God offered him, to preſerue the faithfull Muſulmans, to moleſt his enemies, and to open to him ſelfe a way to great and glorious conqueſts.

The counſell of Mahomet the Viſier Baſcha.

The other Baſchas Piali and Muſtapha, did with no leſſe vehemency then Mahamet had done maintaine the contrary, for they not onely enuying him, but hauing declared themſelues his open enemies, did euer croſſe his deſeignes & councels, and did more earneſtly embrace this buſineſſe, knowing that the great Lord did affect it, and highly extolling his deſeigns, they hoped to win his fauor, and to diſgrace him that councelled the contrary: Likewiſe, they thought that by councelling him to what he was addicted, that they themſelues ſhould be employed in that enteprize, the one by Sea, and the other by Land; whereupon they perſwaded him that the Venetians forces were of themſelues weake, and the aide of Chriſtian Princes vncertaine and badly grounded, as they had known by experience: that the Iſle of Cyprus being farre from Venice was not eaſily to be releeued, and eaſie to be enuaded by them, by reaſon of their neere neighbourhood: that it was a moſt rich and excellent Iſland, and very commodious for all his other ſtates, and ſeated in a place, which might much aſſure his ſubiects nauigation vpon thoſe Seas.

The opinion of the other Baſchas contrary to that of Mahomet.

The reaſons of the two Baſchas contrary to Mahomet.

Selim lent a willing eare to thoſe two, becauſe they were of his opinion, and Mahomets credit was thereby much diminiſhed, and his ſpeech greatly ſuſpected, ſo as after-ward, that enterprize was reſolued and concluded, to the which Selim promiſed to goe in perſon, with ſuch a will and reſolution as all men thought that the very firſt yeare of his Empire he would haue vndertaken this warre if other lets had not detained him. For after Solimans death he found the Empire much waſted, by reaſon of his fathers continuall warres both at Malta, Zighet and in other places, where he had loſt great numbers of Soldiers and ſpent much treaſure: beſides, his army was ill prouided of all neceſſaries, which it behooued him to renew by reſt and time, & with all to repaire his fleet; all which being done there was no more likelihood that it would be any longer deferred.

Selim reſoluth to inuade the Iſle of Cyprus

The Venetians were ſpeedily aduertized of all theſe things, by Marke Antonio Barbaro their Baily in Conſtantinople, a very wiſe & diſcreet mā, who at that time did many great and good ſeruices to the Commonwealth. But theſe things at the firſt ſeemed vnto them impoſſible, ſo as the Senators could hardly be drawne to beleeue it, for when motion was made of making prouiſions for the nauall army they they anſwered that it behooued them to proceed diſcreetly therein, and not to prouoke Selim, who peraduenture had neuer thought on ſuch a matter, which would rather haſten the danger then preuent it.

The end of the ſeuenth Booke of the ſixth Decade.

The Contents of the eighth Booke of the ſixth Decad.

THE Senate are certainly aduertiſed of the Turkes enterpriſe vpon Cyprus. A Cypriot practiſeth treaſon ouer the whole Iſland. The Venetians implore the ayde of all Chriſtian Princes. The Pope ſolliciteth all Chriſtian Princes, in the Venetians behalfe. The Venetians ſolicit the King of Perſia to make warre on Selim. The Turkes great preparations for the warre of Cyprus. Selim by the perſwaſion of Baſcha Mahomet, ſendeth a defiance to the Venetians, vnleſſe they quit the Iſle of Cyprus. The ſmall entertainment giuen to the Chiaus of the great Lord. The Venetians prouiſions and preparations for the warre of Cyprus. The Popes Propoſition to preuent the delay of the vnion of the Armies. Mark-Antonio Colonna, Generall of the Popes Armie, in title of Gonfalonier of the Church. The enterpriſe of the Marquerites is broken off, by reaſon of the bad acceſſe to the place. The vnion of the Armies of the Pope, King Philip of Spaine, and the Venetians. Muſtapha, Generall of the enterpriſe of Cyprus. The Turkiſh Armie landeth in Cyprus. The ſmall forces which were in the whole Iſland. The enemies come and encampe before Nicotia. The ſituation of the Citty of Nicotia. Thoſe of Famagoſta will not ſuffer Baillon to goe to Nicotia, who was ſent for thither. And laſtly the Prayers and Proceſſions of thoſe of Nicotia.

The

The eight Booke of the ſixth Decad of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

ANTONIO BARBARO Bayly in Conſtantinople hauing giuen ſundry intelligences to the Senate, he ſent the laſt thither vpon the firſt day of Ianuary 1570. whereby he aduertiſed them, not of the common report, but of the certaine reſolution made in the Councell of the great Turke, concerning the enterprize of Cyprus, al hough the Baſchas did conſtantly affirme the contrary, vſing all meanes to keepe it ſecret. For the Bayly ſeeming to beleeue nothing of the matter, dealt with the Turkes, and chiefely with Ibrahim their Dragoman, who was one of the Viſier Baſchas Domeſticks, and thereby more reckoned of, did ſound him, and draw him into ſundry diſcourſes of diuerſe matters which hee had learned of the Baſcha, about the prouiſions which were made, and eſpecially of the great number of ſhips which were built in the Gulphe of Aizza, and in the great ſea; of the commandement giuen by the Captaine Generall of Aſia, whom they terme the Beglerbey of Natolia, to the ſoldiers of that Prouince to bee ready to goe to Caramannia, with other like matters, which gaue ſufficient teſtimony, that the enterpriſe of the next enſuing Spring, was onely for the Realme of Cyprus, which they did meane to enuade on the ſodaine.

The Senate are certainly aduertiſed of the Inuaſion enterpriſed vpon Cyprus.

The Senate by theſe ſo often reiterated intelligences, deſiring ſpeedily to redeeme the time which they had loſt, began to prouide all things neceſſary for a long warre: Wherevpon they ſuddainly reſolued to ſend troopes of ſoldiers in Garriſon into Cyprus, commanding all the Gouernors of the Iſland, to take ſpeciall care for the gard thereof, and to prepare for their owne defenſe, exhorting the people to bee loyall to them, and the Gentlemen which were feudatories, to make prouiſion of armor and horſe, as they were bound to doe.

The Venetians preparations for the warre of Cyprus.

They did likewiſe ſpeedily prouide for the other Sea-townes of their dominions, ſending men of authority to command their cheife Caſtles. They made great leuies of footmen in ſundry places of Italy, and tooke into their pay the beſt Captaines of thoſe times: in a word, they left nothing vndone, which might ſerue to defend themſelues or to offend their enemies; they cauſed great numbers of Gallies to be made ready in the Arcenall, they choſe eleuen Captaines of the great Gallies, and made Franciſco Duodo their Admirall, a man much eſteemed for his valour and ſkill at Sea, and foureſcore captaines for the light Gallies, who were of the cheifeſt Gentlemen of the Citty, and beſt experienced in marine matters. Pietro Troni was made Captaine of the armed ſhips, Ieronimo Zene Procurator of Saint Marke was declared Generall of all that fleet, hauing been choſen to that office two yeares before, no occaſion beeing offered them to ſend forth their fleet to Sea, and he by that meanes hauing not executed his place, did neuertheleſſe ſtill retaine the ſame dignity. He was reputed both in particular and in publick to be a man till then very fortunate and had well and honorably diſcharged the moſt important offices of the common-wealth which had beene impoſed vpon him. Al things being thus ordred, they waited for nothing but to put them in execution, whereupon they conſulted how to employ thoſe forces: ſome thinking it fit to ſend forth Galleys towards the Leuant, which lying in the hauens of Candy ſhould bee euer ready in all occaſions, which the time, and the enemies attempts ſhould preſent: ſaying, That by ſo dooing they ſhould encourage their ſubiects, and encreaſe their reputation, and might beſides breed diuerſe doubts in the enemies mindes, which might for a time delay their iourney, they not determining to hazard themſelues forth of the ſtreight of Gallipolis, but with all their forces ioyned together, eſpecially when they ſhould vnderſtand of any that were able to ſtay them. But oppoſition was made againſt this opinion, ſome ſaying, That the danger was greater, then the aſſurance which that aduiſe did promiſe, becauſe that thoſe Galleys which the Turkes doe vſually keepe armed at all times for the garde of their townes, are ſo many in number, as diuerſe Fuſts belonging to Pirats (which they ordinarily vſe in time of warre) beeing ioyned vnto them, it might happen that ours would bee expoſed vnto great danger, the which by ſo much the more was to bee auoyded, as the hope was great that all their forces beeing ioyned together, might execute ſome notable enterprize.

I will not forget to obſerue by the way, how that ſome fewe moneths before Selim reſolued on that ſeege, ſome of his councell ſeeking by all meanes to ſurpriſe that Kingdome, beganne to conſult by what treachery and deceit they might obtaine it, not fearing to be reprehended for it, but rather highly commended, ſeeing that if the worſt ſhould happen they could but reſtore what they had taken.

Treaſon practized by a Cipriot.

Now as the way of trechery was the ſafeſt, it ſeemed likewiſe vnto them the eaſieſt: for if any towne of Cyprus ſhould be taken in that manner, it was a very eaſie matter in regard of the neere neighborhood, not only to keepe it, but likewiſe to ſeaze on others, by reaſon of the great and ordinary quarrels and diſſentions among the Cypriots. For the execution of this deſeigne, one Diaſorinus ſeemed vnto them a very fit Inſtrument. He was by nation a Cipriot, by nature ſubtil and cunning, a great Courtier, and one that had much credit among the Cypriots. To this man Scander, Gouernour of the higher Miſia; ſent letters full of courteous complements, with whom by little and little he beganne to enter into a league of freindſhip, ſending often-times letters and preſentes one to an other.

After familiar conuerſation by letters, Diaſorinus being won through faire and goodly promiſes by the Gouernour gaue conſent to betray his Contrey, and to that end, wrote to Scander, as often as any fit occaſion was offered, ſometimes in the Greeke tongue, and at other times in Charactery: The Characters were ſmall animalls, as flies, ants, ſpiders, butterflies and ſuch like.

Treaſon is diſcouered & the Author executed.

But becauſe Gods will was not to haue the Cypriots as yet to fal into that miſery, they beganne to ſuſpect Diaſorinus, in regard of the frequent ſending of letters and preſents betwixt them, whereupon, they found meanes to interrupt ſome of his letters which they finding to be written in Caracters with the figures of theſe animalls, they forthwith ſuppoſed that there was ſome ſecret in them which they would not haue all the world accquainted with.

Diaſorinus was preſently apprehended, his letters laid before him and beeing loath to confeſſe any thing hee was put to the tortures which made him to confeſſe that not only himſelfe, but diuers others of the cheife of the Iſland, drawne by the goodly promiſes of Scander, and wearied likewiſe with the Venetian Gouernment, vnto whom they would not giue place either for nobility or for wealth, had conſpired and determined to receiue the Turkes into the Iſland: whereupon he with his other complices were put todeath.

Now to returne to the Senates determination concerning the reſiſting of the Turkiſh Army: they reſolued to place ſtrong and ſufficient Garriſons in the Caſtles

Caſtles of Cyprus, ſpeedily to ſend thither the neceſſary aid; and beeing ready to chooſe a Commander to conduct thoſe forces, Eugenio Singlitico Count of Roccas a Gentleman of Ciprus, (who at the ſame time beeing Lieftenant Generall of the Army of the firme land, did for the moſt part continew at Venice) did freely offer himſelfe to aid his Contrey at ſuch a need and to ſerue his Prince; wherevpon hauing a ſpeedy diſpatch he imbarked himſelfe with a thouſand footmen, the Senate hauing firſt made him General of al the Cauallery in the Iſland.

Supplies of one thouſand men ſent into Cyprus.

Ieronimo Martinenga, Captaine of the men at armes, did likewiſe freely make offer ro raiſe within a few dayes vpon other princes ſtates two thouſand footmen to conduct them to the releeſe of Famagoſta, and to remaine there with them for the defenſe of the Citty: the which hee hauing in a ſhort ſpace done to his great honor, and brought them to Venice, to imbarke them in the veſſells appointed for that purpoſe, he would firſt ſhew them in armes to the people in the market place of Saint Marke, who tooke great pleaſure to beehold them, which being done, they ſailed towards Cyprus, but their Captaine falling ſick at Sea, dyed within a few dayes after, for want of looking to, who was mightily bewayled, & being carried into Ciprus was buried in Famagoſta in S. Sophias Church.

The voluntary offer of Ieronimo Martinenga.

The death of Martinenga.

The Senate beeing deſirous to implore the ayde of all Chriſtian Princes, ſent word to their Ambaſſadors reſiding in their Courts, that they ſhould acquaint them with the cauſe, which at that time did onely concerne themſelues, but would ſhortly bee common to all Chriſtendom; the which they did, not ſo much for any hope they had to bee releeued, as for that they were willing to take from them all cauſe of ſuſpition that they deſpiſed other mens ayde, and that preſuming too much on their owne forces, they went about to precipitate into a manifeſt danger the euent of that warre, whereon depended the common cauſe of Chriſtendome.

The Venetians implore the aide of Chriſtian Princes.

Firſt of all they made meanes to the Pope, as well to draw ſome ſuccors from him, as that hee by his authority ſhould diſpoſe other Princes to ſend them ſupplies. Micaele Suriana was at the ſame time Ambaſſador for the Common wealth at Rome, who augmenting the Popes good-will and diſpoſition by ſundry reaſons, did continually ſolicite him effectually to embrace the protection of the Republick in a time ſo dangerous, by ſetting before him the example of other Popes, who vpon other occaſions, had readily ayded them againſt that common enemy of Chriſtendom: Hee did likewiſe put him in minde of the Republicks benefits beſtowed vpon the Sea Apoſtolick, for the conſeruation whereof, it had often-times expoſed hir forces and State, againſt very mighty Princes: but hee did cheefly ſet before his eyes, the manifeſt danger which threatned other Chriſtian Realmes, and eſpecially the Churches territories, if the Venetian State, which all men thought to bee the Bulwarke of Chriſtendome ſhould bee ouerthrowne and ruined.

Reaſons propounded to the Pope to moue him to releeue them.

By theſe reaſons and diuerſe others, the Pope beeing drawne to defend the Venetians, hee ſeemed to bee very zealouſly affected to the cauſe, and deſirous to prouide for the neceſſity of that warre, and to aide the Common-wealth; yet neuertheleſſe, excuſing himſelfe for that hee was not able to doe what hee would, hee bewailed the miſery of his time, wherein the Sea Apoſtolick by ſundry accidents was very bare of means, and eſpecially by reaſon of the troubles in France, which threatning the citty of Auignon, had conſtrained him to be at great expences: wherevpon although it was often propounded in the Conſiſtory to embrace the Venetians defence, and to aide them; and that the propoſition was approoued by the Colledge of Cardinals, yet neuertheleſſe, it tooke no great effect: at the firſt they were onely permitted to leuy vpon the whole Clergie of their State without any exception, the ſum of an hundred thouſand Ducats towards the expence of the warre. Hee did afterwards make a motion, to ioyne with all poſſible ſpeed, the King of Spaines Galleys, with thoſe of the Venetians, that they might make a mighty fleet, able to reſiſt that of the Turkes, and to diſapoint their firſt attempts: And in the meane time to make a league with the ſame King and other Chriſtian Princes, whereby all their forces might continually be ioyned together, to make head againſt the enemies greatneſſe. The Ambaſſador Suriana acquainted the Senate with his Holyneſſe propoſition, who entreated them to accept thereof, and to referre the whole buſineſſe to him; that hee would manage it as the common Father, with great affection, to the good of all Chriſtendom, and to their owne particular deſire and profit; the which the Senate very willingly did.

The Pope ſendeth to exhort the Catholicke King to ioyne in that warre againſt the Turke.

The Pope for the beginning of this Treaty ſent Lodouico de Torres, Clarke of the Apoſtolick Chamber, into Spaine to King Philip, to diſpoſe him to ioyne his forces with others againſt Selim Ottoman the common enemy, vnto whom hauing related, from the Pope, as well the publicke intereſt of all Chriſtendome, as his owne particular, hee found his Maieſty ready and well inclined to doe that whereunto his Holyneſſe exhorted him, referring neuertheleſſe his finall anſwer till his arriuall at Siuill, (for hee was then at Corduba, at the aſſembly of the Eſtates of Caſtill) but vpon Torres reply, that nothing would ſo much hinder that buſineſſe as long delay; hee granted him, that his owne Galleys, with thoſe of his Pentioners and Confederates, which amounted to the number of ſixty fiue, beſides thoſe of Spaine, who by reaſon of the troubles of Ganado continued vpon thoſe ſeas, ſhould be brought into Sicely, commanding Gieuan Andre Doria their Admirall to obey the Popes commandement, concerning the time and meanes to ioyne them with the Venetians, that they might afterwards ſaile into the Leuant: Hee did likewiſe obtaine a Commiſſion to the Viceroy of Naples, and Sicill, to permit the Venetians to furniſh themſelues forth of theſe countreys with corne ſufficient for the fleete: but as concerning the entring into the league, he anſwered, That it craued a larger and more mature deliberation for which hee referred him till ſome other time: yet neuertheleſſe within a while after his comming to Siuill, he concluded it of his owne peoper motion.

The King of Spains anſwer to the Popes content.

The Venetians had enioyned Sigiſmond de Caualli their Ambaſſador with the Catholick King, to ayde and further the Treaty of Torres, who hauing well and duly acquitted himſelfe of that charge, returned to Venice: Leonardo Donato was ſent thither in his place, who dealt ſo with the King, as hee continued him in that good deſire and inclination.

Torres, hauing diſpatched his buſineſſe in Spayne, did for the ſame purpoſe make a iourney into Portugall, hauing firſt obtained letters of recommendation from the Kings mother, who lay then at Madrill. Sebaſtian the firſt of that name was at the ſame time King of Portugall, beeing ſeauenteene yeares old, bred and brought vp in Chriſtian piety vnder the gouernment of D. Luigi Gonzabel a Ieſuiſt, a man very famous and of great authority neere the King, by whoſe meanes the Pope preſumed to obtaine of that Prince whatſoeuer he was able to doe for the profit and ſeruicie of Chriſtendome. Torres hauing requeſted this King to ſend the tenne Gallies, which were vſually ready armed in that Kingdom, that they being ioyned with the King of Spaynes might altogether ſaile into Sicily. The King ſhewed great loue and reuerence to the Sea Apoſtolick, and ſeeming to be deſirous to ſatisfie his Holineſſe demand, in a matter ſo holy, iuſt and honorable, did to his great greefe excuſe himſelfe for that hee could not accompliſh his good deſire; ſaying, that his Gallies were at the ſame time vnready and diſarmed by reaſon of the contagious ſickneſſe which had the yeare before beene at Liſbone, and that it would be impoſſible to make them ready vppon a ſuddaine, or to be ſeruiceable that yeare: ſo as by this meanes Torres iourney into Portugall was to no purpoſe.

During this negotiating in Spayne, Giouani Michaele being the Venetians Am-

Ambaſſador with the Emperor, a man of ſingular vnderſtanding and well ſeene in affaires of importance, had already motioned the matter to the Emperor, telling him that the occaſion was now offered which he had ſo often deſired in their diſcourſes together, how he might fearleſſe inuade the Turkiſh States whileſt they being buſied at Sea might not haue leiſure to ſuccour them: and therefore he ſhould not delay it till they had ended their warre and aſſured their Sea coaſts at which time it was to be feared that they being freed from all other care, would ſeek to enlarge their Empire, by his loſſe and ruine: as for the ſmall ſafety in the truce with them their Example might giue him ſufficient teſtimony thereof, Selim hauing broken it with them, and infringed his oath vpon none occaſion, but only through a couetous deſire to rule ouer the whole world. The Emperor gaue a willing eare to theſe remonſtrances, with a ready anſwer, that he would neuer be wanting to the wealth and commodity of Chriſtendome, but that he was deſirous to ſee, how the King of Poland, the Muſcouit, with other Chriſtian Princes, and eſpecially the King of Spayne would carry themſelues there-in, vnto whom hee woold ſend an expreſſe meſſenger into Spayne to know his mind.

The Venetian ſolicit the Emperor to the ſame effect.

The Emperors anſwer to the Venetian Ambaſſador.

As for Charles the ninth the French King, the Pope vſed all the meanes hee could by his Nuncio to draw him into the league, exhorting him to fauour and further it with all his power, notwithſtanding al the domeſtick warres and broiles which had for certaine yeares moleſted his Kingdome; if not with his forces yet at leaſt with his name and authority; the which the King ſeeming not to be able to ſatisfie, and being likewiſe vnwilling to neglect the authority and exhortation of his Holineſſe, he ſaid, in manner of delay that he would ſee what others would do, who were more mighty, and free from all other letts; for he had at the ſame time ſharpe warre in his Realme, where not long before the battaile of Montcontour, was fought betwixt his brother the Duke of Aniou, his Lieuetenant Generall, and the Proteſtants, of whom the Duke of Aniou gat the victory: But the Queene Mother who had the entier gouernment and managing of affairs, making a more open excuſe, alleaged, That the condition of other Princes was not like to that of hir ſonne, becauſe that others treated of continuing warre againſt their enemies wheras they made a propoſition in France to breake the truce with a moſt mighty Prince their antient freind, and therefore that the buſineſſe deſerued longer and more mature conſultation.

The Pope ſolliciteth the French King to haue an hand in this warre.

The exſtort of the King and the Queene his mother to the Pope.

Yet neuertheleſſe the King and Queene, gaue louing and kind ſpeeches to the Venetian Ambaſſador reſiding in their Court, and beſides diuers offers made to the Senate from them, by their Ambaſſador reſident at Venice, the King did expreſſly ſend thither one of his Gentlemen to offer to the Signory that which the condition and miſery of the time would permit his Kingdome, troubled with ſuch greeuous accidents, namely to be a meane to diuert that warre, and to compoſe that controuerſie with the great Lord; making vſe in that manner of that freindſhip, the which he himſelfe had not contracted, but hauing found it eſtabliſhed by his Grandfather, and afterwards confirmed by Henry his father, he would vſe meanes to preſerue it, the which hee ſuppoſed would for that time bee to purpoſe, and redound to the profit of the Venetians, his ancient, and great freindes.

The French Kings offer to the Venetians.

The Senate did not thinke thoſe offers of any force at that time, the preparations for warre being very foreward on both ſides, fearing leaſt by an vncertaine hope of peace the mindes of other Princes, who were already much animated to warre would be ſoftened: The Italian Princes were much diſpoſed to this league, as the Dukes of Vrbin, Sauoy, Florence, and Ferrara, who did all of them offer to ſpend their meanes and liues in that warre.

Tamas King of Perſia was ſollicited to take armes and to reuenge the old and new wronges receiued from the Ottomans, and to this end Vincentio Aleſſandri a Cittizen of Venice was ſent thither, who hauing dwelt a long time at Conſtantinople could ſpeake diuers languages. Hee beeing come to Caſbin where the King of Perſia lay, was by meanes of certaine Armenian Marchants brought in by night, according to the manner of the Contrey, although it was in the ſummer time, before Sultan Caydar Mirziſi the Kings third ſonne, who was at the ſame time his Lieuetenant, with whom hauing a long time diſcourſed concerning his comming thither, and telling him what great warlike preparations Selim made againſt the Venetians, together with the great prouiſions of al Chriſtian Princes to fight with him, hee entreated him in the name of the Senate to make vſe of ſuch an occaſion, and to make warre vpon the Turkes in Aſia, whileſt the townes there ſhould bee vnfurniſhed of Garriſons by reaſon of the warre of Cyprus.

The Venetians ſolicit the King of Perſia to make war vppon Selim.

Caydar lending a willing eare to this diſcourſe, did dilligently craue to bee informed of the whole matter, not promiſing him any thing, but to procure him audience of the King his father. But Aleſſandri perceiuing that they vſed many delaies therein, beeing aduiſed and aſſiſted by Coza Ali a marchant of Tauris, vnto whom (he comming with him from Venice) the buſines had been recommended, he beganne to deale with the great Chancellor of the Kingdome, who after diuers ordinances, made a free anſwer, That his King was a very wiſe and diſcreet Prince, who knowing that in a matter of ſo great importance it was neceſſary to proceed very maturely, he would firſt ſee the ſucceſſe of the league, whereuppon he might afterwards more ſafely reſolue.

The Chancellor of Perſia his anſwer concerning the Emperors demand.

Aleſſandri hauing receiued this anſwer, and perceiuing that he could not bee admitted to ſpeake with the King, left Perſia: for he plainly diſcerned that Tamas, being very old, was altogether addicted to peace, and auoided all occaſions which might cauſe the Turkes to ſuſpect that he had any intelligence with Chriſtians againſt him

Such were the Venetians preparations, ſuch their reſolution, and thus did they treat with forraine Princes, that beeing vnited together they might oppoſe themſelues againſt that Common enemy: at what time the Turkes beganne to vſe hoſtile actions, & ſtaied diuers Venetian Marchants with their goods who traded at Narenta, and other places of Albania in the Turkes dominions; they did likewiſe vnlode (although vnder another cullor) two Venetian ſhippes which were at Conſtantinople, not ſuffering them to depart from thence. Therevppon it was thought fit at Venice to doe the like by the Turkes ſubiects, and their goods, to the end that vppon all occaſions the bodies and goods of thoſe men might be anſwerable for their ſubiects.

The Turkes preparations for the warre of Cyprus.

Whileſt the Venetians were buſied in their preparations, the Turkes at Conſtantinople did haſten the prouiſion of all neceſſaries for their iourney, they did in their Arcenall build new Gallies, trimmed the ould ones, caſt new peeces of Ordnance: enroll great numbers of Pioners in Grecia, made huge proportions of Biſkets in Morea, ſent fiue and twenty Gallies to Alexandria, to fetch all prouiſions made there for the Army, and Selim continuing his reſolution to goe in perſon with the army, they prepared an infinite nnmber of veſſels called Mahonnes, and Palanderias, and made great prouiſions of all things, according to the cuſtome of that nation whenſo-euer their great Lord doeth goe vnto the Army.

But the Baſchaes, Muſtapha, and Piali, with diuers others of the Councell vnto whom the enterprize of Ciprus was committed, conſulting afterwards on what courſe were beſt to be held in that warre, and there being ſome contrariety found in their opinions, ſome ſtay was made of the buſineſſe.

In the meane time, the Venetian Baily that lay at Conſtantinople, beeing acquainted with all theſe proceedings, tooke great care how he might aduertiſe the Senate thereof; to write he durſt not, fearing leaſt his letters would bee intercepted, as ſome of his had already beene, wherevppon, knowing that the Baſcha

Mahomet

Mahomet was euer againſt this enterprize, hee did hope by his meanes to obtaine his deſire: Hee did by Ibrahim acquaint the Baſcha, and afterwards himſelf by word of mouth, how-ill beteeming it was for the Maieſty and generoſity of ſo great a Prince, to inuade thoſe on a ſudaine and vnlookt for, who vpon his word and oath, thought themſelues ſafe and firme, as though when time and occaſion ſhould bee offered, hee could want forces to employ againſt them, for the recouery of that which hee might iuſtly thinke did belong vnto him, againſt whom hee ought firſt to proceed by way of Iuſtice, and next by force, vſing firſt gentle meanes, before hee did take Armes. The Baſcha being mooued by theſe reaſons, perſwaded the great Lord, to ſend ſome of his ſeruants to Venice, to demand the Realme of Cyprus, before hee ſent his Army to enuade it, which councell Selim allowed. Cubat Chiaus was appointed to that end, who ſome two yeares before had beene at Venice vpon other buſineſſe: the Bayly vnder this coulor, tooke occaſion to ſend one of his ſeruants to accompany the Chiaus, to conduct him ſafely thorow the Venetians territories, and to cauſe this negotiation to bee the more eſteemed, Hee determined to ſend Lodouico Bonricy, his Secretary, whom hee thorowly inſtructed with all matters; hee did likewiſe obtaine leaue of the Baſcha to ſend his yong ſonne Lodouico to Venice, fearing leaſt hee ſhould miſcarry among thoſe Barbarians, in ſuch wretched times.

The Bayles remonſtrance to the Baſcha Mahomet.

Selim ſendeth a defiance to Venice vnleſſe they ſurrender the Realme of Cyprus.

This propoſition to ſend to Venice, did occaſion an other good, for there was a ſuſpention of Armes on the Turkes ſide, till the returne of the Chiaus, whereby the Venetians had time to man their townes with ſtrong garriſons, and to prouide for their affaires. The Chiaus beeing come to Venice, the Senate beeing before aduertiſed of the cauſe why hee came, and hauing reſolued vpon an anſwer, commanded that no man ſhould talke or conuerſe with him; but beeing left alone with the Secretary Bonricy, and two Dragomans, they decreed that without any other ceremony, hee ſhould haue priuate audience; where hee comming into the Senate, and beeing placed in the vſuall ſeate, vppon the Princes right hand, hee went and kiſſed his Gowne, and after diuerſe reuerences, hee preſented a purſſe of cloth of gold Tiſſue, wherein according to the cuſtome of that nation, Selims letters were, and ſaid: Moſt excellent Prince, this is a Letter from my Lord, when you are acquainted with his demand, I expect to haue an anſwer: Wherevnto the Prince anſwering that it ſhould bee ſo, and the Chiaus ſtanding ſtill, perplexed in minde, becauſe no other ſpeech was vſed to him, added.

The Chiaus preſenteth Selims letters.

My Lords, Mahomet the Viſier Baſcha hath commanded mee to tell you, that hee is very ſorry, that an occaſion is offered, that hee muſt needs breake off from you, hauing euer ſought by all meanes to continue your friend: but complaints comming ſo often to the Porte, and from ſo many places, of the vnfriendly dealings of the officers belonging to this State, and eſpecially of the kinde entertainment and reception giuen to the Weſterne Pirates in Cyprus, who this very yeare, haue done great hurt to the Muſulmans, hath taken ſuch impreſſion in the minde of the great Lord, and hath ſo prouoked him againſt this State, perceiuing that ſpeech vſed ſo often vpon theſe complaints to your Bayly, hath beene to no purpoſe, as his authority hath beene no longer able to keepe warre from beeing denounced againſt you: and becauſe hee knoweth that yee cannot long hold out againſt the power of ſo potent a Prince, hee aduiſeth you as a friend to take ſome other courſe to ſhield you from ſo many dangers, and to this end he hath procured my comming hither, and offereth to doe all hee may, that yee may auoyde this mighty ſtroake of fortune, and continue your ancient friendſhip with the great Lord: and hauing ended his ſpeech hee preſented a letter from the ſame Baſcha, conteining in ſubſtance that which hee had ſpoken.

The Chiaus hauing deliuered his meſſage, the Prince told him, that the Senate had reſolued on an anſwer, the which ſhould bee read vnto him, that hee might the better vnderſtand and know their intention: Wherevpon hee commanded manded Antonio Milladonna, Secretary to the Councell of Tenne, to read it, which in effect was thus. That the Senate did greatly maruaile, that his Lord beeing no way by them prouoked, nor vpon any iuſt cauſe, would violate and enfringe that oath, by which he had ſo ſolemnly confirmed the peace, and tooke for a pretence to make warre vpon them, that they ſhould giue away a kingdome which the common-wealth had for many yeares lawfully and peaceably enioyed; the which hee might bee well aſſured that they would neuer part from; but ſeeing hee was determined to proceed againſt them after that manner, the Venetian Senate would not faile to defend that which did belong vnto it, hoping by ſo much more to bee the better able to doe it, by how much the iuſtice of their cauſe would procure them all ayde and ſuccour, both diuine and humaine. They told him afterwards, that his Lords letters beeing tranſlated and read, hee ſhould receiue an anſwer, and ſo the Chiaus without any farther diſcourſe was diſmiſſed.

The Senates anſwer to the Chiaus.

The contents of Selims letters.

The beginning of thoſe letters was ſtuffed with ſundry complaints againſt the Venetians, for that they had diſquieted the ancient bounds of Dalmatia, which by conuention, made with his predeceſſors, had beene eſtabliſhed betwixt both the one and other Empire: that contrary to the old and new agreement, the Admiralls of the Venetian Galleys had put diuerſe Turkiſh Pirates to death, after that they had taken them aliue in fight; but eſpecially for that the Weſterne Pirates were welcome into the Iſle of Cyprus, who did continually diſquiet his neighbour cities, and barred his ſubiects from their free nauigation: then toward the latter end hee craued, that if the Venetians were deſirous to continue their ancient friendſhip with him, that they ſhould ſurrender vnto him the Iſle of Cyprus, to take away that cheeſe cauſe which did entertaine thoſe controuerſies betwixt them; otherwiſe, they ſhould prepare for a fierce warre by ſea and land, for hee was determined to ſend his nauall Army with great forces to take that Iſland, and in other places to inuade their dominions by land, hoping in God, the giuer of victories, and in his bleſſed Prophet Mahomet, by whoſe fauour the Ottoman Family had obtained ſo great an Empire, to be victorious in that enterpriſe.

The Senates anſwer to Selims letters.

The Senate made this anſwer to theſe letters. That the Venetians had euer inuiolably maintained peace made with the Ottoman Emperors, and contemned all other reſpects whatſoeuer, by refuſing all occaſions whereof they might haue made good vſe to their owne profit: becauſe that aboue all other things they thought it fit and beſeeming a Prince, carefully to keepe his promiſe, and they being deſirous to auoyde all ſuſpition of ſo great an infamy, had diſſembled and buried in ſilence, diuerſe wrongs done vnto them, becauſe they would not bee the firſt deſturbers of the peace: But now perceiuing that vppon no occaſion, warre is denounced againſt them, at ſuch a time as they leaſt expected it, they would not refuſe it, for the defence of their owne, and in particular for the defence of the Realme of Cyprus, the which as their Anceſtors had enioyed it with ſo iuſt a title for ſo many yeares, they did likewiſe hope that God would giue them the grace to defend it valiantly againſt all thoſe that would vniuſtly take it from them.

The Venetians great preparations.

Warre beeing in this ſort denounced againſt the Venetians, and by them entertained, the Senate made a decree to ſell diuerſe publick poſſeſſions, to accept of ſundry loanes of money, to the great profit of thoſe that brought them, and in a word to vſe all meanes to gather great ſums of money together: whereupon for this purpoſe the number of the Procurators of Saint Marke was augmented, which is the cheef dignity next to the Duke, beſtowing it vpon thoſe that ſhould lend twenty thouland Ducats: to the Common-wealth: they did likewiſe permit all young Gentlemen to enter into the great Councell before the time appointed by the lawes, who thereby might be capable to elect magiſtrates, and likewiſe to execute the like places themſelues, ſo as they would lay in depoſito certaine ſommes of money in the publique treaſury.

The

The ſurceaſe of armes had continued for a while till the returne of Cubat, and the end of his negotiation, but being come to Raguza, the anſwere which he brought was ſoone divulged, wherevpon the ſouldiers that lay in the parts neere adioyning, not tarrying for any others commandement being aſſembled in great numbers, did not only waſte and ſpoile the champaine country of Albania and Dalmatia which was ſubiect to the Venetians, but went and encamped before Dulcina and Antiuari, who finding them to be manned with ſtrong Garriſons and hauing no ordnance to batter them, they were enforced to retire.

VVar opened in al places.

Now the Chiaus being returned to Conſtantinople, and the Senates anſwere being knowne, all men did greatly wonder at it: for the Turkes hauing ſeene in former time what deere account the Venetians made of the great Lords friendſhip, ſuppoſed that they would try all meanes before they would take armes againſt him. But Selim did not ſo much wonder as he did ſcorne and diſdaine, accounting himſelfe highly wronged and contemned in his owne perſon, becauſe that the vſuall ceremonies and entertainments done to Ambaſſadors had beene denied to Cubat, and for that they had not ſent an expreſſe meſſenger to him with their anſwere, but had contrary to their promiſe, detained the Secretary Bonrizzi at Venice. In regard whereof his pleaſure was, being ſo councelled by Mahomet, to haue Cubat come into his preſence, and particularly to relate the Venetians ſpeeches and entertainment giuen vnto him, together with their preparations for warre: which he vnderſtanding from his mouth, was ſome times amazed at the report of the Republikes forces, repenting him in a manner of his determination, and on a ſodaine he would enter into rage and choller, being therevnto prouoked by his owne pride, and by the flattery of his councellors: wherevpon, he placed gards about the Baylies houſe, that he ſhould not goe abroad, commanding the Baſhas of Cairo and Aleppo to doe the like to the Venetian Conſuls of Alexandria and Syria yet they were afterwards ſet at liberty, on condition they ſhould not depart nor conuay their marchandize forth of the Turkes Dominions.

Selim is greatly diſcontented for the ſmal reſpect and entertainment giuen to his Chiaus.

IN the meane time Prince Loredan died at Venice, and Lodouico Mocenigo was choſen in his place, to the peoples great ioy and vnuſuall applauds, preſuming that they had a Prince, who was wiſe, diſcreet, and a louer of the poore, and would conſtantly oppoſe himſelfe againſt all thoſe perils and dangers which did then threaten the Commonwealth.

The

The Senate after this election hauing acquainted all Chriſtian Princes with the comming of the Chiaus to Venice, together with their anſwere, went about to continue the former motions of the league. Therefore for the greater recommendation of the matter, they reſolued to ſend an expreſſe Ambaſſador to the Emperour, and to that end they appointed Giacomo Sourance, a man of great authority and reputation, who had a long time delt for the Commonwealth in Princes Courts; the Senate thinking it neceſſary, firſt to ſolicit that Prince, who already beganne to grow could in the buſineſſe, to the end that by his example other Princes might be drawne into that vnion for Chriſtendome.

The Venetians ſend an Ambaſſador to the Emperor to ſolicit him to enter into the league.

Being come to the Emperors Court, he found that he did alleadge ſundry difficulties, and that he was ready to ſend the tribute to Conſtantinople, which he vſed to pay to the Turke for the Realme of Hungary, the which he vſed meanes to hinder, or at leaſt to delay it till the finall reſolution. Yet neuertheleſſe the Emperor ſeemed to bee glad of his comming, either for his owne excuſe or elſe becauſe he deſired to haue an expreſſe Ambaſſador to come from the Signory about that matter, to the end he might be preſent at the Imperiall Dyet which he determined within a while after to hold at Spire, and hee ſuppoſed that his preſence would be the occaſion of propounding and concluding ſo great and important a matter.

The Emperors anſwer to the Venetian Ambaſſador.

As for the Spaniſh Court there was no ſpeech of the league, that King hauing ſent backe the treaty thereof to Rome to D. Eſtuniga his Ambaſſadour and to the Cardinals Granuelle and Pacheco, but the Popes Nuncio and the Venetian Ambaſſador made earneſt requeſt, that the King would command Doria, that ſo ſoone as he ſhould bring thoſe Gallies, which he had appointed him into thoſe ſeas; to goe preſently and ioyne with the Venetians fleet, concerning which propoſition thoſe of the Kings Councell made ſundry difficulties, ſome times alleadging that it was againſt reaſon that the Admirall of the Kings Gallies ſhould obey the Venetians Admirall: then they made ſhew to ſuſpect that the Venetians went about to make vſe both of the apparence and name of thoſe forces to treat with more aduantage with the Turkes; and therefore they concluded that the treaty of the league ought firſt to take place, as moſt neceſſary.

The Venetians propoſitions in the Court of Spaine, with the difficulties alleadged thereupon.

Now at Rome, whither the treaty of the league had beene ſent backe (as hath beene ſaid) the Pope perceiuing that to particularize the conditions thereof, would breed a very hurtfull delay, he propounded, that ſeeing the King of Spaine and the Venetians were agreed to make that vnion, that without any more delay, they ſhould publiſh the league, being made in the ſame manner as in the yeere 37. and that in the meane time their forces ſhould ioyne together, to inuite other Princes to declare themſelues, and thereby to affright the enemies.

The Popes propoſition to auoid delay.

During theſe practizes the Generall Zanne departed from Venice about the beginning of Aprill, and went to Zara, which was the Rendezuous of all the fleet, and for all the prouiſions for warre, that ſo ſoone as things were ready they might from thence ſaile into the Leuant. But the fleet, to their great hurt, ſtayed there longer then was expected, tarrying for certaine Gallies, and for armes for the ſouldiers, and other warlike engins ordained in great number, for the ſouldiers did endure there ſundry diſcommodities, and many of them grew ſicke, by meanes whereof the Gallies were badly furniſhed with ſouldiers and marriners: yet neuertheleſſe ſo ſoone as the Senate heard newes from Rome that the King had commanded Doria to ioyne with the Venetian nauall army, it wrote to the Generall, that leauing foure Gallies for the guard of the Gulphe, vnder the command of one of the captaines that had at any time beene an Admirall, he ſhould ſpeedily ſaile with the reſidue of the army to Corfou, and there to expect newes from the Gallies of Spaine, that he might afterwards ioyne with them at Meſſina, and the two fleets beeing ſo vnited ſhould ſhape ſuch a courſe as God ſhould direct them.

The fleet receiueth great diſcommodity by their abode at Zara.

According

According to this commandement Zanne departed from Zara the twelfth day of Iuly and ſailed to Lieſna, where he found ſixe great Gallies, and certaine ſhips which he ioyned to his fleet, and from thence, he went directly to Corfou. At the ſame time, twelue Gallies were in the Popes name armed at Ancona to be ſent to the Venetian fleet at Corfou. For, after ſundry propoſitions made in open conſiſtory concerning the aide which the Church might affoord the Venetians in that warre, it was concluded that twelue Gallies ſhould bee armed by the ſea Apoſtolike, but rigged by the Venetians. The Pope committed them to Marc Antonio Colonna duke of Palliano with title of General to the Church in that warre againſt the Infidels.

The Pope armeth twelue Gallies whereof Colonna is made General.

The Venetians ſeemed to approoue the Popes choiſe and wrote to him about it, Colonna ſent letters to Venice, wherein hee gratified their loue and good will towards him, which he promiſed in all points to anſwer to the honour and ſeruice of the Commonwealth.

The Turkes on the other ſide ſo ſoone as the Venetian fleete was gonne from Zara, beganne to ſpoile and waſte Dalmatia, with great troupes of horſe and foot, where they tooke ſome caſtles. Now the Venetian Generall being come to Corfou with three ſcore and tenne light Gallies (for the great Gallies and Ships ſtaied by the way) he beganne to conſult what was beſt to bee done (in the councell, by the Senates appointment, beſides the Generall who had two voices both the Prouidators of the army and Sforza Palauicin were preſent) all men were deſirous that the fleete ſhould without delay paſſe forward; but many things hindered this deſeigne; firſt, becauſe they had no certaine newes of the Gallies of Candy, which were in number twenty, vnder the command of Marco Quirin Admirall of the Gulphe, and next becauſe they had no certaine intelligence of the deſeignes of the Turkiſh fleet; for it would haue beene a very raſh attempt with halfe the forces to haue hazarded the whole fortune of that warre on the incertaine euent of one fight, ſeeing that by a little temporizing they might more commodiouſly aſſure the eſtate of that action.

And laſtly becauſe the ſickneſſe which firſt beganne at Zara, by reaſon of the miſeries which the ſouldiers and mariners had there endured, was ſo mightily encreaſed, as great numbers daily died, whereby many Gallies were empty of men: this was the chiefe cauſe of the delay, and the captaines tooke great care how to make new leauies of men to furniſh the fleet: To this end, commandement was ſent to the Gouernors of Zant and Cephalonia to raiſe the ſpeedieſt and greateſt ſupplies that they poſſibly could.

The cauſe which ſtaied the fleet at Corfou.

In the meane time becauſe the ſouldiers ſhould not grow idle, the Generall reſolued to ſend them to beſeege the caſtle of Marguerits, a place of it ſelfe nothing famous, but very neceſſary for the obtayning of other conqueſts, in which action it was thought fit to employ them, till ſuch time as the Gallies of the Pope and the Catholike King ſhould arriue. The charge of this enterpriſe was giuen to Sforza Palauicin Generall of the Venetian troupes, who departing from Corfou with eight and forty Gallies, commanded by the Prouidator Celſi, with fiue thouſand foote and foure great peeces of ordnance, arriued by day breake in the Hauen of Niſta oppoſite to it, where he ſpeedily landed his ſouldiours, and willed them to march on a ſodaine to aſſaile the enemies, thereby hoping with eaſe to ſurprize them and to ſeize vpon the place, and to this purpoſe, he ſent certaine Harquebuziers before, and himſelfe followed after with the reſidue of his forces: but hauing marched a great while through narrow and difficult waies, they did from farre deſcry the caſtle which they went to ſurprize, being ſeated on the top of an hill, in a place of very difficult acceſſe. Palauicin hauing well conſidered al matters and finding things to be otherwiſe then they had beene reported, thought it againſt reaſon, to hazard thoſe troupes which were deſtined to greater atchiuements, and therefore on a ſodaine hee turned backe

The enterprize of the Marguerites is broken off in regard of the difficulty thereof.

againe, againe, although the Prouidator was of a contrary opinion, and countermanding the Harquebuziers that he had sent before, he marched backe to the Hauen of Nisita and returned to Corfou.

At the same time Marco Quirini came with his Gallies from Candy to Corfou, hauing by the way taken the fort of Brazza de Menia, which the Turkes held. He was presently commanded to go with twenty Gallies and scoure the Islands of the Archipelago: whereupon, he sailed to the Isle of Andros one of the renowned Ciclades. Within a while after, the Generall Zanne receiued commandement from the Senate to saile with his forces farther vp into the Leuant, and by assayling some of the enemies townes to diuert them from the inuasion of Cyprus. Whereupon, he left Corfou and went to Modon where Quirin with his Gallies met him, and within two daies after he arriued in the Isle of Candy anchored in the Gulph Anfialea, which at this day marriners call the Hauen of Suda. The Generall being there desirous to make speedy prouision of whatsoeuer the fleet needed, found great difficulties in it, chiefly in recouering sufficient numbers of men to supply the places of them that were dead, whereupon, he sailed with forty Gallies to Candace the chiefe city of the Island, the sooner by his presence to hasten the necessary prouisions, leauing both the Prouidators and Palauicin in the hauen of Suda with foure score Gallies, enioyning them to leauy men from all parts.

The Venetian fleet saileth to Corfou by the Senats commandement.

Now after that the fleet was sufficiently furnished with souldiers, marriners and other necessaries, they vnprofitably spent the time and the best season of the yeere, expecting the Popes and Spanish Gallies, the which, according to the Venetians directions, being ioyned together, were to meet them in Candy. At the last, toward the latter end of August, Mart-Antonio Colonna the Churches Generall, and Giouan Andrea Doria, the Catholike Kings, being arriued, the Venetian fleet was merueilous ioyfull of their comming: The Generall and fleet went forth of the Hauen of Suda to welcome them, where according to the manner they saluted with volies of shot; then all of them entring together into the hauen, made no long aboad there, but after some propositions made, the whole fleet retired to Sithy, there more maturely to consult what were best to be done to free the Isle of Cyprus from inuasion.

The nauies of the Pope, King of Spaine and Venetians ioyne together.

Whilest the Christian fleet had spent much time in preparing and vniting it selfe togither, the Turkes with greater celerity had assembled all their forces, and being mighty at sea, had without any difficulty, prosperously pursued their enterprize, the which was more speedily performed, because that Selim, who said that hee would in person goe to the army changed his determination and resolued to remaine at Constantinople, by the aduise of Mahomet and Mustapha, to whose authority and councell all the other Bashas condescended. Selim then tarrying at Constantinople made Mustapha his Lieutenant Generall in that warre, committing the whole enterprize by land to him, and all marine actions to Piali, Admirall of the Gallies. Piali within a while after departing from Constantinople with fifty fiue Gallies and certaine other vessels, Mustapha set saile with like number, vnto whome for an extraordinary fauour the great Lord had giuen the Imperiall Galley to transport him, which is of extraordinary greatnesse and most sumptuously decked, in which the great Turke embarketh himselfe when he goes forth on any enterprize. They anchored first at Negrepont, then at Rhodes, where hauing intelligence that the Venetian fleet lay at Zara, and could not depart from thence by reason of sickenesse and other impediments, and that they had no newes at all of the Spanish fleet: the Turkes being out of feare that the fleetes would ioyne together, and supposing that they durst not come on any farther, determined to saile directly to Cyprus: But as the Turkish fleet passed along from Negrepont to Rhodes, Piali made an attempt to take the fort of Tina, which is an Island in the farthest part of the Archipelago, belonging to the Venetians, Mustapha, Generall of the enterprize of Cyprus.

Venetians, and comming vnlooked for in a morning to that Iſland thinking to ſurprize it, it was diſcouered at ſea by Ieronimo Paruta a Venetian Gentleman Gouernor of the Iſland, a valiant and diſcreet perſon, who of a long time hauing feared their arriuall, hee made prouiſions of all neceſſaries for defenſe. Hee perceiuing the enemies for to bend their courſe thitherward, ſhot off a warning peece to aduertize thoſe of the Iſland that were abroad in the country, that they ſhould quickly retire into the caſtle, which beeing done in time, they prepared themſelues to withſtand the Barbarians aſſaults, which were very cruell, not onely once, but twice and thrice, in euery of which, they were brauely repulſed, with great loſſe of their men, and were enforced to diſcampe, after that they had with incredible fury waſted the whole Iſland, burned the Country houſes, ruined Churches, and ſlaughtered all the cattaile that were in that Iſland.

The Turkes repulſed from Tina.

From Tina Piali went to Rhodes, where all their fleet lay which amounted to more then two hundred armed veſſels, accounting an hundred and fifty Gallies, together with Fuſts and Galeots, but in the great fleete were certaine Mahonnes, which are like to great Gallies, not altogither ſo bigge as a Gallion, ſixe ſhips, and great numbers of other veſſels commonly called Caramuſcolini, and ſome fifty Palandaries to tranſport horſe.

The number of the Turkiſh fleet.

This fleet bending it direct courſe toward Cyprus was diſcried neere to Baſſo on the firſt day of Iuly in the yeere 1570. which ſcoured all the coaſt from Limiſſa as farre as the Promontory commonly called the Cape of the Cat: then landing part of their forces they burned and ſpoiled the ſea coaſts, taking many priſoners: the next day purſuing their iourney, they went to Salines, where finding no reſiſtance, they vnſhip't their ordnance, and the reſt of the ſouldiers who preſently fortified their campe with deepe trenches and ſtrong Rampiers, from whence they afterwards waſted and ſpoiled the country neere adioyning. Then marching to Leucara, nine miles from Salines they did eaſily make themſelues Maſters of the country and people, vnto whom Muſtapha gaue great guiſts and goodly promiſes to draw on others, and eſpecially thoſe of the mountaines, ſeeking rather to winne them by faire meanes then by force.

1570.

The Turkiſh fleet landed.

Muſtapha by guiſts ſeekes to win the Cyprois.

In the meane time they diſpatched foure ſcore Gallies and diuers flat bottomed veſſels to Tripoli, and to the Riuer of Caramania, there to raiſe other horſe and foot forces, which arriuing in Cyprus, made vp the number (as moſt authors write) of fifty thouſand foot, fiue and twenty hundred horſe, three thouſand Pioners, with great numbers of horſe of carriage and thirty peeces of great ordnance with an hundred and fifty Falconets.

There were no ſuffitient Garriſons in the whole Iſland able to reſiſt theſe forces: for the ordinary Garriſon was but two thouſand Italian foot men, and ſome thouſand others ſent from the firme land, with Martinengos two thouſand ſouldiers, many whereof died by incommodious tranſportation; ſo that the greateſt hope of beeing able to defend the townes and caſtles, conſiſted in the new ſupplies which thoſe of the country had promiſed to leauy. There was no other cauallery in the whole Kingdome but fiue hundred Stradiots which were kept there in pay by the Common-wealth.

Things beeing thus, and ſuffitient forces wanting to repulſe ſo mighty an enemy, for the cauallery was to weake for to hinder his landing, and the infantery not ſuffitient to defend for any long time the two chiefe fortes which they held, Nicotia and Famagoſta, and for to guard the mountaines and other paſſages of the Iſland hee beeing landed: therefore they reſolued eſpetially to defend thoſe two cities.

Aſtor Baillone who by Martinengos death was Generall of all the forces in the Iſland, in the abſence of the Prouidator (for Lorenzo Bembo died, not long long before)and other Venetian Magiſtrates, called a councell, where the chiefe offices and command in that warre were diſtributed to ſundry Cypriot Gentlemen, of honourable ranke, as well for their wealth as nobillity, but ſmally experienced in martiall matters. The Count Roccas was made Lieutenant to Baillone, Giacomo de Nores Count of Tripoli, Maſter of the ordnance, Giouan Singlitico captaine of the Cypriot cauallery, Giouan Soſomene, captaine of the Pioners, Scipio Caraffa, and Pietro Paulo Singlitico captaines of the foot, who were appointed to guard the ſtrong places of the mountaines, and others were appointed to other places.

Aſtor Baillone General in Cyprus.

They did likewiſe conclude in that councell to attempt to hinder the enemies landing; and to that end, the chiefeſt of them went into the field with the greateſt forces they could aſſemble, but, conſidering their enterprize to be to dangerous, and vnſeaſonable, the enemy hauing already landed part of his forces, they returned home to their Garriſons, ſo that the Turkes landed without any difficulty, which made them at firſt to ſuſpect, that they did it for ſome pollicy, to draw them afterwards into an ambuſcado, whereupon at their firſt arriuall they were very wary, but running afterwards vp and downe the country, and finding no oppoſition, beeing thereby emboldened, their army did not onely aduance forward but went about in disbanded troupes, without Enſignes to robbe and ſpoile at their pleaſure.

Piali is of opinion to beſeege Famagoſta firſt.

The Turkiſh captaines beeing vnwilling to looſe time reſolued to aſſaile one of the two chiefeſt fortes of the Iſland. Piali was of opinion, to beſeege Famagoſta firſt, hoping quickly to take it, and that it being taken, Nicotia would of neceſſity yeeld, which had many vnproffitable eaters within the circuit of her walles, which being ſeated farre from ſea, in the middeſt of a champaine country, poſſeſſed by great numbers of enemies, could not bee releeued, nor without new prouiſion long hold out the ſeege: that Famagoſta was no great fort, but weake, and ſo defectiue as it would neuer endure one onely battery, and that they within it were not many, or ſo bould and valliant as to ſuſtaine any aſſault.

Muſtapha maintaineth the contrary and his opinion is followed.

Muſtapha mainteined the contrary, ſaying, that the reputation of ſo great an army as theirs, ought not to be blemiſhed by attempting any meane enterprize, thereby to encreaſe the enemies courage, and diminiſh their owne: That the Geneuois for foure ſcore and tenne yeeres had held Famagoſta, at the ſame time as the Kings of the family of Luſignan commanded the Iſland, whereby might be gathered, that the taking of that city, would bee of no great importance for the winning of the whole Kingdome. That the Nobillity, and very many of the people were retired into Nicotia, that all the wealth and munition of the whole Iſland was there, ſo as that onely exploit beeing well performed would end all the reſt, and their firſt attempt giue end to all their deſeignes.

Theſe reaſons forcible in themſelues and ſtrengthened by the reputation of the author, cauſed them to reſolue firſt to beſeege Nicotia, whither the whole campe marched the two and twentith of Iuly, hauing firſt ſent fiue hundred horſe towards Famagoſta, to cut off all correſpondence and intelligence betwixt thoſe two cities: the Turkes purſuing their iourney approached neere to the walles of Nicotia. Great feare ſeized on the inhabitants when they perceiued the enemy at their Gates, like men who wanting diſcreet fore-ſight to prouide for dangers a farre off, did extreamely feare them beeing neere at hand, hauing alwaies beene incredulous that the Turkiſh fleet would come into the Iſland, though the Venetian Baily at Conſtantinople, and the Senate, had giuen them many aduertizments thereof that they might prouide for their affaires in time.

Nicolo Dandulo was at the ſame time Gouernor of the city, a man to weake

to

to vndergo that burthen, which not deſert but opinion had laied on him: yet to whom long experience had rather giuen abillity to execute, then nature to direct. The ſodainneſſe of the danger had encreaſed his feare, and his feare the danger, for, at the arriuall of the enemies army, the trenches were vnfiniſhed, and the ſouldiers diſordered, and the city vnvictualled.

Now whileſt thoſe in Nicoſia, beeing incompaſſed with many miſeries, were buſied in furniſhing the city with neceſſaries, and inconſulting by what meanes to fruſtrate the enemies deſeignes, they were ſo tedious in their reſolutions, in regard they had no eminent Commander able to decide the controuerſies which aroſe from diuerſity of opinion, that the Turkes had time to pitch their tents, to plant their ordnance, and likewiſe for to fortifie their campe, which ſtretched it ſelfe from Saint Marines as farre as Aglangia, poſſeſſing the whole ſpace oppoſite vnto foure Bulwarkes, and on the other ſide of the towne which was not enuironed by the campe both the Baſhas did daily ſend an hundred foote and as many horſe, that none might iſſue forth or enter into the Citty.

The enemies are encamped before Nicotia.

This Citty is ſeated in the middeſt of the champaine, in an wholeſome temperate aire: it hath great ſtore of water, and the ſoile is very fruitfull: In former times it was nine miles in compaſſe about, but the Venetians beeing deſirous to fortifie it, reduced it to three: it is proportioned like a ſtarre with eleuen points, in euery of which is a bulwarke, made onely of earth, which were not yet finiſhed when the Turkiſh army arriued: and the rules of fortification were ſo well obſerued, as the greateſt Inginers accounted it the moſt abſolute peece in the world.

The ſytuation of the city of Nicotia.

Howſoeuer, the City rather was vnfurniſhed of a skilfull Commander, and braue men, then of fortification. There were tenne thouſand foot-men in the city, amongſt whom were fifteene hundred Italians and the reſt were natiue Cypriots, namely three thouſand Cernedes, two thouſand fiue hundred of the city, two thouſand new men enroled in the townes and villages of Cyprus, that were retired thither, and a thouſand Nicotian Gentlemen, all with vnexperienced troupes, were for the moſt part badly armed.

They likewiſe ſent to Famagoſta for to entreat Baillone to come thither with ſome certaine troupes to command the city: but thoſe of Famagoſta hauing no ſuperfluous forces, and beeing vncertaine whether the enemy changing his determination would on a ſodaine come and aſſaile them, did conſtantlo deny the Nicotians requeſt, not ſuffering the aide they required, nor the captaine to goe forth of their city: vpon this refuſall Baillone likewiſe excuſed his departure, adding that Martinengas ſouldiers by wanting a captaine, ſaid that they would obey none but him, ſo that his departure might breed ſome great diſorder and confuſion in the City. Moreouer, there was ſtore of ordnance in the towne, which wanted but braue men for to mannage it: There were many Pioners, for beſides foure thouſand vnder the commaund of Gioan Soſomene, as many more were come to the citty; neuertheleſſe, for all this great multitude of people, the captaines beeing diuided amongſt themſelues, this ſo neceſſary fortification was left imperfect, which did much weaken the forces within it.

Diſcord among the commanders in the city.

On the contrary ſide, there was in the enemies campe ſuch agreement, and obedience towardes the captaines, as all military actions were ſpeedily executed. Muſtapha a couragious perſon and a great ſoldier, beſides the ranke which he then held, had great credit and authority amongſt the ſouldiers, in regard of the fame and reputation he had purchaſed for his command in Selims army before he was Emperour, when hee made warre on his brother Achomat, all men attributing the vnexpected victory which enſued, to his onely valour and proweſſe : and therefore the ſouldiers being accuſtomed to martiall deeds, trauaile and danger, were growne much more actiue and valliant, hauing their captaines valour for their obiect, togither with the hope of great reward if they were victorious.

Muſtapha his great credit among the ſouldiers.

His army was reported to be very ſtrong, but his chiefe force were ſixe thouſand Ianiſſaries, and foure thouſand Spaches (theſe are horſe-men, neuer out of pay, which ſome time when need is, fight on foote) all valliant men and bred vp in warre : Therefore by how much thoſe of the city wanted humaine aide againſt ſuch forces, by ſo much greater was their recourſe vnto God. For, day and night praiers were made in priuate Houſes and Churches, and ſollemne proceſſions ouer all the city, which were performed with great deuotion and concourſe of people, therein following the example and exhortation of Franciſco Contaren Biſhop of Baffa.

Prayers and Proceſſions in Nicotia.

Hee at that time was chiefe amongſt the Clergy in that city (for Philippo Mocenigo Archbiſhop of Nicotia was then at Venice) did not ceaſe to aide and aſſiſt the people as if hee had beene their owne paſtor, and hauing on a time aſſembled the chiefe of the towne, in Saint Sophias Church, hee gaue them a briefe and learned exhortation befitting the time, from whence they departed ſo well ſatisfied and reſolued, as they did put one an other in good hope and comfort of a fortunate iſſue of that warre, and did brauely diſpoſe themſelues to defend their country.

The end of the eight Booke of the ſixth Decade.

The

The Contents of the ninth Booke of the ſixth Decade.

THE Turkes beſeege the City of Nicotia, with their furious battery. The taking of the Bulwarke Conſtance, whereof enſued the Cities loſſe. The Barbarous cruelties committed at the ſacke of the City. The reſt of the Iſland yeeldeth to the Turkes, Famagoſta excepted. The Turkes approach the City of Famagoſta, with the inhabitants reſolution. The ſundry opinions of the captaines of the Chriſtian army, who at laſt reſolue to goe and fight with the enemy. Doria having intelligence of the loſſe of Nicotia, returnes home into his country. Many townes ſubiects to the Turkes yeeld to the Venetians. The Popes exhortation for the concluſion of the league. The difficulties which aroſe in the concluſion of the league. The Emperour refuſeth to enter into the league. Supplies ſent to Famagoſta. Mahomet Baſha propoundeth a treaty of peace to the Venetians. The Venetians are doubtfull and vncertaine either for peace or warre. The Emperor oppoſeth himſelfe againſt the title which the Pope had giuen to the Duke of Florence. The Pope and Spaniards ſeeke to the Venetians, leaſt they ſhould make an agreement with the Turke. The league is concluded and ſigned, with the Articles thereof. Don Iohn of Auſtria is made Generall of the league. The meanes which the Venetians vſed to get money. What Selim promiſed to himſelfe after the taking of Nicotia. The enemies are defeated in Candy. The Turkes ſpoile and waſte the Iſlands of Zant and Cephalonia. And laſtly the conditions of peace propounded to the Venetians by Mahomet Baſha.

The ninth Booke of the ſixth Decade of the History of Venice.

THe enemy without any empediment being come before Nicoſia, ſent certaine horſe to make incurſions neere to the city, to draw thoſe within it forth to skirmiſh; the Italians would gladly haue ſallied, but at firſt the Gouernor would not ſuffer them; yet beeing ouercome by the importunities of all the captaines, he permitted Cæſar of Vincenza, Lieutenant of the Count Roccas, to ſallie with certaine horſe, which being few in number could not execute any important matter, but onely ſought to draw the enemy within the ſhot of the cities ordnance: and hauing done ſo two daies togither, a captaine of a troupe of Stradiots, whoſe name was Andre Coriese, was taken by the enemy, and being brought before the Baſha, hee preſently commanded his head to bee cut off.

Thoſe of Nicoſia make certaine ſallies.

The enemies afterward without any empediment did build a fort on Saint Marines mount; ſome foure hundred and forty paces from the city: for although the beſeeged vſed all meanes to fruſtrate the enemies deſeigne towards the curtaines of Podocatera and Caraffa (for ſo were thoſe Bulwarkes called, by the name of thoſe Gentlemen that had particular command in the building of them) and did continually with their ordnance play vpon that part, yet, they could not hinder the enemy, who wrought day and night, from executing his enterprize; who not ſatisfying himſelfe with that one fort, did on a ſodaine build three more in three other ſeuerall places, the one vpon a little hill at Saint Georges, the ſecond oppoſite to the Bulwarkes Conſtancia and Podocatera, on a little riſing, called Marguerits Mount, and the third on the top of the Mount Mantia, hoping with theſe fortes to batter the Bulwarkes, curtaines, and houſes of the city.

The Turkes build three fortes neere to the city.

They did afterwards make deepe and broad trenches which they brought vnto the ditch of the old walles and placed courts of gard in them, which could not bee hurt by the cities ordnance: then, for foure daies ſpace, without intermiſſion, from morning till night they furiouſly with all their ordnance battered the walles; but perceiuing it to bee to ſmall purpoſe, becauſe the bullets for the moſt part fell vpon earthen Rampiers and made no breach, they ceaſed the battery, and fell to the ſpade and mattock, ſo as they preſently came vnderneath the counter ſcarpes, thinking thereby to ouerthrow them: then they plaied vpon foure Bulwarkes, namely Podocatera, Conſtantia, Dauila, and Tripoli, all which they determined to aſſault at once, in which for a long time both ſides fought valliantly, but in the end the Turkes were with with great loſſe repulſed.

The enemies fierce battery.

A fierce aſſault giuen to foure bulwarks at one time.

Muſtapha wondering and raging thereat, beeing almoſt out of hope to take the City, ſolicited and animated his ſouldiers, to goe once againe to the aſſault, promiſing great rewards to ſuch as ſhould doe valiantly, and after that hee had made a ſpeech to them worthy a Generall, hee cauſed a proclamation to bee made thorow the whole Army, that any three which ſhould firſt mount

mount the citty walls ſhould be made Sangiacks, and if any Baſcha dyed, hee that ſhould firſt enter the citty, ſhould ſucceed in that dignity.

The ſouldiers beeing thus encouraged, the aſſault was reſolued on: The next day early in the morning the Turkes marching by day breake in great ſilence to the ſame Bulwarkes, aſſailed the beſieged on a ſuddaine and vnlookt for, hoping thereby with more eaſe to obtaine the victory, (as indeed it did). For the Turkes finding thoſe that had the garde of the Bulwarke Conſtantia halfe a ſleepe, and mounting furiouſly the Parapet, gaue them no time nor leiſure to make any defence, who beeing drowned in ſlumber and feare, forgat to retire into the Citty.

An aſſault giuen to the Bulwarke Conſtantia.

The Turkes take the Bulwarke Conſtantia.

The great opinion which the beſieged had conceiued of the arriuall of ſupplies from the Common-wealth of Venice, which they ſo much deſired, made them beleeue, that the noiſe which they had heard the night before, whileſt the Turkes were preparing for the mornings aſſault, was a token of the enemies diſcamping; in regard whereof, and becauſe they were oppreſſed with long watchings, and intollerable labours, they had ſecurely diſarmed themſelues, and fell to reſt: The Turkes then in this confuſion entring pell mell with the Chriſtians into the laſt rampiers, there aroſe a great cry, accompanied with feare and amazement, whervpon, many betooke themſelues to open flight.

The Count Roccas quarter was neere to the Bulwarke, who by the ſuddaine noyſe beeing certified of that which was done, did preſently arme, and comming in among the thickeſt throngs, hee found ſo great diſorder there, as notwithſtanding all his meanes and perſwaſions to cauſe the ſouldiers to ſtand faſt, and make valiant reſiſtance, his labour was in a manner loſt, to ſuch a deſperate paſſe were matters brought, and himſelfe beeing ſhot into the head with an Harquebuze, fell downe dead, whereupon all thoſe, that by his arriuall had taken courage, and began by little and little to make head, leauing the defenſe of the walls, ran home to their houſes to prouide for the ſafty of their wiues and children. Pietro Piſani and Bernardino Polano Captaine of Salma, comming thither in haſt, could not by their authority and example ſtay the diſordered runne-awayes; among whom Polano thruſting himſelfe, and going about to hold them back by force, was together with them cut in peeces. Piſani perceiuing his fellow to be ſlaine, did with the reſt retire to the market place, whither from all parts the poore inhabitants came, who were not yet purſued by the Turkes, who hauing taken the Bulwarke Conſtantia, would before they went on any farther, make themſelues maiſters of all the reſt, in which the Italian footmen did ſtill fight brauely with the enemy: but in the end when they perceiued their ſtrong places to bee loſt, and that they were at once aſſailed in front and on their backs, beeing vnable to make any longer reſiſtance, they abandoned the walls, and making themſelues way thorow the middeſt of the enemies, they retired to the market place, where they made head for a time, vntill that the Baſha of Aleppo arriued, who entring the towne at the Bulwarke of Tripoli, went firſt to make good the walls, where hee made great ſlaughter of ſuch as hee met with, and finding no more reſiſtance, hee marched towards the market place, where ſeeing ſo many armed people to make head, hee cauſed three peeces of Ordnance to bee brought from the walls, and beſtowing his ſhot among them, hee enforced them to quit the place, many of whom retired to the Pallace; whither the Gouernor, Biſhop Contaren, and many of the chiefe Cittizens had already eſcaped, thoſe which could not enter, running vp and downe heere and there thorow the ſtreetes, were preſently either ſlaine or taken priſoners.

The Count Roccas ſlaine.

All the Bulwarkes are taken.

The Citty of Nicoſia is taken.

They within the Pallace hauing receiued the Baſchas word for the ſafety of their liues, ſo ſoone as they had opened the gates, the Turkes preſently runne in vpon them, who were able to make no reſiſtance beeing vnarmed, where they were all murthered: therein, the Gouernor, Biſhop, and common people running one ſelfe ſame fortune.

That

The City is ſacke.

That beeing done, and the Turkes freed from farther trouble, they ran confuſedly and without Enſeignes about the citty, ſacking houſes, ſpoiling and ruining Churches, diſhonouring wiues, rauiſhing virgins, and putting all to the edge of the ſword, without diſtinction of age or condition, ſo as that day, twenty thouſand perſons dyed by the hands of the Turkes: and thoſe whom the cruell enemy left aliue, rather to reſerue them for ſome miſerable puniſhment, then for any compaſſion towards them, were bound in chaines, and haled to priſon ouer the dead bodies of their friends and kinsfolke. In this manner did this Citty in one day, taſte the extreameſt of calamitie, which for a long time had liued in great pompe and magnificence, nay rather in all exceſſe and diſſoluteneſſe, ſeruing for an example of the inconſtant mutability of humaine affaires. The Citty was taken and ſackt vppon the ninth day of September, and the foureteenth day of the ſiege.

The number of the dead.

The Turkes did afterwards with eaſe become Lords of the reſt of the Iſland, Famagoſta excepted. For the other townes following the victors fortune, did preſently yeeld, and Cerina likewiſe as readily as the reſt, notwithſtanding that Giouan Maria Mudazzo Captaine of the Caſtle, and Captaine Alphonſo Palazza beeing entreated by thoſe of Famagoſta, had determined to hold out and brauely to defend it. Thoſe of the mountaines did the like, Scipio Caraffa, Paulo Singlitico, with diuerſe other Gentlemen, and ſome Greeke Preiſts, and great numbers of Countrey people, yeelding them-ſelues to Muſtapha, vnto whom they ſware fealty and aleageance; ſo that the Venetians poſſeſſed nothing in the Iſland but onely Famagoſta, whither Muſtapha determined to march, leauing 4000. footmen for the gard of Nicotia.

Cyprus yeeldeth to the Turkes, Famagoſta excepted.

Muſtapha, hauing taken order for Nicotia, marched towards Famagoſta with his whole armie, and encamped at the village Pomodama, three miles from the Citty, cauſing his Turkiſh horſe to make dayly incurſions to the very gates, who bore the heads of the chiefeſt Nicotians vpon their lances points, to daunt the ſouldiers, and to diuert them from their reſolution in ſuſteining the ſiege: hee did afterwards draw neerer to the Citty, making great trenches: but thoſe within the towne ſallying to skirmiſh, did ſo diſquiet the enemies, as they twiſe draue them from their trenches, and with their ordnance did ruine three Forts which they had almoſt finiſhed in places very commodious for them; namely at Saint Georges, Periſpola, and at the Crane tower, which neuertheleſſe, did afterwards do them great hurt, for they therein ſpent aboue fifty thouſand pound weight of powder, which ſince then they wanted.

Now becauſe winter drew neere, an vnfit ſeaſon for a ſiege, which they perceiued would prooue long and difficult, and that it behooued him beſides to ſtrengthen his Galleys, by reaſon of the intelligence hee receiued of the vniting of the Chriſtian fleete; Muſtapha beeing vnwilling to enterprize any thing, that might darken or eclipſe his glory purchaſed at Nicotia, did often and in ſundry ſorts ſolicite thoſe of the citty to entertaine ſome agreement, and to yeeld: He permitted Iohn Soſomene, who had beene taken at Nicotia to go to Famagoſta, vpon his own word, to procure money to pay his ranſome, that hee might exhort them to a voluntary yeelding, and to tell them that they could by no meanes hold out long. But the Captaines, Magiſtrates, and people of Famagoſta, reſoluing to defend it to the laſt man, would in no ſort liſten to his diſcourſe, but inſteed of intreating the Senate to quit that citty to the enemy, they humbly beſought it to ſend them aid: and the better to acquaint it with what they needed, they reſolued to ſend Nicolo Donato to Venice, with two Galleys, and with him Ieronimo Ragazzone, the Cities Biſhoppe, who was well inſtructed of all matters, and very fit for ſuch a buſineſſe.

But it is now time to returne to the Chriſtian fleet, which departing as hath beene beene ſaid forth of the Hauen of Suda was come to Sithy, where the Captaines beganne to conſult what was beſt to be done. Propoſitions were made by ſome of them to enuade ſome places belonging to the Ottoman Empire, and thereby enforce the enemies to leaue Ciprus to come to the reſkew of his owne, affirming it to be the ſureſt meanes to fruſtrate the enemies deſeignes. The Generall Zanne was of a contrary opinion, perſwading them to ſaile directly to Cyprus, alleadging how that the fleet was cheefly deſtined for the defenſe of that Kingdome, which by directing their courſe elſewhere could not bee preſerued from the danger which threatened it: That the only remedy was to goe and fight with the enemies fleet, becauſe that vpon report of their comming, the Turkes would be inforced to quit the land enterprize and to retire to their nauy for the defence thereof: which if they ſhouldnot doe, they were then ſure to find the empty Gallies in the Hauen expoſed to their mercy: That it was moſt likely, that the Turkes, vpon intelligence that the Venetians forces and Gallies were vnited with thoſe of the Pope and King of Spayne, would preſently leaue Cyprus, not to fight, but to returne to Conſtantinople: and that therby they might find meanes to incounter them by the way, & fight with them with great aduantage: for though they were Inferior to the enemies in number of men and veſſells, they were neuertheleſſe without all doubt in goodneſſe of ſhipping, and magnanimity and courage ſuperior to them; beeing beſides freſh and luſty, whereas the enemies could not but be much wearied and waſted with their exploits done ſince their arriuall in the Iſland: moreouer, to approach the enemies fleet, though no other profit ſhould enſue thereof, would encreaſe their owne reputation, whereas on the contrary to turne away from ſuch an enterprize would argue feare and cowardize, encreaſe the enemies courages and diminiſh their owne, eſpecially theirs that haue the guard of the Fortes in Cyprus: That it was no ſound aduiſe to looſe ones owne vppon hope to get it of another man; and leaſt of all when as a weaker Prince, ſuch an one as was the Common-wealth of Venice, could hardly defend it being gotten, or recouer from the Turkiſh power and in the middeſt of all his warlike countrey that which is loſt.

Sondry opinions of the Captaines of the christian fleet.

The Generall is of opinion to meet with the enemy & fight with him.

Theſe reaſons beeing ſtrong and forcible were approued by euery one, as agreeable to the Senates decree, namely to leaue all other enterprizes and to intend the voyage of Cyprus already reſolued, whereupon the fleeet departed from Candy the eighteenth day of September to ſaile thitherward.

The whole fleet conſiſted of an hundred and foureſcore light Gallies, namely an hundred and foure and twenty of the Venetians, twelue of the Popes, and fiue and forty of the Catholick King: and beſides all theſe, twelue great galleys, and foureteene Venetian men of warre, with great numbers of other veſſels of burthen, which carried Munitions and other neceſſaries. In the whole Nauie there were fifteene thouſand mercenarie footmen, beſides great numbers of voluntaries, and the moſt of them Gentlemen, and men of note, commanded by ſundry Captaines of great experience and reputation. The fleete ſayling with a faire winde towards Cyprus, did in three dayes, rid away three hundred miles, and arriued at Caſtel-roſſo, which is ſeated on a rock, oppoſite to Caramania, ſome hundred and fifty miles from Cyprus, where by reaſon of night that ſtole vpon them, and a tempeſt that aroſe, they were enforced to land in the Hauens of Vathi and Calamita, where the ſame night they receiued ſorrowfull newes of the loſſe of Nicotia.

The Number of the Chriſtian fleet.

This did greatly trouble the whole fleete, whereupon the next day a Counſell was called, to determine what was to bee done. Such as from the beginning had not approoued that iourney, did then condemne it more then before: and Doria did openly proteſt, that he would returne home, and ſaid, That he came from Candy, with an intent to releeue Nicotia, which beeing loſt, the cauſe of his iourney ceaſed, and that he knew none other reaſon ſufficient to expoſe them to the Doria hearing of the loſſe of Nicotia, is deſirous to returne home.

the hazard of a bataile, which in regard of the loſſe of that Citty was much more to be well conſidered: becauſe that the enemies beeing then free from land actions, and growne more proud and inſolent by meanes of the victory, would bee imbarked in their Veſſells, not alone to repulſe but to aſſaile vs; adding heerevnto, the vnfitnes of the ſeaſon, winter drawing on, & the long iourny they were yet to make before they ſhould arriue at their wiſhed Hauen. and alſo his particular charge of preſeruing his fleet which was committed vnto him by the Catholicke King.

The Generall & Prouidator vſe reaſons to Doria to perſwade him to ſtay.

Theſe reaſons making him reſolute in his opinion, he could not be diuerted from it by the Generall Zanne, nor by the Prouidator Veniero, who being already imbarked for Ciprus, ſeemed highly to allow of that iourney, each of them telling him that ſince they were come ſo farre together, he ought with them to run one ſelfe ſame fortune, and make prooſe of the hazards of warre; wherof they ſhould not afterwards haue cauſe to complaine, thereby blotting out the infamy which all men might throw vpon them, for hauing ſuch gallant forces and conſuming ſo much time in vaine without attempting any memorable matter: but all theſe perſwaſions were to no purpoſe with him nor with the reſt likewiſe who had noe liking to the iourney, who vpon Dorias refuſall to goe on any farther, the Generall Zanne to his greatgreeſe was enforced to permit it.

Doria returneth home.

The Chriſtian fleet then departing from Caſtell-roſſo, and comming all of them to Scarpanto into the Hauen Triſtano, Doria on a ſodaine took his leaue directing his courſe towards Puglia, and from thence into Sicily, his only care being to retire ſafely into his Contrey.

Colonna and Zanne being deſirous to exploit ſome worthy enterprize, remained ſtill together. But hauing intelligence that Piali, with a great number of well armed Gallies was come from Cyprus to ouertake them, and finding themſelues to weake for reſiſtance, they weighed ankors and ſailed into Candy to the Hauen of Canea, not without danger of being aſſailed by the Turkiſh fleet, which hauing notice of the Chriſtians departure ſailed ſpeedily to the Ile of Stampalia: and Piali determining to goe to Candy, in hope to find ſome aſſured booties on thoſe Seas, could not execute his proiect by reaſon of ſtormes and foule weather, wherevppon he returned back, and went into the Archipellago: where hee entered the Hauen of Calegiera making a ſhew as if hee would winter there, but on a ſuddaine changing his mind, hee went with his whole fleet vnto Conſtantinople.

At the ſame time certaine Townes of Albania which were ſubiect to the Turke did riſe againſt them, and being deſirous to ſhake off their ſlauiſh yoak, they ſent to requeſt the Venetian Magiſtrates their neareſt neighbors, to ſend them ſupplies of men and armes aſſuring them that at the firſt ſight of their Enſeignes they would ſpeedily come vnto them and become their ſubiects, and for a ſure teſtimony thereof, they offered to giue them their children in hoſtage: which requeſt of theirs, though it could not bee granted, as befitted their need and deſire,

Diuers places ſubiect to the Turke yield to the Venetians great numbers neuertheleſſe of inhabitants of the black Mountaine, and neere to Boyan, called at this day the countrey of Drina, and other places belonging to the Marcouichians, did ſubmit themſelues to the Venetians, ſo that the Gouernors of Antiuari, Dulcigna, and Budua, did in the name of the Venetian Commonwealth, receiue the oath of allegiance of more then an hundred townes and villages. The Chriſtians of Zara were in armes, not ſo much in hope to make any new conqueſt, as to repulſe the enemies, and to free the countrey from their continuall incurſions: But there was no memorable matter done, in regard both parties were apter to robbe and ſpoile then to fight.

In the meane time, the renewing of the league was treated at Rome, whither ſo ſoone as ample commiſſions were brought from Spayne and Venice to their Agents and Ambaſſadors for the concluſion therof, the Pope hauing called them before before him beganne to exhort them all to enter into league againſt the common enemy, telling them that the cauſe was common, (although that in reſpect of preſent loſſe it did more neerely concerne the Venetians), in regard the quarrel was betwixt Chriſtians and Infidells, and that if his owne preſence ſhould be neceſſary, his age ſhould not hinder him from the iourney: That he would entreat, ſolicite, and admoniſh the Emperor and all other Chriſtian Princes to enter into the league, for which he promiſed continually to pray vnto God that it might pleaſe him to grant it victory ouer his enemies.

The Popes exhortation for the concluſion of the league.

The Ambaſſadors and Cardinalls ſeemed to be greatly mooued by this exhortation, giuing his Holineſſe many thanks for it, each of them promiſing to proceed therein charitably, ſpeedily and ſincerely, as became a matter ſo important, holy, and deſired by their Princes, as well in reſpect of their owne particular intereſt, as for the Common good of all Chriſtendome: theſe words beeing often re-itterated by them did not produce effects conformable therevnto, but euery of them aimed at his owne particular profit, which beeing ſundry, brought forth different opinions, breeding extreame and important delayes in the concluſion of that buſineſſe, wherein diuers monethes were already vainely ſpent in idle and needleſſe diſputations.

The Pope had appointed fiue of the greateſt and nobleſt Cardinalls of the Colledge to bee preſent in the name of the Sea Apoſtolick at the treaty of the league, to wit, Alexandrine his Nephew, Moron, Ceſis, Graſſi, and Aldobrandino, betwixt whom and the two Spaniſh Cardinalls, with the two Ambaſſadors of Spaine and Venice, the treaty hauing beene begunne to be decided, they preſently fell into ſundry difficulties: for euery of them aiming to haue the league concluded to his owne particular profit, propounded very ſtrange matters, as it often happeneth in ſuch caſes: But the Pope who proceeded therin very ſincerely, his ayme beeing only for the good of all Chriſtendome, went about ſomtimes to moderate the exceſſiue demands of the Spaniards; proteſting that if they did not preſently conclude it, to reuoke all power and authority granted to their King to leuy money: Then turning his ſpeech to the Venetians, he exhorted them to harken to an agreement, though it were ſomwhat to their diſaduantage, promiſing neuer to faile them in any aid or releefe poſſible.

Long delaies vſed in the concluſion of the league.

The Cardinalls likewiſe that were his Holineſſe Commiſſioners, ſpeaking now to the one & then to the other, did all they might for the ending of the buſineſſe, but eſpecially Cardinall Moron, a man well experienced in the managing of moſt important affaires, and very eloquent, who allowing the propoſitions of the Venetians Ambaſſador, as thoſe which tended to the vniuerſall good, went about to draw the Kings Ambaſſadors from their owne priuate intereſt, and to make them capable of truth which hauing done by a very eloquent remonſtrance, and they vnable to make any reaſolable anſwer, fell to new excuſe, ſaying that they would write thereof into Spayne and expect a more particular and expreſſe commiſſion from their King.

The Spaniards idle excuſes.

The Spaniards added to the former difficulties which they had propounded, That the Venetians ſhould be bound on paine of Eccleſiaſticall Cenſures to obſerue in euery poynt that which ſhould be reſolued on in the league, as though they had ſuſpected the Venetians loyalty, which had like to haue broken off the whole buſineſſe: They did moreouer ſtriue about a General to command the Army, the Spaniards arrogantly crauing not onely to appoint a Generall (which was freely granted) but a Lieftenant, who in his abſence ſhould haue the ſame authority in the Army, there-by wholly diſtruſting the Venetians, which ſuſpition ſtill encreaſing, did much coole the treaty of the league, which was begunne with ſuch earneſt heate.

The difficulties propounded by the Spaniards.

The Senate being highly diſpleaſed there-with did expreſly ſend a new Ambaſſador to Rome to acquaint the Pope with their earneſt deſire to ſee the league concluded cluded, together with their firme resolution to continew the warre. Gionan Soranze was deputed to this end, who comming to Rome, and finding the same difficulties, his arriuall and speed could doe no greater good, so as to all mens greefe time was vnprofitably spent, which rather craued the execution of matters already resolued, then consultation about new.

The Emperor refuseth to enter into the league.

The league was at the same time propounded in the Emperors Court, where it had no better successe for the Emperor vnder sundry coullors hauing spent many monethes before he would giue any certaine resolution, beeing still desirous to gaine time did in the end declare, That hauing Truce with Selim for eight yeares, three of which were hardly expired it would be against his honor not to keepe his word; and though he were desirous to doe otherwise, yet he could not without the consent of the Princes and Estates of the Empire, neither did hee intend to doe it without the aduise and Councell of his owne particular States of Austria, whereuppon he craued time to thinke thereof, and to see the resolution of others, the which peraduenture by reason of the accident of Nicosia, might alter, and that hee would not consult on a matter of so great importance, but maturely and at leisure: By this answere it was easily perceiued, that hee had noe great inclination to intangle himselfe in that warre: the like did the other Princes and Common-wealthes of Germany. For the Emperor in the diet of Spyre hauing propounded to call another assembly to consult particularly on matters belonging to the league, answer was made, that when his maiesty had beene molested by the Turke they had not suffered him to want any aid or succour, but that then they would not but vppon vrgent necessity fall againe into so dangerous and difficult a warre.

The Senate hauing notice of the Emperors resolution and perceiuing that it was to no purpose any longer to entertaine an Ambassador there, called him home, the like they did to Antonio Tepulo appointed for the same purpose to goe into Poland, who so soone as they vnderstood the Emperours resolution they sent back for when he was halfe way on his iourney being assured that although the Polanders were a warlike nation and enemie to the Turke, yet they would not take armes vnlesse all Germany did the like. Such end had the negotiation of the league for that yeare.

The Venetian Generall resolueth to send aide to Famagosta.

Now to returne to the fleet, the Venetian Generall came to the hauen of Cania as hath beene said, as well in regard he was to neere his enemies & farre from his freinds, as for the season of the yeare vnfit for marine actions, thinking it folly then to goe to releeue Famagosta, whither for that time hee only resolued to send sixteene hundred footmen in three shippes, with twelue Gallies for their conuoy, vpon intelligence he had receiued how that eight Turkish Gallies lay at ankor not farre from thence, to keep all releefe from it. The Prouidator Venieri made intreaty that for more assurance, hee should send thither as many more shippes and soldiers, seeing that in the defense of that only Citty, the whole hope of the conseruation, or rather recouery of that Kingdome consisted; which beeing not effected by reason of sundry impediments, Venieri in regard thereof, or rather in regard of the indisposition of his person, remained in Candy.

The Marquis Rangon Palauicin his excuse.

The Marquis Rangon Palauicin was chosen to command those new supplies, but absolutely refusing to goe thither, said, That hee came to goe vnto Famagosta, if that Baillone were not there, or else vnto Nicosia, but the one beeing lost and Baillone remaining in Famagosta, hee was quit of his promise: but this excuse seeming vnworthy for so great a soldier, especially at such a time, hee lost his former reputation and shortly after his life in conceipt thereof Lodouico Martinenga Captaine of the men at Armes and then Gouernour of Cania, was elected in his stead Captaine Generall of those supplies, who freely accepted that charge.

Lodouico Martinenga leades supplies to Famagosta.

The

This beeing done, the Generall thought it fitte, for the eaſe of the Iſland to depart thence, and leauing Qurini in Candy, with the Galleys of the Iſland, and three great Galleys, hee ſayled with the reſt of the fleete to Corfou, beeing by the way by a terrible tempeſt driuen into the Hauen Vatica. There hee wayted for the Senates commandement to know what hee ſhould doe, eyther to ſtay there, or elſe (as himſelfe aduiſed) to paſſe on farther into Dalmatia, there to trimme his Galleys, and furniſh the fleete, with many things which it wanted.

Colonna preparing for his departure to Italy, was by reaſon of foule weather enforced to tarry a whole moneth in the Hauen of Caſopa, from whence tired with long ſtay, hee ſet ſayle, and in his iourney incountred many misfortunes. For his owne Admirall Galley ſtrucken with lightning, was in an inſtant burnt, himſelfe hardly eſcaping into the Galley of Franciſco Troni, the which not long after beeing by the ſame tempeſt driuen on ſhoare, was there beaten in peeces: but the weather waxing faire, hee arriued at Zara, hauing eſcaped two wonderfull and notable dangers: from whence hee wrote to the Senate, acquainting it with that late accident; then hee directed his courſe towards Ancona, and from thence rode poſte to Rome, to yeeld an account to the Pope of his iourney.

Collonna eſcapeth two great dangers as hee returned homeward.

The Generall Zanne within a while after fell ſick, as well by reaſon of the great trauailes hee had ſuſtained, as with greefe of minde: Wherevpon hee beſought the Senate to giue him leaue to come home to prouide for his health, which beeing granted, Sebaſtiano Veniere was choſen in his ſteed, who remained in Candie; hee was ſpeedily commanded to ſayle from thence with two Galleys to Corfou to take charge of the fleete, the which by the Senates Decree was to Winter there, and to bee furniſhed with all neceſſaries. And the Senate fearing leaſt Venieri ſhould bee gone to Cyprus before hee could receiue his Commiſſion, it determined to create a Prouidator Generall at Sea, who in Venieri his abſence, ſhould haue as ample authority as the Generall, and when Venieri ſhould bee in the Army, to hold the chiefe place next him. Auguſtino Barbarico, a man of ſingular wiſedome and integrity of life, was by a generall conſent choſen, on whom it ſeemed the Common-wealth might ſafely relye and build vpon.

Sebaſtiano Venieri is made Generall in Zanne his ſteed.

In this manner, and with ſuch ſucceſſe, ended the firſt yeare of this warre, begunne with greater reſolution then ſucceſſe. Now the vnhappy loſſe of Nicoſia, with other euents, cleane contrary to all mens hopes, greatly perplexed the Senate: ſo as vpon ſundry occaſions, it was much diſtracted. For on the one ſide, the earneſt deſire to recouer their reputation, and to bee reuenged for iniuries receiued, did prouoke them to renue the warre in fiercer manner then before, and to make new proofe of their fortune and valour: but on the other ſide, conſidering their enemies power, and the vncertainty of other Princes ayde, who were all addicted to their owne particular intereſts; they were tranſported with other thoughts, and ſome-times changed to accept ſome honorable conditions of agreement, from which they knew by intelligence from their Bayly, that the Turkes would not much ſtarte: and in regarde they ſtill held the Citty of Famagoſta, the report which was ſpred abroad euery where of the league, and of the Confederates great forces, together with the vncertaine ſucceſſe of that warre, did put them in good hope and comfort, the more eaſily to obtaine peace and quietneſſe, and to reduce their affaires to their former State:

Beſides, the great difficulties which hindered the concluſion of the league, the bad preſage and ill ſucceſſe of ſo vnfortunate and vnluckie a beginning of warre, and the confluence of ſo many aduerſities, did take away from the mindes of the moſt generous, all hope of any future ſucceſſe.

The Senators beeing thus irreſolute a very fit occaſion was offered them with their honors to negotiate a Peace. For the Baſcha Mahomet ſtill deſiring to compoſe this warre in friendly manner, was willing to renew the motion of peace, the ſucceſſe of that warre in no ſort liking him, for if it ſhould prooue vnfortunate it would encreaſe the danger of their Empire, if proſperous the authority & reputation of his enemy Muſtapha.

The Baſcha Mahomet reuiueth the treaty of peace.

Mahomet then beeing moooued by theſe reaſons did oftentimes diſcourſe with the Venetian Baily concerning the treaty of peace which was broken off, going about to draw from him whether he had any commiſſion to deale therein: at the laſt taking occaſion through the ordinary complaints made at the great Lords Port by the freinds and kinſfolkes of thoſe Turkes that were impriſoned at Venice, or whoſe goods had beene ſeazed there at the beginning of the warre he began to deale with the Baily to vſe means to the Senate that the Ottomans ſubiects ſo impriſoned might bee ſet at liberty, and their goods reſtored to them, ſaying, That it was againſt all equity, the Venetian Marchants liuing at liberty and enioying their goods ouer the whole Ottoman Empire, the ſubiects of the Turke ſhould bee diſpoiled of their goods, and kept in miſerable bondage and captiuity.

The Baſcha in ſpeaking heerof told him that his Lord was vexed thereat, and that hee did not only wiſh him to write to Venice, but to ſend an expreſſe meſſenger thither, to treat of that buſineſſe more effectually. Ibraim vſed the like ſpeech to the Baily, wiſhing him to incite the Senate to ſend a meſſenger of purpoſe to Conſtantinople, to the end that vnder coulour of this treaty concerning Marchandize, ſome meanes of a Generall Agreement might bee propounded.

The Baily vppon this aſſurance, and by the Baſchas permiſſion diſpatcht his owne ſteward with one of the Dragomans to carry letters to Venice, which the Baſcheas ſelfe had dictated to him concerning the affaires of Marchants, acquainting them afterwards more particularly what hee had done, and with the Baſchas intention.

Graſſinan a French-man departed at the ſame time from Conſtantinople, hauing beene Agent for the moſt Chriſtian King there; who arriuing at Venice, told the Senate that the Baſcha had vſed diuers ſpeeches to him concerning the treaty of peace, and that he brought letters from the great Lord and the Baſcha to his King to that end, knowing very well that they would not take it in bad part that the moſt Chriſtian King, as friend to both ſides, ſhould mediate ſuch an agreement.

Although the Senators did ſumwhat ſuſpect theſe propoſitions, fearing, that they were rather made to delay the preparations for warre, then to lay downe Armes, and enter into ſome honorable accord; Neuer-the leſſe the ſundry accidents of thoſe times did much perſwade to harken to thoſe Treaties, cheefly for that at the concluſion of the league a new difficulty aroſe about the time when it ſhould beginne. For the Spaniards, would haue let ſlippe all that cheefe part of the Summer, and not haue had it to bee mentioned in the capitulations therein contained, and that it ſhould not bee in force till the yeare following.

The Venetians great doubts & perplexities.

The Venetians on the contrary fearing that they ſhould not bee able to repulſe the firſt attempts of that mighty Army, which the Turkes were ſaid to haue prepared, and which was ready to march, had very earneſtly written to the Pope, that hee by his authority would remooue that difficulty, giuing him to vnderſtand how that by his Councell they had embraced warre, diſmiſſed the Chiaus from Venice, and contemned all other means of agreement propounded often-

The Venetians requeſt to the Pope.

oftentimes by their Bayly: that they had likewiſe by his aduiſe and councell, ſo long wayted for the Spaniſh Galleys, as in the end, their ayde was more in name then in effect: and yet they had euer ſhewed them-ſelues ready to conclude a league ſutable to his intention, and to the preſent need of all Chriſtendome. But all theſe intreaties and purſutes did not produce ſuch effects as the time required: For the Pope beeing of him-ſelfe well diſpoſed, and wholy inclining to the generall good, knowing that the Venetians were agreeable to his will, confeſſed that their requeſt was iuſt and honeſt, exhorted them to continue ſtedfaſt, and not to giue place to theſe firſt accidents of warre. And yet, his Holyneſſe beeing ouer-credulous, and ſuffering himſelfe to bee carryed away by thoſe, who for their owne particular intereſt fauoured the cauſe of the Spaniards, was eyther remiſſe, or did not conſtantly with his authority withſtand ſuch impediments, as were perceiued eyther to weaken the league, or delay the concluſion thereof.

The Emperor will not allow of the Popes new title giuen to the Duke of Florence.

The Venetians were likewiſe much greeued to ſee the Pope at that time entangled in other affaires: for the Emperors Ambaſſadors proteſted, that vnleſſe hee did reuoke and diſanull the new title which hee had beſtowed on the Duke of Florence, their Maiſter ſhould bee enforced to maintaine his owne dignity, with that of the Empire, by all meanes poſſible: The Pope though by Nature timerous, would not for all that retract that which hee knew hee might doe, and was well done, but made preparation by temporall armes to defend his owne authoritie, and that of the Sea Apoſtolick: Therefore hee ſpeedily leuyed forces, prouided armes, money, and all other neceſſaries for warre, cauſing Proclamation to bee made in all places vnder the Churches iuriſdiction (to the particular hurt of the Venetians) that it ſhould not bee lawfull for any, without exception, to leuy Souldiers forth of that State; and thereupon hee impriſoned Pompeo de Caſtello, and Gionan Aldobrandino, who beeing Pentioners to the Venetians, had in their name enrolled footmen in the Churches territories, whereby all men thought that Italy would fall into a dangerous warre. This made the Senate reſolue to ſend the Secretary Formenti to Rome, to appeaſe this new ſtirre: but his departure was delayed, and Commiſſion ſent to their Ambaſſadors there, to make the ſame requeſt to the Pope, and to put him in minde of the miſeries of the time, the greatneſſe of the preſent dangers which threatned Chriſtendome, together with the remedy (if there were any) alone reſiding in him. Whereunto though the Pope gaue a willing care, hee neuertheleſſe excuſed himſelfe by reaſon of his owne neceſſity, and did ſtill purſue his priuate deſeignes, leauing the euents of the common warre very doubtfull.

The Venetians reſolue to harken to peace.

Theſe troubles cauſed the Venetians to welcome the arriuall of theſe men from Conſtantinople, and likewiſe vppon ſo faire an occaſion carefully to thinke on the treaty of peace, becauſe they dayly ſaw their hopes more and more to decline, and the cauſe to ceaſe for which they had firſt neglected it. They determined then to hearken to the treaty of peace, and ſo much the more willingly as it was offered from the Turkes: neuertheleſſe, becauſe they would not ſeeme too greedy of it, nor inuite the Turkes thereby to infringe it vppon euery trifle, without motioning peace at that time, they gaue Commiſſion to Giacomo Ragaſſon, a man well experienced in ſuch buſineſſes, to goe to Conſtantinople, to treate of the enlargement of priſoners, and reſtitution of Marchants goods taken on eyther ſide: and beſides, the Councell of Tenne gaue him another ſecret Commiſſion to giue to the Bayly, which in effect was, that if afterwards the Turkes did motion peace, hee likewiſe ſhould ſeeme to deſire it, and enter into farther diſcourſe thereof, if he ſhould perceiue that it might take effect on reaſonable & honorable conditions for the Common-wealth, namely of recouering the Realme of Cyprus, in paying ſome great tribute to the Turke for it, or elſe that they might ſtill keepe the Citty of Famagoſta, or by quitting it to the great Lord, to haue ſome other State elſe-where in counter-change, and alſo for the reſtoring of their ancient confines of Albania and Dalmatia. They did impart as much to Ragaſſon, and gaue him power to ſpeake thereof, if the Turke, who had firſt craued to haue one ſent thither of purpoſe (for the Bayly was impriſoned) if for any other reſpects they ſhould refuſe to treate with him.

The Articles of peace propounded by the Venetians.

Ragaſſon his departure from Venice to Conſtantinople, was preſently diuulged in the Courts of Princes, but they aſſured them (as indeed it was ſo) that they had ſent him for the diſpatch of buſineſſe belonging to particular marchants, without any other commiſſion at all: yet euery man ſuſpected that hee had ſome other ſecret Commiſſion to treate of peace, the which they were the rather induced to beleeue, becauſe that the Venetians had occaſion thereby to ſeeke to aſſure their affaires, hauing had but an vnfortunate beginning in their warre, perceiuing their hopes dayly to vaniſh.

The Pope and Spaniards ſeeke to the Venetians to conclude the league.

The Pope hauing a ſhare in this ſuſpition, and beginning to ſhake off his feare of the Emperors armes, did hotly reuiue the Treaty of the League, beeing thereunto prouoked by the Spaniards, and determined to ſend Marc-Antonio Colonna to Venice, who beeing wiſe and pollitick, and very gratious with the Venetians, might with his ſpeech interrupt the practiſes of peace, and by granting them ſomewhat, which had beene denied them before, to induce them to conſent to the ſpeedy concluſion of the league.

Colonna beeing come to Venice, and often-times brought into the Senate, did vſe all good meanes and offers, to perſwade them to embrace the league, labouring to let them ſee how profitable it was for the Common-wealth, and how that his deſire to ſerue at once the Pope his naturall Prince, the Catholick King, vnto whome hee had vowed and dedicated his ſeruice, and them ſelues likewiſe, vnto whom, in reſpect of the truſt they had repoſed in him, hee was no leſſe bound then to any other whatſoeuer, did make him more earneſt in that buſineſſe, beeing not able to bridle his loue, nor conceale that which reaſon commanded him to vtter, and hauing by a long Oration particularly acquainted them with the preparations of the League, hee did earneſtly entreate them to embrace it.

Colonnas remonſtrance to the Venetian Senate.

Colonnas authority and eloquence was of force to haue perſwaded the greateſt part of the Senate to this confederacie, but the importance of the buſineſſe, the experience of the former yeares ſucceſſe, the quality of the generall propoſitions, and they vncertaine, and the hope that the Treaty of peace might haue more proſperous ſucceſſe, held the Senators in ſuſpence: whereupon, by a Decree of Senate, Colonna was anſwered in generall termes, how that their actions might teſtifie their diſpoſition towards the league.

The Senates anſwer to Colonna.

At the laſt, time preſſing them to make a ſpeedy reſolution, and Colonna hauing receiued new inſtructions from Rome, whereby all matters were granted them, concerning their forces, time when to employ them, and likewiſe for the increaſe of the number of their Galleys for the firſt yeare; the Pope did beſides particularly promiſe to permit them for fiue yeares ſpace to leuy three tenths vpon the Clergie of their State: theſe things beeing conſidered by the Senate on the one ſide, and the practiſes of peace on the other, by the commiſſions giuen to the Bayly and Ragaſſon, made the Senators very doubtfull, Peace and Warre beeing at their owne choyce and liking: whereupon the Senators were of contrary opinions concerning the continuation eyther of the one or other, not growing to any certaine reſolution. Eſpecially two of the moſt principall and eminent in the gouernment of the Republique, diſſented farre

in

in opinion; the firſt (which was Paulo Tepulo, a man very famous, and much practiſed in the gouernment of the Common-wealth,) ſaid, That without relying on Mahomets goodly propoſitions, which rather tended to deceiue and lull them a ſleepe, then benefit them, they ought without longer delay, to embrace the league, in regarde the concluſion thereof was certaine, and the euents of the Treatie of Peace moſt vncertaine. Andrea Badoario, a man of equall authority, was of a contrary opinion, ſaying, That ſeeing they had motioned peace, and had to thoſe ends giuen ample Commiſſions and inſtructions, they could doe no leſſe then expect an anſwer, and not make ſuch haſt, or rather precipitate themſelues into the concluſion cleane contrary. Both of them were attentiuely heard, and their reaſons did in ſuch ſort mooue the Senators, as they ſtill continued irreſolute. But at laſt the moſt part inclining to the concluſion of the league, the better to raze out that note of Infamy, wherewith the former vnhappy euents of warre had blotted them, they all on a ſuddaine altered their opinions, and reſolued to ſend ample power and authoritie to their Ambaſſadors at Rome, in their name to conclude the league, and preſently gaue Colonna a pleaſing anſwer, who ſuddainly returned to Rome, where the Pope hauing notice of their reſolution, called the Ambaſſadors of the Catholick King and Venetians into the Conſiſtory, where cauſing the Datary to read the Articles, agreed vpon betwixt them, hee was the firſt that ſwore (laying his hand vppon his breſt) ſtrictly to obſerue them: The Cardinall Pacheco likewiſe ſwore in the behalfe of the Catholick King (Granuell beeing gone to Naples) the Ambaſſador of the ſame King did the like, and thoſe of the Venetian Common-wealth in their Princes name ſwore on the Euangeliſts.

Tepulos opinion tends to warre.

Badoarios of a contrary opinion.

Warre is reſolued at Venice.

The league againſt the Turke concluded.

Then the Pope commanded, that the next day after diuine ſeruice was ſollemnly celebrated, and the Proceſſion ended in Saint Peters Church, it ſhould bee publiſhed, notwithſtanding that the Venetian Ambaſſadors were of opinion to deferre the publication thereof, till the Emperor were acquainted therewith, that his intention might bee knowne.

The particuler Articles of the league were theſe: Betwixt Pope Pius Quintus, promiſing for the Sea Apoſtolick and his ſucceſſors, with the conſent of the whole Colledge of Cardinalls, Philip the Catholick King, and the Duke and Senate of Venice, a league and perpetuall confederacie hath beene made, to abate and ouer-throw the Turkes power, who of late haue with a mighty Armie, enuaded the Realme of Cyprus, a countrey very commodious for the conqueſt of the Holy land. That the Confederates forces ſhall conſiſt of two hundred light Galleys, one hundred ſhips of warre, fifty thouſand footmen, Italians, Spaniards and Almaines, foure thouſand fiue hundred horſe, with Artillery and Munition proportionable to ſuch forces: all which ſhall bee imployed, as well for defence of the Confederates ſtates, as to aſſaile the enemies, and particularly for the enterpriſes of Argier, Tunis, and Tripoli: That all theſe forces ſhall bee vnited (in the moneth of May next enſuing, or at the beginning of Aprill) at Ottranto, to paſſe into the Leuant againſt the enemies, as time, and the councell of Captaines ſhall thinke fit. That theſe forces neuertheleſſe may bee changed, by increaſing or diminiſhing the prouiſions for warre, as neceſſity and the quality of the enterpriſe ſhall require: whereupon a yeerely meeting ſhall bee at Rome in Autumne, there to conſult what is beſt to bee done. And if it ſhall there bee concluded, not to attempt any thing that yeare in common, yet it might bee lawfull for euery of the confederates to execute their particular enterpriſes, and eſpecially for the King of Spaine, to enterpriſe thoſe of Argier, Tunis, and Tripoli, in which, ſo that there bee no mighty Turkiſh Army abroad, the Venetians ſhall bee bound to ayde the King with fifty Galleys for that purpoſe.

The Articles of the league.

That the King likewiſe ſhall bee bound to ayde the Venetians, whenſoeuer they will enterprize any thing in their Gulph againſt the common enemy, on this condition neuertheleſſe, if he which ſhall craue this aide, haue far greater forces ready. That all the Confederates ſhall bee reciprocally obliged to defend the States of any one of them whom the Turkes ſhall enuade, and in particular the Citties and other places belonging to the Church.

That for the expence of warre, the Catholick King ſhall pay the one halfe; and the other moyety beeing deuided into three parts, the Venetians ſhall pay two, and the Pope the third: they ſhall bee bound to giue the Pope twelue Galleys ready rig'd, and munitioned, which his Holyneſſe ſhall man for the ſeruice of the league. That generally each of the Confederates ſhall bee bound to contribute for the common neceſſity, whatſoeuer hee ſhall aboundantly haue, and others want, and afterwards ſhall haue it allowed in their accounts. That the ſtore-houſes for Corne ſhall bee euery where open for the common good, and that graine may bee taken forth of commodious places, ſo that hee from whom it is taken, haue firſt made his owne prouiſion. That at Councels and conſultations the Commanders of the three Confederate Princes ſhall bee preſent, and what the moſt of them reſolue on, ſhall bee concluded: Neuertheleſſe, the execution of matters determined, ſhall remaine to the Generall of the Army (who was preſently named) to wit, Don Iohn de Auſtria, and in his abſence Marc-Antonio Colonna with the ſame authority, though at the ſame time, hee retaine the title and ranke of the Churches Generall. A place was reſerued for Maximilian of Auſtria the elect Emperor, the moſt Chriſtian King, and the King of Portugall, to enter into this confederacie, when they ſhould thinke it fitte, and to all other Chriſtian Princes likewiſe, that had a deſire to enter into it. There was no particular mention made of places which ſhould bee conquered, for that was referred to bee diſpoſed off in the ſame manner, as in the league of the yeare 1537. wherein was expreſly mentioned, If any ſtrife ſhould ariſe betwixt the Confederates, the Pope as Vmpier and Iudge ſhould decide it, without any breaking off, or preiudice to the confederacie, or ſtoppe to the execution of matters by it eſtabliſhed.

Don Iohn de Auſtria Generall of the Army.

Theſe Articles (as hath beene ſaid) beeing ſworne to and ſigned by the Ambaſſadors, were within foure moneths after, as the ſame Princes had decreed, read, and ratified a new. But becauſe the Confederates were not tyed to obſerue all that is aboue mentioned, till the yeare following, it was agreed vpon in another writing a part, wherein the aboue mentioned matters were not particularly ſpecified, that the ſame yeare in the moneth of May, foure ſcore Galleys, and twenty ſhips of warre, ſhould meete at Ottranto to ioyne with the Venetian fleete, not comprehending in that number thoſe of the Pope, Duke of Sauoy, and Knights of Malta.

Some particular treaties.

During theſe treaties of peace and league, the Venetians with a generall conſent, made ſpeedy prouiſions for warre: they had not forgotten the affaires of Cyprus, and eſpecially the conſeruation of Famagoſta, on which depended the hope of all fortunate ſucceſſe. Marc-Antonio Quirini beeing choſen for this purpoſe, departed from Candy with foure ſhips to carry ſupplies thither, for whoſe conuoy twelue galleys were appointed. Hee beeing come neere to Famagoſta, cauſed his ſhips to ſaile ſome-what before in the enemies view which were in Conſtantia, himſelfe keeping toward the land: So ſoone as the enemies deſcryed theſe ſhippes, they ſent foorth ſeauen Galleys to inueſt them, which beeing perceiued by Quirini, hee ſuddainly aduanced with his Galleys, to get betwixt them and home.

Supplie ſent to Famagoſta.

But the Turkes, hauing diſcouered the Venetians galleis, and altering their purpoſe from offending others to ſaue themſelues, did ſpeedily make to the ſhoare from whence they came, ſo that they had time by help of thoſe of the campe, who in great troops came to their aid, to eſcape to land, & forſaking their galleis, ſome of Flight of the enemies Galleys.

of them were ſunke by Quirinis ordnance, who perceiuing ſome ſignes of a future tempeſt gaue ſpeedy commandement that the ſhips ſhould bee towed into the Hauen, that he might ſafely land his ſupplies conſiſting of ſixteene hundred foot, with great ſtore of munition & victuals, which did much incourage thoſe of the city, who infinitely commended his care and dilligence; and whileſt hee remayned there, hee tooke a ſhip of the enemies and ſome other ſmaller veſſels laden with munitions and victuals which were going to the Turkiſh army, and hauing intelligence that the Turkes had builded certaine fortes at the Rocke of Gambella, he ſailed thither with his Gallies, and on a ſodaine razed them.

The Venetians raze the forts at Gambella.

Theſe things beeing fortunately performed, Quirini ſuppoſing his longer ſtay there to bee to ſmall purpoſe did on the fixteenth day of February 1571. arriue with his Gallies in Candy. The Senate beeing very carefull to prouide for Famagoſta, ſent two other ſhips thither with eight hundred footmen and great ſtore of munition, vnder the command of Honcreo Scoto, with letters to the inhabitants full of hearty affection, highly commending their conſtant loyalty, intreating them ſtill to perſiſt in their owne defence and by no meanes to rely vpon the word or promiſe of thoſe Barbarous infidels: The like letters in effect were written to Baillone, wherein his valour was much commended, as worthy of his Anceſtors, and the loue which himſelfe and predeceſſors had euer borne to the Common-wealth, promiſing highly to recompence him.

More aide ſent to Famagoſta.

When theſe laſt ſupplies arriued at Famagoſta, they made vp the whole number of foure thouſand Italian footmen, eight hundred of the Iſlanders which are termed Legionaries, and three thouſand Citizens and country people, with two hundred Albaneſes.

The number of ſoldiers in Famageſta.

At the ſame time the rebellion of the Albaneſes againſt the Turkes did ſtil continue, diuers of the countries of Ducagina, Pedana, Ematia and Sadrina, comming dayly to make ſundry offers to the Agents of the Common-wealth, wherevpon, the Prouidator Celſi was commanded to ſaile to Catharra with tenne Gallies, but Celſi falling ſicke by the way, Nicolo Suriano, who was Lieutenant of the Gulphe, was commanded to take that charge vpon him, and with foure Gallies to enter into the Riuer Boyan to backe the rebellion of that people, and carefully to obſerue whether he could with good ſucceſſe make any attempt vpon Durazzo, Scatar, or Alexia which the chiefe of the Albaneſes had propounded. Suriano hauing continued certaine daies in thoſe confines, perceiued very well that the deeds were not anſwerable to their words, and that it was in vaine to make any attempt vpon the enemies territories without ſuffitient forces for that purpoſe: the Senate neuertheleſſe beeing vnwilling to omit any thing which it knew might auaile the Common wealth, choſe Giacomo Malateſta for Gouernor Generall in Albania, who comming to Catharra was deſirous to make incurſions into the enemies country, where hauing taken a great booty, and heedleſly returning homewards through a valley, hee was aſſailed by the enemies, and beeing wounded in the thigh, and beaten from his horſe was taken priſoner and carried to Riſſana.

The Albaneſes rebel againſt the Turkes.

In regard of the great expences which the Venetians were to furniſh, which would monthly amount to three hundred thouſand Ducats, the Senate ſought by all meanes to raiſe money; wherevpon it againe encreaſed the number of the Procurators of Saint Marke, they likewiſe ſold the paſtures and voide grounds, and the pawnes and pledges of La Zecca were opened vpon ſundry conditions. Prince Moceniga in that and all other matters ſhewed himſelfe very carefull and vigilant to make ſpeedy prouiſions of all neceſſaries; and being preſent on a time in the great councell, whither all Gentlemen that haue voyces in the creation of Magiſtrates doe vſually come, he made a briefe but important ſpeech, exhorting all of them to bee willing to releeue their deereſt country in that time of need and warre, either with money, aduiſe, or any other thing which it might want,

Prince Mocenigo his remonſtrance to the great councell.

euery

euery man according to his power and meanes, saying that they could neuer doe it in a time more conuenient, and thereby should not onely preserue their wealth, but their honor, children and liues, all which would be exposed to great danger if the insolent enemy should prooue victorious.

His words being pronounced with much earnestnesse did greatly mooue those of the assembly, and encouraged them boldly to continue that warre, with hope of better successe, whereupon, whatsoeuer was requisite for the furnishing of the Nauy, or for prouision of victuals, and money, which is the strongest sinew of warre, was presently determined and concluded.

Whilest the Venetians were thus busied in their preparations, the Turkes on the other side raised new forces to pursue the course of their victory. Selim had receiued such content for the taking of Nicotia, the newes whereof was brought to him by Mustaphas sonne, together with many ritch presents, as hee was desirous all other things laied aside to intend onely the ending of that enterprize, notwithstanding the great report which was made of the Christian fleet, the which after the conquest of Cyprus he promised to himselfe to defeate, and then presently to become Lord of all the Islands belonging to the Venetians, most commodious (as he said) to open a passage to the city of Rome, chiefe of the Romaine Empire and belonging to him as to the greatest Emperor, and of a long time promised by their Prophets to the Ottoman family.

Selim ruminating on these vaine and idle thoughts commanded his fleete, that so soone as Cyprus should be furnished with suffitient supplies, then to fight with that of the Christians, and afterwards pursue other enterprises as occasion should be offered. And according to his owne proiects hee sent twenty Gallies from Constantinople vnder the command of Caiacelebey, who by the way meeting with the Gallies of Chios and Rhodes, sailed altogether towards Cyprus, to keepe out all releefe from Famagosta. After his departure from Constantinople thirty other Gallies came to him, and beeing come to Finica to leauy souldiers, he went from thence into Cypras, where making some aboade, hee sent his Gallies in the meane time to Tripoli, to take in new supplies and munitions: then his Nauy being furnished with all necessaries he left Cyprus, leauing Aramat there with twenty Gallies, tenne Mohannes or flat bottomed boates to transport horse, fiue ships, with many other vessels for the guard of the Island, himselfe taking foure and fifty Gallies with him, and went to meet Portau, newly made a Basha in Piali's stead, who beeing come from Constantinople, and by the way ioyning the Gallies of Naples in Romagnia and Miteline with his forces, was with an hundred Gallies at Castel rosso, the Rendezuous of the whole fleet, whither within a while after Vluzzali came from Argiers with twenty of his owne Gallies, and diuers other vessels belonging to Pirates, and not long after, Hassan sonne to Barbarossa came thither likewise with twenty Gallies.

The number of the Turkish fleet.

The whole Turkish fleet beeing in this sort vnited, to the number of two hundred and fifty saile, went directly to the Isle of Candy and entred into the Hauen of Suda, and sayling afterwards towards Cania, it landed great troupes of souldiers neere to the city, who presently falling to booty, did put al to fire and sword. Against these the Prouidator of Cania sent great numbers of souldiers of the cities Garrison with diuers of Quirini's Gallies which were then in the Hauen, who enforced the enemies to retire, and our men beeing presently backt by three hundred Corsicans conducted by Colonel Iustinian, the enemies were put to rout and with great slaughter beaten to their Gallies, not daring to assault the castle. The enemies fleet departing from Candy, where it had done infinite harme, sailed to Ceriga, where it did the like, and from thence went to Iunca, where hauing trimmed their Gallies, they made incursions into the Isles of Zant and Cephalonia, and the inhabitants being retired into the fortes, all the villages and country houses were burned, and the whole country wasted.

The Turkes are put to rout in Candy.

The Turkes waste the Islands of Zant and Cephalonia.

The

The Turke beeing not ſatisfied with ſetting forth a fleet, had likewiſe raiſed a land army, vnder the command of Achmat Baſha, determining to enuade the Venetians both by ſea and land, in regard the treaty of peace was wholly broken off, and no hope of agreement left. For ſo ſoone as Ragaſſon came to Conſtantinople, the Turkes hoping by accord to obtaine that which they could hardly get by armes, he was together with the Baily brought before Mahomet the Viſier Baſha, who beganne highly to extoll the power of the Ottoman Empire, and to relate the great Lords deſeignes againſt the States of the Venetian Common-wealth, who reſolued to enuade them by ſea and land; That Selims intent was to propound peace on very hard conditions, neuertheleſſe hee would find meanes to moderate that great ſeuerity, prouided likewiſe that they would conſent to what hee ſhould tell them, which in effect was, that the Baily ſhould perſwade the Senate freely to ſurrender to Zelim the entire poſſeſſion of Cyprus, as a State iuſtly belonging to the Ottoman Empire.

Baſha's Mahomets propoſition to the Venetian Baily.

The Baily perceiuing thereby that the treaty of peace could not bee continued to the honour of the Common-wealth, aduiſed Ragaſſon to leaue Conſtantinople (which hee did) the other buſineſſe concerning merchants remayning likewiſe imperfect, which once was concluded, but preſently reuoked, by reaſon of ſome falſe reportes brought from Syria and Alexandria, ſo that Ragaſſons iourney was altogether vaine.

The end of the ninth Booke of the ſixth Decade.

The

The Contents of the tenth Booke of the ſixth Decade.

THE Spaniards abſolutely tell the Pope and Venetians that they will not ioyne their forces till Don Iohns arriuall. The great progreſsion of the Turkiſh fleet. The league is concluded at Rome and publiſhed at Venice. The Turkes take Dulcigna and Antiuary. The Venetians great preparations ſo ſoone as they heard that the Turkes were come into their Gulphe. The enemies come before Mandracchia, with their baſe retreat. The Pope ſoliciteth Chriſtian Princes to enter into the league. The arriuall of Don Iohn and the Spaniſh forces. The Turkiſh army before Famagoſta. Marc-Antonio Bragadino Gouernor of Famagoſta. The enemies at one time batter the city in fiue ſeuerall places. The beſeeged make a counter-battery. The Turkes giue many fierce aſſaults to the city. The cittizens by reaſon of extreame want are enforced to yeeld vpon compoſition. Muſtapha his perfidious cruelty; His impiety againſt the dead. The vnion of the Chriſtian fleete, with the number of the veſſels. The Chriſtian fleet reſoluth to fight with the Turkes. The famous battaile of Lepanto, where the Turkiſh fleet is defeated and put to rout. The number of the dead on both ſides, with the number of the enemies veſſels that were taken. The great ioy at Venice for newes of the victory. Don Iohn retireth to Meſsina. The Venetians take the fort of Marguerites. The Chriſtians enterprize vpon Saint Maur is bootles. And laſtly Marc-Antonio Colonna his magnificent entry at Rome.

The

The tenth Booke of the ſixth Decade of the Hiſtory of Venice.

THE Confederates nauall army which ſhould haue met at Ottranto in May, there to haue ioyned altogether, came not thither at the latter end of Iune, neither was there any tidings of it. The concluſion of the league hanging in ſuſpence, and the Venetians fearing that they ſhould not bee ſtrong enough of themſelues, to incounter and repulſe the enemies fleete, which was reported to bee farre greater then thoſe of the former yeere, determined to ſet forth threeſcore Gallies of the beſt in all the fleet at Candy, to employ them for the releeſe of Cyprus, or other places as need ſhould bee, to hinder the enemies nauigation vpon thoſe ſeas, and to cut off the rereward of the Turkiſh Gallies which ſhould lagge behind the fleet, and in a word to take hold on all occaſions which time ſhould offer. Such was the State of the Venetian fleet for that time, the greateſt part whereof remayning at Corſou, did daily expect the arriuall of the Spaniſh Armada.

The Venetians expect the (onfederates } fleets.

The Pope and Venetians made earneſt requeſt that the Gallies of Naples and Sicily which were ready might goe to Ottranto, but the Spaniards would not heare of it, reſoluing to tarry for Don Iohns arriuall. The Turkes on the other ſide hauing intelligence that the forces of the Chriſtian Princes were not yet vnited, departing from Candy did boldly ſaile forwards, the great Lord hauing commanded them to ſeeke out the Chriſtian fleete and fight with it, and in the meane time to waſte all places by the way belonging to the Venetian State. The Generall Venieri hauing intelligence of the enemies courſe and deſeignes, and knowing that nothing could hinder them from paſſing forward, reſolued to ſaile with the fleet to Meſſina, fearing (as it was very likely) that if the enemies fleet ſhould come neerer to Corſou, his owne Gallies would bee expoſed to ſundry perils and and dangers, and if the Turkes ſhould come and lie betwixt the Fana and the Merlieres, hee likewiſe feared that they would hinder the vniting of the Confederates forces.

What moued the Generall Venieri to ſail to Meſſina.

Whileſt theſe determinations were made abroad the league on the ſecond day of Iuly was with great ſolemnity and concourſe of people publiſhed at Venice, after the celebration of Maſſe in Saint Markes Church by Don Guzman de Silua Ambaſſador for the Catholike King, in the preſence of the Duke, Senate, Princes Ambaſſadors, and great numbers of Prelats, who together with the whole Clergy going afterwards through the city in Preceſſion, came into the great Market-place which was ritchly hung with tapiſtry and other coſtly ornaments, whither ſo ſoone as the Prince came to the vſuall place where proclamations are made to the people, the league was by an Herald publiſhed with great ſilence, which being done, the ordnance were ſhot off, drummes beaten, and trumpets ſounded to the great ioy and content of all the people.

The league is publiſhed at Venice.

The

The league being in this ſort publiſhed, they haſtened the preparations already begunne, and ſolicited other Princes to enter into it, that they might the better encreaſe their forces. Wherevpon the Pope determined for that purpoſe to ſend his Nephew the Cardinall Alexandrine into Portugall, ſuppoſing that the forces and territories of that King would bee fit to affoord aide and reputation to the league, hee beeing Lord of many armed veſſels, and his countries of the Indies confyning vpon the Turkiſh Empire: in reſpect whereof the Senate likewiſe reſolued that Antonio Tepulo then Ambaſſadour in Spaine ſhould to the ſame end goe to the King of Portugall to bee there in the name of the Common-wealth at ſuch time as the Popes Legat ſhould treat of that buſineſſe.

The Pope ſolliciteth the King of Portugall to enter into the league.

The Venetians, the league beeing thus concluded, were ſo bent to warre, vpon hope to encreaſe their forces by the aſſiſtance of other Princes, as they would not harken to any diſcourſe of peace: for the moſt Chriſtian King hauing diſpatched the Biſhop of Aix to Conſtantinople, chiefly to negociate ſome accord, and hee comming to Venice acquainted them with the zeale and affection of his King towards the good and proffit of the Common-wealth, togither with his Commiſſion to procure peace betwixt the Turkes and them; The Senate thanked him, and without giuing farther eare to his propoſitions called in the Confederates Ambaſſadours that they might heare his meſſage; this they did to take away all iealouzy and ſuſpition, and to animate them to warlike preparations like themſelues.

The Venetians will not heare of peace.

The Turkiſh fleet in the meane time came ſtill forward into the Venetian Gulphe, none daring to oppoſe it: on the other ſide the Sangiacs of Scopo, Durazzo and Ducagina, taking fiue thouſand men, tenne cannons and many other leſſe peeces with them, came neere to Dulcigna, hauing enforced the country people to quit the ſtreight paſſages which they guarded, wherevpon the inhabitants reſolued to abandon the city and to retire to Catharra: but Nicolo Suriana, and Sciarra Martinenga comming with new forces, did confirme and encourage them to defend their city, although it were not ſtrong either by art or nature.

The Turkes come before Dulcigna.

The enemy beeing encamped before it, after that hee had made a battery and a reaſonable breach, the Ianiſſaries prepared for the aſſault, wherevpon Martinenga beeing out of all hope to hold out long without freſh ſupplies did ſpeedily ſend for the French men which hee had brought thither, with whom for a time they valliantly defended it: but the enemies fleet approaching, and Suriana in that reſpect beeing with his Gallies enforced for to quit thoſe ſeas, all the inhabitants and ſouldiers beeing affrighted, and wholly deſpayring to hold the towne any longer, craued a parley, the battery hauing continued for the ſpace of twelue daies, and the accord was made with the Baſha to depart with their liues and goods, with promiſe to giue them foure ſhips, to tranſport thoſe to Raguſa that were willing to depart, and good entertainment to ſuch as would ſtill remaine there, and that the ſouldiers might depart with their armes and enſignes.

Dulcigna yeeldeth to the Turkes in compoſition, which is badly obſerued.

The city was deliuered to the Turkes, though that the conditions were afterwardes badlie obſerued, becauſe that ſince then, ſome contention either true or feigned ariſing therevpon betwixt Pertau and Achmat Baſhas who were come to that ſeege, they tooke occaſion to deale cruelly with thoſe poore wretches, who relying on their word had ſubmitted to them, for they cauſed all the inhabitants in a manner to bee impriſoned, and did put diuers valliant Albaneſe ſouldiers to the ſword, that were come thither to defend the city: onely they kept their word with the Gouernor, Martinenga, and ſome few other of the chiefeſt, who were ſafely conducted to Raguſa.

Dulcigna

Dulcigna beeing taken, the enemies fleete ſailed towards Antiuari, where the inhabitants were much daunted with their neighbours misfortune, though they feared not the fleete, the Citty beeing foure miles from ſea. The Gouernor hauing intelligence of the enemies approach, did without waiting for their comming, ſend the Citties keyes to the Baſcha by ſome of the principall townesmen, in regarde whereof hee was afterwards by the Senate condemned to perpetuall baniſhment.

In the meane time, newes beeing brought to Venice, how that the enemies with a mighty fleete were come into their Gulphe, the whole Citty was much terrified, eſpecially when it vnderſtood, how that in all places where they came, they left terrible ſcarres behinde them, the Venetians preſently began to fortifie all paſſages, and eſpecially the Porte of Saint Nicholas on the ſhoare, oppoſite to which is a very ſtrong Caſtle builded, and well ſtored with ordnance, the defence whereof was committed to Lodouico Grimani, with certaine foote companies, and furniſhed with expert Gunners: they afterwards gaue Vincento Moroſin, one of the cheefe Senators charge of all the Fortifications along the ſhore, with ſixe other Gentlemen of the order of Senators to aſſiſt him, namely Daniele venieri, Marco Iuſtiniano, Ieronimo Contareni, Franceſco Mithaele, Lorenzo Souranze, and Andrea Bernardo.

Theſe men cauſed a mighty Iron chaine to bee drawne from the aforeſaid Caſtle to the oppoſite ſhore, the which embarred the whole Channell, and behinde it they placed three great Galleys, and a certaine number of light ones, which were well ſtored with Ordnance. All other paſſages were likewiſe aſſured: they did more-ouer place ſundry corps du Guard in diuerſe places of the citty, and in a word omitted nothing which was neceſſary for the preſeruation and defence thereof.

But it was knowne within a while after, that all theſe ſpeedie preparations were altogether vnneceſſary: For Vluzzali, Admirall of that fleete, after that hee had waſted, (as hath beene ſayd) the Iſles of Liſena, and Curſoles, went back againe to ioyne with the Baſha, who with the reſidue of the fleete, lay at the mouth of the Channell of Catharra, where making ſome aboade, hee ſummoned the Caſtle to yeeld, and yet made none attempt vppon it; becauſe peraduenture hee was vnwilling to performe any great enterpriſe, or elſe feared the vnion of the Chriſtian fleetes.

The enemies fleet returneth forth of the Gulph of Venice.

Whereupon hee departed thence, and ſailed to la Valona, where hauing reenforced his Armie with diuerſe troopes, brought to him by the Sangiack of Boſſina, and ſent foorth certaine Galleys, truely to diſcouer the eſtate of the Confederate nauall Armie, hee bent his courſe towards Corfou; and comming to Paxu, hee ſent firſt to view Mandracchia, and the Galleys going vnto Butintro, the Captaines coaſted vppe and downe the Iſland, and heedfully obſeruing the ſytuation thereof, could not agree vppon that which they would haue done.

In the meane time, diuerſe ſouldiers which were in the Fuſts going on ſhore to get pillage, fell into an Ambuſcado of certaine troopes of horſe belonging to the garriſon of the Citty vnder the commmand of Captaine George Mormori, by whom all the enemies were eyther ſlaine or taken, and among others Caſſan, ſurnamed Baffa, a Renegado of Candy, a man very famous, not ſo much for his experience in marine matters, as for his notable crue'ty.

The Chriſtians ſurprize ſome of the enemies by ambuſcado.

In the end, the whole fleete drew neere to the Iſland, and yet as they paſſed along many Cannon ſhot were beſtowed among them, which did no great harme thorow the fault and ſmall experience of the Gunners. And comming to Potama, great numbers of ſoldiers were landed, who aſſaulted the towne, our men who had had ſeazed on the paſſages of the mountaines beeing to weake to hinder their paſſage, Phillippo Rancone with foure hundred footmen garded the Towne, part of his forces were Greekes and the reſt Italians, who perceiuing the enemies great numbers, beganne to retire towards the plaine, where finding other ſupplies ſent from the Caſtle, he made a ſtand, and cauſed the Turkes that followed him to doe the like:

The Turkes come before Mandraccbia.

But the day following, greater numbers beeing landed, together with ſixe hundred horſe which they had taken in at Butrinto, they gaue an aſſault to the Caſtle Saint Angelo, and finding it to be a farre difficulter enterprize then they had immagined, gaue it ouer: but being deſirous before their departure to leaue ſome token of their barbarous cruelty behind them, they burnt many Country houſes, and diuers Churches, ruining the Villages and Vineyards neere to the Citty, and the third day after they departed from the Iſland.

The Venetians did with great greeſe endure all theſe miſeries and calamities, ſtill truſting to the aid of the league, and yet they receiued not thereby the profit and commodity which they had hoped for, for which to their great loſſe they had altered their former deſeignes, and in a manner engaged their forces: becauſe that a decree beeing made that the Gallies of Candy ſhould ſaile towards Meſſina, there to ioyne with thoſe Confederates, they were doubtfull of the ſucceſſe of Famagoſta, hauing receiued no newes whether it had been releeued or not: and for that on the other ſide their Generall, by waiting for Don Iohns arriuall, was an idle Spectator of all thoſe wronges and outrages which the enemies had done vnto them and yet durſt not ſet fore-ward to take reuenge.

The Venetians complaints to the Pope.

Therefore they reſolued to ſhew vnto the Pope, how that by his meanes they had entred into that warre, and had refuſed all meanes of Agreement, therein to obey the authority of the Sea Apoſtolick, and not to ſeeme likewiſe to diſtruſt other Chriſtian Princes, that they for their partes had notwithſtanding all expences and dangers prouided what ſoeuer was neceſſary for the vnion; and, they did not ſee that the Confederates effects were correſpondent to their diligence and induſtry: ſo as that league which had beene made for the honour and glory of Chriſtendome, did more diſhonour them, and in particular did great harme to their Common-wealth, by reaſon of the loſſe of Famagoſta, which vndoubtedly would ſhortly enſue, except it were ſpeedily releeued.

Theſe complaints beeing propounded to the Pope who found them very iuſt and reaſonable, he ſpeedily diſpatcht a Poſt to Don Iohn, writing by him to his Nephew the Cardinall Alexandrine, who was in Spayne, earneſtly to purſue that buſineſſe according to his former inſtructions.

The King of Spains anſwer to the Cardinall Alexandrine.

The Legat Alexandrine was honorably entertained by the Catholick King, who in ſmooth termes accquainted them with his erneſt deſire therein to ſatiſfie the Pope, hauing determined for that purpoſe, that Don Iohn with the Spaniſh Gallies ſhould goe and ſpend the winter in Sicily, thereby to bee readier to execute that which ſhould bee concluded at Rome. And although hee had often by letters in former time exhorted the Emperor to enter into that vnion, hee would expreſſly neuer the leſſe ſend Don Pedro Faſſarda to him, to entreat him from him to condiſcend therevnto

The Emperor is doubtfull.

Hee beeing come to the Emperors Court found him very doubtfull: for hee receiued many meſſages and letters from the Baſcha of Buda who exhorted him to obſerue the peace, promiſing him faire and Kingly neighborhood and freindſhip: on the other ſide hee had Intelligence of the Turkes warlike preparations, who remaining till then at Scopia held all men in ſuſpence to what place hee determined to bend his courſe: in the end hee reſolued to ſend the accuſtomed tribute to Conſtantinople, beeing aſſured that it could in no ſort hinder the league league, nor keepe him-ſelfe from entring into it, when time ſhould ſerue, whereas on the contrary, by delaying it any longer he might receiue ſome great loſſe; becauſe that Selim doubting his loue and good meaning, might aſſaile him on a ſodaine. The Emperors reſolution.

Theſe things did greatly trouble the Venetians, who knew very wel that peace with the Turkes, in the warlike and mighty Northerne Prouinces, would greatlie preiudice the league, and precipitate the ſtate of the Common-wealth into greater daunger: in regard whereof the Pope and the Catholike Kings Agents, propounded to the Emperor, that they would giue him out of the Confederate forces, twenty thouſand foote, and foure thouſand horſe, to enuade the enemies on that ſide, and that the other thirty thouſand which remayned (according to the treaty of the league) would ſuffize for the execution of their Sea actions.

The Emperors Ambaſſador reſident at Rome, had oftentimes aſſured them, that the Emperor wanted no good will to warre on the Turke, but meanes; and therefore if the Confederate Princes would promiſe him aide, he would without all doubt enter into the league; and that all Germany being at laſt prouoked by neceſſity and ſhame, would ioyne in that warre and by their example, Poland and Muſcouy would doe the like. The leagues offer to the Emperor.

Neuer-the-leſſe, all theſe offers were vaine and to no purpoſe, becauſe that the Emperor making many excuſes, continued his former reſolution to ſend the tribute to Conſtantinople. In the meane time the Gallies of the Pope, Venetians, Florentines and Malteſes met at Meſſina, where with great earneſtneſſe they waited for the arriuall of Don Iohn, who departing from Cathalognia with ſeauen and twenty Gallies and fiue thouſand Spaniſh foote-men, did at laſt arriue on the laſt day of Iuly at Genoa, where making ſhort ſtay, leauing Doria with twelue Gallies, to make prouiſions for the fleete, him-ſelfe went to Naples, where hee was entertayned with great magnificence, and receiued the ſtandard of Generall for the league which the Pope ſent him: and within a while after leauing thirty Gallies to conuoy the ſhippes, hee went with the reſidew of the fleet to Meſſina, where he knew that the Generalls of the Pope and Venetians expected him.

Hee was accompanied by many great Lords of Spaine, namely by Don Bernardin de Requeſens great commendador of Caſtill, Don Aluares de Baſſan Marquis of Santa Cruz, Don Iuan de Cardona, Earle of Piega, Antonio Doria, Carlo d'Auſtos Duke of Seſſa, Ferranti Loffra, and the Marquis of Treuic, who for Nobillity, and the Kings fauour, were very famous: Theſe were of Don Iohns Councell for warre. The arriuall of Don Iohn with the Spaniſh forces.

Now ſo ſoone as Don Iohn arriued at Genoa hee diſpatcht Micaele de Moncada the Kings counceller to Venice, to acquaint them with his comming and to gratifie the Senate for the good opinion it had conceiued of him, and to promiſe that he would in ſuch ſort manage all matters, as they ſhould not bee deceiued in him: being very deſirous ſpeedily to execute ſome notable enterprize vpon the enemies. The offers of Don Iohn to the Venetians.

Theſe newes, pleaſing to all men, did awaken their former hope. The Turke then departing with his whole fleet (as hath beene ſaid) from Corfou returned to Butintro, where remayning for a time to receaue ſome intelligence of the Chriſtian fleete, and a new commiſſion from Conſtantinople, hee went after-wards to Preueze, where the Baſcha receiued certayne newes of the taking of Famagoſta, and a particular commiſſion to goe and ſeeke the Chriſtian fleete to fight with it.

The Turkes after the taking of Nicoſia had deferd the ſeege of Famagoſta, by reaſon of winter and other diſcommodities, vnfitting for a ſeege: but ſo ſoone as it drew neere towards the ſpring, they ſpeedily prouided all neceſſaries for it, as ordnance, munition, and other war-like engins, which were ſent to them from Syria and Caramania: fifty thouſand Turkes came thither like-wiſe, many of whome tooke no pay, but onely ſerued in hope of booty, the Baſcha hauing craftely giuen forth, that the ſpoyle of Famagoſta would be farre ritcher then that of Nicoſia.

The enemies army before Famagoſta.

The enemies army being thus prouided, and ſtrengthned, did about the middeſt of Aprill approch the citty, hauing brought fifteene peeces of battery from Nicoſia, and making great trenches, one part of the army encamped in the gardens, and the other at Percipola: Then on the fiue and twentieth of the ſaid moneth they made platformes whereon to plant the ordnance, with deepe and broad trenches for the Harguebuſiers, ſo cloſe together as it was impoſſible to anoy them, hauing ordinarily (but eſpetially in the night) forty thouſand pioners at worke.

The care of thoſe within the Citty for their fortifications.

The enemies intent being diſcouered, they of the towne began to rampier vp all places which they thought the enemy would batter: there was euer a ſtrong gard on the way couered with the counter-ſcarpe, for the better defence thereof, and they raiſed new flanquers; they did afterwards on that ſide of the wall which was battered make a trench twelue foote in depth, and breadth, with ſmall loope-holes for the Harquebuſiers, from thence to defend the counterſcarpe.

Marke-Antonio Bragadino was Gouernor of the Citty, who together with Aſtor Baillone did carefully prouide what-ſo-euer was neceſſary without any confuſion at all, being a man that well knew what did belong to his place. Antonio Bragadino lay in the Caſtell raiſing new flanquers to defend that ſide of the Arſenall. The Knight Goita was Maiſter of the ordnance, who being ſlaine in a skirmiſh, the Gouernor gaue his company to Neſtor Martinenga. More-ouer, three Captaines were appointed, to take charge of the fire-workes, each of them hauing twenty ſoldiers vnder his command, choſen out of all the companies, to beſtow thoſe fiers when neede ſhould bee, all the ordnance was brought to thoſe places where they expected the battery.

The number of ſerviceable men in the citty

Beſides, they made diuers ſallies to moleſt thoſe abroad, and to hinder their workes. At the laſt they cleered the citty of all vnprofitable eaters, which were in number eight thouſand perſons, who retired into the villages, the Turks doing them no harme: The reſt of the people being numbred amounted to the ſumme of ſeauen thouſand ſeruiceable men, namely three thouſand fiue hundred Italian foot, and the reſt Greekes.

Bragadins exhortations to his ſoldiers.

Bragadini dayly perceiuing the dangers to encreaſe by reaſon of the enemies approaches, exhorted and encouraged his ſoldiors, telling them that the time was now come to manifeſt their ſingular vallour and generous courrage by brauely defending that Citty, ſo farre remote from other parts of Chriſtendome, againſt the power of the Ottaman Empire, in ſo iuſt a quarrell as theirs was, and to caſt away all feare, hoping onely that God, who is the giuer of victories, would giue them good and fortunate ſucceſſe.

This ſpeech cauſed euery man to encourage his fellow cheerely to entertaine labour and danger. Three hundred of the beſeeged with ſword and rarget, accompanied with as many Italian Harquebuſiers made a ſalley, who at firſt did put the enemies to flight, but at laſt were ſo rougly charged, as in their retreate they loſt thirty of their men, where-vpon it was concluded to make noe more ſallies.

The enemies make fiue batteries at one time.

The enemies beeing by little and little come to the toppe of the counter-ſcarpe, and hauing ended their fortes which were tenne in number, beganne the battery with three ſcore and foure cannons, among the which were foure foure Baſiliſcos of an exceeding bigneſſe did beat the Gate Lemiſſa, euen to the Arſenall.

They beganne to batter it in fiue ſeuerall places at once; the one at the Tower of the Arſenall on which fiue Canon from the fort of the Rock continually plaid, the other againſt the curtaine without the Arſenall which was battered by eleuen peices; the third was out of another Fort with eleuen Cannons vppon the Tower of Andrazzi, and two Caualiers abone it: the fourth plaid vpon S. Napes great Tower with the foure Baſiliſks; and the laſt was againſt the Gate Lemiſſa battered from ſix fortes with three and thirty Cannons, where the Generall Muſtapha was in perſon. At firſt they began rather to batter the fortifications of the Cities Ordnance, then to ruine the walls, by reaſon that it did much anoy them; whereuppon the beſeeged, ſo ſoone as the enemy had begunne the Battery, quartered themſelues vnder the wall where they continued till the end: Bragadin kept the tower Andrazzi, Baillone that of S^t. Nape, and Tepulo that of Campo-ſanto, that they might be preſent at euery action, to reward the valliant and rebuke cowards. The charge of the Ordnance was committed to Lodouico Martinenga, and ſix other Captaines were appointed vnder him to command the Canoniers and to furniſh them with what they wanted.

The diligent care of the Captaines of the City.

Captaine Franceſco Bogone commanded the Tower of the great Caualier of the Arſenall: Pietro el Conte lay at the Courtaine of the Caualier Del Volti, and at the Tower of Campo-ſanto, Neſtor Martinenga had charge of the Caualier of Campo-ſanto, of that of Andrazzi and of the Curtaine as farre at Saint Napes tower, together with that Curtaine which lieth neere the Gate Lemiſſa: Horatio Valatri had the guard of the Rauelin & Curtaine towards the Bulwark, Robert Maluzzi cõmanded the Caualier of Lemiſſa which was more anoied then al the reſt.

Euery Captaines charge.

Beſides, ſo ſoone as the battery beganne, Bragadini commanded wine, cheeſe, and poudered fleſh to be carryed to the Italian and Greeke ſoldiers and Gunners vpon the walls, ſo as the ſoldiers ſpent but two Venetian ſouls a day in bread, and were payed euery thirty dayes. The beſeeged did for tenne daies ſpace make ſo furious a counter-battery, as they made fifteene of the enemies peices of Ordinance vnſeruiceable, and ſlew thirty thouſand of their men, ſo that they were not ſafe in their forts: but the beſeeged foreſeeing the want of pouder were enforced to limit, how many ſhotte a day euery peece ſhould make, namely thirty, which muſt bee made in the Captaines preſence, for feare of ſhooting in vaine.

The beſeeged make a counterbattery.

They want pouder.

The Famagoſtans beeing thus careſull a Fregate arriued from Candy on the 29. day of May, which encouraged and told them that they ſhould ſpeedily be releeued. The enemies in the meane time hauing by force and great ſlaughter of their men wonne the Counterſcarpe, did beginne to digge downe the earth neere to the wall of the Counterſcarpe, which the beſeeged did day and night carry in: the enemies perceiuing it, made certaine loope holes from which to beat them in flanck, to hinder their workes, (which tooke effect) wherein they afterwards threw ſo much earth as it filled vp the Dike; then hauing perced through the Counterſcarpe, they made a paſſage through the Dike euen to the wall, which they fortified with wooll ſacks and fagots: ſo as they could not be anoyed but from aboue, and that ſildome.

The enemies being come ſo neere the walls began in ſundry places to vndermine, whereuppon the beſeeged make countermines the charge whereof was committed to the Knight Maggio, they threw fire-workes vppon the enemies, which did greatly anoy them; ſome of theſe mines did no good, the reſt tooke effect, as that at the Tower of the Arſenall, which with great noyſe brake the wall which was of a wonderfull thickneſſe, and threw more then the one halfe of it to the ground, carrying with it part of the Parapet.

The Toure of the Arſenall ouerthrowne by a mine.

This breach cauſed great numbers of Turkes with their Enſignes to mount it. Pietro el Conte with his company had the gard there, who did bravely at firſt ſuſtaine their aſſaults, whither other Captaines with their companies comming to ſecond him; the Turkes were roughly repulſed, the aſſault hauing continued aboue fiue howers.

The enemies are repulſed from the breach.

The beſeeged in this action loſt aboue an hundred and three-ſcore men, and many were wounded there. Marco Criuellatore and the Knight Maggio did afterwards in all parts, where they perceaued mines to be made, make places of refuge well flanqued with barrells full of moiſt earth, and ſackes full of ſtraw, the Greekes for that purpoſe bringing willingly what-ſo-euer they wanted, for the ſpeedy reparation of the Parapetts, ruined by the enemies artillery, which plaid vppon them day and night without intermiſſion.

These reparations were to very great purpoſe becauſe that the ſhot lighting on no ſolide ſubſtance did no other harme then carry away with it ſome of thoſe ſackes, and others beeing preſently put in their place, the breach was ſtill ſtopt vp. The enemies, purſuing their former deſeigns, gaue fire to the mine of the raueling of the Rocke, which made a very great breach; where-vpon, they preſently gaue a furious aſſault, Muſtapha looking vpon and encouraging them. Count Hercules Martinenga and his company did brauely with-ſtand them, till the other Captaines came thither, and then the enemies were repulſed with great loſſe: the like happened at the Arſenall, where after an aſſault, which laſted ſixe howers, the Turkes, to their great ſhame, were enforced to retire: the Biſhop of Limiſſa with the croſſe in his hand, came to the aſſault to encourage his countrymen; the like did many valliant Ladies, bringing armes, ſtones, and ſcalding water to the ſoldiers.

The Turkes in the preſence of the Generall Muſtapha, giue a furious aſſault and are repulſed.

The enemies being by theſe meanes, and by the ſingular valour of the beſeeged, ſo often repulſed, and out of hope that way to take the Citty, began to build other forts neerer to it, from whence they might with more eaſe beate downe the defendants fortifications and ſafe places of retreat, and taken from themſelues all impediment: and hauing to this end built ſeauen forts, they planted great ſtore of ordnance in them, from whence they continually ſhot, keeping them ſtill in alarum and made ſhew (eſpecially in the night) as if they would giue an aſſault, whereby the beſeeged had not a moments eaſe, nor any meanes to reſt, but onely in the heat of the day.

The great labour and trouble of the beſeeged.

The Turkes at laſt perceiuing that breaches of the mines were not ſuffitient to open their paſſage, fell to vndermining the walls, ſo as they reduced the Rauelin to ſo ſmall a ſpace, as the beſeeged were enforced to giue themſelues ſcope with boords and other matter. Then the Knight Maggio perceauing that of neceſſity they were to abandon the Rauelin, being no longer able to keepe it, hee made a mine there, that he might quit it to the enemies great loſſe,

An aſſault giuen in foure ſundry places at one time.

Muſtapha perceauing that the wall might bee mounted in ſundry places, reſolued at one time to giue an aſſalt in foure ſeuerall places, namely at the Rauelin at Saint Napes tower, at that of Andruzzi, and at the Curtaine and tower of the Arſenall; in all which they fought continually for ſixe howres ſpace, in three of which the enemies were brauely repulſed, but the fourth, which was the Rauelin, was of ſet purpoſe forſaken, to the great hurt both of the Turkes and Chriſtians. For, it being aſſalted thoſe within it being not able with their armes to ſtirre vp and downe, by reaſon of the ſmall roome, and going about to retire as it had bin already determined, the enemies mingled them-ſelues among them, where-vpon, fire being giuen to the mine, it blew vp a thouſand of the enemies, and two hundred Chriſtians. Muſtapha him-ſelfe was preſent at euery aſſault, where he encourraged his ſoldiers, rebuked ſome, and promiſed rewards to others according to their deſerts. The Rauelin being loſt there was no more betwixt the aſſaillants and the beſeeged then the thickeneſſe of the places of retreat, made (as hath beene ſaid) with tuns and ſacks full of earth, and ſtraw, ſo, that thoſe of the campe, and the citties

crues ſoldiers, did often times talke togethet according to the manner of war, the Turkes flouting and bragging, and the Chriſtians deriding their vanity, and amid their ieſts the enemies brought fom Chriſtian ſlaues they had in their Camp to propound to them ſome particular agreement, as they had already ottentimes done by letters to the Gouernour and people tyed to arrowes, which were neuer anſwered, nor any conſent giuen to come to parley.

The Turkes perceiuing that their cunning trickes were to no purpoſe, did againe turne to force, and came to a new aſſault by meanes of the Rauelin which they had already wonne, where on both ſides was a braue fight, but moſt of all to the honour and reputation of the beſeeged, for, valourous and braue Baillone beeing more courageous in deedes then words, encouraging his Soldiors in the formoſt rankes, did himſelfe take from a Turkiſh Enſeigne-bearer, an Enſeigne wherein the Armes of the Venetian Common wealth was painted, which they had wonne at the taking of Nicoſia, and Lodouico Martinenga on the other ſide, who had the guard of that quarter, ottentimes refreſhing his men in the fight, putting new in their ſtead that were hurt or tired, ſtill exhorting them to doe worthily, did that day purchaſe the fame and reputation of a diſcreet and valiant Captaine.

The valour of the beſeeged in repulſing the enemy.

This attempt of the enemies, hauing no good ſucceſſe, they inuented another way, yet vnpractiſed, they did caſt a great heape of wood called Teglia which is very apt to burne, againſt the gate of the Rauelin with ſtore of pitcht fagots, which thy ſet on fier, it burnt ſo fiercely as it was impoſſible to quench it, this fier laſted fiue dayes, by meanes wherof the beſeeged were enforced to retire farther in by meanes of the great heat and ſmoake.

Another inuention of the enemies to take the City.

Notwithſtanding all theſe diſcommodities, labours and troubles, theſe valiant men did ſtill continew the defenſe of their Cittie, determining to hold out euen to the laſt Man: but all things faiting, ſauing hope and courage, and all manner of victuals beeing very ſcarce, they hauing already eaten aſſes, horſe, doggs, catts and hauing no more bread nor corne to make any, drincking nothing but water, perceiuing beſides that three other mines were making towards the Cauallier of the gate, that of all the Italian ſoldiers there were only but eight hundred in health, and they ſo tired and ſpent with long watching and continuall trauell ſuſtained in fight in the heate of the day, and the moſt part of the Greekes being ſlaine; the cheeſe of the Citty determined to preſent a petition to the Gouernour, wherein relating the want and miſery wherevnto they were reduced, they beſought him, in regard they had freely expoſed their liues and meanes to maintaine the Citty vnder the obedience of the Common-wealth, that he would by yeelding on honorable conditions, preſerue the honour of their Wiues and Children, which would bee expoſed eauen as a Prey vnto the enemies, if they ſhould enter by force.

The eſtate of the beſeeged enforceth them to yeeld.

Vpon this Petition of the People, the Magiſtrates and cheeſe Captains conſulted what was beſt to be done, their opinions beeing very different: for ſome thought it fit to continue their defenſe, and to dy with their ſwords in their hands rather then to yeeld, or elſe to ſally forth in the night, and on a ſuddaine to aſſaile the enemies, and with their blood by dying to reuenge their death: That they could not beleeue that the Turkes would obſerue and performe any accord they ſhould make with them, perceiuing that neceſſity had rather induced them thereunto then any free motion, that their yeelding would wrong and impaire the honour and reputation which till then they had gotten. Others on the contrary ſaid, That it did not beſeeme them, vnto whom the guard and conſeruation of that Citty had beene committed, to ſhew themſelues more cruell towards the inhabitants, then the very Turkes, becauſe that there was nothing more certaine, then that the Captaines of the Camp did only propound an accord becauſe they would preſerue the Citty from being ſackt, and to ſaue the Inhabitants liues,

The Captains ſondry opinions.

to

knowing that if their ſoldiers ſhould once enter by force ; it would then bee to late to hold them backe :beſides, as it was not the part of a valliant man baſely to yeeld for feare of death, in like manner to loſe his life raſhly and vnprofitably, proceeded rather from fooliſh obſtinacy then from magnanimity. Theſe reaſons with diuers others being alleadged to the ſame purpoſe, did after a long conſultation preuaile, and they reſolued to yeeld on honorable compoſition. In this manner on the firſt day of Auguſt, after ſundry treaties it was concluded, by meanes of an Italian enſeigne which was priſoner in the campe, that ther ſhould be truce; and vpon giuing of hoſtages on either ſide, began to treate of the particularities of acord for the citty. Hercules Martinenga, and Matteo Colti, a Cittizen of Famagoſta, were giuen in hoſtage for thoſe of the Citty, and for the enemies, Muſtapha his Lieutenant, and the Lieutenant to the Aga or Captaine of the Ianiſſaries, whome Baillone with certaine horſe and two hundred Harquebuſiers went to receiue at the gate; our men were like-wiſe honorably entertayned by the enemies, Muſtapha his Sonne comming forth to meet them, with great numbers of horſe and foot, who brought them to his father, who hauing entertained them, beſtowed on them two ritch gownes imbrodered with gold, and then ſent them to lodge in the Aga,s Pauillon.

The beſeeged reſolue to yeeld on compoſition

Oſtages giuen on both ſides.

It is a thing to be wondred at that thoſe in the Citty which had ſuſtained ſo great labour, miſery and calamities, inſted of reioycing for that their troubles would ſhortly end, were ſad and melancholy, as men foreſeeing their future wretchedneſſe. The Commiſſioners ſeemed eaſily to grant what-ſo-euer was propounded to them, which in effect was, That the ſoldiers ſhould bee ſafely conducted into Candy by the Turkiſh Veſſells, carrying along with them their armes and bagage with fiue peeces of ordnance, and three horſe belonging to the three cheefe Commanders: That the inhabitants that were deſirous to depart, might doe the like, and thoſe that would tarry behind ſhould haue aſſurance giuen them to enioy their goods and to liue in their Chriſtian Religion. Theſe Articles were in one day propounded, ſigned and granted, and counterſigned by Muſtapha with his owne hand: whereupon for the execution thereof, forty Veſſells of all ſorts were on a ſodaine ſent to the Hauen, where the ſicke men began to be embarked, the reſt ſtanding vpon their guard to hinder the Turkes from enterprizing any matter contrary to the accord, till ſuch time as they were all ſhipt, the Turkes neuer-the-leſſe dealing curteouſly with them both in word and deed. Yet ſo ſoone as the enemies came into the citty, they began to wrong the inhabitants, and to commit violence, wherewith Bragadini hauing acquainted Muſtapha, entreated him that for the performance of his owne promiſe, and obſeruation of the articles, he would command the ſoldiors to ceaſe from farther violence, and to ſend more ſhips to embarke the remainder of the Chriſtian ſoldiers. Neſtor Martinenga was ſent on this meſſage to the Baſcha, who courteouſly entertained him, and graunted his demand, ſeeming to be very deſirous to know Bragadini and to conferre with him, as with a valliant and noble Captaine, of whome him-ſelfe had made tryall.

The articles of the capitulation.

Muſtapha his feigned curteſie

Bragadini giuing credit to theſe fugred words, leauing Tepulo in the citty, did the ending of the ſame day, beeing accompanied with Baillone Martinenga and Quirini, goe to the Baſchas tent, attended on by ſundry Captaines, and Greeke Gentlemen all on horſe backe, with ſome forty Harquebuſiers on foote. Bragadini rod formoſt vnder a crimſon Vmbrella or Canopie, clothed in purple, wearing his vſuall robe of Magiſtrate, who being come to the Baſchas Pauillion, left their weapons at the doore, and being entred were curteouſly entertayned by Muſtapha, who cauſed them to ſit downe, where after they had diſcourſed on ſundry matters, the Baſcha diſſembling that which hee had already determined in his mind thought it time to put it in execution, and the better to bring it to paſſe, he craued caution for the veſſells he lent them, whereunto Bragadini hauing

Bragadin comes to Muſtapha his tent.

made

made anſwer, that no ſuch thing was mentioned in the Articles, and that therefore they were not tyed there vnto, and beſides, he had no man there with him whome he could leaue behind for that purpoſe. Muſtapha pointing to Quirini, ſaid, let this man be a pledge, Bragadin conſtantly maintayned the contrary, and told him that he could not iuſtly detained any of them: the Baſcha waxing impatient, and being no longer able to maſter his choller, did fiercely thunder many iniurious ſpeeches againſt them, accuſing them that they had during the truce contrary to the law of armes put diuers of his Turkes to death, whome they had taken priſoners, (which was moſt falſe) and riſing from his ſtate, commanded them all preſently to be manacled: then thruſting them forth of his tent, he cauſed his ſoldiers to murder Baſſone, Martinenga, Quirini and all the reſt before Bragadins face, who was reſerued to a greater torture, hauing before his death endured many marterdomes, they cauſed him twice or thrice to offer his necke, as though hee would haue cut off his head, which he moſt courragiouſly preſented to them, they would not at that time put him to death, but did onely cut off his noſe and eares. Muſtapha his perfidious cruelty.

Count Hercules who had beene ſent as an hoſtage, being like-wiſe manacled, was hid by Muſtaphas Eunuch till his Maiſters fury was paſt, whoſe ſlaue he became after-wards. All the Chriſtian ſoldiors were preſently taken and bound, not diſtruſting any ſuch perfidious cruelty. Thoſe which were already ſhipt had no better vſage, for beeing diſpoyled of their goods, they were all made Gallie-ſlaues.

Two daies after, Muſtapha entred the Citty, where he commanded Tepulo to be brought forth of priſon whether hee had committed him, and preſently to bee hanged at the yards arme of a Gallie: Then cauſing Bragadin who was wounded and diſmembred to be brought before him, he loaded him, (though he were weake and feeble) with two baskets full of earth, the one before, and the other behinde, and willed him to carry them to the breach, making him to kiſſe the ground as often as he paſſed by him: then ſending him to the Hauen into a Gallie of Rhodes he cauſed him to be bound in a chare, with a crowne at his feete, and in that manner to be hoiſted vp to the maineyard of the Gallie, that hee might bee the better diſcerned by the ſlaues and Chriſtian ſoldiors that were in the Hauen, at the laſt, the noble Gentleman beeing brought backe to the cities Market-place, with drums and trumpets in the view of all men, was ſtript forth of his clothes, and was there moſt ignominiouſly laid a long vpon a ſcaffold, and moſt cruelly flead a liue, who without any murmuring, taking his marterdome patiently, did onely taxe the Baſcha with his perfidious cruelty and periury, hauing his hart ſtill lifted vp to God, beſeeching him to giue him grace to die conſtantly for his holy faith and religion, and then ſo ſoone as the executioners with their bloudy kniues were come as farre as his naule, his bleſſed ſoule leauing his fraile earthly manſion flew vp to heauen. His skinne was preſently ſtuft with ſtraw, and carried round about the citty; then it was hung at the yard arme of a Galleot, and carried all along the coaſt of Syria, in his returne towards Conſtantinople, proudlie and vainegloriouſly ſhewing it to the whole world: the body was cut in foure quarters, and ſet vp at the foure principall batteries. More then barbarous cruelty.

It was not certainly knowne why Muſtapha vſed ſuch barbarous cruelty: ſome ſaid, that he hauing taken the ſpoyle from the ſoldiors which hee had promiſed them, went about to ſatiſfie them by the puniſhment of a few, in reuenge of the great multitude which hee had loſt at the ſeege: others ſay, that hee being prouoked by their obſtinate holding out, and for that he had loſt ſome of his deere friends at that ſeege, whome hee loued, had ſworne to bee reuenged. There bee like-wiſe which ſay, that Muſtapha was of ſo cholericke a nature, as being once moued, he would for the time be like a mad man, and that hee was prouoked by ſcorne and diſdaine, when hee ſaw Bragadini and the reſt to come to his Paniliõ attended by troupes of ſoldiers, and in ſuch ſtately manner, as though hee had had beene a conqueror and not conquered. But this occaſion beeing to idle of it ſelfe to cauſe him to commit ſuch cruell and barbarous actions is not very credible; for he being mooued by his owne wicked and diuiliſh diſpoſition, did vſe like cruelty towards the dead. For comming into the Cathedrall Church of S. Nicholas, he cauſed the toombs and monuments to be opened, and the bones of the dead to be throwne heere and there, he ouerthrew Altars, and Images, with other brutiſh and cruell actions, for which his owne ſoldiers did much condemne him. Hauing in this manner conquered the citty, he preſently cauſed the Dikes to be clenſed, the forts that were abroad to be razed, the trenches to be filled, and whatſoeuer within the walles had beene ruined to be rampierd vp againe, ſo as in a ſhort ſpace the Citty was reſtored to her former beauty, and made ſtronger then before.

Great impiety againſt the dead.

The Baſha hauing left the Bey of Rhodes Gouernour there departed from Cyprus on the twenty fourth of September, and returned victorious and triumphant to Conſtantinople where with great ioy he was welcomed by al men, notwithſtanding that his victory was bought at a deere rate: for in that warre he loſt aboue fifty thouſand men, and among others many excellent Captaines, and great numbers of his beſt ſoldiers. But now to returne to the Chriſtian fleet.

The Baſcha returneth to Conſtantinople.

The vniting of the Confederate fleet.

THe triumuirate Admirals D. Iohn, Sebaſtiano Venieri & Marc Antonio Colonna, meeting after ſome delay all at Meſſina in Sicily, after ioyful & mutuall gratulation of their ſo happy and deſired conuention, leauing thoſe Ceremonies, they proceeded to the more eſſentiall parts of the buſineſſe. They firſt priuately conſulted how to employ thoſe forces to ſome honorable and cõmodious end, that the ſucceſſe of the warre might counterpoize the charge and expectation. This Councel conſiſted of ſome few of the moſt ſelect and eminent of the Army, both for authority and iudgement, as principally D. Iohn Generall, Sebaſtiano Venieri the Venetian Admiral, Marc Antonio Colonna, the Popes Admirall, Bernardino de Requeſens Great Comendador of Caſtile and Lieutenant Generall of the Army, and Auguſtino Barbarico Prouidator Generall of the Venetian fleet.

The propoſition was whether they ſhould ſeeke to oppreſſe the enemy by maine battaile, or defend their owne territories, wherein, various opinion interchangeably vttered, Bernardino de Requeſens, D. Iohns Oracle, being inuited by the reſt, with cleere voyce, graue countenance, and ſignificant geſture ſaid thus.

The Aduiſe of D. Bernardino de Requeſens for fighting or not fighting with the enemy.

Your Highneſſe (moſt excellent Prince) in commanding mine opinion before theſe more ſufficient, obſerues the order of feaſts, where the courſeſt meates are “ taſted firſt. My Councell may perhaps be leſſe pleaſing, yet as holſome as ſome
“ other. The queſtion is whether wee ſhall aſſault the enemy by ſea, or keepe him
“ from infeſting vs by land. This will beſt be reſolued when we haue made true diſ-“ couery and comparriſon of his forces and our owne. If we be ſtronger, it is more “ honorable to iuuade, if weaker more ſafe to repell; what the number of the ad-“ uerſe Gallies is we may ſee, how thoſe Gallies are fortefied and man'd we may “ coniecture, and how thoſe men are fleſht and confirm'd with late victories wee “ need not doubt. Let vs take heed that while wee ſeeke to reuenge our “ harmes, wee doe not aggrauate them, nor loſe in ſtriuing to recouer. It “ were a ſhame to returne ſo great a fleet without ſome notable effect: but “ it were both ſhame and vtter vndoing not to returne it at all. The “ Common-wealth were better want the intereſt then the principall. This fleet is “ the ſureſt Ankor of our hope, and to loſe it would indanger the wracke of “ Italy. Let vs not therefore offer to fight, vnleſſe ſome aduantage of place “ or time on our ſide counterpoize the odds of ſtrength on theirs: or to preſerue “ with hazard of our fleet ſomthing of greater importance (if any can be) then the “ fleet it ſelfe. The ſtormineſſe of winter will ſhortly calme the fury of this Turkiſh “ nauy.

nauy. In the meane time it wilbe a degree of our victory to limit and ſtop the courſe of theirs. This, moſt excellent Generall is mine opinion, to which I am not yet ſo wedded, but that any cleerer iudgement may diuorce me.

This was of ſome cooler tempers heard with applauſe, but of the noble Venieri and Barbarico, not without diſdaine, which yet was modeſtly oppugned by Barbarico as followeth.

I deny not (moſt excellent Generall, and you my noble Lords) but that this ſpeech of D. Bernardino de Requeſens is inritched and ſtrengthened with forcible argument: wherein if there yet be any defect, it proceeds not from to little iudgement, but too much care and tenderneſſe of the Chriſtian State, a zeale which not onely excuſeth, but almoſt iuſtifies and endeares his error: I confeſſe, that to oppoſe againſt a ſtronger, a weaker power were to betray it. But wherein appeares it that we are the weaker? If they exceed vs in number of Gallies, we excell them in ſtrength and ſwiftneſſe: if they vs in multitudes of men, we them in courage, and diſcipline? He thinkes their victories haue added much to their courage, I thinke deduc'd more from their ſtrength. Queſtionleſſe our men in Cyprus and other places held their Altars, liberties, wiues, children, wealth, countries, and liues at to high a rate to deliuer them vp gratis. They haue found the Chriſtian markets deare, nay happily their victories may beget ours, breeding in them not animoſity, but ſecurity and preſumption, euer their owne traitor. Was this fleet built and ſet together with ſo much care, coſt, and difficulty, preſently to diſſolue and break vp, as if we meet but to ſalute, or went to ſea onely to purge and returne? or ſhall we ſtay only to looke on our enemies, as if we could deſtroy them like Baſilisks? But winter will coole their heate: were not we better quench it now that it may not breake out againe the next ſpring? Will not this crocodile which deuoures vs both by ſea and land, fatned with Chriſtian bloud and ſpoile, wax ſtronger by a yeeres growth? If we be to weake for him now; How ſhall we reſiſt him then? How ſhall we looke our Country, nay Heauen in the face, or lift vp our eyes to it, not daring to lift our hands againſt their enemies? But I ſurfet your eares with perſwation needleſſe to ſuch a iudgement and reſolution. Your fathers Imperiall Maieſty diſplaied in your brow promiſeth the ſame magnanimity in your breſt. There is I know to much Cæſar in you to haue the patience not to fight. Make haſt then Illuſtrious Prince to reape this mature and fruitfull victory with your ſword.

Barbarico his ſpeech perſwading to fight.

This was the ſence of his ſpeech which the ſpeakers reputation and gracefull deliuery gaue more life and ſtrength to. It was afterwards more amply and methodically confirmed by Cornia a Spaniard. The ſympathy betweene whoſe tongue, and the Generals eare farthered perhaps his reſolution to fight, willing that ſo noble a councell might be rather attributed to one of that nation then to Barbarico. Cornia his ſpeech was in effect this.

There are three motiues (moſt magnificent Generall) which without imputation of feare, or omiſſion of duty, may induce a Commander to decline battaile. Firſt, diſproportion betweene the benifit of victory, and preiudice of ouerthrow on either part. In this reſpect, the Duke of Alua did politickly abſtaine from incountring the Guyſe in Naples, where the French could looſe but their army, but the Spaniard his army and Kingdome of Naples.

Cornia his ſpeech confirming Barbarico.

Secondly if he foreſee an eaſier, cheaper, and ſafer meanes to diſſolue the aduerſe army, then by battaile. Thus did your Highneſſe father Charles the fifth, of ſacred memory, breake the neck of the Proteſtants army in Germany.

Laſtly the inequallity of ſtrength. He being the weaker and likely to miſcary in the attempt, whereof there are ſo many Preſidents that we need alleadge none. But neither of theſe can be applied to diuert vs from battaile, wherein if we preuaile wee recouer our owne againe, and happily Greece for forbearance. If fighting valliantly we be ouercome, yet ſhall we in the conflict ſo farre weaken

and

„ and maine the aduerſe fleet, that we ſhall ſooner arme a defenſiue nauy, then he „ an offenſiue, and eaſilier ſecure our own then he make any farther impreſſion on it.
„ Touching protraction. The winter will in deed diſſolue his fleet, but ſo, that it „ will bud forth againe the next ſpring; perhaps grow greater and get the ſtart of „ our nauy. His being vnited by nation, ours by combination.
„ Touching inequallity of force, it is probable we exceed them more in men then
„ they vs in veſſels. For he muſt needs conſume many men in taking ſo many ſtrong „ townes and forts, and imploy many in keeping them. Neither are the skars of the „ late peſtilence yet healed among them; Therefore my aduiſe is, the Gallies of „ Candy being come, that you haſten to Corfou, by which they muſt needs paſſe, „ leaſt hauing intelligence of your reſolution to fight, they preuent the danger of „ incounter, and carry from you the fruits of their owne victory, and opportunity „ of ours.
„ Don Iohn after this ſerious conſultation concluded to aſſaile the Turkiſh fleet & attempt to intercept their haruests of Cyprus, and other Maritime parts of Chriſtendome ere they ſhould houſe it. Therefore departing from Meſſina on the 17. of September, being at ſea, he compoſed his Gallies to that forme of battaile he ment to obſerue in fight: ſo marſhalling and exercizing them before, that euery ſquadron might know his place, and euery Galley his ſquadron, and bee able to transforme themſelues into all figures, without confuſion, when occaſion ſhould require. Two daies after they arriued at the Cape of Colonnes, where they came to anchor by reaſon of a contrary winde, as alſo for that they were there to take in freſh ſupplies of footmen. In the meane time they diſpatched Gill-Andrada with three other Venetian Gallies to Corfou, to make certaine diſcouery of the Turkiſh fleet, of which three, that of Caterino Maripietro preſently returned to conduct Paulo Vrſino and the Colonel Aquauiua to the Nauy, bringing newes that the Turkiſh fleet had paſſed along in view of Zant, and were entred into the Gulph of Lepanto.

The Turkiſh fleet in the Gulph of Lepanto.

Herevpon, though with much difficulty, by reaſon of contrary windes, they put to ſea, and the ſeuenteenth of September arriued at Corfou: from whence the laſt of the ſame month they ſet ſaile and came to anchor in a ſafe and ſpacious Roade at the Gamoniſſes, where Gionan Andrea Doria being by the Generall commanded to ſuruey the army, finding ſome Venetian Gallies not compleat in men, diſtributed amongſt them certaine companies of Spaniſh and Italian ſouldiers, whereof Matius Tortona commanded one band. He a man of a turbulent inſociable nature being vpon ſome occaſion aboord Calergo the Candiot fell at difference with ſome of the company, proceeding from words to blowes. Venieri not farre off, informed of the tumult, ſent firſt one of his captaines, who, not preuailing, was ſeconded by the Admirall of Venieri his ſquadron, who ouer confidently interpoſing himſelfe in the quarrell became a ſharer amongſt them of ſome blowes, and in concluſion was dangerouſly wounded, which Venieri interpreting an intollerable contempt of his authority, iealous rather of the States dignity then his owne, commanded Mutio and his Enſeigne to bee apprehended, and according to martiall ſeuerity in caſe of mutiny preſently hanged at the yard arme of the ſame Galley to deterre others from like inſolence.

An accident which had like to haue bred great miſchiefe.

This priuate ſparke of diſſention had like to haue kindled a generall flame through the whole army and haue turned their ſwords, now drawne againſt the common enemy, vpon their owne boſomes. For the Generall naturally partiall to the Spaniſh, and perhaps enuious of Venieros Authority, as his Corriuall in honour, conſidered only the ſeuerity of the puniſhment but not the capitalneſſe of the crime exacting it, ſo that now the combuſtion ſuruiued the Author, and the diſcord bred in an inferior member of the army was aſcended to the head, and endangered the whole.

Don Iohn complained that his authority was more contemned by Venieri then then Venieri by Tortona, for which if the councell of warre gaue him not honorable ſatisfaction, he would take it himſelfe, and teach him that though he reſpected the honor of the Venetian Eſtate, he would not neglect his owne. To theſe coales the friends of Tortona and maligners of Venieri (a very baſe office) ſerued as bellowes. Don Iohn his obiections againſt Venieri.

Venieri on the other part proteſting that he did it not to blemiſh the reputation of the Generall, but to preſerue his owne and preuent the ſodaine contagion of the mutiny, deſired Don Iohn, would make his reaſon, not his affection iudge of it, and conſider the party executed not as a Spaniard but mutineere. Affirmed that if the Generall ſhould take this iuſt, though ſeuere execution, as an occaſion to breake the league which was applied as a meanes to keepe it, it would be manifeſt, that not deuotion induced, but ambition diuerted him from this honourable action. As for violence, hee ſhould finde him as dangerous an enemy as otherwiſe a neceſſary friend. Venieri his anſwer to them.

Colonna Admirall of the Popes Gallies, a man worthy ſo eminent place, wiſely foreſeeing what this might grow to, as a man equally beloued and louing both parts, nobly vſed his interceſſion to ſuppreſſe, or at leaſt cõpound the ſtrife, „Chiefly importuning Don Iohn, in whom hee found greater obſtinacy of diſcontent „ and eſtrangement, telling him the act was iuſt, though ſodaine, like the occaſion, „ and that ſuddainneſſe neceſſary in dangers of ſo ſwift extention, as hauing once „ got the ſtart, remedy could hardly ouertake them. That mutiny in an army „ was of as inſtant conueyance as a Gangrene in the body, if the parts infected „ were not preſently cut off, it endangered the whole. That it was no intruſion „ on the Generalls authority, for an vnder Admirall in his owne ſquadron to execute a priuate offender. That in deed hee had no cauſe of offenſe, or if hee had „ cauſe, yet no leiſure to entertaine it. That the enemies ſtrength could not ſo „ much endanger them as their owne diuiſion weaken them. That as nothing „ could heape more honour on him then the ſuppreſſall of the enemy, ſo nothing „ could lay fowler aſperſion then to looſe this opportunity of doing it. Therefore if hee could not caſſier his paſſion, hee ſhould imploy it againſt the common Aduerſary. „

Theſe perſwations, ſtrong but not bitter, deliuered by a friend, though for a reputed enemy, mooued him to abſtaine from the effects of choller, though not to extinguiſh it. So that diſtaſted of Venieri, he communicated al important deſeignes and conſulted with Barbarico.

From hence they held on their courſe to Cephalonia, according to their former reſolution, and on the fourth of October paſſing the Channell of Viſcarda, on the fifth they anchored in the vale of Alexandria. Where Gyll-Andrada, and Giuan Baptiſta Contareni brought letters from Paulo Contareni, Prouidator of Zant, confirming their intelligence of the Turkiſh fleet. Herevpon by vniſent of the whole councell of warre and earneſt deſire of the ſouldiers they haſted to the Gulph of Lepanto to fight with the enemy. And drawing neere vnto vnto the place, Don Iohn commanded the decks to be cleered, cheſts ſtowed, thoſe cabins which might bee impediment to the valliant taken downe, the reſt that might bee receptacles to cowards lock'd vp, leauing neither excuſe for his men nor aduantage for his enemies. And as hee prepared all eſſentiall ſo hee neglected no imaginary or opinionate part of defenſe or offenſe. Therefore knowing that ſtrength was the beauty of an army, but brauery the Enſeigne of that ſtrength, his men were armed ritchly, and his Gallies ſutable to his men, both carrying the badge of triumph, and a face of victory, diſplaying magnanimity and confidence, not effeminacy, like a bright but dreadfull flame.

And now, that hee might husband the ſmall remainder of time to the vtmoſt minute, he cauſed victuals to be proportioned to his men moderately not ſuperfluouſly, farre from the ſwyniſh cuſtome of ſome northerly nations, who as if wine were the nurſſe of valor as oyle to a lampe, againſt any ſea fight knock the heads out of their barrels, and drinke the wit out of their owne heads and ſo reele aboord, ſometimes ſtumbling vpon victory but neuer vpon honor, which muſt euer be deriued from vertue, not vice. This noble temperate captaine vnderſtood drunkenneſſe could not be the fountaine of reſolution, and therefore diſtributed ſo much to his ſouldiers as might ſtrengthen their bodies, not weaken their iudgements, and breed courage in them, not rage; which with more ſpeed then ceremony ended, the Heroick Generall, with countenance and habit becomming ſuch a place and perſon, deſcended into his Barge, in which he paſſed through the fleet, being arranged in forme following.

The order and forme of the Chriſtian battaile.

It conſiſted of foure diſtinct partes principall, viz. Two wings, the maine battaile, and a reſeruation of ſuccors. In the right wing were conteined three and fifty Gallies, whereof Gionan Andrea Doria was Admirall, bearing in his maine top a greene flag. The left wing was compoſed of an equall number of Gallies commanded by Auguſtino Barbarico with a yellow flagge on the ſtarboord ſide of his toppe. In the maine battaile were included three ſcore and one Gallies wherein Don Iohn the Generall was himſelfe, diſtinguiſhed by a sky-colloured flag. The two wings and the maine battaile were one hundred ſixty ſeuen Gallies ſtrong, ſo placed that the two wings carried forwards the body with equall pace, one not forſaking the other: yet betweene all three was there ſuffitient diſtance to admit three or foure Gallies a breſt without falling foule either of themſelues; the wings, or maine battaile: as well to giue way to thoſe ſupplies of reskewes which ſhould be needfull in any part, as to transforme the whole battaile it ſelfe into any figure without confuſion. Aluarez de Baſſan Marquis of Santa Cruz bearing a white flagge in his poope, conducted the reſeruations of ſuccor, conſiſting of thirty eight Gallies, out of which were deducted eight, commanded by Don Iuan de Cardona, precurſor of the whole fleet, who running twenty or fiue and twenty miles before the reſt, by ſwift Fregats, ſignified vnto the Generall whatſoeuer was neceſſary to be known in their diſcouery, with commandement when they deſcried the Turkiſh Nauy to retire and impe themſelues to the wings in equall diuiſion: Cardona into the Right.

The Galeaſſes and Argozies were halfe a mile before the Gallies, two before the right wing, two before the left, and two before the middle battaile, euery Galeaſſe a mile from each other: the firſt were commanded by Ambroſio and Antonio Bragadini, the ſecond by Iacomo Guori, and Antonio Duodi, the third by Andrea Piſaro, and Pietro Piſano. The vſe of theſe greater veſſels (being fortified with plenty of ordnance and lined with multitude of ſmal ſhot) was to receiue the firſt fury of the enemies fleet paſſing by, that beeing weakened and diſordered by them, the next charge might be more ſafe and eaſie.

And in reſpect they were huge and vnwildy veſſels vnapt for oares, euery Galeaſſe was towed by two ſeuerall Gallies whenſoeuer they were becalmed and had loſt the vſe of their ſailes. The Galeaſſe of Antonio Duodi was towed by the generall and Colonna. The Galeaſſe of Iacomo Guori by Sebaſtian Venieri and Chriſtofero Lieni. The Galeaſſe of Ambroſio Bragadino by Auguſtine Barbarigo. The Galeaſſe of Antonio Bragadini by Antonio Canali. The Galeaſſe of Andrea Piſaro by the Prior of Meſſina. The Galeaſſe of Pietro Piſano by Gionan Andrea Doria. The generall like the heart in the middeſt of a body was ſeated in the middeſt of the battaile, guarded on the right ſide by Marc-Antonio Colonna the Popes Admiral, and on the left by Sebaſtian Vinieri the Venetians high Admirall. Colonna was flanked by the Admirall of the Geneuois, whereof Hector Spinola was captaine, aſſociated with the Prince of Parma.

Venieri was flanked with the Admirall of Sauoy, commanded by Lieny, accompanied with the Prince of Vrbin.

A ſterne the Generall, Colonna and Venieri were back't with a Galley named the the Prince of Spaine, and an other belonging to the great Commendador of Caſtile.

The right ſide of the maine battaile oppoſite to the wing was ſtrengthened by the Admirall Galley of Malta commanded by the Prior of Meſſina. The left ſide was guarded by a Galley called the captaine of Petro Lomelino, commanded by Paulo Iordano Orſino.

In the right wing Iohn de Cardona ſeconded Giouan Andrea Doria. In the left wing Auguſtino Barbarico was ſupported on one hand by Marco Quirini, and on the other by Canali. Yet was the whole fleet though diſtinct in order ſo intermixt in nation, that neither the Spaniſh, Venetian nor Popes Gallies could reſpect their particular ſafety.

The particular names of euery Galley, his place and captaine of the Chriſtian fleet may be found in this Catalogue.

Theſe Gallies and captaines went before the fleet for diſcouerey.

Gallies.	Captaines.
1. The Saint Magdalen of Venice.	Marco Contareni.
2. The Sunne of Venice.	Vincento Quirini.
3. The Admirall of Sicily.
4. The Vice-Admirall of Sicily.	Iuan de Cardona Admirall of the Sicillian fleet.
5. The Admirall.	Dauid Imperiali.
6. The Ioannica of Sicill.
7. Saint Caterina of Venice.	Marco Cigognia.
8. Our Lady of Venice.	Petro Franceſco Maripietro.

The Gallies and captaines of the left wing.

Gallies.	Captaines.
1. The Admirall of Venice.	Auguſtino Barbarigo Prouidator Generall of the Venetian fleet.
2. The Vice-Admirall of Venice.	Antonio Canalis an other Prouidator likewiſe of the Venetian fleet.
3. The Fortune of Venice.	Andrea Barbarico.

4. The Archer of Naples.	Martino Pyrola.
5. The Trebble hand of Venice.	Georgio Barbarico.
6. The double Dolphin of Candy.	Franceſco Zeno.
7. The Lion and Phœnix of Cania.	Franceſco Mengano.
8. Saint Nicolas of Cherſo.	Colanes Draſi.
9. The Victory of Naples.	Octauio Roccardi.
10. The Lomelina.	Auguſtino Coneuali.
11. The Elengina of the Popes.	Fabio Valciati knight.
12. The Lady of Cania.	Philippo Polani.
13. The Sea-horſe of Candy.	Antonio de Cubellis.
14. The double Lyon of Candy.	Nicolo Fratello.
15. The Lion of Iſtria.	Dominico de Tucco.
16. The Croſſe of Cephalonia.	Marco Cimera.
17. The Saint Virginia of Cephania.	Chriſtofero Criſſa.
18. The Lion of Candy.	Franciſco Bonaccio.
19. The Chriſte of Candy.	Andrea Cornelio.
20. The Angel of Candy.	Giouan Angelo.
21. The Piramis of Candy.	Franceſco Buono.
22. The Lady of Candy with the Armed-horſe.	Antonio Eudomeniano.
23. The Chriſte raiſed againe of Venice.	Simone Gora.
24. The leſſer Chriſte raiſed againe of Venice.	Frederico Renieri.
25. The Chriſte of Corfou.	Chriſtofero Condocollo.
26. The Chriſte raiſed againe of Cania.	Georgio Calerga.
27. The Chriſte of Venice.	Bartholomeo Donato.
28. The Chriſte raiſed againe of Vegia.
29. The Retimana.	Nicolo Auonali.
30. The Chriſte of Candy.	Giouan Cornelio.
31. The Chriſte raiſed againe of Cania.	Franceſco Zancaruolo.
32. The Rodus of Cania.	Franceſco Molino.
33. The S. Euphemia of Breſcia.	Horatio Fiſogna.
34. The Lady Marquis of Doria.	Franceſco Sphedra.

Before theſe went Ambroſio Bragadino with his Galeaſſe.

10 20 30 40 50

35. The

35. The fortune of Andrew. Giouan Lodouico Belui.
36. The Arme of Cania. Micaele Vizamano.
37. The Sea-horſe of Venice. Antonio Canali.
38. The Chriſte of Cania. Daniele Calefattio.
39. The Arme of Venice. Nicolo Lipomano.
40. Our Lady of Zant. Nicolo Modono.
41. The Chriſte raiſed againe. Franceſco Zancaruolo.
42. Our Lady of Venice. Marc-Antonio Piſano.
43. God the father in Trinity. Giouan Contareni.
44. The flame of Naples. Iuan Cueua.
45. The Saint Iohn of Naples. Garçia Vargaro.
46. The enuy of Naples. Torribio Acaueſo.
47. The valliant of Naples. Micaele Quixada.
48. The Sancta Iacobea of Naples. Monſeratto Guardiola.
49. The Saint Nicolaico of Naples. Chriſtofero Mongiua.
50. The Chriſte raiſed againe of Venice. Giouan Baptiſta Quirini.
51. The Angell of Venice. Vnfredo Iuſtiniano.
52. The Saint Dorotea of Venice. Paulo Nani.
53. The Admirall of Venice. Marc-Antonio Quirini Prouidator of the Venetian Nauy.

In the maine battaile were theſe captaines and Gallies.

Gallies.	Captaines.
1. The Admiral of Lomelina.	Paulo Iordano Orſino, Admirall of that fleet.
2. The Maſter Lomelina.	Petro Baptiſta Lomelino.
3. The Admirall Bandinella.	Bandinello Saulo vice-admirall of that fleet.
4. The Maſter of Genoa.	Pallerano.
5. The Toſcano of the Popes.	Metello Caracciolla knight.
6. The Sea-man of Vincenza.	Iacomo Dreſſano.
7. Our Lady of Venice.	Giouan Zeno.
8. The Saint Ieronimo of Leſina.	Giouan Balzi.
9. The Saint Ioannica of Venice.	Giouan Antonio Colleoneo.
10. The S. Alexãdrica of Bergamo	Georgio De Aeſté Admirall.
11. The Admirall Marina.	Ieronimo Canali.
12. The Logge of Venice.	Bertuccio Contareni.

13. The Mongibello of Venice.	Franciſco Dandolo.
14. The Virgin of Candy.	Cypriano Marini.
15. The temperãce of Giouan Andrea Doria.	Vincentio Paſcalic. Roccano Fuluio.
16. The good fortune of Naples
17. The caſtle of Spaine.	Baccia Piſano.
18. The victory of the Popes.
19. The Piramis.	Marc-Antonio of Saint Vliana.
20. The Chriſte of Venice.	Ieronimo Contareni.
21. The Saint Francis of Spaine.	Chriſtofero Guaſches.
22. The peace of the Popes.	Iacomo Antonio Perpignano.
23. The Pearle of Giouan Andrea Doria.	Giouan Baptiſta Spinola.
24. The wheele ſerpentine of Venice.	Gabriele Canali.
25. The Piramis of Venice.	Franceſco Buono.
26. The Palme of Venice.	Ieronimo Venieri.
27. The Admiral of Gyl. Andrada.	Bernardo Cinoguerra.
28. The Granado of Spaine.	Paulo Boteino.
29. The Admirall of Genoa.	Hector Spinola accompanied with the Prince of Parma.
30. The Admiral of Venice.	Sebaſtiano Venieri Admirall of the Venetian fleet.
31. The Galley Royal.	Don Iohn of Auſtria General.
32. The Admirall of the great Commendador.
33. The Popes Admiral.	Marc-Antonio Colonna.
34. The Admiral of Sauoy.	The Lord Lieny accompanied with the Prince of Vrbin.
35. The Grifonia of the Popes.	Aleſſandro Negroni.
36. The S^t. Theodora of Venice.	Theodoro Balbi.
37. The Mendoça of Naples.	Martino de Caide.
38. The mountaine of Cania.	Aleſſandro Vizamano.
39. The Saint Iohn Baptiſta of Venice.	Giouan Mocenigo.
40. The victory of Giouan Andrea Doria.	Philippo Doria.
41. The Piſana of the Popes.	Hercole Lotta.
42. The Figuera of Spaine.	Diego Lopes de Diglia.
43. The Chriſte of Venice.	Georgio Piſano.
44. The Saint Iohn of Venice.	Daniele Moro.
45. The Florence of the Popes.	Tomaſo de Medici.

The

46. The George of Naples.	Eugenio de Vargas.
47. The Maiſter of Naples.	Franciſco Benauides.
48. The Moone of Spaine.	Emanuele Aquilar.
49. The Paſſara of Venice.	Lodouico Paſqualigo
50. The Lyon of Venice.	Pietro Piſano.
51. The S. Ierome of Venice.	Gaſparo Mari Pietro.
52. The Admirall of Grimaldi.	Georgio Grimaldi Admiral.
53. The Maiſter of Dauid Imperiali.	Nicolo Lucano.
54. The S. Chriſtopher of Venice.	Aleſſandro Contareni.
55. The Iudith of Zant.	Marino Sicuro.
56. The Larmelina of Candy.	Pietro Gradonico.
57. The middle Moone of Venice.	Valerio Valereſſo.
58. The Doria of Giouan Andrea Doria.	Iacomo Caſali.
59. The order of Saint Peter.	Santabio.
60. The order of Saint Iohn.	Lodouico Teßera.
61. The Admirall of Malta.	The Prior of Meßina Admirall.

The Right wing.

Galleys.	Captaines.
1. The Admirall of Sicill.	D. Iuan de Cardona Admirall.
2. The Piedmontan of Sauoy.	Octauio Moreto.
3. The Admirall of Nicola Doria.	Pandolpho Polidoro.
4. The Force of Venice.	Reniere Zeno.
5. The Queene of Candy.	Giouan Barbarico.
6. The Nino of Venice.	Paulo Polani.
7. The Chriſt raiſed againe of Venice.	Benedetto Sorance.
8. The Armed mã of Retima.	Andrea Calergo.
9. The Eagle of Retima.
10. The Palme of Cania.	Iacomo Medio.
11. The Angel of Corfou.	Stellio Carchiopulo.
12. The Saint Ioannica Arbera.	Giouan de Domeni.
13. The Lady Frauica.	Lodouico Cypico.
14. The ſhip of Venice.	Antonio Paſqualigo.
15. Our Lady of Candy.	Marco Feſcarini.
16. The Chriſt of Crema.	Franceſco Forneri.

17. The

17. The Saint Vittoria of Crema.	Euangeliſto Zorlano.
18. The Maiſter of Grimaldi.	Lorenzo Trecchia.
19. The maiſter of Marini.	Antonio Cornili.
20. The Margaret of Sauoy.	Battaglino.
21. The Diana of Genoa.	Giouan Georgio Laſagna.
22. The Gingana of Naples.	Gabriele Medino.
23. The moone of Naples.	Iulio Rubbi.
24. The fortune of Naples.	Diego Madrau.
25. The hope of Naples.	Pietro Buſto.
26. The Fury of Lomelina.	Iacomo Chiappio.
27. The Maiſter of Lomelina.	Georgio Greco.
28. The Negrona.	Nicolo Conſtano.
29. The baſtard Negrona.	Lorenzo de Turri.
30. The fire of Candy.	Antonio Buono.
31. The Eagle of Candy.	Ieronimo Georgio.
32. The S. Chriſtopher of Venice.	Andrea Trono
33. The Chriſt of Venice.	Marco Antonio Lando.
34. The Hope of Candy.	Ieronimo Contareni.
35. The Royalty of Padua.	Patara Buzacarino.
36. The Saint Ioſefica of Venice.	Franceſco Oſeda.
37. The Reſolute of Naples.	Giouan Caraffa.
38. The Sicilia of Sicilia.	Franciſco Amadea.
39. The Maiſter of Nicola Doria.	Iulio Centaurio.
40. The Eagle of Corfou.	Pietro Buono.
41. The S. Triſonica of Catarra.	Ieronimo Bazanteo.
42. The Tower of Vincenza.	Lodouico de Portu.
43. The S. Mary of the Popes.	Pandolfo Strozzi Knight.
44. The S. Ioannica of the Popes.	Angelo Bifalio Knight.
45. The Maiſter of Nigroni.	Lodouico Gamba..
46. The Admirall of Nigroni.	Giouan Ambroſio Nigroni.
47. The Monarca of Iohn Andrew.	Nicolo Garibaldo.
48. The Hand-maide of Iohn Andrew.	Nicolo Imperiali.
49. The Admirall of Giouan Andrea.	Giouan Andrea Doria.

The Reſeruation for ſuccour, placed behind as a Garde, are theſe Captaines and Galleys.

Galleys.	Captaines.
1. The Saint Ioannica of Sicily.
2. The Buccana.	Giouan Pietro Morilo.

3. The

3.	The Leena of Naples.	Pietro de Lagia.
4.	The Conſtancie of Naples.
5.	The Marcheſa of Naples.	Iuan Machado.
6.	The S. Barbera of Naples.	Iuan Aſcaleo.
7.	The S. Andrea of Naples.
8.	The S. Caterino of Naples.	Iuan Rufio de Valaſques.
9.	The S. Bartilmeo of Naples.
10.	The S. Angelo of Naples.	Iuan de Ripe Melino.
11.	The Terrana of Naples.	Marco Molino.
12.	The Chriſt of Venice.	Giouan Loredano.
13.	The double hand of Venice.	Aluarez de Baſſan Marquis de
14.	The Admirall of Naples.	Sancta Cruz.
15.	The Faith of Venice.	Giouan Baptiſta Contareni.
16.	The Pillar of Venice.	Catarina Mali Pietro
17.	The Magdalen of Venice.	Lodouico Bulbi.
18.	The Lady of Venice.	Giouan Bembo
19.	The Menidus of Venice.	Filippo Leo.
20.	The Hope of Venice.	Giouan Baptiſta Benedetto.
21.	Saint Peter of Venice.	Pietro Badoario
22.	Saint George of Sabenica.	Chriſtofero Lachico.
23.	The Saint Michael of Venice.	Georgio Cochio.
24.	The Sibilla of Venice.	Daniele Trono.
25.	The Crane of Spaine.	Luigi de Hereda.
26.	The Admiral of Vaſchedo.	Vaſchedo Coronado.
27.	The Suprana of the Popes.	Antonio de Aſcoli.
28.	The Occaſion of Spaine.
29.	The Maiſter of the Popes.
30.	The faire wether of the Popes.

THe Generall deſcending (as hath beene ſaid) into his Barge, paſſed thorow his fleet, taking a ſhort but exact view of the forme of his battailes, and by breefe, but effectuall ſpeech, breathed courage into his men. His Oration was to this purpoſe.

Don Iohns Oration to his ſoldiors.

Braue, inuincible ſpirits, whom gratious Heauen hath held worthy to bee hir Champions: to whom the Angels will not bee idle ſpectators, but actors and aſſiſtants in this ſacred Tragedy. Nature I know hath giuen you the ſtrongeſt temper of valor, and Deuotion ſet ſo keene an edge on that temper, as I need not whet by any farther incouragement. Onely let mee tell you, you now haue faire occaſion to vnſheath and vſe it. Let Victory ſet ſuch a gloſſe on it, as no ruſt of forgetfulneſſe may euer eate out. Now bring this darke halfe Moone, which ſeeks to eclips the bright ſunne of heauen, to ſuch a waine as ſhall neuer fill againe. Let hir not any longer vſurpe domination of the Sea. Our enemies exceed vs in numbers, made vp of cyphers and ſhadowes of men, but let vs excell them in reſolution, the eſſence of Soldiors. They are impriſoned and immured by ſhores and rocks, as much as I ſhould ſay, victory cannot eſcape vs. They muſt fight becauſe they cannot flye, wee becauſe wee muſt ouer-come: Wee haue neceſſitie of conqueſt; the danger mixt with it, doth but ſeaſon and ennoble it. Who would triumph

" triumph ouer woemen, Wee are to ſhare the whole wealth of nature:
" the earth to the ſuruiuors, heauen to the martirs. Euen the ſcarres of the woun" ded willbe beautifull becauſe honorable, who would ingratefully refuſe to bleed
" for that louing God which hath not refuſed to dye for him. Courage therefore " diuine Champions, forget not that ſom of ye are Romains, and which is more all " Chriſtians.

This ſpeech was euery where anſwered with applauſiue and hopefull conclamations. In which reſolution wee will leaue them a while, to view the countenance of the aduerſe Nauy. The Turkes in the meane time vſed circumſpection and prouidence nothing barbarous. For hauing intelligence by ſpies, fugitiues, and priſoners not only of the conuention of the Confederate nauy, but their aproach beeing now in the Gulph of Lepanto, Mehemet Bey was diſmiſſed with 60. Gallies to Aſpropicio a neighbor Citty to bring from thence competent ſupplies of victuall and men, in which buſineſſe he vſed ſuch celerity that in ſhort time he returned, bringing with him plenty of victuall and munition beſides ten thouſand Ianizaries two thouſand ordinary ſoldiers and two thouſand voluntaries, with which multitude and falſe ſuppoſition of our paucity they were not ſo cõfirmed, but that they ſtood poſſeſt of a certaine fatall ominous miſdeeming the euent. In which reſpect the high Admirall Ali Baſcha, though by his owne inclination and his maiſters command he ſtood reſolute to fight, called a Generall Councell to deliberate ſo important a deſeigne: Moſt of them perſwaded to giue battaile, but Partau Baſcha Generall of the land forces earneſtly oppugned it, on the contrary part Haſſan Baſcha ſonne to Barbaroſſa ſomtime Viceroy of Algier a young man yet of great ſpirit and worthy ſo noble a father whoſe magnanimity he ſeemed to inherit, licenſed to ſpeake with braue countenance and apt geſture ſpake as followeth.

The ſpeech of Haſſan Baſcha perſwading to fight.

" Moſt exceſſe and victorious Prince, the Turkiſh Nation hath euer ſo nobly be-" haued it ſelfe that it is a queſtion whether their fortune hath bred their greatneſſe
" or their valour commanded their fortune. Once it may be affirmed that if our " ſtarres haue fauored vs, wee haue not forſaken our ſelues, nor ſhamed them, but " magnified their influence by our actions. Our Predeceſſors haue left vs ample " territory, wherein wee haue not been vnthrifts but haue ſo huſbanded it that if " they made little, much, wee haue extended much almoſt to infinite. So that if we " hold on this courſe of victory, Alexander neuer ſtood more then wee, in need of " new worlds: which if theſe prying inquiſitiue Chriſtians had not diſcouered to vs,
" our valour ere long would want work. Yet let vs not ſeeme ſo glutted and cloyed
" with conqueſt as to refuſe to accept this one triumph more. This by Sea wil ſerue
" to counterpoize that other balance of land victories. Let vs fill both the hands " of our Emperor, one with ſpoiles of the land, the other of the Sea. Theſe feeble " tired Chriſtians haue been but our Porters. They are now ready to deliuer it. Let " not vs diſdayne to take it of them leaſt they couzen vs now, as they did my father
" about thirty yeares ſince, and ran away with their burthen. Wee haue Gallies e" nough not only to ſtowe their wealth, but if need were their Gallies. Therefore moſt inuincible Admiral let vs preuent their flight by ſpeedy aſſault.

This ſpeech vttered by a man whoſe performance had euer heeretofore beene correſpondent to ſo confident a perſwaſion, not only encouraged but inflamed many of the hearers, whereof Vluzzali Generall of the forces of Barbary could not containe him-ſelfe, but with many earneſt and pregnant arguments auer'd the ſame: alleaging beſides the opportunity, the neceſſity of obtaining the great Lords command. Caiabeg the Sanzach of Smirna ecchoed Vluzzali.

Yet many the grauer and aduiſeder Captaines diſſented from this more hotte then deliberate determination, eſpecially Mehemet Bey the Sanzach of Negropont which if not eloquently, yet truly demonſtrated the danger of fight as followeth.

I am ſorry (magnificent Alli) that at this time the Councell of Illuſtrious Haſſan, is rather to bee admired and applauded for greatneſſe, then followed for ſoundneſſe, fitter to ſet our tongues on worke then hands: I meane to bee anſwered then executed. It is moſt true, in rayſing the Ottoman Empire, that the Turkiſh valour hath euer guided their fortune: but as true, their wiſdome hath directed their valour, elſe had they neuer created this world of their greatneſſe out of nothing, or made it of Attomes and ſo ſlender principles. They haue not by poaſting to the end of their deſires lamed or tyred the meanes that carried them, but by going ſoftlier, haue gone farther. Greatneſſe is ſteepe and high, not to bee aſcended but by leyſure. Thoſe that ſtriue to riſe violently fall precipitately. Such was the ſuddaine floud and ebbe of the Goths, ſuch the inundation of Tamberlan. One Kingdome is a ſufficient croppe for one yeare. After that rate wee may ſoone begger Chriſtendome, and perfect the Turkiſh Monarchie. As wee haue wonne Cyprus, and may keepe it, ſo wee may loſe both that and our ſelues too, in ſeeking to get more. If you conceiue the Chriſtians haue come ſo farre, but with reſolution to fight, or to fight, but with probabillity of preuayling, you muſt thinke them either fooles or cowards. But if after ſo familiar and long hoſtillity, ouer-vallewing our ſelues, hinder vs not to know them, wee muſt needs confeſſe their ſwords and wits as ſharpe as ours. Not their Puſillanimity, but diuiſion hath ruined them; and our multitudes rather wearied then conquered them. From Preueza themſelues departed, not wee draue them: at leaſt the ſhame of flying then, will excite them to fight now. Our oddes of ſtrength is vncertaine. If they bee the weaker, ſupplyes may ſtrengthen them. If wee the ſtronger, many accidents may weaken vs, but none ſtrengthen. Therefore my councell is, that wee go home while our way is open, and wee haue our welcome in our hands, and not let hope defraude vs of certeinty. Yet is mine opinion euer ſubiect to your correction.

Mehemet Bey his ſpeech, diſſweding from fight.

This ſpeech was highly approoued of Partau Baſcha, Siroch, and Carabey. Yet fate, and their Emperors expreſſe command, vrged publickly by Vluzzali, ſo farre carried them againſt their owne iudgements, that they reſolued not onely to hazard battaile, but ſeeke it. To this end hauing diſtributed thoſe foureteene thouſand ſoldiers where they found moſt need, They weyed anchor, and came to Galanga, about the euening the ſeuenth of October, and there ſtayed. There ſupplying their Galleys and themſelues, with whatſoeuer was requiſite for the incounter. Now drawing neere, the Admirall neglected nought that tended to the augmentation of the ſtrength, or oſtentation of the brauery of his Galleys and men. One principall care was, the faſtning of his ſlaues, leaſt their bodies his, but mindes his enemies, might inſteed of neceſſary inſtruments, be conuerted to dangerous boſome aduerſaries: knowing that deſire of liberty and reuenge, two violent appetites, would make them apt to ſnatch at any opportunity. Hee cauſed their allowance of dyet to bee augmented, ſo cheriſhing their bodies, that they might bee apt for labour, and mixed hope of future lenity, with feare of preſent puniſhment, that ſtubburnneſſe, a thing inuincible in the obdurate minds of ſlaues, might not hinder the vtmoſt extent of their ſtrength. Hee likewiſe keeping good aduiſes at ſea, to preuent ſuddaine inuaſions, drew foorth his fleete into order of battaile, that both his men and Galleys, when need required, might not bee to learne their duty or order: which hee neglected not continually to practiſe, as hee approched the Chriſtian fleete, till hee had brought them to perfection therein.

The eight of October very early in the morning, hoping vnexpectedly to haue come vpon the Chriſtian fleete as they were at anchor, they hoyſted their ſayles halfe maſt high, ſo to hinder their diſcouery, and with a gentle gale ſailed towards Cephalonia. Both fleetes were within twelue mile of one an other, yet vndeſcried, by reaſon of certaine points and head-lands diuiding and ſhadowing them.

That

They firſt kend the Chriſtian Nauy cleere of the Cruzulares, which had ſome-what diſordered them. And ſeeing Andrea Doria ſtand to ſea-ward, vainely imagined hee had fled, as vpon the like reaſon the Chriſtians were deluded with the like conceit of them, which opinion as it begat contempt of the aduerſe part, ſo it bred confidence in themſelues. The place where the fleetes met, ſerued aptly to fight, but not to flie. The Gulph beeing in circuit not aboue two hundred and fifty miles, immured with rocks, ſhores, and Iſlands ſo thick, that to flie, threatned well nigh as much danger as to ſtay. On the North, they were ſhut in by part of Albania, extending from Saint Maura to Lepanto foure ſcore miles. On the Eaſt they were embarred by Morea ſtretching ſeauenty miles from the mouth of the Gulph to Cape Tornezzo. On the ſouth the Iſle of Zant oppoſed it ſelfe. 25. miles in length. the weſt was cloſed vp by Cephalonia and Saint Maura, the one beeing, 40. the other 15. miles long on that coaſt. On the coaſt of Albania, ſcarſe a mile from the maine, were the Rocks Cruzalares of an equall bigneſſe, but the leſſe the more dangerous. Heere againe the Chriſtian fleet before concealed by interpoſition of head lands bewrayed truly hir owne greatneſſe, which though inferior to the Turkes, yet exceeding their expectation did ſome-what ſhake their former reſolution: yet hope, ſhame, and which was more then both, neceſſity, ſpurring them forwards, they approached in forme following.

The order of the Turkiſh fleet.

They diuided their fleete which conſiſted of two hundred and ſeauenty veſſels, Galleys, Galeots and Foiſts, into foure battailes, correſpondent to that of the Chriſtians. In the middle battaile was the high Admirall Ali Baſcha, and therein were conteyned foure ſcore and ten Galleys, in the middeſt of whom, in a ritch and well fortified Galley was he himſelfe, flanqued on the right ſide with Partau Baſcha, and on the left with the Treaſurer of the Nauy, who were likewiſe aſſiſted each of them by three Admirals. The right wing conſiſted of fiftie Galleys, whereof Mehemet Sirocch had the charge. The left wing included ninetie Galleys, conducted by Vluzzali. The Reſeruation for ſupplies was a mixture of ten Galleys and twenty Foiſts, commanded by Amurat Dragut Rais. Hee himſelfe in a beautifull and well armed Galley, ſometime Admirall of Conſtantinople. Their maine battaile was oppoſite to ours. Their right wing to our left, and their left to our right wing. Euery battaile diſtinguiſhed by different Flagges, very curiouſly and richely wrought. Euery priuate Galley adorned with Pendants and Enſeignes of great worth, and beauty, which ſerued rather to breed appetite in the couragious and greedy Chriſtians, then feare: The Galeaſſes they did rather wonder at for hugeneſſe of Bulke, then doubt for offence or danger in ſeruice, thinking them fitter for burthen then fight, wherein notwithlike the horſe of the Greekes lay buried their greateſt miſcheefe: neither could they yet entertaine an aſſurance that their aduerſe fleet would aſſaile them, being (as I may ſay) affraid not to hope. Yet did not this diſtraction make them neglect all poſſible meanes of their owne ſafety or enemies harme. All vnneceſſary things they ſtowed in hold, all needfull they brought vp on the hatches, as powder, ſhotte, Pikes, arrowes, aud all offenſiue or defenſiue prouiſion. Euery Captaine incouraged his ſouldiers, euery ſoldier his fellow; and cuſtome of victory kept out all conceipt of beeing ouercome; each one cheriſhing in himſelfe the remembrance of the Chriſtians flight at Preueze: vicinity of place bringing it to their apprehenſion. The very wind ſeemed to whiſper in their eare ſecret argument of preuailing, to which their credulitie harkened. But ſoone was that Argument confuted, when the winde which till now had beene partiall to them, became a newtrall to both, and a flat calme giuing as it were attention to the voyce of the Cannon. And not onely the winde, but the Sunne ſeemed now to bandie againſt them, for hauing with too much light blinded the Chriſtian Nauy, at the inſtant of ioyning battaile, remooued that preiudice to the Turkes.

And

And not onely the winde but the Sunne ſeemed now to bandy againſt them, for hauing with too much light blinded the Chriſtian Nauy, at the inſtant of ioyning battaile, remooued that preiudice to the Turkes. And the winde as if awakened, and come to doe ſeruice to the God who made it, breathed a gentle gale from the Weſt, which aptly ſerued to carry the miſts of the water and ſmoake of the Ordnance vpon the Turks, whoſe battailes conteined theſe particular Captaines with their Galleys.

The Turkes diuided their fleete into foure Battailons.

The right wing.

1. The firſt was the Admirall of Mehemet Siroch Gouernor of Alexandria.
2. The ſecond Galley of Alexandria, was gouerned by Caras Tubat.
3. Bagly Saraf.
4. Giafer Chiagey.
5. Oſmanan Celebin.
6. Peruſio Reis.
7. Bink Cuſapogli.
8. Oſman Occan.
9. Driuis Aga.
10. Baiazet Siman,
11. Oſman Ali.
12. Deli Aga.
13. Dardagan Bardanbely,
14. Caſli Cuian.
15. Iufuf Aga.
16. Iuſuf Magar.
17. Calafa & Cheder.

All theſe had Galleys of Alexandria.

18 Muſtafa Genouell,
19. Dermigy Pery.
20. Mat Aſſan.

21. Cheder Aga.
22. Soliman Beyt
23. Hibraim.
24. Saban.
25. Caiacelebin,
26. Cheder Siman.
27. The Sonne of Cara Muſtafa.

Their Galleys were of Conſtantinople.

28. Iuran Saba.
29. Dauid Iuſuf,
30. Solac Rais.
31. Arnaut Ferrat.
32. Iuzel Memy.

} Their Galleys were of Tripoli in Barbary.

33. Schender Selim,
34. Lumag Iuſuf.
35. Bardach Celebni,
36. Bagdat Aſau.
37. Guzel Allibi.
38. Bruſali Piry.
39. Rodle Ali.
40. Aga Baſcha with the Admirall of Conſtantinople,
41. Sinaman Muſtafa.
42. Giegiore Ali,
43. Amurates Reis,
44. Calepi Memy.
45. Marul Muſtafa.
46. Heder Lumet,
47. Sinaman Deruis,
48. Meminey Durmis.
49. Algagias Sinan,
50. Adagi Ruſtan,
51. Chingeuey Muſata,
52. Iuſuf Celebni,
53. Tufer Muſtafa.

} These commanded ouer Galleys of Deſpotado, in old time Aetolia.

54. Ali a Genoweſe and Pyrate Captaine of ſmall Galleys.
55. Megil Reis with a ſmall Galeaſſe,
56. Mehemet Bey, with the Admirall Galley of Negroponto.

The Battaile had theſe Captaines and Galleys.

1. Aſſam Bey the Gouernor of Rhodes,
2. Deli Chiafer the warden of Rhodes,
3. Occi Rais,
4. Poſtunag Ogli,
5. Calefact Ogli.
6. Gazizy Reis,
7. Dromus Reis with an Admirall Galley of Conſtantinople:
8. Herbercy,
9. Caragias Rais,

} With Galleys of Rhodes.

10. Ocean

10. Ocean Rais,
11. Deli Piry,
12 Giafer Aga.
13. Bachian Rais,
14. Coz Ali,
15. Colach Rais, } with Galleys of Conſtantinople.
16. Oluz Rais.
17. Aſſan Baſſa, ſonne to Barbaroſſa.
18. Caruf Rais.
19. Alman Rais,
20. Gungli Ogli,
21. Arnaut Celebin,
22. Magar Ali,
23. Giafer Celebni, } Their Galleys were of Naples in Romagnia.
24. Deli Celebni,
25. Deli Aſſan.
26. Caraperi Aga.
27. Sinan Rais
28. Carau Muſtafa.
29. Sali Arauar.
30. Preuil Aga captaine of Naples in Albania.
31. Balahzi Ogli.
32. Bararzi Muſtafa. } with Galleys of Mittilene.
33. Sinan Baly,
34. Agdadi Rais.
35. Two ſonnes of Ali, in a Galley of Conſtantinople.
36. Oſman Rais in an Admirall of Conſtantinople.
37. Deli Iuſuf
38. Ferat Baly, } with Galleys of Mitilene.
39. Cuiacelebin.
40. Bagdar Rais.
41. Haluagi Muſtafa.
42. Giaur Alli Muſtafa, Admirall of ſmall Galleys.
43. Caracoza with Galleys of Valona.
44. Mamatre Saderbey Gouernor of Mittilene.
45. Aly Baſcha high Admirall of the fleet, in a Galley Royall.
46. Portau Baſſa, generall by land with an Admirall Galley.
47. Muſtafa Eſdey Treaſurer,
48. Marmari Rais.

49. Alcicgoli,
50. Caras Deli.
51. Ferat Ceragli.
52. Tramontan Rais, with an Admirall of Conſtantinople,
53. Sulimun Celebni.
54. Deli Ibraim.
55. Murat Coroſſaa,
56. Denur Bali,
57. Caby Heit,
58. Murrat Traſy Scribe of the Arſenall,
59. Peruis Sinam,
60. Dardagan Bali,
61. Giafer Caran,
62. Deruis Sach.

} with Galleys of Conſtantinople.

10

63. Curbaly.
64. Giafer Aga, the captaine of Tripoli in Barbary,
65. Carau Hamat,
66. Ruſtan Cialmagi,
67. Durmis Ogli,
68. Schender Dernigi,
69. Maumet Alis.

} Theſe Galleys were of Tripoli,

70. Afis Cluega Gouernor of Callipolis,
71. Selim Siach,
72. Heder Baſchi,
73. Sicun Muſtafa,
74. Salu Rius,
75. Dely Iſchender,

} Theſe Galleys were of Calipolis.

30

76. The Lord of Marue with an Admirall Galley of Conſtantinople.
77. Peruis Lahumagi,
78. Haſuf Bali,
79. Siran Bardachi,
80. Iuſuf Cinigi,

} Their Galleys alſo were of Callipolis,

40

81. Piri Begogli, with an Admirall Galley of Conſtantinople.
82. Deli Oſmun,
83. Piry Sinan,
84. Demir Celebni,
85. Deruis Hidir,
86. Sinan Muſtafa,
87. Haſirgy Rais.

} with Galleys of Conſtantinople:

50

88. Aſcy

88. Aſcy Ogli.
89. Caias Saraf,
90. Agadi Ahameth,
91. Oſman Sehet.
92. Deruis Celebin,
93. Giafer Rais,
94. Dardagan the Gouernor of the Arſenall.

The left wing.

1. The firſt was an Admirall, whereof was Captaine Carau Hozias,
2. Catalus a Pirate,
3. Chiazell Sinam.
4. Chior Mehemet.
5. Hignau Muſtafa.
6. Cademly Muſtapha,
7. Vſchiufli Memy.
8. Carau Morat.
9. Paſſa Deruis,
10. Iagli Oſman.
11. Piſman Rais.
12. Taſciuis Siſman.
13. Ieſil Hogli.

(2–13: With Galleys of Natolia.)

14. Cara Cialibina, Captaine of ſmall Galleys.
15. Suizi Memy.
16. Magli Rais.
17. Oſey Aſſan.
18. Cumigi Haſuf.

(15–18: They had ſmall Galleys, and did obey Cara Cialibin,)

19. Cadeh Sidir,
20. Oſman Rais,

(19–20: Theſe two had Galleys of Conſtantinople.)

21. Caraperi a Pirate, and alſo Captaine of ſmall Galleys.
22. Iulio Peruis,
23. Calobodan Soliman,
24. Iachuli Mamat,
25. Sayr Giafer,
26. Chior Memy,

(22–26: Theſe had ſmall Galleys, and were commanded by Caraperi their Captaine,)

27. Chiuſuel Giafer, with a Galley of Conſtantinople,
28. Ramazzan,
29. Calemy Memi,
30. Gieſman Ferrat,
31. Hiupris Aſſan,
32. Zambal Murat.

75. Dermar Bey.
76. Iuſuf Alis.
77. Caran Alman.
78. Murat Biaſſan.
79. Carabiney gouernor of Suriaſaro.

} Their Gallies were of Suriaſaro.

80. Calau Baſtagi.
81. Carabi.
82. Giafer Hedi.
83. Ferrat.
84. Memy Beogli.
85. Oſman Piry.
86. Piry Rais.

} Theſe Gallies were of Conſtantinople.

87. Caſam Rais.
88. Talatagi Rais.
89. Rus Celebin.
90. Tutur Ali.

} Theſe Gallies were of Conſtantinople.

91. Vluzzali King of Algier with an Admirall Galley.

The Battaile of Succors.

1. Was an Admirall Galley of Conſtantinople gouerned by Amurat Dragat Rais.
2. Caram Caſli.
3. Haſſam Rais.

} Theſe were Fuſts.

4. Abdula Reis, and that was a little Galley.
5. Aligau Aſſan.
6. Cus Ali.
7. Ginzel Ali.
8. Curtat Celebin.

} Theſe were alſo Foiſts.

9. Deley Bey.
10. Saudagi Memi, this was alſo a Foiſt.
11. Dardagno Reis, and he had an Admirall of Conſtantinople.
12. Deli Dorni, and he had a Galley.
13. Cuidar Memi the Gouernor of the Iſle of Scio.
14. Shetagi Oſman.
15. Haeder.
16. Delius Heder.
17. Armat Merny.
18. Suſan Reis.
19. Gyafer Bey.

} Theſe had Foiſts.

20. Cabil Sinam, his was a Foiſt.

21. Amurat Reis. } Theſe were Foiſts.
22. Sariogi Grafer }
33. Mor Ali. }
24. Piali Murat and this was a ſmall Galley.
25. Caragiali Rais. } Theſe were Foiſts.
26. Murat Alias. }
27. Iumez Alias. }
28. Aſſan Sinan a Galley of Conſtantinople.
29. Boſtagi Murat a Foiſt.
30. Deli Suliman, this was an Admirall Galley of Conſtantinople.

All things thus diſpoſed of, Ali Baſha, ritchly cloathed and armed after the Turkiſh manner, in the poope of his Galley, thus ſpake to the Captaines and Commanders of the nauy there aſſembled to receiue direction.

Ali Baſha his ſpeech of incouragement to his captaines and ſoldiers at the inſtant of battaile.

» MOſt Heroick Captaines, and Inuincible Ianizars, the ſcourge of the Chriſtian, and right hand of the Ottoman Empire, we haue heretofore taken pains » to fetch our ſlaues, our enemies haue now brought them vs. Deſpayring their » ſucceſſe on land, they are come to try the ſame fate in an other element, as if there » were important difference to burne on ſhoare, or drowne at ſea. They haue » changed place but not ſpirit. The ſame effeminacy which they had in other » parts they haue tranſported hither, conſtant only in their vices and vanities. Mag» nanimity and the effect, Honor, are not more inherent or hereditary to vs, then » cowardize and ſeruility to them. We much exceed them in number, but more in » weight of ſufficiency: we were ſouldiers euen when children, they children
» now they are men. What are their ſouldiers but players, minſtrels and tum» blers, a multitude of vngelt Eunuches? what is their Generall but a youth, fitter
» to leade a maske then an army? what are both but the remainder of this yeeres
» victory, whereof Cyprus was the late ritch earneſt? neither can they ſo ſoone
» forget to yeeld, nor we to ouercome. Therefore be confident braue fellowes
» in armes, that not reſolution but their deſtiny hath brought them hither. Italy
» is the gate of Chriſtendome, and Venice the key of Italy, This fleet is that Barre » which if we can either breake or put backe, all flies open, and we ſhall goe be» yond Cæſar in the VVeſt, Alexander in the Eaſt, making the riſing and ſetting of » the Sunne the confines of the Turkiſh Empire. Come on then, let vs fill the » ſea with their bodies, our Gallies with their wealth, our ſelues with honor and » felicity of both.
»

The memorable battaile of Lepanto.

The Chriſtians hauing in all reſpects prouided for ſo great an attempt, as farre as humaine wiſdome or ſtrength extended, conſidering this fleet to be their Arke, God himſelfe being intereſſed in the controuerſie, ceaſed not with humble but importunate inuocation to implore the aide of Heauen, which by their Prieſts and Churchmen was confidently promiſed, Their deuotions concluded, and both battailes now facing each other, the charge ſounded by a cannon from Ali the Turkiſh Admirall, & anſwered by one from each wing, with barbarous clamors, after their cuſtome, which they thinke awakens the courage of their owne, and amazeth and terrifieth their enemies, ſwiftly made towards the Chriſtian fleet, who in a contary manner made trumpets, drums, fifes and other ſuch martial muſick the delightful Prologue to a more dreadful ſcæne. Venieri back't his Galley with two other of Gioan Loretano and Catarini Malipietro. Colonna did the like with two other.

And

And now being within diſtance of their ordnance, the Turkes paſſing by the Galeaſſes were vnexpectedly torne by their great ſhot, which brake forth on all ſides like thunder and lightning out of ſome darke cloud: they being high and cloſe, infinitely ſpoyled the naked Turkes and Rowers, and made as it were that breach at which the Chriſtian fleet entred. For it diſordered them then when they had no time to reforme themſelues. In which confuſion yet deſperatly paſſing the Galeaſſes, they ranne vpon a ſharper point of danger. For the winde reſiſting the ſwiftneſſe of their approch, ſtaied and ſet them vp as dead markes to the Chriſtian ordnance, which had more certaine ayme at them lying ſtill, then in motion and courſe. Beſides, it did benight them with ſmoake, augmenting the terror of thoſe inuiſible miſchiefes which they felt, but could not ſee to ſhun or reueng. The horrible noize of ſome commanding, others anſwering, the crack of Gallies, foule of each other, terrified both the Turkes which ſuffered, and Chriſtians which but heard it; victory appering to them in a dreadfull countenance. In ſome Gallies, the officers ſlaine, the ſlaues brake loſe and like Lyons ſlaughtered their keepers. In others, the powder taking fire caſually, ſeemed to rebell againſt them too; ſhooting their bodies vp in the ayre as ſacrifizes to that Chriſt whom they blaſphemed. Here men fallne ouer-boord wanted Gallies, heere Gallies emptied of their companies, wanted men, and floted like dead bodies without ſoule, which Mehemet Siroch, now finding himſelfe a truer Prophet then he deſired, obſeruing, with-drew himſelfe from the body of the fleete thinking to circumuent the Chriſtian left wing: betwixt whom and Syroch, Auguſtino Barbarico interpoſed his ſquadron, wherewith he ſhut vp his paſſage, the eaſlier by reaſon of a Promontary called Mahanguli extending it ſelfe on that part. Marino Contareni reſolute to be a ſharer with his vncle Barbarico both in honour and danger, followed and vnited himſelfe to that ſquadron, betwixt whom a cruell fight was maintained on both ſides. The Turkiſh left wing commanded by Vluzzali, and confronting our right was very neere to haue ioyned with Doria, who conſidering himſelfe inferior in number of Gallies (he hauing but fifty, his enemy ninty) vrged it not. Vluzzali balancing with the fortune of the Chriſtian his owne oddes of ſtrength, was contented likewiſe to abſteine. Doria after ſome ſuſpence ſtood out to ſeaward with certaine of his Gallies a mile from the remainder.

In the meane time, Don Iohn, Colonna and Venieri the confederate Admirals in exact order incountred the middle battaile of the enemy, exchanging in the approach three or foure vollies of great ſhot, with much diſaduantage to the Turkes. The Chriſtian veſſels being ſnugge and ſtooping from the ordnance of the Turkes higher Gallies, and many of their peeces choaked with Chriſtians bullets caſually ſhot into their mouthes and there ſticking. Which difficulties bred rather fury then deſpaire in them, and induced them with violence of oares to make haſt to grapple, that there fighting hand to hand, the difference might be decided by pure valour. And beeing now come neerer, ſwarmes of arrowes and ſmall ſhot enterchangeably ſtung both ſides, and artificiall fiers reciprocally lightned euery where. At laſt boording, death and wounds, dreſt variouſly, were the entertainment of that hoſtile and vnwelcome viſitation. Whence ſprung ſuch a deluge of bloud that this might haue beene more properly called the red ſea. Now Siroch perceiuing himſelfe not only fruſtrated by interpoſition of Barbaricos ſquadron, but diſtreſſed by the vnreſiſtable force of it, perſiſted in fight, to ſaue his honor though not life, vſing his vtmoſt incouragements to reuiue the languiſhing hope of his men, wherein by ſpeech, but more by example, he ſo farre preuailed, that deſperation ſupplying the want of reſolution, they had now recouered, not onely hope of reſiſtance, but victory: For after doubtfull and vnequall conflict in many parts, here number oppreſſing valor, there valor counterpoizing the ods of number, eſpecially in the Gallies of Barbarico and Ciconias, Barbarico whileſt with inuincible courage he ſtill ran to the weakeſt part, like the vitall vitall ſpirits in the body, was vnfortunately and mortally wounded by a fatall Turkiſh arrow in the left eye, himſelfe being in deed not onely the eye but the very heart of his ſquadron. He falling downe, gaue demonſtration that the life bloud of an army runnes in the veines of the Commander. His owne men ſhrunke back, the Turkes intruded and preſt in his Galley, which had beene then taken, but that Frederico Nani and Siluio Porcia came in to her reskew. Theſe heroick gentlemen growing vp like Hidraes heads in the roome of Barbarico, repeld the Turkes and recouered the former hope of victory. Porcia receiued a wound in his thigh, the honorable badge of his valor.

In an other part, Ciconia oppreſt with multitude of Turkiſh Gallies, was as I may ſay refined with wild fire, and his face beautified with an eminent skar, but was at laſt preſerued by ſpeedy ſupplies, being ſo farre from yeelding either to wearineſſe or torment, that after this he boorded and tooke a principall Galley, and one of their Imperiall Enſeigns; which in the Venetian armory ſerues now to diſplay the inuincible courage of the taker. But Siroch inuironed with danger and miſchiefe on all ſides, hauing no meanes to ſatisfie his deſire of reuenge on al, deſperatly ranne vpon Giouan Contareni (whoſe kinſman was before not idely ſlaine) with ſuch violence, that he had almoſt ſtem'd his Galley; which he obſtinatly perſeuering to boord, was there mortally wounded; as before in iudgement, ſo now in valor hauing manifeſted himſelfe a compleate and abſolute ſouldier. He falling, bred like amazement with the Turkes, as the fate of Barbarico had with the Chriſtians: his men ſlaine, wounded and diſmaied left their decks naked to their thronging enemies, who ruſhing in, were like to haue made the Galley a common ſepulchre to both; For ſhee, being ſhot betweene winde and water was now ready to ſinke. The Turkes leaped ouer-boord, hoping by ſwimming to finde the land more merciſull to them then the water. Siroch was taken, not quite dead, but his wounds ſerched, and found incurable, in pitty, not cruelty he was diſpatch't. His death, though it were deerely bought, was a mortall wound to the Turkes whole Nauy. For thoſe that were before buſied with his incounter, this right wing, or arme, now cut off, conuerted their forces, though much enfeebled, againſt other members of the fleet, aſſiſting where they ſaw need and had opportunity. Beſides, the battaile of ſuccors continually ſupplied and releeued impartially all parts diſtreſt.

Now the two Generals, Don Iohn and Ali Baſha meeting like two furious Currents, began ſo cruell a fight in the middeſt of both fleets that the reſt ſeemed but ſpectators to them two. The Gallies incircling them were the Theater, theſe two the Stage. Contrariety of Religion, emulation of honor, anger, hope, and feare producing admirable effects in both. While the Baſha made violent impreſſion on the prow of Don Iohns Galley, ſhe by others was likely to haue beene entred on the poope, which ſeene was preuented by thoſe that back't her, who boording theſe boorders tooke their Gallies, but with great ſlaughter and difficulty. The Turkiſh Admirall knowing the fortune of the day to depend vpon his ſucceſſe, deſperatly contended to inforce Don Iohn, wherein he ſo farre preuailed, that he compelled him to bring out of hold his freſh reſeruations, to exchange place with his wounded and wearied men vpon the hatches, which ſtrang and vnexpected ſupply as it were new borne out of the wombe of the Galley to defend their mother, bred amazement, and by amazement haſtned the deſtruction of the fainting Turkes. The Baſha ſhot in the head, his Galley ſoone yeelded; himſelfe being yet aliue preſented to D. Iohn, had his head ſtrooke off, which, mounted on the point of a pike, he held vp in publike demonſtration of victory, a grateſull obiect to the Chriſtians, but dreadfull to the Turkes. The ſame cauſe bringing forth at once moſt contrary effects, extremity of hope and feare, which yet leſſe diſmaied them, not diſcerning it a far off, then the aduancement of the Croſſe royall in the top of their Admirall Galley. That was ſeene throughout the fleet, and the farall ſignification eaſily interpreted. Now they all fly, but ſo confuſedly, that while they ſhun the purſuite of one Galley, they fal foule vpon an other. Beſides, Marco Quirini and Antonio Canali intercepted many of the Gallies flying, and men ſwimming to the ſhoare. In this memorable fight many notable captaines on either ſide were taken and ſlaine, whoſe diſtinct Catalogue enſues at the end of the battaile, not yet abſolutely ended. For Vluzzali foreſeeing now to late this generall ouerthrow, ſtudied how he might in ſome meaſure reueng what he could not preuent; therefore houering alooffe from the fleet to expect ſome ſtraglers of the Chriſtian Nauy, at laſt found opportunity to cut off certaine Venetian Gallies which at firſt had followed Doria, but now deſirous to haue beene ſharers in ſo noble a victory, were retyring to the maine battaile: them he chaſed, fetched vp and boorded, yet they brauely repelling him, and Doria wheeling about to aſſaile him abaſt, knowing it dangerous for him to perſeuer in fight where his owne force would continually decreaſe, and his Aduerſaries be augmented, by confluence of reskew from all parts of the army, executing his moſt miſchiefe vpon thoſe Venetians, he with ſaile and oares ſtood off to ſea, towing after him the Gallies of Pietro Bua of Corfou, of the Prior of Meſſina, and Lodouico Cipico of Trahù, Benedetto Soranza, mortally wounded and oppreſſed by multitude, fighting valliantly to the laſt was ſlaine, and his Galley taken. But ſo, that ſuch getting in concluſion proued their loſſe. For many of the enemies thronging into the Galley, either by caſualty or deſperate malice of ſome captaine, ſhe fired, and they periſhed in a wretched mixture of death, burning, and drowning. It ſeemed that the fury of the ſlaughtered Turkes ſuruiued and was vnited in Vluzzali, who alone gaue all three battailes ſome taſte of his diuiliſh rage. Notwithſtanding, all thoſe Gallies which he had taken, were recouered, but that of Petro Bua of Corfoù, in whoſe purchaſe he had a very hard bargaine. The night was his beſt protection, which ſhaddowed him from the purſuing Chriſtians. Who now deſpayring to fetch him vp, whom they could not ſee to follow, gaue ouer the chaſe and ſtood back to the fleet, and Vluzzali eſcaped with about thirty Gallies. Many which could not ſwim being aliue, as if death had taught them that skill, floted being dead. And the ſea glutted with multitudes ſwallowed, ſpued their carkaſes vp againe. Many laboring in the water for life, found now more ſafety in their wracks then before in their Gallies, and ſometimes a Turke and Chriſtian, laying hold of one planke, began a priuate fight, while a third tooke benifit of what they ſtroue for; the ſea in the meane time prooving victor of both. Here a tired Chriſtian calls to his friend for helpe, here a Turke implores it of his enemy. Lamentable and confuſed cries come from both, when now the billowes begin to roare louder then all. For the nauy was yet ſcarce collected and reduced to a ſafe Hauen, towards night, when there aroſe ſo ſodaine and violent a ſtorme, as if the battaile had not now beene ended would haue beene a cruell ſtickler in it.

ſignification

To conclude, the inſolent enemies being thus ouer-throwne, and their ſpoile gathered. the next care was to cure the wounded men and repaire the bruſed and torne veſſels. Wherein the Commanders teſtified no leſſe induſtry then in preparation for the fight, and valor in it. It is hard to reſolue which of the three Admirals D. Iohn, Venieri, or Colonna merited moſt applauſe, they all did what could not be exceeded by any other, nor equalled but by themſelues. The former diſtaſt twixt Don Iohn and Venieri, as it had beene prouidently pacified by mediation of Colonna, ſo was it in the conqueſt nobly forgotten of themſelues, D. Iohn toward the beginning of the battaile being endangered by inequallity of number, Venieri with his owne danger brauely reskewed, like two fierce maſtiues iarring betweene themſelues, when the Beare comes, forget priuate ſtrife to aſſaile the common enemy, which noble curtezy the Generall gratefully and publikly acknowledged, honoring him with the title of father, and which was more, father of the victory. The whole army in vnited voice gratified the diuine mercy for ſo great preſeruation, tion,and eleuating their victorious hands to heauen, acknowledged them to bee ſtrenthened by it. Euery man congratulated the ſafety of his liuing friend, yet moderatly lamented the fate of thoſe dead, the ſorrow of their death being dried vp with ioy of the cauſe. Thoſe bodies which were recouered were honorably buried: the reſt detained by the ſea, were yet eternized on the ſhoare. To repeate the noble actions of euery particular man were a labour worthy Plutarke, euery life would be an hiſtory. But amongſt the moſt eminent ſhines the noble indifferency of the Marquis de Sancta Cruz, who diſpoſing of the reſeruation of ſuccors diſtributed them not by his owne affection but other mens neceſſities, bewraying at once excellency of iudgement, courage and celerity.

Many circumſtances gaue luſter to this victory, but nothing more then the flight of the Chriſtian fleet not many yeeres before from the ſame place, the infamy of the one glorifying the other and ſeruing as a foile to it, as ſhaddowes ſet forth and enlighten any bright picture. It was a pleaſing conſideration to thoſe who had beene in that fugitiue nauy to thinke that after ſo many yeeres they ſhould finde their honor where they loſt it. To this they added remembrance of the like battaile betweene Auguſtus Cæſar and Marc-Antony many hundred yeers before fought in the ſame place, as if deſtiny had made it a ſtage for great actions, and this battaile had beene but the ſecond part of the firſt.

The totall number of the dead in the Chriſtian army were 7656. others ſay 7566. the chiefe of the Venetians were Auguſtino Barbarico Prouidator Generall of the Venetians fleet, Benedetto Soranza, Marin and Ieronimo Contareni, Marco-Antonio Lande, Franceſco Bicono, Iacomo de Meſſa, Caterin Maripietro, Giouan Loredano, Vincento Quirini, Andrea and Georgio Barbarici all of the degree of Senators. Of Romans, Horacio Caraffa, Ferrante Biſballo, Virginio & Horacio of the noble family of Vrſini in Rome. Of the Spaniards, Iuan and Bernardino de Cardona, of the knights of Malta were many ſlaine, amongſt whom theſe three were moſt famous, Ioakin Spart Commendador of Moguncia. Ro: of Hamberg Commendador of Hemmendorf, and Francis Droſt, by nation Germains. The chiefe men wounded were, D. Iohn the Generall, Veniери the Venetian Admirall, Paulo Iordano, Marco Molino, and Troylo Sauello, and well nie ſeuen thouſand priuate men. This loſſe of it ſelfe great, was leſſened by compariſon of the Turkes, who were reported by ſome Authors to haue beene diſmembred of 29000. of their braueſt ſouldiers ſlaine and taken: ſome affirme it leſſe, ſome more. But the multitude of their Gallies taken, wracked, and dead bodies floting on the ſea (carrying with it a reſemblance of the generall deluge) acknowledge it to be great. Amongſt thoſe ſlaine, the moſt eminent was Ali Baſha the high Admirall Generall, one of great magnanimity and worthy ſuch a place. Mehemet Bey alias Siroch Gouernor of Alexandria a man of ſingular iudgement and valor, fighting to the laſt, not (as others) that he ſaw not, but contemned the danger. Haſſan Baſha the valiant ſonne of his valerous father Barbaroſſa, and many others equally valliant, noble, and deere to the Emperor their Maſter. The moſt welcome priſoners were Achmat and Mahomet ſonnes of the Generall Ali Mehemet Bey Gouernor of Eubœa, and three thouſand and odde vulgar ſouldiers. There eſcaped Partau Baſha who ſince others would not follow his councell in abſtaining from fight, made vſe of it himſelfe. Vluzzali a deſperate and ſubtill Rennegado who fought, but ſo alwaies that he might flie, and as the Parthian horſe-men, did moſt miſchiefe in flying. There were taken 130 veſſels. Whereof 117. were Gallies, 13. Galeots. Some report, 160. ſome more, ſome leſſe. The eſcape of the reſt making the number of ſuch as were taken vncertain. The Galley of Cleopatra was not more ritch, curious or beautiful then the Admirall Galley of Ali, neither did the beauty of it better become peace, then the ſtrength warre. There was much treaſure and many things of great value found in it, which the noble Generall, not baſely conuerted to his priuate vſe but diſtributed to thoſe who moſt deſerued it. Amongſt theſe, a Macedonian by whoſe fortunate hand the Baſha died was worthily the greateſt ſharer. And becauſe Don Iohn held gold to poore a reward for ſuch vneſtimable merit, he approued thoſe other guifts with honor, and knighted him. But the munificent Venetians thinking this a petty remuneration, nothing equiualent to the dignity of their ſtate, gratified him with an annuity of 300. Ducats.

whoſe

The moſt eſteemed ſpoile of the Turkiſh fleet were the enfranchiſed Chriſtians, in number 1200. words are but mute expreſſals of the wretchedneſſe of their captiuity (being at once compelled to ſuffer for, yet doe againſt their Religion) Nothing could equall it but this ioy of their enlargement, which was ſuch as that of Ionas may be apprehended at his birth and reſurrection out of that monſter. Neither was this exceſſiue gladneſſe confined to their owne breſts, but at their arriuall multiplied by diuiſion among their friends and kinſmen. Of whom theſe liuing martires receiued ſuch welcome as was giuen to the three Ebrew Salamanders comming out of the furnace. They ſeemed but then married to their wiues, and their children new borne to them: Embracements were now in ſteed of fetters, and kiſſes of blowes (bleſſed exchange!) And now they wept for ioy that they had no contrary cauſe to weepe. The miſery paſt ſeemed to ſweeten their preſent felicity, ſo that this day was with all deuotion, magnificence and exhileration celebrated as the Saboth of their ſlauiſh labours. The ninteenth of the ſame month Vnfredo Iuſtiniano arriued at Venice with aduertizement of victory to the Senate. Neuer any muſicke ſo feaſted their eares as that newes, no Oratory could be ſo harmonious as the plaine relation of it. The only word of victory was the Epitome of all Retorick. The death of particular men ſeemed only a letting bloud for the generall health. No man grutched to beſtow a ſonne or brother towards this common ſacrifize. Euen the heroick Barbarico was rather enuied then lamented, they which honored him aliue, being dead welny adored him: ſo that ſorrow was now baniſhed out of Venice, and confined to Conſtantinople.

The gratulatory Ambaſſadors of all neighbour Princes flocked thither, acknowledging the Venetians their protectors and champions.

The time of the yeere, and weakeneſſe of their fleete and men, moued the Generall D. Iohn to deſiſt from purſuing the victory any farther. Therefore he proceeded to diuiſion of the ſpoile, which was thus proportioned.

The Popes ſhare was.

Gallies. 21.	Whereof 19. ordinary, 2. Galeots.
Ordnance. 54.	Whereot 9. great, 3. murtherers, 42. ſmaller peeces.
Priſoners. 881.	Amongeſt whom were Achmat and Mahomet the ſonnes of the Generall Ali Baſha.

The Venetians ſhare was.

Gallies. 44.	Whereof 39. ordinary and a halfe, 4. Galeots and a halfe.
Ordnance. 131.	Whereof 39. and halfe great, 5. murtherers and an halfe. 86. ſmaller peeces.
Priſoners 1162.	Of all ſorts.

The Spaniſh ſhare was.

Gallies. 64.	Whereof 58. Gallies and a halfe, 6. Galeots and an halfe.

Ordnance 214.	Whereof 58. great peeces and a halfe, 8. great murtherers and an halfe. 128. ſmaller peeces.
Priſoners 1713.	Of all ſorts.

The Remainder were diſtributed among the aſſiſtants.

The diuiſion concluded not with equallity, yet generall ſatisfaction; the Venetians thinking they had the more honor, though the Spaniard the more luggage. Venieri indefatigable in doing nobly, and exaſperated with the yet ſmarting blow of Cyprus, eſteeming one Chriſtian Kingdome not to be counteruailed with many barbarous fleets, extolled highly the magnanimity of the General, hoping that praiſe would haue ſpurred him forward in ſo faire and open a way of victory, propoſing the reskew of Greece, an action which would more immortalize him then the conqueſt of Tunis had done his father, whoſe Genius he ſaid would not enuy to ſee it ſelfe exceeded by him, which was not equalled by his Predeceſſors. This, much enflamed the hot-aſpiring minde of the youthfull Prince lately fleſhed, in ſo much that they proceeded to conſultation how they might perfect this trophei whoſe hardeſt worke (the foundation) was already laied: when the ſecret maligners of Venieri hauing now againe by his meanes leiſure and ſecurity to oppoſe themſelues to any deſeigne of his, diuerted D. Iohn from ſo braue a reſolution. Therefore making Aprill the time, and Corfou the Rendezuous of their next yeeres conuention, they diſſolued the Nauy. Don Iohn returning to Meſſina.

This abrupt departure in the eye of expectation, appeared a running away, or tergiuerſation (I had almoſt ſaid Apoſtacy) from victory, whom he ſeemed to leaue vnkindly, deſyring him to ſtay longer. All men greeued to ſee hope pregnant and great, likely to bring forth faire iſſue if ſhe had gon out her time thus miſcarry. The death of Ali by a Grecian, that miſerable nation interpreted an Omen of enſuing liberty; and in opinion manumzied, after they found themſelues thus deluded, groaned as vnder a new ſubiugation. Vpon intelligence of the ouer-throw, they had taken heart and would haue taken armes too, had they beene offered: It greeued him now to diſmiſſe that reſolution ſo neceſſarily entertained. They deſired if D. Iohn would not himſelfe, only to let his ſhaddow (his fame) fight for them, while he ſtood by. That he would doe them the grace to eternize himſelfe by their deliuery. And being certified of his returne cried out that he at once for-ſooke himſelfe and them, their liberty and his glory being the Twinnes whereof he was in labor, and that it was but a little greatneſſe which one victory could fill. And ſurely had this opportunity beene well improoued, there might haue beene farre more made of it. For though that ingenious Turke to expreſſe the inequallity betweene the loſſe of our Cyprus and their Nauy, ſaid, That Selim had cut off the Venetians arme, they, but his beard: inſinuating, That timber growes, but not Kingdomes; and ſhips might be built, but not Iſlands: yet is it manifeſt that the chiefe ſtrength of this Samſon lay in this haire, and that if hee had beene aſſailed ere it grew out againe, the razor which cut his beard might haue cut his throat. Thus much the Tyrant himſelfe vnwittingly acknowledged by the intended maſſacre of the Chriſtians vnder him, cunningly fathered on reuenge, but begot by feare. He knew captiues of the quality of fire, as dangerous as ſeruiceable. It is true that the next ſpring, his fleet (not as it might haue beene quite rooted out) budded forth to his former hight: his Arſenals ſpawning ſhoales of Gallies, yet barren enough in marriners, the eye of a fleet; without theſe his Gallies were blinde, not directing, but groaping their way: his experteſt Pilots, old naturall ſea-men, begot as it were on Marmaides, and nurſt vp in the armes of the ſea, perriſhed in the laſt battaile; theſe freſh multitudes did not man but fraught his veſſels.

But

But theſe publike conſiderations were leſſe potent to mooue D. Iohn to perſiſt, then other priuate reſpects, to reduce him from this honorable expedition. Therefore the noble Venieri, whoſe actiue vntired ſpirit, neither the yeeres winter, nor his owne, could benumbe, was excited, not deterred, by his departure, ſo far from being retrograde in his courſe of victory that he determined to goe a ſtep farther: and knowing that the terror of the late ouer-throw had much ſhaken and made a breach in the Turkiſh courage, he thought good to enter it ere time or ſupplies ſhould repaire it. Being in this deliberation, Philippo Bragadino Prouidator of the Gulphe arriued with ſixe Galleaſſes and ten Gallies, and after conſultation, ſtrengthing his owne fleete with this addition, and both with his owne reputation, he ſodainely diſpatch't Quirini, aſſociated with many braue captaines to Marguerita, which Venieri his fame deliuered vp to them; but finding it vntenable they razed it.

Venieri taking this as an earneſt of ſome farther ſucceſſe propounded an expedition for Saint Maura, which many of the councell of warre oppugned, alleadging the ſtrength of the place, the vnaptneſſe of the time, and diſproportion of their owne powers to both; yet he full of hope and courage, reſoluing, whereſoeuer the impediment were, it ſhould not be in himſelfe, proceeded thither, and hauing better viewed the impregnableneſſe of the place, hee thought it a part of wiſdome, next the not vndertaking a dangerous attempt, ſpeedily to lay it downe, and therefore returned to Corfou.

Colonna leauing D. Iohn (on whom all ſupreame and exquiſite honors were heaped) at Naples, from thence with great magnificence paſſed towards Rome: by the way, all mens eares and eyes taken vp and reſerued ſoly for this obiect. Enery tongue being a Preface to the voluminous praiſes dedicated to him afterwards at Rome. Venice held the enemy at the armes end but had he euer cloſed with Italy, Rome would haue beene ſhrewdly griped. This Ague of feare thus ſhaking her, imagine how welcome the Phyſition was that cured her. To haue ſecured her from miſchiefe, had been meritorious, but to returne it thither whence it came, was an infinite obligation: Arriuing therefore at Rome, long after himſelfe, his fame had out-ſtripped him, and raiſed the ſpirit of that ancient city in a ſhape of triumphe to ſee her aged glory in this bright Glaſſe of victory, and entertaine her new champion. The city ſeemed to be turned inſide outward: their ritch tapiſtries now beautifying the walles without, the ſtreets ſtrewed with flowers as at a marriage. At laſt came Colonna accompanied with the chiefe Senators and attended by the moſt eminent captiues, in number 160. ſuted rather to his fortune then their owne, very ritchly, yet in their countenances retayning a maieſtick ſorrow. Thus paſſing through many triumphant Arches erected in his honor, he came to the Popes palace, at whoſe feete proſtrating both himſelfe and his dignities, and deliuering vp the ſonnes of Ali, late likely to haue arriued in a leſſe welcome manner, he was moſt graciouſly entertained. His Holineſſe applauding his proceeding generally. But quite contrary was his opinion of Doria: whom he ſaid behaued himſelf more like a Pirate, or newtral, then one of the Chriſtian party.

The end of the tenth Booke of the ſixth Decade.

The Contents of the firſt Booke of the ſeuenth Decade.

THE farther expectation of al men after the famous victory of Lepanto. The Venetians preparation againſt the ſpring. The Emperor beeing ſolicited by the Pope and Venetians to enter into the league refuſeth it. The French King, Kings of Portugall and Poland doe the like. The Spaniards ſeeme vnwilling by reaſon of the troubles of Flanders. The Venetians great preparations to paſſe into the Leuant. The Turkes ſcoure the ſeas whileſt their fleet is making ready. The death of Pius the fifth, with the creation of Pope Gregory the thirteenth. Don Iohn his allegations for his ſtay at Meſſina. Souranza comming thither ſolicits Don Iohn to depart and vnite himſelfe to the Venetian fleete. The cauſe of Don Iohns delay. Souranza bringeth ſupplies to Corfou. Iealozies betwixt the French and Spaniards by reaſon of the troubles of Flanders, with the French Kings complaint againſt the Duke of Alua. The Spaniards are iealous of the French. The Pope and Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the moſt Chriſtian and Catholike Kings to remooue their diſtruſts. Vluzzali Generall of the Turkiſh fleet putteth to ſea. The Senats reſolution perceiuing the delays of the Spaniards: Don Iohn certifieth Marc-Antonio Colonna of his departure: The Chriſtian fleet notwithſtanding leaues Corfoù: Vluzzali determineth to fight with the Chriſtian fleet: The Chriſtians reſolue to aſſaile the Turkes: The enemies alter their purpoſe and refuſe battaile: The death of Sigiſmond King of Poland: The Venetian Generall intending to giue battaile encourageth his ſoldiers. And laſtly the retreat or rather flight of the enemies.

The

The firſt Booke of the ſeuenth Decad of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

THE victory of the confederate Princes ouer the Turkes, who by their fortunate ſucceſſe had till then made themſelues terrible to all nations, had begot ſuch expectation and hope in moſt men, as they ſuppoſed a fit occaſion was now offered to reuenge all former wrongs : and that the Ottoman Empire forſaken of her late felicity would be ouerthrowne by the power of Chriſtian Princes; perſwading themſelues that the onely report of the arriuall of the Chriſtian fleet was ſufficient to open a way to gallant enterpriſes and conqueſts, and to cauſe the inhabitants of the Prouinces poſſeſt by the Turkes to reuolt, who did deadly hate their religion, cuſtomes, and gouernment: But the diſcreeter ſort were not tranſported with ſuch idle ſuppoſitions, nor fed with ſuch vaine hope, conſidering the euent of things by reaſon, and not by affection, knowing that ſo long as the Turkes land forces (the true foundation of their Empire) were vnſhaken, there was no likelyhood at all to preuaile againſt them, nor to hope on the peoples reuolt who commonly are wont to produce cleane contrary effects, and eſpecially in the Ottoman Empire, where ſubiects are poore and needy, wanting commanders, armes and meanes, ſo that their commotions can not greatly hurt the Turkes, or profit others: and that the Greekes, accuſtomed of a long time to ſeruitude, had loſt the greateſt part of their ancient generoſity.

Small hope in the reuolt of the Turkes ſubiects.

The Venetians vpon theſe conſiderations were carefull to make new warlike preparations, to augment the number of their Gallies, to refreſh their army with new ſouldiers, and generally to prouide whatſoeuer ſhould be neceſſary, that they might ſpeedily ſend their fleet into the Leuant againſt the Turkes.

The Venetians preparations againſt the ſpring.

But Chriſtian Princes (ſhutting their eyes in regard of their owne particular affections) did not apprehend the fit occaſion offered to abate the power of ſo great and terrible an enemy, and in a manner enuying one an other they diſcourſed thereof as though it had beene a forraine warre (wherein notwithſtanding conſiſted the common ſafety) and reiected the good fortune which the former proſperous ſucceſſe did promiſe them : for the Emperor being entreated and ſolicited by the Pope and Venetians to embrace the cauſe, and being likewiſe perſwaded by the Catholike King, who to that end had ſent Don Pedro Faſſardo to him, ſtill perſiſting in his vſuall delaies, and irreſolutneſſe, alleadged new but greater difficulties, and wanting will, was very glad to entertaine any excuſe to free himſelfe from it: therefore he demanded to haue ready money giuen him in ſteed of thoſe foote forces which they offered, and ſufficient caution for it in ſome free townes of Germany, adding farther that he would be aſſured of the continuance of that ſupply for a long time, and that to thoſe ends they ſhould inſert more ſtrict and expreſſe obligations in the Articles of the capitulations : this hee propounded onely for a ſhew, knowing well enough that they would neuer be granted; and it was likewiſe knowne, that hee had prepared the tribute, and already made choice of a messenger to carry it to Constantinople. Charles the French King on the other side, solicited by the Pope, not to be wanting to all Christendome in such an expedition, answered that he would first vnderstand the Emperours resolution, and so soone as his forces were ready, hee would not faile speedily to send his aide to ioyne with the land-troupes of Germany, vnder the conduct of his brother the Duke of Aniou, but that hee neither could, nor ought, to suffer his sea-forces (farre inferior to those of Spaine) to ioyne with them.

The Emperors excuſes to free himſelfe from entring into the league.

At the same time the Cardinall Alexandrine hauing executed his commission in Spaine, was by the Popes commandement gon in Portugall, from whence they hoped to procure thirty vessels of warre for seruice of the Christian fleet: the King did honourably entertaine him, yet hee could draw nothing from his Maiesty but generall promises, whereby he saw, that the King inclyning wholly to the enterprize of Barbary against the Moores, did not greatly respect matters farre from home. Not long after, Antonio Tepulo hauing accomplished his Ambassadge into Spaine, went thither likewise, verily perswading himselfe that the newes of the late victory would the easier haue induced that King to embrace the league, wherein a very honourable place was reserued for him, the Confederates fortunate successe inuiting him therevnto, together with his owne interest, that the vnbridled greatnesse of the Turkes might bee abated, whom (not without cause) hee might feare would prooue bad neighbours to his Indies. All this could not procure the King to incline to the league, nor could the Ambassadors draw any other promise from him, then this, That hee would the next yeere send foure thousand foot men to the seruice of the league, and ioyne some few of his owne vessels to the Confederates fleet, the which he could not then doe, because that certaine French Protestants of Rochell, did ordinarily make incursions vpon his territories and sea coasts, whereby he was enforced continually to entertaine certaine armed vessels, to resist them and the Moores of Fesse, and of this by letters he certified the Senate.

The King of Portugals answer to the Cardinall, and Venetians.

Tepulo in the end, because his Ambassage should not be fruitlesse, told him, that he might assist the common cause of Christendome against the infidels by other meanes, not hindring himselfe at all, namely by causing his officers in the Indies to acquaint the Persians, sworne enemies to the Turkes, with the vnion of the Christian Princes, with their late victory against Selim, and with their deseignes, and afterwards by sending certaine numbers of Portugall Harguebuziers from the red sea, vnto the confines of the Turkish Empire, to keepe them busied in sundry places, or at least to amaze and hold them in suspence. The king promised so to doe, adding therevnto that they should stop their commerce from Ormus and Bazzana, and the transportation of mettal through the Persian seas, which abundantly was brought to them from China.

The King of Portugals promises.

The King likewise gaue meanes to the Cardinall Alexandrine, to conuey certaine Breeses to the Persian King, Prester Iohn, and some other Kings of Arabia written vnto them by the Pope, wherein he solicited them to take armes against the Turkes, the which letters tooke none effect, nor were euer answered.

The Pope likewise solicited the King of Poland, with whom at the same time the Cardinall Commendon remayned, who promised to draw that King into the league, in regard of sundry accidents which happened, besides the victory, the Turkes meaning to bee reuenged on the Polakes, for that they had fauored the Valachian, to the preiudice of the Ottoman Empire, and for that purpose had in hostile manner entred Prussia, Padolia, and Russia. But the King falling sicke during the treaty and not beeing able to bee present at the negociation, it was referred to some Lords of the Kingdom, who did smally affect that war, being vnwilling to contribute (according to their custome) towards the expense of forrain war: As also because that at the same time they had intelligence that a Chiaus was comming from Conſtantinople to their Court, to treate about that contention, al the Popes endeuor & authority could not make it ſort to any good effect.

The Pope solliciteth the King of Poland.

was

After this manner were matters handled in the Court of Chriſtian Princes, who ſeemed already to decline from their former hope, and knew, that for the abating of the Turkiſh power the Sea-forces were not ſufficient, but that a mighty land-Army was needfull: and that therefore it eſpecially imported them to haue the Emperor to enter into the league, all men holding it for certain, that Poland, Muſcouy, and the other northerne Prouinces, apt to take Armes againſt the Turkes, would preſently yeeld to the authority of the Empire: this being conſidered by the enemies they vſed all meanes to preſerue the Emperor Maximilians freindſhip, thinking the danger, which threatened them, not to be ſmall, if all Germany ſhould league it ſelfe againſt them.

Baſcha Mahomet ſolliciteth the Emperor.

Therefore Mahomet Baſcha had written to the Emperor, and had particularly acquainted him with the battaile, making the ouerthrow farre leſſe then indeed it was, and the power of the Ottoman Empire very great, requeſting him not to breake the truce for other mens pleaſures, but to preſerue his inuiolate freindſhip with Selim; which beeing once knowne, would continue for euer. But that which did heerein moſt trouble the Pope and Venetians and made them to feare, was, their ſuſpition, that the Spaniards would not ſhew themſelues ſo ready to purſue the courſe of the victory, as the importancy of the cauſe did require: because that diuers of the Catholick Kings courtiers murmured againſt D. Iohn for hazarding the Kings forces in battaile, ſeeing that his maieſties intereſt was vnlike that of the Venetians where-vppon they were differently to bee mannaged: and for that afterwards when they vnderſtood, that the Duke of Seſſa, a noble and famous Gentleman, came to command in the Army in ſtead of the great Commander Requeſens who went to be Gouernour of Milan, they inferd there-vppon, that the Catholik King would not haue D. Iohn attempt ought without his aduiſe and Councell.

The Pope and Venetians doubt.

Now the greateſt let then found in purſuing this warre of the Leuant, was, the bad ſucceſſe of the affaires of Flanders, where they daily grew from bad to worſe, not without ſom ſuſpition that the Proteſtants of Germany, England and France would fauour and aſiſt that rebellion: ſo, that a fit and conuenient opportunity being made to vnite the Nauies and put to Sea, notwithſtanding that Leonardo Contaren the Venetians Ambaſſador with D. Iohn, did ſolicite this vnion and ſhipping of the ſoldiers, all his purſuites were in vayne. The Venetians alone, not looſing time, ſpared neither coſt nor labour, but ſought to make vſe of the victory, and with great ſpeed trimd their Gallies, augmented their number, made new leuies of ſoldiers to compleat their army, that it might ſpeedily bee ready to ſaile into the Leuant. And becauſe that D. Iohn and the Spaniards had entertained ſome diſtaſt of the Generall Venieri (as hath beene already ſaid) the better to take away al occaſion of hatred and diuiſion, they choſe Iacomo Foſcarini their Generall who at that time was Prouidator Generall in Dalmatia, who hauing notice that hee was elected, and receiuing the Common wealthes ſtanderd from Lodouico Grimani who ſucceeded him in Dalmatia, he departed from Zara on the firſt day of Aprill with nine Gallies and went to Cortou, where taking charge of the fleet, which at that time conſiſted of 40. Gallies, he made a General review, and ſent for great numbers of footmen vnder diuers Captaines from Brindiſi, he ſtored the Gallies with victualls, armor, munitions and all other neceſſaries: this being done, the Generall Venieri with ſome Gallies retired into the Gulph, there to execute ſome Noble enterprize, if occaſion were offered.

The Turkes admiration of the Chriſtians before the battaile.

This in effect is all that was done by the Chriſtian Princes. The Turkes after the battaills loſſe, were by ſo much more afflicted, as inured to victory, they could not entertaine conceit of contrary ſucceſſe, and contemning the Chriſtian forces, they came rather to ſpoile then to fight: but this vnexpected ouerthrow made made them more circumspect. whereuppon Selim who then lay at Constantinople, feariug least some innouation might happen at Constantinople, presently went thither and shewed himselfe to the people, dissembling as much as in him lay, his discontent and feare. The Baschas neuertheless were very carefull to prouide all necessaries for the army, so as it seemed they were in hope to reforme their former error, and to recouer their lost reputation: they repayred their old Gallies, built new, enrolled great numbers of Marriners, sent for soldiers forth of the Prouinces to come to Constantinople, so that vsing industry and speed to the hurt and wonder of the Christians, Carassali departing forth of the streight of Gallipolis with threescore armed vessells, began to scoure the Seaes, and to wast the Islands of Tino and Cerigo, whilest Vluzzali prepared a great fleet: for they had determined being once vnited to passe on, and to inuade the Isle of Candy; or else face the Venetians Nauy, frustrate their deseignes, and assure the Seas belonging to the Ottoman Empire. These pro uisions and the Confederates delaies and irresolutions, had much imboldened the Turkes, and although in the beginning they had sundry times conferred with the Venetian Baily concerning peace, and seemed to be very desirous of it; they neuertheless delayed the certaine resolution thereof till the arriuall of the Bishop of Aix Ambassador to the most Christian King, whom they knew at that time to be come from Venice towards Constantinople vppon important affaires, supposing that hee brought som particular commission with him concerning that businesse, and that by his mediation together with his Kings authority, they might the easier establish and conclude some honorable agreement: but the condition of matters being afterwards changed when they came to treat on particulars, they propounded very vniust Articles, being desirous to make peace as though they had been victorious not vanquished, menacing the Venetians with losse and destruction: The Confederates neuertheless being no whit mooued by these nor other geeat mischeefs, went very slowly to work, as though the enemies had beene wholly defeated, that they had no more cause to fight, and as if at their own pleasure they might haue enioyed the fruit of the Victory. All men did wonder at these delaies, and differently discoursed therof: A rumor was spred abroad, that the French did no longer in secret but openly assist the Flemmings who determined to inuade the territories of the Catholick King; that to this end, they prepared fifty shippes of warre at Rochell, which should be commanded by Philippo Strozzi: and elsewhere other stirrs and rumors of war were reported to be currant in the Realme of Nauarre.

The treaty of peace broken.

Rumors diuulged by the Spaniard.

These soe important and dangerous reports, held the Spaniards in suspence, and would not suffer them to imploy their sea forces, in which their greatest hope consisted) in forraine enterprizes, fearing not to haue them a gain at their need, for the defense of their owne territories Many alleaged other reasons which mooued the Spaniards not to set forth: But whatsoeuer the true occasion was, it was after the Spanniſh manner kept very secret: for they, making no shew to feare the French, or that they had giuen ouer the enterprize of the Senate for any other resp ect, they did still affirme the contrary, promising from day to day to come to Corfou: all this they did very cunningly, knowing well enough that if the Venetians should suspect that the Conederates went about to forsake them, it would enforce them to make vse of the present time, and to agree with the Turkes: a matter which would greatly preiudice the Spaniards, who resoluing for to continue perpetuall enemies vnto the Turkes would alone bee constrayned to make head against the forces of so great a Potentate.

The Spaniards feare least the Venetians make peace with the Turks

After this manner did the Spaniards at the same time beare themselues, not bewraying their inward intentions, but temporizing in conclusion did nothing.

In the meane time Pius Quintus dyed generally lamented, a man of great Sanctimony and zealous of the common good of Chriſtendome, the onely inſtrument of the preſeruation and augmentation of the league. Death of Pius Quintus.

Theſe newes flying to Venice, the Senate preſently by letters ſollicited the Colledge of Cardinalls, not to ſuffer the league, which his late Holineſſe had cheriſht, to dye with him, knowing how mortall delay was to it, and how preiudiciall the diſſolution, to the common good: the Colledge reſolued to continue the preparation for warre, and inſtantly committed the managing of the buſineſſe vnto the former Commiſſioners, who then preſently went in hand with it. The Venetians ſollicite the Cardinalls in the vacancy of the Sea.

The Papacy was not long vacant, for the ſame day the Conclaue elected Hugo Boncompagno Cardinal of Saint Sixtus, a Bologneſe & doctor of the lawes long reſident and very famous in the Court of Rome intituling himſelfe Gregory 13.

His Coronation ſolemnized he confirmed the league in the former condition but concerning the conuention of the fleetes there aroſe many delayes and difficulties: for D. Iohn only ſeeking procraſtination, grew ſcrupulous of his departure, ſaying his commiſſion extended no farther, but euery day expected a more ample, wherewith hee hoped ere long to ſatiſfie them: by this meanes was the great preparation of the Venetian fruſtrate, and D. Iohn perſeuering in theſe protractions, wrote to the Generall Foſcarini that his onely ſtay was for the Duke of Seſſa, who if he came not uery ſpeedily, himſelfe reſolued without him to come to Corfou: hee likewiſe taxed Collonna, becauſe his expectation of the Florentine Gallies, made him delay his ioyning with the fleet. The Senate had enioyned the Generall Foſcarini not to attempt any particular enterprize till the Spaniſh Gallies were arriued, leſt he therby ſhould hinder the common cauſe of the league,

At the ſame time Sciara Martinenga of Breſſia a man famous for his martiall experience, and Gouernor Generall of Albania propounded the enterprize vpon Caſtelnouo to the Senate, a matter greatly deſired by the Venetians, not ſo much for facillity of conqueſt, the towne beeing ſmall and badly inhabited, as for the commodious ſituation thereof, lying at the mouth of the Gulph of Catharra. The enterprize vpon Caſtelnouo propounded to the Senate.

The Senate in ſom ſort deſirous to let the enemies feele the fury of their Armes committed this attempt to Martinenga, who told them that he had already ſufficiently viewed the place, and that the execution thereof was eaſie. Hee imbarked himſelfe and fiue thouſand footmen at Chioggia, among whom were many Frenchmen, gallant fellowes and good ſoldiers, hee directed his courſe towards the Gulph of Catharra, carrying with him a commiſſion from the Councell of Tenne to the General Venieri to aid and aſiſt him in that enterprize, whom meeting by the way neere to Siſena they ſailed together towards the mouth of the Gulph, where landing their ſoldiers and attempting to ſurprize the Towne, the alarme was ſo whot ouer the whole Countrey, as multitudes of Turkes comming to defend it, Martinenga and the Generall were enforced to quitt the enterprize and to retreat, the one to Zara, and the other with his French forces to Catharra, The attempt vppon Caſtelnouo in vaine.

After this manner did the Chriſtians affaires languiſh, and were nothing anſwerable to the reputation which the late victory had gotten them, their fleets and ſoldiers remayning idle at Corfou and Meſſina, being ſpectators of the enemies inſulting braues at ſea, their number and victualls daily diminiſhing D. Iohn ſtill remayning at Meſſina and vſing his former delayes, did infinitely diſcontent the Generall Foſcaren, who ſomtimes determined of him ſelfe to attempt ſomewhat vppon the enemy, but at laſt making a vertue of neceſſity and knowing his owne forces alone toweake for any great enterprize, he was enforced to ſpend the time in expectation of the confederates arriuall. And yet hedid by all meanes auoide any occasion that might discontent the Spaniards, or giue them cause of any suspition, that they might haue no lawfull cause to bee wanting to the common cause.

any

Foscarini beeing thus perplext, thought it best to send the Prouidator Soranza to Messina, who was newly come from Candy, hoping that by his wisdome and discretion, Don Iohn being put in minde of his former honor, might bee speedily induced to depart. Souranza departed from Corfou with twenty fiue Galleys, hauing foule weather all the way: at last arriuing at Messina, hee was honorably entertained by Marc-Antonio Colonna, excusing himselfe and imputing it to the tempest, that he had not met him farther at sea: they both went to Don Iohns Pallace, and at the gates were receiued by the Count of Piega his chiefe Steward, and principall Gentlemen of his houshold, conducting them into the Princes, presence, who with all honorable curtesie welcomed him, seeming highly contented with his comming: Soranza began to acquaint him with the cause of his arriuall, together with the state of matters, and incredible desire of all men to see him at Corfou: he informed him of the great number of Galleys, soldiers, abondance of victuals and munitions, wherewith two and twenty ships were loden: that they onely wanted the conuention of the fleets, which they all desired in so important an action: in regard whereof hee was sent to acquaint him with the state of the Venetians nauy, and to waite vpon him to Corfou. That the Venetian Captains, who had a long time bin in readinesse, would attempt nothing without his presence, notwithstanding that they had beene often inuited thereunto by report of the enemies weakenesse, and by their wrongs and spoiles committed in the Islands vnder their dominion: That the Senate, and euery particular man, desired to haue the glory and honor of all enterprises bestowed vpon him: for which cause especially they had hitherto kept their whole fleet in harbor, being wel assured that his arriuall at Corfou would be no longer deferred, & that his own present comming to Messina, was rather to hono: then hasten his departure: saying that nothing would be more dangerous to the league, then continuation of delay. Marc-Antonie Colonna, did in the Popes name second Soranza, telling him how much his Holinesse desired the prosperity of the league, and conuention of the fleetes.

Soranza is honorably entertained by Don Iohn at Messina.

His Remonstrance to D. Iohn.

Don Iohn seemed not to distaste this motion, excusing his delay by sundry impediments hapned, promising euer after to vse all possible speed, and to take order for the present rigging of an hundred Galleys which should bee man'd with forty thousand footemen of seuerall nations. But the effects were not answerable to his words, for at that time there were but three score Galleys in the hauen of Messina: and of those which the Duke of Sessa was to bring from Spain, there was no newes at all: Besides, t he old soldiers refused to go any farther, vnlesse they might receiue certaine moneths pay which was due vnto them for their former seruice. Yet they dayly fed the Venetian Prouidator with sundry hopes and faire promises: and the better to beguile him, they imbarked three thousand Italian foot in thirty Galleis vnder the conduct of the General of Naples, giuing it forth that they were to goe before to Corfou, there to expect the remainder of the fleete.

The Spanish delayes.

In these delayes did they waste time, and halfe Iune was spent without any exploit vpon the enemy, or any certaine hope or resolution what to do: his Holinesse solicitations being therein of no more force then that of the Venetians: for the Pope hauing often by letters, and lately by his expresse messenger the Bishop of Odiscalca hastned Don Iohn: he went about to satisfie him with good words, & faire promises, so far, as the nauy was blest by his Holinesse Nuncio, processions and prayers appointed to be made, and a day prefixt taken for their departure.

The true cause of Don Iohns delay.

In the end, D. Iohn knowing no more how to excuse his delay, beeing on euery side solicited to depart, the Marquis of Santa Cruz, arriuing with the Galleys of Naples, and Don Iuan de Cardona with those of Sicill, his owne Admirall Galley being beeing likewiſe ready, was conſtrained to diſcouer the truth of the matter; which was, that hee had receiued expreſſe commandement from Spaine, not to carry the fleete into the Leuant, by reaſon of the Kings doubt of the French, which had reſtrayned his commiſſion and forces in a place from whence hee might eaſily depart (if need ſhould be) to defend the territories of the Spaniſh King.

Souranza vnderſtanding the true cauſe of D. Iohns delay, and perceiuing his own earneſt ſoliciting to be in vaine thought it fit before his departure, at leaſtwiſe to trye if for the honour of the league he would lend him part of his nauy, which being ioyned to the Venetians at Corfou, might preſerue the glory and reputation which it had formerly wonne; yet becauſe he would not bee ſeene in it himſelfe, he cauſed Colionna to demand it, whereuppon the Councell beeing often aſſembled, they at laſt reſolued to lend him 22. Gallies and 5000. foot: but becauſe many of them were to be drawn from the Garriſons of Calabria; their departure was yet longer delayed. Gilles Andrada Knight of Malta had command of the Gallies as Generall to the King, and Vincento Tuttauila Count of Sarna commanded the ſoldiers.

D. John leadett the Venetians 22. Gallies.

With theſe Gallies and thoſe of the Church, 13. in number, eleuen of the Duke of Florence, and two of Michaele Bonello brother to Cardinall Alexandrine, the Prouidator Souranza returned to Corfou, and by the way Marc-Antonio Collonna, diſplayed the enſeigne of the league, and held the place of Generall.

The Intention of the Spaniards publiſhed, it was euery where reported that the whole force of the league would not for that yeare make any expedition into the Leuant: and yet the Spaniſh Ambaſſador at Rome had intelligence that notwithſtanding the affaires of Flanders a iourney might be made into the eaſt, and therfore that his Kings Gallies ſhould direct their courſe to Affrike, and likewiſe to releeue Sicily. Muleaſſen King of Tunis his purſute with D. Iohn to excite him to this enterprize, was cauſe that al men beleeued this report: and yet mens diſcourſes were different for though the warre of Flanders was not new, the accidents were ſo, which enforced the Catholick King to haue a care of the preſeruation of thoſe Contries where the enemies forces and diſorders were very much augmented For Count Naſſau hauing at the beginning of the yeare taken Mons in Henault, and not long after the Citty of Valenciennes, his whole forces conſiſting of forraine ſoldiers and for the moſt part French, this bred great diſtruſt and iealouzie betwixt the two mighty Kings of France and Spayne, ſo as the Duke of Alua, then Gouernour of the Low-Contries, did ſpeedily aduertize his maiſter thereof, the like did he to the Pope and Venetians, amplifiing the matter more then needed, wherewith Cardinall Granuell and the Spanniſh Ambaſſador that were at Rome, wrote ſpeedily to D Iohn, willing him not to depart from Meſſina, all Spaine beeing in alarme, which did likewiſe put ſome iealous diſtruſt in the French, leaſt the Spaniards with their nauy ſhould inuade Prouence, whereuppon they beganne to fortifie Marſeilles, and other important places, placing in them ſtrong Garriſons.

Vppon a rumor ſpred abroad that the Duke of Alua ſhould publiquely ſay, that hee accounted warre to beee open betwixt Spaine and France, the moſt Chriſtian King was mooued thereat, & made many complaints by his Ambaſſadors not onely at Rome and Venice, but in Spaine alſo, beeing partly greeued that his cheefe officers did affirme ſo important a matter; the which as himſelfe deteſted, hee ſuppoſed others would doe the like: in part like-wiſe going about to iuſtifie his owne actions, from which it ſeemed that the Duke of Aluas ſuſpition proceeded, cauſing him to vſe ſuch ſpeech.

The Chriſtian King affirmed, that thoſe French which had followed the Count Naſſau at the taking of Valenciennes, were indeed his ſubiects, but all of them of the the Protestant faction, and by consequent disobedient rebels to the Crowne of France: that hee had euer beene greatly greeued for the troubles in Flanders, as one that in his owne kingdome had too much experience of subiects rebellion, and whose part it was to roote out, and not by such examples to cherish the boldnesse of vassals against their Prince; beeing as desirous of the wealth of Christendome as any other liuing, although his owne particular troubles would not at that time permit him to shew it in effect: and seeing with his owne forces hee could not assist them, his meaning was not to hinder the good intent of others: that he had some armed vessels ready, not to assaile or offend any one, but onely for the safety of his owne seas infested by Pyrates: the number of his vessels being insufficient for any great action.

The French King forbideth his subiects to goe into Flanders.

These or such like discourses did the French Kings Ambassadors by their maisters commandement vse in Spaine, Rome, and Venice: and to giue the greater credit vnto them, they were by Edict euery where published, with a prohibition to all French men, on greeuous penalties, not to passe with their armes into Flanders: and not satisfied here-with, his most Christian Maiesty, seemed at the same time to incline to the league, wherevpon, the Cardinall Lorraine, by his commandement, did often conferre with the Venetian Ambassador, resident in his Court concerning that businesse, whom hee went about to perswade, that the French King was wholy bent to procure the peace of Christendome, with a singular affection toward the Crowne of Spaine.

Reasons alledged by the Protestants to moou: the French King to warre.

All this notwithstanding, the Spaniards were no better satsfied then before, saying, That the French did but this to coulor their practises, and to open themselues a way to assaile the Catholick Kings territories in sundry places: That they had certaine notice, how that the King of Nauarre, and the Admirall Coligni, did openly vrge the most Christian King to vndertake that warre, whom hee must needs please, in regarde of his owne particular interest, the chiefe Lords and Princes of his Court, mainteining that France would neuer bee at quiet, vnlesse the King did resolue vpon some forraine enterprise, wherein to employ both Catholicks and Protestants, and among others, that of Flanders seemed the easiest for many respects: That he might make that warre with some coulor, by reason of the claime of the Crowne of France to those Countries: in which warre without all question the Queene of England would willingly haue a share, in regard of her distast of the Catholik King: That the marshall of Montmorency went into England to none other end, then to conclude the League with the English, and that both of them together beeing freed from other troubles, might the easlier enuade the Netherlands: Besides, that the French Kings league with the Turke, made them to suspect, that hee went about to procure the Turkes Army to enuade the Catholick King, as they had done in former times, especially seeing it was reported that the Turke had giuen the citty of Tunis to the French King, and promised with his forces to defend it against the Spaniards.

The Spaniards are iealous of the French mens actions.

The Pope beeing greatly mooued at these delayes, as well for the common interest of Christendome, as his owne reputation, which hee accounted to bee much blemished, in that hee at his first comming to the Papacy hauing freely confirmed the league, the Nauy should now become idle and vnprofitable, or else be imployed to any other end, which the King of Spaine could not doe, it beeing set forth at the Clergies cost, by permission and authority of the Sea Apostolick, onely against the Turkes. This caused his Holinesse to send new messengers to D. Iohn, to command him speedily to depart and ioyne with the Venetians fleet: and on the other, he councelled the Venetians to dispatch speedy Ambassadors to the French and Spanish courts, to roor out all suspitious doubts, and distrusts betwixt those Kings, and particularly to incite the Catholick Maiesty, to send away his fleet without any more delay, according to the articles of the league.

His

His Holineſſe ſent his Nuncios for that purpoſe, Antonio Maria Saluiati Biſhop of Saint Pepoſito the French King, and Nicolo Ormaneti Biſhop of Padua to the King of Spaine. The Emperor likewiſe vſed meanes to attone theſe two Kings, being mooued therevnto by ſundry particular reſpects of his owne: but the Venetians more then any ſhewed themſelues earneſt and ready in this buſineſſe as well in regard of their owne intereſt, as for that they were loath to giue the Pope any cauſe to ſuſpect, that by not ſtirring in ſo important a deſeigne, their mindes were turned to peace, and thereby to diſtaſte him of the league.

Ambaſſadors ſent from Venice, to France and Spaine.

They then according to his commandement choſe two Ambaſſadors, namely, Giouan Micaele for France, and Antonio Tepulo for Spaine, who made haſt to thoſe Courts. Michaele being come into France did briefly acquaint the King with the Senates deſire to ſee a firme and aſſured peace eſtabliſhed betwixt Chriſtian Princes, that being afterwards vnited, they might turne their forces vpon the common enemy: he told him that the Venetians were much diſcontented with the rebellions of Flanders, and with the iealozies which therevpon aroſe betwixt his Maieſty and the Catholike King, which if they ſhould haue laſted, could not but haue procured great hurt to Chriſtendome: but by how much the matter was great and important of it ſelfe, by ſo much the leſſe could the Senate be induced to beleeue it, being well acquainted with his Maieſties diſcreet loue and affection to the common good: And becauſe the perſwations of thoſe, who are enemies to peace, and who for their owne particular intereſt, are wont to diuert Princes from their good and honourable deſeignes, the Senate would not be wanting (therein following the cuſtome of their anceſtors) to imploy in that buſineſſe, the fauour which it particularly preſumed to haue with his Maieſty, to exhort him to ſtop his eares to ſuch inducements, and if peraduenture he had already entertained them, that it might pleaſe him in the behalfe of Chriſtendome, and for his particular loue to their Commonwealth to caſſier them, to the end that the Catholike King freed from that doubt, might freely harken to the enterpriſes of the Leuant, and obſerue the Articles of the league.

The Venetian Ambaſſadors diſcourſe to the French King.

The King gaue a willing eare to this diſcourſe, ſaying that the Senate was in no ſort deceiued of his exceeding loue towards their Commonweale, and leaſt of all, in beleeuing that he was deſirous of the wealth and aduancement of Chriſtendome: that the troubles of Flanders had neuer pleaſed him, that he had vſed all poſſible meanes, to keepe his ſubiects from being adherents or ſupporters of thoſe Rebels: but that the condition of thoſe times, and the preſent wretched eſtate of his Kingdome would not permit him to tame the inſolency of ſome that loued innouation; who were not to be wondered at, if after they had raiſed troubles in his owne Realme, went about to doe the like in his neighbours Dominions: that it had neuer beene by his conſent; for that would haue hurt the Catholike King, and done no good to France, but on the contrary, would haue procured new troubles which might eaſily incite the Catholike King to an agreement with the Flemings, and afterwards to make warre vpon him in Daulphiné, or in the Kingdome of Nauar, by which meanes, in ſeeking to carry the war into a forraine country, he might be enforced to bring it into his owne, at ſuch a time when the forces of his Realme were waſted and diuided by long ciuil wars. The Queene mother being preſent at this diſcourſe, who at that time had great authority in managing the affaires of the Kingdome, deſirous to preſerue peace, would needs with her owne hand write to his Holineſſe to aſſure him of her willingneſſe in all things to follow his aduiſe and councell: and that if her ſonne the King had raiſed forces, it was not don with an intent to hurt any but only to ſerue and defend himſelf from the Spaniards who were reported vpon no iuſt cauſe to haue taken armes.

The French Kings anſwere to the Venetian Ambaſſador.

The mother Queene of France writes to the Pope.

The Catholike King on the other ſide, before Tepulo his arriuall at his Court, reſolued to write to Don Iohn, That all other reſpects laied aſide, hee ſhould make haſt with his Gallies to ioyne with the Venetians and with them to ſaile into the Leuant, being herevnto moued by intelligence of the French Kings affection towards him, or elſe, for that he did not much feare his power, hauing recouered Valenciennes, or becauſe he would not ſo much honor the French, as to haue it ſaid, that for feare of them he had giuen ouer ſo important an enterpriſe, as that againſt the Turkes, or (that which is moſt like to be true) becauſe, as became a wiſe and vertuous Prince, he would in no ſort omit that wherevnto he was obliged by the league: but whatſoeuer it were that cauſed this reſolution it is certaine that it proceeded from his owne proper motion, and that he did write ſo to Don Iohn, before he acquainted his councell therewith, fearing leaſt they ſhould propound ſome difficulties, which might haue diuerted him from it as in former times.

The Catholick Kinges reſolution before the Ambaſſadors arriual.

Antonio Tepulo in the meane time being come into Spaine and aduertized of the Kings determination, did not ſpeake any thing of the French iealozies or vniting of the Nauies, but only intreated the King to permit D. Iohn, in regard the time of yeere was almoſt paſt for ſea-affaires to winter in the Leuant, mooued therevnto by ſundry reaſons which much imported the Venetian Commonwealth. The King neuertheleſſe alleadging many reaſons to the contrary, would not grant his requeſt, either of his owne proper motion as being vnwilling to hazard too much on fortune, or elſe being ſo aduiſed by ſuch as were not greatly affected to the league. Now, whileſt the confederate fleet went ſlowly forward, the great and mighty Turkiſh nauy ſcoured the ſea. For Vluzzali being made Generall thereof, beſides the gallies which he had receiued of Carazzati, had with great ſpeed rig'd and man'd an hundred others, with al which, departing in great pompe and magnificence from Conſtantinople, he had already paſt the Streight of Gallipolis and came forward intending to waſt and ſpoile the Iſle of Candy, and other places belonging to the Venetians, according as he ſhould haue intelligence of the progreſſion of the Chriſtian fleet: certaine newes being at that time brought to Venice of the ſtay and delaies of the Spaniſh fleet, which did much diſcontent them, and made them wonder that the Spaniards, who at firſt had been ſo deſirous of the league, ſhould after ſuch a fortunate and vnhoped for ſucceſſe (fearing ſome vncertaine and remote dangers) wholy depriue themſelues of the preſent and aſſured beauty thereof. The Senate not being able to diſcouer wherevnto thoſe delaies tended, thinking it vaine to expect their aſſiſtance any longer, determined to write to Generall. Foſcaren that without any longer expectation of the conuention of the fleets, ſo ſoone as the Prouidator Souranza ſhould returne to Corfoù, he ſhould put to ſea, to encourage their ſubiects, and aſſure their owne territories, & proceeding warily, to embrace ſuch occaſions as God ſhold offer him, for the honor and profit of the Commonwealth. Foſcarin receiuing this commandement & tired with his idle aboad there, ſo ſoon as the Prouidator Souranza & Colonna came to Corfou, propounded the departure of the nauy into the Leuant, wherevnto all men conſenting, they began to conſult about their iourney. But Antonio Colonna did freely and with great affection vtter his good meaning towards the affaires of the league, and in particular to the profit & aduancement of the Venetian Commonwealth, much bewayling the time loſt and the diminution of their forces: neuertheleſſe he willed them to hope well, aſſuring them that the Spaniſh Kings intention was honorable, and the Pope very earneſt in ſoliciting him, and that Don Iohn with the reſidue of the fleet would ſhortly meet them: yet though the Popes ſubiect, and ſeruant to the King of Spaine, he was reſolued to ſpend his life in that enterpriſe, it importing the Venetians particular ſeruice, whom hee knew were more intereſſed in that warre then any other.

Tepulo his ſute to the Kinge of Spaine.

The ſenates reſolution when they perceiued the Spaniſh delaies.

Colonna his aduice.

Generall Foſcarini replied, that the State was well acquainted with the Pope and Catholike Kings loue, and they of the States affection and inclination to the league, as the proceeding herein teſtified: but Colonnas vertue, zeale to the common good of Chriſtendome, and particular affection to the Venetian Commonwealth, was not only manifeſted to themſelues, but to the whole world, by General Foſcarini his anſwer to Colonna.

ſo

ſo many noble ſeruices in aduancement of the league: yet himſelfe could not chooſe but lament, that ſo many fayre occaſions preſented, they had not imbraced them as they deſerued. But ſince it was fruitleſſe to call backe time paſt, and they not able to remoue the impediments detayning D. Iohn in Sicely, the onely remedy hereof is to redeeme delayes paſt with preſent expedition, and to ſet forward againſt the enemy inferior to themſelues both in number and vallor. And ſeeing it hath pleaſed the diuine prouidence (conducting humaine actions in by-wayes to vs vnknowne) that the confederate fleeet ſhould bee thus diſioyned, let vs ſee if wee can ſet vpon them diuided, which they would ſhunne if we were vnited: If wee can enforce them to retire, it will bee much to vs to haue in this ſort mainetayned the reputation of the league and confirmed our owne eſtates without the Spaniſh ayde. Colonna approued the opinion of Poſcarin, confirming it by many arguments: not-with-ſtanding he aduiſed him to conduct the Galies and Galeots altogether, the Ponents then ſeruing them fitly for their courſe.

Colonna's opinion concerning the ſetting forward towards the enemies.

Gil Andrada ſtood newtrall betwixt theſe opinions, onely ſaying they ought to proceede circumſpectly, and not without neceſſity or aduantage hazard ſo important an attempt, adding that further inteligence was requiſite, by which they were to direct their proceeding: but highly commended the councell of Colonna for carrying all their force vnited and well furniſhed, not expoſing themſelues to caſualty, concluding that their opinions ſhould ſway his.

Gil. Andrada his opinion.

Thus reſoluing to leaue Corfou, the fleet conſiſted of ſix ſcore and ſix Galies, ſix Galliaſſes and twenty ſhippes, and in euery Galley an hundred and twenty Souldiers; it was diuided into three battailes; in the mayne lay the three Generalls with fiue and forty Gallies: the reſt were equaly diſtributed into two wings, the Prouidator Souranza conducting the right, and Canalis the left, reſeruing place in the vanguard for the Gallies of Candy hourely expected, each ſquadron towed two Galeaſſes, and part of the ſhipping, ſo diſpoſed, that when need required they might affront the Galleis, yet not to fight without thoſe veſſells. The fleet beeing ready to depart, a Fregate from Palermo came to the Venetian Generall, ſent by Placido Ragazzon, certifiyng him that a Galley from Spaine was come to D. Iohn at Meſſina, bringing commandatory letters from the King that hee ſhould without any more delay ioyne his whole fleet with that of the Venetians: This was afterwards confirmed by D. Iohns owne letters, written to Marc-Antony Collonna.

Don Iohn certifies the Venetians that hee will ſhortly bee with them.

Although theſe newes were pleaſing to euery man, yet did they not hinder the reſolued departure of the fleet: For vpon the 28. of Iuly the three Generalls left the Gamoniſſes, where they had tarried for the Prouidator Canalis who was gonne to Ottranto with ſixteene Gallies, to take in three thouſand foot, vnder the command of Collonell Horatio Aquauiua, ſonne to the Duke of Atria: which at their arriuall were diſtributed among the fleet. Before their departure from the Gamoniſſes, Giouan Mocenigo with his Galley was deſpatch't to Candy to acquaint them with the comming of the Chriſtian fleet, and to make diſcouery of the enemies, of whom no newes could bee heard. The fleet then vnder ſayle, the Prouidator Quirini returning from Candy with 30. Galleis, came to it at the entrance of the Channell Viſcarda, from whence with a fayre winde (though the towing of the greater veſſels did hinder the way) they held on their courſe to Zant, where hauing no newes of the enemies, and enforced to ſpend two dayes there, in taking in freſh water, they ſent forth 3 other Gallies to diſcouer. vidz. thoſe of Angelo Suriana, Philipo Leone, Venetians, and that of Romegas a knight of Malta.

The fleet departeth notwithſtanding.

Vluzzali at that time ankored vnder the Caſtle of Maluefia with 200. Gallies, and many other leſſer Veſſels, hauing intelligence that the Chriſtian fleet fought him, which diſ-vnited he thought durſt not haue departed frō Corfou, & therefore had ſent certaine Gallies towards the Promontory of Malea, whom hee preſently called called back, & stayed in this place to receiue more certaine newes of the enemies. And beeing truly aduertized that it made towards him, and that already it was come as farre as Cerigo; in number of small vessells it was inferior to his, but superiour in greater, he determined to put to sea and encounter them. And calling vnto him the cheefe Commanders of his fleet, he encouraged them to battaile, telling them how faire an occasion was offered to purchase immortall glory and credit with their great Lord by breaking the Christian small fleet, which was so audacious to come and seek them, thinking thereby to auoid the spoile of Candy: that his meaning was to leaue the hauen, to order his nauy, and to fight with the daring Christians: this said, he confirmed his words with shew of performance, and presently prepared all necessaries for the fight, directing his course towards the Cape of Malea. In the meane time the two Gallies of Suriana and Romegas returned to the fleet at Cerigo, bringing certaine newes that Vluzzali lay in the hauen of Maluesia with 200. saile: Hereupon, the three Generalls considering that it would redound to their dishonour not to fight with the enemies being so neere, determined with one consent to saile to the Cape of Malea, and to offer the enemies battaile. According to this resolution the whole fleet went to the head of Cerigo called Dragoniera, as the neerest place to the Cape of Malea, from whence they might view the enemies countenance, and entertaine any offered occasion. There early in a morning on the seauenth of August the watch discouered the Turkish nauy, sailing towards the Channell of Cerigo, which being but tenne miles from our fleet they verily supposed that it was comming directly to vs ward to fight: the three Generalls commanded the enseignes to be displayed, trompets sounded and disposed all things in readinesse for the fight: the fleet beeing thus arranged left the Dragonieras, and made towards the Cape of Malea, to be in a more commodious place to offer battaile to the enemies, who at first made shew to accept it, but when the Turks came neerer they altred their course and went to the Harts Iland which is a rocke neere to the Promontory from whence they came. I know not whether they did it for feare or else because Vluzzali had no commission nor intent to fight, but only made a shew thereof to maintaine his owne reputation: Some thought that Vluzzali like a skilfull Seaman made that retreat to get a westerly wind, which at that time of yeare is wont to blow in those quarters, that he might afterwards by the aduantage thereof inuest our nauy: which beeing preuented by the Christian Captaines, and a south-east wind arising Vluzzali was enforced to alter his determination, and beeing come to the point of the Isle of Cerigo towards the west, he thwarted the Channell which lies betwixt the Harts Iland, and that of Cerigo, and shut in that large space of Sea of ten miles, and turning his prowes towards the Christian fleet, he diuided his nauy into three great squadrons, consisting of equall number of vessells, and there attended them. Both fleets were resolued, the one not to fight without the Galeasses, and the other not to come neere those hot vessells, who the yeare before had done them such mischeefe. This stay of the enemies did profit our men, who thereby had time to order the fleet in better forme; and within a while after, the wind prouing fauorable to them, they set forward and came so neere to one another, that the shotte flew from both sides: but our men being scanted of wind, could not come forwards without deuiding the great vessells from the lesse. The Turkish fleet consisted of 200. saile among which were 160. well armed Gallies, the rest were lesser vessells mingled among them. That of the Christians exceeded not the number of 127. light Gallies, but they had six Galeasses, and 22. shippes of warre excellently armed. Both these fleets for many respects were thought to be in a manner equall. Vluzzali meaning nothing lesse then to fight, yet fearing by open flight to dishonour his great maister, and vnwilling to encreale the Christian glory, like a politique captaine, made shew of that he least intended, for seeming desirous to fight he did delude the Christians and ſtill keeping the prowes of his Gallies vpon them by little and little he gaue back; and by the approach of night, and by a warlike ſtratagem which hee vſed (for hee ſent one Galley bearing a lanthorne a contrary way, to make them think that he followed with the reſt) he eſcaped at his pleaſure. About the ſame time Sigiſmond King of Poland dyed without iſſue male, wherevppon Charles the French King deſirous to procure that Crowne for his brother the Duke of Anion, ſent his Ambaſſadors thither. But to returne to the enemies. They were deſcried the next morning ſailing towards the arme of Meina. Our men hauing kept at Sea al night ſailed to Cerigo, enforced to take in freſh water, and to refreſh their tired rowers, where continuing all that day and a peece of the next, ſpies brought word that they had diſcouered the enemies not farre from thence, whervppon they ſpeedily imbarked their ſoldiers and went to meet them: but their labour beeing fruitleſſe, they lay all night at Sea in order of battaile, and the next day which was the tenth of Auguſt by day breake they diſcried them at the Cape of Matapan, lying with the poopes of their Gallies to land-ward. Vluzzali perceiuing that the Chriſtians had diſcouered him, ſhot off certaine warning peeces to call his men aboord, and ordered all things for battaile. The Chriſtians approching the Turks came forth of the Hauen with their fleet diuided into three battailes, whereof the left wing was a great way extended to the Sea, the right wing kept neere to the maine, wherein was Vluzzali him-ſelfe, comming on faire and ſoftly, ſomtime purpoſely ſtearing his courſe to draw the Chriſtian Gallies from the Galeaſſes and ſhipps. The Turke fearing nothing more then the Galeaſſes, commanded both his wings to fetch a great compaſſe about, the one towards the right, and the other towards the left, aloof from the Galeaſſes and ſhipps, which being preuented by the Chriſtians, by turning their wings likewiſe in manner of a Creſcent, their mayne battaile fronted that of the Turkes. The wings of the Turkes fleet being thus diuided from their battaile ſeemed very aduantageous for the Chriſtians: which Generall Foſcarini (ready to lay hold on any faire occaſion) perceiuing, requeſted Collonna and Andrada, that not tarrying for the ſhippes and Galeaſſes, they would with him vpon the ſodaine aſſaile the enemies battaile, depriued of the wings, hoping to breake it ere they could arriue to reſcue it, and with couragious ſpeeches entreated them to follow his councell. The Generalls encouragement and aduice was ioyfully receiued by all the hearers, but Collonna and Andrada ſaid, that it was dangerous ſo to doe, for feare of drawing the enemies three battailes vpon them at once, being not able to reſiſt them without the help of the Galeaſſes and ſhippes, and that therefore without thoſe veſſells they would by no meanes hazard the fortune of the battaile. The wings of the Chriſtians in turning about to confront thoſe of the enemy, were ſomwhat diſordred, which the Turkes perceiuing went about with certaine Gallies to circumuent the ſtragglers, which Souranza noting, went againſt them with foure Gallies, and made a fierce fight, in the midſt whereof, fearing to be encloſed with forty of their Gallies making towards him, he was preſently relieued by 20. Gallies and two of the Galeaſſes, whoſe murthering ſhot made ſuch hauock among them, as in a ſmall time 18. of their Gallies were rent and torne, whereat the Turks being amazed returned as though they had rather fled then retreated. One of Souranzaes Gallies was ſhot through in this fight, himſelfe returning againe to his Squadron. The Chriſtians had determined not to ioyne battaile without their Galeaſſes and tall ſhipps, which Vluzzali well vnderſtood, as well by the fugitiues and his owne ſpies, as by their manner of ſayling. And he him ſelfe though he were willing to fight, yet the better to fruſtrate the Chriſtians deſeignes, who drew with them their Galeaſſes and other greater veſſells; he ſent his veſſels of burthen to Malueſia, wherby he freed himſelfe of a great burthen, and made him-ſelfe apt to take or leaue fight at his owne pleaſure The day growing to an end, Vluzzali perceiuing that he had done enough for that time,

The Christians descry the Turkish fleet.

The number of the Christian and Turkish fleet.

Vluzzalies policy.

The death of Sigiſmond King of Poland.

The Chriſtians fleet deſcrieth that of the Turkes.

The Turkes retire from the Chriſtian fleet.

time, both for the allaying of the Chriſtian heate, and encouragement of his own ſoldiers, in ſeemely order as one not afraid, ſailed with his whole fleet together to Corona. And the Chriſtians retired to Cerigo.

The end of the firſt Booke of the ſeuenth Decade.

The Contents of the ſecond Booke of the ſeuenth Decad.

VLVZZALI determineth to aſſaill Don Iohn ere hee ſhould come to the fleet. Difficulties made by thoſe of the Chriſtian Nauy to meet with Don Iohn to free him from that incounter. Don Ihon with the Spaniſh forces comes to Corfoù. The reſolution of the Confederate Captaines. Vluzzali reſolues not to fight with the Confederats. Thoſe of the league reſolue to aſſaill the towne and Caſtle of Modon. The Confederate fleet ſtaies in the Hauen of Nauarin. Nauarin is beſeeged. The Confederates raiſe their campe from before Nauarin, and determine to returne into the Weſt. Vluzzali after the retreat of the Chriſtian fleet returneth to Conſtantinople. Don Iohn returnes to Naples, and Colonna goeth into Spain. The Venetians complaine to te Pope of the meane proceeding of the Spaniſh fleet. The State of Dalmatia during the warre. A fort builded by the Turkes at Catharra is raized by the Venetians. Conference of peace with the Venetian Bayly at Conſtantinople. Peace or warre is propounded in the councell of Tenne. The Princes of Chriſtendome hauing intelligence of the Venetians practiſes of peace with the Turke goe about by their offers to interrupt it. Of what efficacy the oration of Prince Mocenigo was concerning that ſubiect. The cauſes moouing the Senate to condeſcend to peace. Peace is made betwixt the Venetians and Turkes. And laſtly the Articles thereof.

The

The ſecond Booke of the ſeuenth Decade of the Hiſtory of Venice.

WHILEST the Chriſtian fleete remained at Cerigo, it had intelligence that Vluzzali had taken one of our Fregats which had acquainted him how that Don Iohn was comming to the fleete, where-vpon hee prepared to meete him. Colonna and Gyl Andrada being moued at theſe newes, propounded, that all other matters being laid aſide, they were to depart thence with the greateſt number of Gallies to meet with Don Iohn and free him from that danger. This councell was reiected by the Venetian Captaines, ſaying, that to eſchew an vncertaine danger, they expoſed the fleet, and all the force of the confederats to a manifeſt perill; ſeeing that the great veſſells could not faile from Cerigo by reaſon of a contrary winde, nor yet remaine there in ſafety, the Gallies being reduced to a ſmaler number with ſundry other alegations, which were not alowed by Colonna nor Andrada: for they thought that they might ſafely carry away an hundred Gallies with them to Zant, and at one time ſecure Don Iohns arriuall, and yet ſend the great veſſells to Candy which was an eaſie matter to be done, they ſaying that this was the beſt aduiſe for the eaſie conuention of the confederate fleet.

Vluzzali determineth to aſſaile D. Iohn.

A propoſition made to meete with & ſecure D. Iohn.

Whileſt this important buſineſſe was vnreſolued, a Fregat opportunely arriued from Don Iohn aduertizing them that hee could not depart from Meſſina till the firſt of Auguſt. Though this newes did cleere the former difficulties among the Captaines, yet did it not wipe out diſcontent from their mindes: for they like-wiſe vnderſtood, that Don Iohn had no meaning when he ſhould arriue to go farre with his Gallies, but by letters expreſly commanded the Admiralls, to come and meete him; which by reaſon of contrary winds eſpecially, they being to carry along with them ſo many great veſſells, could not be done without much loſſe of time, danger and diſtaſt to thoſe Iſlanders ſubiect to the Venetians, forſaking them at ſuch a time when the enemy was ſo ſtrong at Sea and at their doores. Not-with-ſtanding, they generally reſolued to obey Don Iohns command: but it being an impoſſibility to carry the great veſſells with them, they determined firſt to leaue them ſafely in Candy, and from thence to direct their courſe to Zant. Neuer-the-leſſe this reſolution was not afterwards affected, by reaſon of new intelligence of the enemies fleet, which was deſcried nor farre from the Cape of Malea, which verily perſwaded them that they were going to intercept D. Iohn, whervpon the Chriſtian fleet diſlodged, and went to the arme of Meina from whence Vluzzali was newly departed. From thence being fauored with a faire South-Eaſt wind, within three daies they arriued at Zant, where contrary to their hope not meeting with Don Iohn but receiuing a new commandement to come to him to Cephalonia, they were enforced to leaue the great veſſells there, though in great danger to bee taken by the enemies, who vpon the leaſt inckling thereof would Difficulties ariſing about the meeting of Don Iohn.

not

not haue failed to returne to seaze on them: which being likely to happen, some of the cheefe of the Spanish fleet were of opinion, that seeing it was an hard matter to secure them, to send backe to haue them burnt; But Generall Foscarin detesting this councell, sent the Prouidator Quirini thither with fiue and twenty Gallies to safe-conduct them to the fleet.

Quirini safe conducts the great vessels to the fleet.

From Cephalonia they went to Corfoù, whither Don Iohn was come on the ninth of August with fifty fiue Gallies, thirty three shippes, and fifteene thousand foot-men, who though at first he could hardly dissemble his discontent, for that they had not waited his comming, but had like to haue inforced him for want of sufficient forces to haue gone alone into the leuant, and to remayne idle at Corfoù, to the derogation (as he said) of his reputation and greatnesse, was neuer-the-lesse at last content to forget what was past, and seemed very carefull and desirous to enterprize any honorable or important action, for the profit and seruice of the league, much amplifiing it in words, because it was publikely reported thorow the army, that he came but onely for a shew, and not with intent or commission to exploit any thing, and that he had euer vsed delaies and excuses, eschewing all occasions of assailing the enemy, or of imploying him-selfe in any certaine enterprize; which suspitions did dayly more and more encrease, all men perceiuing, after so many delaies, that he referred all resolutions to the arriuall of the Duke of Sessa and his Gallies from Spaine. But the Venetians told him that their forces there, were more then sufficient, for, vnited, they amounted to the number of a hundred ninty foure Gallies, eight Galleasses, besides forty fiue ships, to weet thirty Spanish and fifteene Venetians. All these Vessells before their departure from the Gomenisses were drawne into forme of battaile: The three Generalls lay in the maine with 62. Gallies; the Marquis Santa Cruz conducted the right wing, and the Prouidator Souranza the left, and in each wing were fifty two Gallies: Petro Iustiniano Generall of Malta commanded the vantgard with sixe Galeasses, Iuan de Cardona and Nicolo Donato led the rereward with twenty two Gallies: Don Rodrigo de Mendoça, and Adriano Bragadino had charge of the shippes, determining neuer-the-lesse to carry them to Zant, and there to leaue them, intending to vse some of them for the transportation of victuall and munition. In this order the fleete departed from Paxu on the eleuenth of September, vncertaine as yet what course to hold, vnlese it were to set forwards to incounter with the enemy, who, by their Gallies sent to discouer, were reported to lie at Modon and Nauarine, diuided and in great want of all necessaries, especially of men, most of whome were dead, and gone away, whereupon they remained safely there till the arriuall of new supplies.

The number of the confederate fleet.

The order of the Confederates fleet.

These newes did greatly reioyce the whole fleet: thinking that a fit occasion was offered to ouerthrow the enemies, presuming that the Turkes hauing inteligence of the conuention of the Confederate fleet, much superior to theirs in strength, would according to their custome returne to Constantinople to winter in the streight, hauing gotten honor by twice confronting the Christian Nauy, and making shew to fight. Some of Don Iohns Councellors did afterwards make vse of these reasons to impaire the credit of their former intelligence, confirmed by many euident signes: where-vpon by giuing too great authority to those men, their departure was delaied, to the great preiudice of the enterprize, and yet euery man confest, that the onely hope of happinesse consisted in the speedy execution thereof, not giuing the enemies any time to flie or vnite themselues because a suddaine and vnlook't for assault would more terrifie and disorder them.

The Confederates error.

The Captaines then presently determined to set forward, and sayling on their course vndescryed from Zant, to fall sodainely on the Isle Sapienza, seated betwixt Nauarin and Modon, to shutte vp the enemies passage, and keepe them from helping one another. But the execution of this deseigne was so so long delaied, and the fleet went so slowly forward, as when by day breake it should haue beene at Sapienza it was scarce come to Prodaua, where being discried by those of the Castle of Nauarin, the Turkes that were their had time to retire in safety to Modon, passing along in the view of our Nauie, which seeing them come forth, and doubting that Vluzzali would offer them battaile, ordred all their squadrons, and after some small stay, our vant-gard set forward, and comming neere to the enemies, discharged their ordnance vpon them, to draw them to fight: but the Turkes hauing noe such intent, and finding no aduantage, retired vnder the protection of the Castle of Modon. After the enemies retreat there arose great doubts and difficulties among the Captaines concerning their proceeding, thinking it a dangerous and impossible matter to enter into the Channell of Modon to fight with the enemies fleet, the entrance whereof, narrow of it selfe, was flanqued with great store of ordnance, where vpon the Generall knowing that the enemy could not be enforced to fight, determined to retire to Sapienza and to enter the Hauen, the two wings being gone afore. Vluzzali perceiuing the Confederates retreate, came forth with fifty Galleis to assaile our Vantgard which lag'd behind; but so soone as Don Iohn espied him, giuing signall to the fight hee turned his prowes towards the enemies: Vluzzali who came not forth to fight, perceiuing our battailes ranged, on a sodaine returned from whence hee came, doing it very aduisedly, as well because night approached, as by reason of a great fogge that arose, which enforced our men to keepe aloofe to sea ward, the shores on both sides belonging to the enemy.

The enemies retire to Modon.

Vluzzali intends not to fight.

The next morrow the sea being calme, the Confederate fleet went to the Gulph of Coron to take in water at the mouth of the riuer Pamisus, some foure miles from Coron, and to conuoy those that went for water (it being in the enemies country,) they landed certaine foote-men, conducted by Francisco Andriana campe Maister, to intercept whome, and for the gard of Coron Vluzzali had sent thither a thousand fiue hundred Ianizars, and two hundred horse, with whom they often skirmished, among whome the valor and prowesse of Charles of Lorraine Duke of Mayenne, did shew it selfe, who at that time accompanied with diuers French Gentlemen was in the army as a Voluntary.

Charles of Lorraine Duke of Mayenne in the Confederate fleete.

Our men hauing watred returned to the Gallies, and before their departure bestowed certaine cannon shot vpon the forte of Coron, and sailing neere to the Isle of Cuprare passed along in the enemies view, diuided into three battailions one after another, because the place was very narrow, and came againe to the South-East side of Sapienza, comming to an ankor right ouer against Modon. But all men perceiuing that to tarry long in that place, hoping to draw the enemies forth to fight, was but lost time, and very dangerous, the Venetian Generall made a proposition to land tenne thousand foote, to seaze on the hill at the point of the Channell, from whence it was most likely to annoy the enemy, for that the place was weakely garded, which would not be defended by Vluzzali, who would not vnman his Gallies for feare of greater danger, the enemy being so neere him.

The Spaniards reiected this proposition, saying that they ought not to weaken the fleet by vnshipping such multitudes, espetially the enimy being so neere, whereupon Foscarene perceiuing all his propositions to be crost, and considering that ere long the fleet would be dissolued without any notable exploit, resolued, that in a matter of so great consequence, where hope of good successe was greater then the danger, to hazard the entring of the Channell of Modon, and there to assail the enemies: this being by him like-wise propounded, hee offered to expose himselfe formost to the danger, and to leade the way to others: though at first all men allowed this, and some straue to haue the honor of the first charge; yet it tooke none effect, so as the fleet without doing ought at al departed thence and went into the large and spatious Hauen of Nauarin, free from the danger of the Castle shot,

ſhot, ſeated on an high place farre from thence: our men lying there, the enemies fleet was as it were beſeeged beneath Modon, ſo as it could not returne to Conſtantinople, but indured much ſcarcity, and was in danger of ſhipwrack, and that which was worſe, it could not come forth but our men might at their pleaſure fight with it.

Extremity of the Turkiſh fleet.

The Turkes in the meane time ſent diuers Harquebuſiers that knew the wayes, who comming vp by the mountaines neere to Nauarin, attempted to anoy and hinder our men from taking in water. Heerevppon wee landed fiue thouſand foot vnder the command of Paul Iordano Vrſino, who repulſing the enemies ſecured the Contrey, whereby matters were brought to ſuch a paſſe, as there was no doubt made but that the Victory would ere long fall to the Confederates: This was rumord ouer Chriſtendome, and al men reioyced thereat, not as a thing hoped for, but already effected. In the end, the enterprize vppon Nauarin was propounded: but conſidering afterwards that if it ſhould ſucceed proſperouſly, it would not greatly profit the common cauſe, they turned to that of Modon, on whoſe conqueſt depended their cheefe hope; becauſe that the enemies fleet beeing driuen from thence could not auoid fight: therefore they determined to aſſaile the Towne & Caſtle of Modon, aſſaulting it at one time by land and ſea, and to the end that the ſoldiers which lay in the ſhippes might bee imployed in that enterprize, Giouan Moceniga was preſently ſent vnto Zant to fetch them to the fleet.

In the meane time Ioſeffo Bonello the Florentine made an engin, by ioyning foure Gallies together, on which were planted tenne Cannons, fortified with Parapets, wherewith to approach and batter the Caſtle of Modon, and at the ſame time to ſecure the paſſage of the other Gallies, which beeing by this engin defended from the enemies ordnance, might enter the Channell and come to the aſſault. But ſo ſoone as it was finiſhed, they perceiued many defaults in it, which made it vnſeruiceable: for firſt, they could not guide it on the water, next, the waight of the burthen and ordnance was likely to ſinke it, neither could they make it ankorable by reaſon of the Seas great depth: but the greateſt difficulty was to bring it to the place appointed, whether it was to bee towed by the Gallies, which beeing not able to make way, were expoſed to the mercy of the enemies ordnance, planted at the mouth of the Channell, which would eaſily haue ſunke them: ſo that diſpairing of the ſeruiceableneſſe thereof, and hauing intelligence that the Beglarbey of Grecia was comming thither with a thouſand horſe to fruſtrate their deſeigne, they gaue ouer the worke.

A vayne and vnprofitable engin

That which moſt tormented the Venetians, and fruſtrated their hope, was a rumor ſpred through the fleet that the Spaniards victuals would not long hold out, who ſaid, that in regard thereof, it behooued them to prouide for their departure and beeing deſirous to leaue ſome token of victory behind them, which might encourage the inhabitants of Morea, and put them in hope of better ſucceſſe, they determined to beſeege Nauarin, ſo often before propounded, and ſtill reiected, in regard of the ſmall reward of the conqueſt.

The ſituation of the Caſtle of Nauarine.

The Caſtle of Nauarin in old time called Pila, is ſeated on a mountaine toppe, which extending towards the South-eaſt, makes the Hauen like to a ſemicircle, and is ſtronger by ſituation, then art: This, the Turkes carefully garded, for the commodiouſneſſe of the hauen, lying in the very hart of Morea. There are two wayes leading to the Caſtle, that on the left hand, is not farre from the Sea, the other behind it towards the firme land, lies by a lake not farre from thence, and is very narrow and hidden.

The Prince of Parma had charge of this enterprize, who landing two thouſand Spaniſh and Italian foot and tenne peeces of battery, took the open, and plaine way to cut off ſupplies from the enemies: but he either neglected or knew not the other narrow ſecret way: Iuan di Moncada, and Moretta the Calabrois went afterwards to make good the paſſage: but they were on a ſuddaine aſſailed by great number of enemies, and with great difficulty came off.

after

By this meanes aboue two thouſand Turkes came to releeue the Caſtle, who beeing maiſters of that narrow paſſage, did at their pleaſures, not onely put in what ſupplies they thought good, but had leiſure to ſeaze on certaine high places, commanding the wayes, from whence with their ſmall ſhotte they ſtill annoyed our men, buſied in planting the Ordnance, lying open alſo at the ſame time to the Caſtles ſhot, ſo that in three dayes they could hardly plant two Canons, and the danger more and more increaſed, the ſoldiers wanting rampiers to defend themſelues; and the enemies numbers ſtill augmented, with whom to their owne great diſaduantage they were daily enforced to skirmiſh. This did greatly trouble the confederate Generals, who knew, that to quit the enterpriſe, would blemiſh their reputation, and to continue the ſiege, would not much auaile them; but their greateſt difficulty was want of bread, which Don Iohn and his faction dayly amplifying, ſaid, That of neceſſity they were to depart.

The Turkes comming to releeue the caſtle doe much anoy the Chriſtians.

And yet it ſeemed ſtrange and incredible to moſt men, that the Spaniſh Nauy comming lately from Sicily with ſo many ſhips, which is the Magazin or Granary of Italy, ſhould in ſo ſhort time want bread: or if it were true, that ſcarcity might eaſily haue beene ſupplied, by ſending to Tarento for certaine veſſels laden with Bisket, which the Spaniards themſelues reported they had left there.

The Venetian Generall, that he might cut of all occaſion of the Spaniards departure, offered Don Iohn part of his owne Store, earneſtly entreating him to accept his offer, telling him that the reſt of his Nauie might bee eaſily ſupplyed by thoſe veſſels before mentioned. It is not certainly knowne why the Spaniard refuſed this curteſie, who ſtopped their eares againſt all reaſonable perſwaſions which might delay their departure: which they onely intending, diſcamped from before Nauarin, leauing a ſafe and open way for Vluzzali to conduct his fleete to Conſtantinople, and the Honor to bee accounted a skillfull and valiant Captaine. Yet Don Iohn did what he could to cauſe Generall Foſcarin and the Venetians to conſent and be well pleaſed with his departure, aſſuring him of his earneſt deſire to purchaſe honor and reputation, whereof Fortune had bereft him, by taking from him the meanes to fight with the enemy; yet, if by the way he did chance to meet with thoſe ſhips of ſupplies, he would then willingly embrace any occaſion whatſoeuer, to doe ſome notable ſeruice to the league, ere hee returned with his fleet into the Weſt: and that though he now wanted opportunity, hee hoped the next yeare to recompence that, which neceſſity had enforced him to looſe.

The Confederats diſcampe from before Nauarin.

Don Johns excuſes.

The Venetian Generall perceiuing his reſolution, conſented therevnto, becauſe hee would not giue an occaſion to the enemies to thinke that the league was broken, as alſo for that hee knew himſelfe alone too weake to attempt any great matter. Yet, when our men thought leaſt of it, they were more likely then euer, to giue the enemy battaile: for at the very inſtant, when the confederats were vpon departure, they had intelligence that a Spaniſh ſhip come from Corfou, was in fight with certaine Turkiſh Galleys, not farre from Sapienza, whereupon all things beeing put in order, the fleete ſpeedily left the Hauen of Nauarin, to reſcue the ſhippe, and to fight with the enemies. Ere our men could get out of the Hauen Vluzzali with three ſcore of his Gallyes, came forth of the channell of Modon, to reſcue thoſe that were in fight, and to ſecure others which hee had ſent to ſcoure the ſeas. So ſoone as Don Iohn ſaw Vluzzali, hee commanded the Prouidator Souranza, to meete him with a certaine number of Galleys, to hinder his comming on any farther, & the Marquis of Santa Cruz, and the Prouidator Canalis with their Squadrons, to charge the enemies with fiue and twenty Galleys, who diſcrying our fleete, left the ſhip, and betooke themſelues to flight.

When

When Vluzzali saw the Prouidator comming towards him he made a stand, but at last turning his prowes, without any farther delay, he retired vnder the Castle of Modon, being still pursued by our Gallies, who beeing come neere to the towne, bestowed diuers Cannon bullets on it.

The Gallies, which fought with the shippe, beeing light and able to make way, escaped with ease, one excepted, commanded by the Sanzach of Mitelene, nephew to the famous Barbarossa, who fighting longer then any of the rest, and his slaues in hope of liberty rowing slowly, was taken by the Marquis of Sancta Crux: but night approaching, they gaue ouer farther pursute.

Then D. Iohn sounded the retreat and commanded euery one to returne into the hauen of Nauarin, beeing vnwilling to leaue the engin behind, that the enemies might not terme his departure a flight: then the greater vessells beeing forth of the Hauen, and a faire southeast wind blowing he willed them presently to saile to Zant, and himselfe the next morning directed his course thither with the whole fleet, being so desirous to returne home as going a neerer way through the Channell of Giscarda, contrary to the aduise of the skilfullest Marriners, who councelled him to goe to Cephalonia, he escaped a great danger neere to the Gulph of Larta, and there lost one of the Popes Gallies, which was broken to peeces vpon the Rocks of Paxu.

Vluzzali after the Confederates departure, freed from all hinderances in his iourney, did without any order put to Sea and came vnto the Cape of Malea, where by reason of a contrary northerne wind he was enforced to continue certaine dayes: but in the end hauing a faire Gale, he sailed to Constantinople with an hundred Gallies, where he was with all honour entertained, the Turkes openly terming themselues Conquerors, for that they had defended Morea and their other territories, dared (as they said) the Christians oftentimes to battaile, & lastly driuen them forth of their dominions, secured the Sea, and made it nauigable.

Vluzzali returnes to Constantinople.

The Confederates in the meane time arriued at Corfou the twentith day of October, who though their fleet were augmented with thirteene Gallies, and certaine shipps loden with wheat brought by the Duke of Sessa and Iohn Andrew Doria, did neuertheless continue their former difficulties, and delayes: for diuers enterprizes were daily propounded in the Councel, without any resolution at al, and among others that of Saint Maura, whereunto D. Iohn seemed to incline: but the Duke of Sessa by his authority dasht it, saying that the time of yeare was vnfit to beseege townes, or to be at Sea with fleets in an enemies Contrey. The Spaniards in this manner reiected all enterprizes, determining to returne into the west after that the Confederates Fleetes had beene vnited for the space of fifty dayes.

The Confederate fleet coms to Corfou.

The Spaniards desirous to returne into the west.

D. Iohn first went to Messina and there left part of his Gallies he carried the rest to Naples where he dismissed his Italian footmen, and sent the Spaniards and Almaines to Garrison. Collonna by the Kings commandement went into Spaine; to yeeld an account to his Maiesty of mataers past, and with him to consult on the next yeares war, where he so wisely and nobly behaued himselfe as he got much honor and reputation. The Gallies of the Pope, King of Spaine, and Venetians, remained idle at Corfou, lying rigg'd all winter, that they might be ready at the spring to set forward against the enemies.

Don Iohn goes to Naples.

ollonna to paine.

This was the successe of the yeare 1572. nothing answerable to the great hope which all men had conceiued of abating the pride and insolency of the Ottoman Empire, whereuppon so soone as the Confederates were gone home the inhabitants of Morea who had made insurrections in the Christians behalfe, and expected the successe of the fleet, hauing neither forces in the field, nor strong places for defense, run ning into the mountaines for feare of the Turkish violence, were enforced to yeeld themselues to their mercy, and againe to submit their necks vnder the yoake of a cruel bondage, which they could neuer since shake off.

The

The Venetians made great complaints to the Pope of the Spaniards delaies, and ſlow reſolutions, but eſpecially of their vnſeaſonable departure from before Nauarin: they were made by a ſollemne Ambaſſade; ſent, according to their cuſtome, to offer their obedience to his Holineſſe in the States name. The Pope in their behalfe preſently ſent Giouan Claudio Gonzaga his Chamberlaine to D. Iohn, to perſwade him to tarry there where he was and to expect a Commiſſion from Spaine to returne to winter in the Leuant, the Pope hoping eaſily to obtaine ſo much of the King of Spaine, ſeeing that the troubles of Flanders were brought to ſome good paſſe: wherevppon his Holineſſe did expreſly ſend the Lord of Lanſan into Spaine, whoſe labour was fruitleſſe, for the Catholick King, hauing already flatly anſwered the Popes and Venetians Ambaſſadors, that hee would no more ſend his fleet ſo farre from home, would by no meanes alter his reſolution, and D. Iohn, not-with-ſtanding the Popes entreaties, well acquainted with the Kings pleaſure, purſued his iourney into the Weſt.

The Venetians complaine to the Pope.

In the meane time Generall Venieri, old and ſickely, by reaſon of his former trauailes, obtaining leaue of the Senate, returned to Venice, with fame and glory great numbers of Senators going to meet him with the Bucentauro as farre as Saint Anthonies Church, which is the very fartheſt part of the Citty, where hee was honorably entertained and welcomed according vnto his merrit.

Venieri his honorable entertainment and welcome at Venice.

During the enterprizes in the Leuant, Dalmatia was not altogether freed from warre: for though there was no forme of an army there, yet the Turkiſh Cauallery, of the neighbor Gouernments, waſted and ſpoiled the Cuntrey doing much hurt to the Venetians ſubiects, wherevppon the Stradiots and foot troops of the Garriſons did often ſally to ſtop their incurſions: yet the Turkes and Venetians were of one opinion, that to make any great warre in Dalmatia would not bee to much purpoſe, the Turkes fearing if they ſhould ſend any great Army into that Prouince, they might giue the Emperor occaſion of ſuſpition, and cauſe him to embrace the Confederates party, and to make warre in Hungary.

The State of Dalmatia during the warre.

The Venetians of the other ſide bending all their deſeignes on the Leuant, thought that the ſucceſſe of the affaires of Dalmatia and Albania depended wholly on the warre, knowing very well they could doe little good there, by reaſon of the ſtrong Garriſons which the enemy ordinarily kept in thoſe Contries: as alſo for that they hauing, by the induſtry of Lodouico Grimani, and Iulio Pompeio, wonne the towne of Macarſca of ſome importance, by reaſon of the trade of Marchants, and fortefied it, had beene within a while after enforced to abandon the ſame, beeing to weake to defend it againſt ſuch huge numbers of enemies. The like ſucceſſe had the conqueſt of the fort of Cliſſa.

Neuertheleſſe the Turks omitted no opportunity to anoy the Venetians: and being not then ſtrong enough to take Citties, they inuented other meanes to hurt them as that enterprize vpon the Citty of Catharra, which they reſolued to get by long ſeege, keeping victualls from it by land did teſtifie: They often likewiſe atttempted to ſhut them from the paſſage to the Sea, by building a fort at the mouth of the Channell, but the Venetians did ſtill hinder their worke, till the arriuall of a Turkiſh Sanzach with great forces, who finiſhed it within three miles of Caſtel-nouo. The Senate aduertized thereof, and mooued with the danger, threatning the Citty of Catarra, wrote to Generall Foſcarini that he ſhould ſend forces to raze that fort. He, though it were in the midſt of winter, did neuertheleſſe ſend the Prouidator Souranza thither with two and twenty Gallies and ſix Galeaſſes, with whom went Paulo Vrſino, Pompeo Collonna, Moretta the Calabrois and other famous Captaines with 4000. foot, with whom Nicholo Suriana Captaine of the Gulph ioyned by the way with foure Gallies. All theſe veſſells arriuing at Ianiſſa, they landed the ſoldiers; part of them went with Pompeo Colonna to ſeaze on a hill not far off, to ſtop the paſſage of thoſe which ſhould come from Caſtelnouo to releeue the Fort, and the reſt went with Nicholo Gambara, to a certaine place neere at hand, whither ſome companies of ſoldiers of the Garriſon of Catarra were to come, with other forces aſſembled by Zacharia Salmone Prouidator of the Citty: After this Souranza entring the Channell with 18. of his beſt Gallies, his Squadron going formoſt, paſſed along beyond the fort, from whence though they made many ſhot vppon the fleet, yet did they no great hurt to it, which went and lay in a ſafe and commodious place to batter it by land and Sea.

The Turkes build a fort againſt Catarin.

It was 150 paces ſquare euery way, without any flankers, but ſo built, as on the one ſide it battered the Gallies entring into the Channel, and on the other plaid vppon them beeing entred, it was well prouided with ordnance, and mand with two hundred ſoldiers. The Venetians reſolued to batter it at one time by land and ſea. The morrow after their arriuall early by day breake they beganne their battery, and within a while the ſoldiers went to the aſſault with ladders, which the enemies for a time defended, but beeing at laſt enforced to quit the place, the Venetians tooke it.

The Venetians take the fort.

There were found in it diuers ſmall peeces of ordnance and 18. great peeces, which the Prouidator preſently ſent to Venice, and by a mine ouerthrew the fort to the foundations, which beeing ſpeedily done, and leauing a ſufficient Garriſon in Cattarra, hee returned with his Gallies to Corfou where the fleet remained. Diuers conſultations were made at Rome that winter, concerning preparations for warre againſt the next Summer, knowing what time they had giuen the enemies to repaire their loſſe receiued at the battell of Lepanto: therfore they concluded to augment the Confederates force, to the number of 300. Gallies & 60000. footmen: there was likwiſe a propoſition made to ſend a hundred Gallies betimes into the Leuant, not ſtaying till all the fleet were vnited, which ſhould be at Sea before the enemies, who as it was reported, did intend to keepe all ſupplies from Candy, and to waſt the Venetians Sea-coaſts: But all theſe propoſitions vaniſht into aire.

They ruine it by a myne.

The Venetians, not meaning wholly to depend on fortune, did ſpeedily place ſtrong Garriſons in the Caſtles and forts of the Iſland, and ſent many foot-companies thither, in the meane time earneſtly ſoliciting the Pope to augment the force of the league, and that it would pleaſe him to aſſiſt them with certaine ſummes of money toward their great expenſe, putting him in mind how that his Predeceſſors, had in former times vpon leſſe occaſion giuen leaue to ſell Church-poſſeſſions. His Holineſſe not altogether granting their demands, did permit 100000. Ducats belonging vnto the tenthes of the Clergie vnder their Dominions.

At the ſame time diuers Conferences had beene held at Conſtantinople concerning peace: for the Turkes hauing intelligence of the vniting of the Chriſtian fleet, and doubting the ſucceſſe of warre, had oftentimes motioned peace to the Venetian Baily there: the Viſier Baſcha ſeemed then, more then euer, deſirous of it, whoſe authority and reputation had beene much augmented ſince the battell; wherevpon contrary to the opinion of others, he diſſwaded the great Lord from warre. He thought it then a fit time to motion it, whilſt Selim danted with the vn. lookt for loſſe of the battaile ſeemed to incline to peace: and that the Venetians likwiſe vpon ſome aduantage might wiſh for it.

Motion of Peace at Conſtantinople with the Venetian Baily.

This inclination of Mahomet once knowne, the people, who by reaſon of the diſcomodities of war did greatly deſire it, bruted it abroad ouer the Citty, that the force of the Confederate Princes was great: Theſe rumors being entertained as true and worthy credit, by thoſe who wiſht for peace, and beeing related to Selim, induced him to permit it for to bee motioned vnto the Baily Mahomet theretherevpon, began freely to conferre with him, making vſe therein of the helpe of Orimbey the chiefe Dragoman, and Rabi Salomon a Iewiſh Phiſition, who beeing familiar in the houſe of the Viſier Baſcha, were often imployed in affaires of great importance.

The Senate at firſt makes no great account of peace.

The Bayly hauing aduertiſed the Senate heereof, it ſeemed not greatly to like of the motion, deſiring rather to continue warre; prouoked therevnto on hope of better ſucceſſe, making account that their late victory would giue greater reputation to the Confederate forces: Yet when they conſidered how many notable opportunities they had loſt, and ſpent much time vnprofitably, they were willing to change their opinions, and with new reſolution to lend an eare to theſe motions of peace, the better to ſecure their owne, expoſed to the vncertaine euents of fortune. This was propounded in the Councell of Tenne, that it might with more ſecrecy and greater ſpeed bee effected.

Peace is propounded in the Councell of Tenne.

In this Councell the Senators were at firſt of various opinions. For many of them were poſſeſt with their former hotte inclination to warre, by reaſon of the promiſes of Chriſtian Princes, who doubting this treaty, did then more then euer, promiſe to aſſiſt the league: Wherevpon Lorenzo de Priuli ſent Ambaſſador into Spaine inſteed of Leonardo Donato, Secretary Perez, and Doctor Velaſco, who at that time managed the moſt important affaires of that Court, viſited him more then ordinary, making ſuch impreſſion in the new Ambaſſador, as themſelues deſired, and vſed all their skill to perſwade him, that their King had euer ſtood affected to the league, and at that inſtant more reſolute then euer to purſue the warre, affirming that his Maieſty had written to his officers in Italy, to make ſpeedy preparations, and to auoyde the long delayes of the precedent yeare: and that Don Iohn on the other ſide had promiſed to ioyne with the Venetians, with the onely force of Italy, not tarrying for that of Spaine. The Emperor likewiſe, who by no offers could till then be diuerted from his reſolution, ſuſpecting only that the Venetians had an intent to make peace with the Turke, told the Venetian Ambaſſador reſident in his Court, that he would ioyne with the league. Theſe new offers cauſed the Venetians to proceed ſlowly in the treaty of peace already propounded, but Prince Mocenigo, euer inclining more to peace then to the league, aſſembling on a time the Councell of Ten, ſpake to them in this manner.

The Spaniards conference with the Venetian Ambaſſador.

The Emperor ſeekes to hinder peace.

Prince Mocenigo his oration to the councell of Tenne.

When at firſt we determined to take armes for our own defence, and with a generous courage imbraced warre againſt Selim, I do not thinke it was done with intent to continue it long, but onely to make proofe of fortune, to manifeſt the valour of our own Common-wealth, the ſtrength of Chriſtian Princes, and to purchace to our owne State and all Chriſtendome greater ſafety againſt the power of that inſolent common enemy. It is certaine that war is ordained for peace, and that the end of our dangerous trauailes is quiet and ſafety. I now ſuppoſe that experience of matters hapned at that time, may more then ſufficiently inſtruct vs what our condition will be, if wee continue warre any longer, what end wee may hope thereof, and what recompence for ſo great expences, & trauailes. The firſt yeare, vainly preſuming to ioyne our force with ſtrangers, for the releeſe of the Kingdome of Cyprus, we loſt the famous citty of Nicoſia: neuertheleſſe without declining from our former reſolution, wee continued our warlike preparations, drawne to it by hope of entring into a ſtrict confederacy with Chriſtian Princes, thereby to recouer our late loſſe. God, miraculouſly gaue vs ſuch a victorie ouer our enemies, as wee could not haue deſired a greater; and yet I know not by what fault or misfortune of our owne, the citty of Famagoſta was taken, and we enforced to quit the entire poſſeſſion of that kingdome, to the vanquiſhed enemy: but the ioy and contentation of winning the battaile, tooke from vs the feeling of a greater and more certaine loſſe: Wherevpon with like ſpeed and earneſtneſſe, we made great preparations the third yeare, augmented our Army, and ſpared for no coſt: Wee may now perceiue what good all this hath done vs.

" Our Galleys haue beene a long time idle at Corfou, expecting the Confederate " supplies: and then when we hoped most, that all difficulties being taken away, our " forces would ioyne, & set forwards against the enemy, we were enforced to leaue
" our Islands as their prey, & to call home our fleet, with greater blemish to our re" putation, & expence of lost time, then the vniting of our forces would haue pro" fited vs: and lastly, when fortune hath offered vs many vnhoped for faire occasi" ons, to ouer-throw our enemies, wee haue beene constrained to omit them,
" beeing forsaken by our friends, who vnseasonably dislodged from the Hauen of " Nauarin, with no honorable, but a very preiudicious resolution. But what need
" I to rehearse things so lately done? Wee are reduced to such extremity, as wee
" are not able alone to maintaine warre against the Turkes, and wee know by ex" perience, that the company of others, who should ayde and assist vs, is rather a " burthen and impediment to vs: at first, it promiseth much, but afterwards it
" growes cold, and in deed, doth rather encrease, then diuert our dangers. Wee " were perswaded that there would not onely be a sure correspondency, betwixt the " Pope, Catholick King and vs, but that the confederacie of these three Poten-
" tates, would haue incited all other Christian Princes to take armes with vs against " the common enemy, especially after that notable victory, which all men thought " would haue procured the Turkes finall ruine, but beeing now confirmed by " sundry proofes wee may perceiue, that this opinion was rather conceiued accor" ding to our owne desire, then the certainty of the matter.
" Shall wee still then continue in the same error, and ground the conseruation
" of the State, and the whole fortune of our affaires, on vncertaine foundations, " and hopes which haue so often deceiued vs? Questionlesse, it was a generous " resolution, not to grant the insolent demands of Selim, constantly to maintaine
" the cause of Christendome, in no sort to degenerate from our Ancestors, who
" haue euer brauely pursued those enterprises, by which they hoped to purchase
" greatnesse and glory to their Common-wealth: but now, when wee haue cou-
" ragiously taken armes, and with fortunate successe wonne the battaile, hoping " for greater matters, (I know not by what disaster) wee can reape no fruite
" thereof, and in fighting wee hazard all, and by winning gaine nothing: to con" tinue still the same deseignes and dangers without any profit, after that the op" portunity, which together with the victory offered it selfe for the execution of " some great enterprise, hath already escaped vs, will bee rather thought obsti-
" nate rathnesse, then any zeale to Christian piety, or desire of true honour.
" If wee consider the quality of our forces and State, wee shall easily perceiue,
" that there is nothing more hurtfull or ill beseeming it, then to draw the warre
" out in length. Because that our affaires doe still impaire, the leagues forces
" depending on sundry councels, and many times on contrary respects, and al" though they are great, doe neuertheless become vaine and vnprofitable: and " then the discommodity of maintaining them for our part, is very great, by reason " of the excessiue expences wee are to bee at for want of men, and especially Row-
" ers. Most part of whom the late warre hath exhaust, not to bee supplyed but
" with great cost, and vncertaine whether with any: But if wee shall view our owne " estate, in a true, not flattering glasse, wee shall discerne it to bee rather great
" then strong, at least not equiualent to such an enemy. An other maine consi" deration, is the distraction and remoteneſse of our territory, neerer danger then
" succour, requiring diuerse Armies to secure so diuerse places. How then is it " probable continuance of this warrre shall not more weaken vs, then the ene" my? prosecution of the late victory in deed gaue vs some hope, for so wee " might haue dispatcht it? But how this opportunity is lost, and the effects of loo-
" sing it are, experience doth teach vs. Now our hope is fledde to the enemy. Can " then any man doubt, but that wee should welcome peace offering hir selfe to vs?

Since

Since we cannot protect our State by warre, why ſhould we not by peace; wee " know that the Baſcha Mahomet, alwaies inclining to amity, hath vſed their late " ouerthrowes as inducements to draw his maſter to entertaine milder conditions. " Yf we now reiect his offer, he may perhaps reiect vs heereafter. Who could haue " immagined that the Turks out of the wracks and aſhes of their laſt Fleet, could ſo " ſodainly haue raiſed another, and with it not only ſecure themſelues, but in- " uade vs? what cleerer demonſtration can we haue of their Potency, or more infal- " lible prediction of the warres euent? if after ouerthrow they could doe all this, " what might we expect after victory? I would entreat thoſe which ſtand for war " to ſatiſfie me if domeſtick occaſions implo y the aid of Spaine at home, or any " priuate reſpect diuert it to Affrick, our props then failing, howare wee able of " our ſelues to ſtand? Dependance vppon others may make vs neglect our owne " ſtrength, and when danger is at our doore, it will bee to late to call for helpe from " Spaine, Portugall or Germany: or for them to preuent thoſe Miſcheefs which " wee alreadyſuffer. "

Theſe infirmities the enemy diſcouering, he will grow more inſolent, and bee ſo " farre from offering that he will not accept any conditions of peace. It is pollicy " therefore, my noble Lords, ſince we haue not reaped the fruit of victory, to pro- " uide that we vndergoe not the calamities of ouerthrow, that the expence of ſo " much blood, time and treaſure, may purchace ſafety, though not conqueſt. Wee " muſt not to confidently rely vppon the hazard of battaile, whoſe euent is euer " vncertaine, ſom-times not greatly profitable. Let vs rather truſt to the cleerneſſe " of reaſon then blindneſſe of fortune, alwayes an enemy to great actions. Peace " may perhaps ſet open ſome fairer breach to warre heereafter. The world can " make no diſhonourable conſtruction heereof, nor our Confederates condemne " vs, but themſelues, wee hauing alwaies beene as foreward in the warre as they " backward. Who can tax vs beeing neglected by others if we ſecure our ſelues? "
We follow but the preſident of the Spaniards, and end the warre as they ſhunne "
it. Nay one of the Catholick Kings cheefe Councelors hath made our Apologie " heerein, who ſuſpecting this treaty, affirmed, his maiſter had no cauſe to cenſure " ill, if the Venetians without violating his, entertained the Turkes freind- " ſhip vpon honorable termes. If this peace ſhould ſoone breake, yet we ſhould " get breath; a thing neceſſary to the weaker and wearied party: All things vnder " the Moone are infected with her mutability, mens councells and actions alter- " like themſelues. "

Let vs then imbrace this meanes of our ſafety; God in whoſe protection this "
State hath euer beene, hath vſed this ſcourge of war to diſcipline, not wound " vs, and will at his leiſure open ſome vnexpected way of farther happineſſe. "

The Senates reſolution to peace.

The Princes ſpeech together with his authority was of great force: wherevpon the Senate ſent preſently a new commiſſion to the Baily to reuiue the treaty of peace with ample power to conclude it on the aboue mentioned conditions.
The great & ſundry difficulties ariſing about the renewing of the fleet did much farther this reſolution, in reſpect of the great numbers that were dead: the like did newes from Flanders, where by reaſon of new rebellions, and aid, which the Germaines were ready to ſend them, all places were in vprore, in regard whereof the Spaniards had turned all their deſeignes thither: moreouer, the Senate at the ſame time had intelligence that a Chiaus from Conſtantinople arriued at the Emperors Court, whom, (though it was afterward knowne that his comming was Concerning Moldauia) they ſuſpected came to craue paſſage for the Turkiſh army which was ſaid to be comming into Frioul.

Cauſes mooning the Senate to imbrace peace.

The Biſhop of Aix Ambaſſador for the French King at Conſtantinople.

Theſe aduertizements did coole their heate who were yet willing to continue the league, ſo as with generall conſent euery one inclined to the treaty of peace:
The Biſhop of Aix, Ambaſſador for the French King, was preſently acquainted with this determination, he was lately returned from Conſtantinople to Venice, where he receiued a new Commiſſion from his King, to returne to the great Lords Porte, and in his name to further this treaty, wherevnto his Maiſter had often aduiſed the Venetians to hearken.

The Bayly hauing intelligence of the Senates determination, was commanded ſo ſoone as the Freneh Ambaſſador ſhould arriue at Conſtantinople, to conferre with him concerning the treaty of peace, and as occaſion ſhould bee offered, to make vſe of his Kings mediation and authority. The Turke in the meane time hauing notice, that the Biſhop was to returne to Conſtantinople, preſently ſuſpected that hee brought new conditions of peace more aduantagious for them, wherevpon, their former treaties with the Baily were by little and little neglected, cunningly going about to temporize, concealing their owne intentions. This delay did greatly preiudice the buſineſſe: for they who for their owne particular intereſt, were deſirous to hinder it, alleadged ſundry difficulties, eſpecially to Selim, telling him that all things were ready; that it was neither profitable nor honorable at that time, to ſpeake of any accord; whereby the ſtate of the treaty grew euery day from bad to worſe, the Turkes propounding very vnreaſonable conditions, thereby manifeſting how careleſſe they were of peace: Therefore they committed the Bayly to ſtraighter keeping, muring vp the windows of his houſe, placing ſtrong guards about it, handling him very roughly, thinking thereby to enforce him to reueale his lateſt and moſt ſecret Commiſſion, or elſe, the treaty of peace being broken, to hinder him from aduertiſing the Senate of their warlike prouiſions; or rather, (which is moſt likely to bee true) to barre his conference with the Biſhop, thinking by this meanes more eaſily to draw from the French Ambaſſador, ignorant of what was paſt, the new conditions which they ſuppoſed hee brought with him. So ſoone as the Biſhop arriued, they conſer'd with him, and found that he had no other then a generall Commiſſion: but the Viſier Baſha ſuſpecting that the French for their owne particular intereſt, would haue an hand in this treaty, & by this good office, bind the Turkes to fauour and aſſiſt the Duke of Aniou, the French Kings brother, in the election to the crowne of Poland, would in no ſort vſe him as an inſtrument, but effect it by the former meanes and mediation of thoſe whom hee had firſt imployed, namely Orimbey and Salomon, therefore he renued his treaty with the Bayly, and after ſundry propoſitions and anſweres from both ſides, peace at laſt was concluded about mid March, whereby confirming all articles contained in the old Commiſſion, ſauing that the caſtle of Siponto, which the Venetians yet held, ſhould be ſurrendred to the Turkes.

The Turkes deale roughly with the Venetian Bayly.

Peace concluded betwixt the Turkes & Venetians.

As for other townes of Albania and Sclauonia with their confines and territories poſſeſt before the warre, ſhould remaine vnto thoſe, who then held them: that all marchants goods ſhould bee reſtored on both ſides; and that the Venetians beſide ſhould be bound for three yeares ſpace, to ſend an 100000. Ducats yearely to Conſtantinople, which the Turkes for their owne greatneſſe and reputation made moſt account of. Peace in this ſort beeing concluded and ſigned by Selim, the Bayly diſpatched his ſonne Franceſco to Venice, who arriued there on the fifteenth of Aprill, where it was preſently publiſhed.

Articles of peace.

The end of the ſecond Booke of the ſeuenth Decade.

The Contents of the third Booke of the seuenth Decade.

POpe Gregory is displeased for that the Venetians made peace with the Turke. The King of Spaine is highly pleased therewith: The Pope beeing satisfied by an Ambassador sent of purpose from Venice, in open consistory doth approue what they had done: The Venetians and Turkes are iealous of each other. Peace is ratified with the Turke. Henry Duke of Aniou is chosen King of Poland, and goes thither: Don Iohns voyage into Affrike where he takes Tunis. The death of Selim the Turkish Emperor. The death of Charles the ninth French King. The King of Polands secret departure towards France. Great triumphs made at Venice at the reception of Henry King of France and Poland. Amurath the Turkish Emperor enuades the Empires territories: Amurath confirmes peace with the Venetians. A great plague at Venice, with the Prince and Senates vow to appease Gods wrath: Great charity of Cardinall Borromeo. The lawes of Venice are reformed, and a new order taken for the gouernment of matters. The Pope sends a golden Rose to the Venetian Duke: The Venetians decree concerning the Citizens particular expences. The Venetians solicited by the Persians against the Turke will not agree to it. Contention betwixt the Venetians and knights of Malta. The death of Pope Gregory the thirteenth, and creation of Sixtus the fifth: A Dutchesse is cruelly murthered in Padua.

The

The third Booke of the ſeuenth Decad of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

Sundry opinions concerning the Venetians peace.

PEACE beeing publiſhed, men did differently cenſure thereof, meaſuring it by their owne particular affection: Many, had regard to their owne intereſt, and others, perſeuering in their former hope, that warre would haue procured much good to Chriſtendome, did taxe the Venetians for making peace: but grauer and more iudicious ſpirits, meaſured future things by experience of matters paſt, ſaying that therein they were to be approoued, at leaſt not condemned requiring it for the conſeruation of the State, which without this only remedy (Peace) was expoſed to very dangerous hazards. But the Pope more then any ſeemed to be diſpleaſed therewith, and at ſuch time as the Venetian Ambaſſador came to acquaint him with it, commanded him forth of his preſence, and would for that time admit no excuſe. The Cardinals and others of his Court following his Preſident diſcourſed thereof after their owne various paſſions.

The King of Spaine is not diſcontented with the Venetians.

The Catholike King, knowing by experience how much it importeth Princes to deſire the preſeruation of their owne States, did with great iudgement and modeſty ſeeme for his part to bee well pleaſed therewith, ſaying, that hee doubted not, but that the occaſions which mooued the Venetians to doe ſo were of great importance, hoping that as himſelfe had freely imploied his forces for the ſeruice of Chriſtendome and particular profit of the Venetian State, they likewiſe in acknowledgement of his loue would be ready to doe the like for him when need ſhould bee: and generally all Spaniards as well at Rome as in Spaine approued it.

Many diſcourſing why the Spaniards did ſo modeſtly carry themſelues therein, ſaid, that in accuſing the Venetians, they feared to vrge them to iuſtifie their owne cauſe, and to taxe the actions of ſome of the confederates the precedent yeere: others ſaid, that though the league were broken, they would not for all that wholly forſake the Venetians friendſhip, whom in other matters they might neede. But I thinke they did it of their owne proude nature beeing willing to let the world ſee that they did not greatly care for the breach of league, accounting themſelues ſtrong enough without it to make head againſt the Turkiſh force.

The Venetians ſend an expreſſe Ambaſſador to the Pope.

Now the Pope continuing his diſpleaſure, the Venetians did not ſhew themſelues ſtubborne, but determined to ſend an expreſſe Ambaſſadour to Rome, honorably and reuerently to appeaſe and diſpoſe him to receiue their iuſtifications. Nicolo de Ponte was choſen, a man of great yeeres and authority, and at that time Procurator of Saint Marke. Hee beeing arriued at Rome and hauing audience, acquainted his Holineſſe with the iuſt occaſions which had

The Ambaſſadors excuſes to the Pope.

mooued the Signory to accept the Turkes offered peace: Hee told him that all their ſea-coaſts were in very great daunger by reaſon of the enemies mightie preparations, the Venetians friends and Confederates delaying their aide, that the burthen and expence of that warre had for three yeeres ſpace beene very greeuous to them and their ſubiects, who were able to vndergoe it no longer: That the Venetians ſo long as hope of happy ſucceſſe did comfort them in their miſeries, had contributed more then they were tied towards the expenſe of warre, but all faire occaſions being omitted, they ſaw no reaſon to continue it any longer: And ſeeing that the Common-wealth perceiued by many experiences, that it could not preſerue it ſelfe by any better meanes then peace, his Holineſſe ought not to take it in bad part, if fitting it ſelfe to time, it ſought meanes to temporize with ſo potent an enemy, thereby to imploy the remainder of her forces in ſome more proſperous action for the aduancement of Chriſtendome, and ſeruice of the Church, as it had often done in former time. That Pope Paul the third, perceiuing that they had in vaine taken armes againſt Soliman, did himſelfe aduiſe the Venetians to peace, the league beeing then as now. That the Senate for diuers reaſons did not impart this their deſeigne to any of the confederates, proceeding therein by the rule of State, and by the ſame which the Catholike King, a very wiſe Prince, had vſed: who at that time when he detained his fleet did not acquaint the Venetians with the cauſe.

that

Theſe reaſons did ſomewhat ſatisfie the Pope, who beganne more mildly to treat with the Venetian Ambaſſadors. The Senate in the meane time had ſpeedily diſpatched Franceſco Barbaro to Conſtantinople, to carry newes of their conſent and confirmation of peace, till that Andrea Badourio, appointed to goe thither as Ambaſſador, ſhould be ready to depart to Selim for the ſollemn confirmation of the Articles, and with the vſuall preſents.

Barbaro made great haſt as befitted the importancy of the buſineſſe, and in 14. daies arriued at Conſtantinople which was at the beginning of May: his arriuall was very gratefull, becauſe that the Turkes hauing daily intelligence of the warlike preparations made at Meſſina, beganne to ſuſpect that the Venetians had cunningly made this treaty to delay their warlike prouiſions, that they might with more eaſe ſurprize them vnawares, and that which confirmed them in this opinion was, becauſe they had no notice of the comming of a Venetian Ambaſſador. This ſodainely cauſed them to prepare the fleet which had beene diſarmed, notwithſtanding that the time was too farre ſpent for ſuch actions, Mahomet with ſundry difficulties hauing till then deferred it to take away all occaſions that might fruſtrate peace.

The Turkiſh fleet departeth from Conſtantinople.

At laſt toward mid Iune, the Baſhas Vluzzali and Piali went to ſea with an hundred and fifty Gallies, thirty Foiſts, and ten Mahonnes, and ſailed to Negropont, where they made ſome aboad, expecting the iſſue of the treaty of peace: and Piali hauing intelligence from the Sanzhac of Cherſega that the Ambaſſador and the new Baily were arriued in Dalmatia and on their way towards Conſtantinople, did with the whole fleet ſaile to Modon, and hearing that peace was eſtabliſhed with the Venetians, he turned his forces vpon the Catholike King, ſcouring the ſea coaſts of Puglia, where he burnt the city of Caſtres.

The Venetians being aduertized that the Turkiſh fleet was abroad, and that they intended not to obſerue the peace, and what themſelues had done was interpreted as a collour to deceiue, were poſſeſſed with the ſame iealozies as the Turks; wherevpon notwithſtanding the Ambaſſador was already in Dalmatia, the euent of his Ambaſſage was held very doubtfull; and a decree being made that Generall Foſcarini leauing ſixe Gallies at Corfou ſhould bring the reſt of the fleet to Zara, and vnrig it, they neuertheleſſe deferred the execution thereof, and ſent him word to diſarme only tenne of the worſt, and to re-enforce the reſt, which being done there remained with him foure ſcore and twelue ſeruiceable Gallies: But this did farther encreaſe the Turkes iealouzies. All theſe ſhaddowes of falſe ſuſpition being vaniſhed, and the Senate ſuppoſing that the Common-wealth was out of danger, being vnwilling any longer to continue ſo great a charge, charge, sent word to the Generall, that he should vnrigge his Gallies, and returne home to Venice. By this time the Ambassador Badoarto arriued at Constantinople, where in few words he told Selim, „ That by how much the Prince and Venetian Senate had beene greeued with the breach of friendship betwixt the State and the Ottoman family; by so much more was their ioy then compleate, because all controuersies ended, they were now reunited as before, their subiects enioying peace, quiet and free traffick: hoping that peace and friendship now renued, would be of long continuance, which the Venetians for their parts would be very carefull to obserue, intreating Selim to doe the like for his part, as became a vertuous and iust Prince.

The Ambassadors speech to Selim.

Selim made no other answer, but briefly seemed to allow that which the Ambassador had spoken, and ratified and confirmed the Articles before concluded with the Baylie. In this sort, after that warre had continued foure yeeres, peace was established with the Turke.

An. 1573. The same yeere 1573. in March, Henry Duke of Aniou, brother to Charles the ninth French King, was elected King of Poland, that Kingdome being voide by the death of Sigismund Augustus the last of the noble family of the Iadelons, who had worne that crowne for the space of two hundred yeeres; and because succession hath no place in that Realme, being an elective Kingdome, after Sigismunds death, which happened in Iuly in the yeere 1572. The Lords and Barons of Poland proclaimed a generall assembly at Varsouia in Aprill next ensuing, there to proceed to election of a new King. After this election posts were dispatched into France to giue Henry notice thereof, whilest Ambassadors were making ready, to receiue and conduct him into Poland.

Henry Duke of Aniou chosen king of Poland.

Italy being now freed from the dreadfull Turkish warre was likely haue batched an other in her owne bowels, for the Duke of Vrbin going about to lay some new impositions vpon his subiects, they denied to pay any thing but that which they had granted to Duke Francesco Maria when he entred into the State, and thereupon tooke armes, protesting neuertheless that they did it not against their Prince, but onely to defend their ancient priuiledges: The Duke on the other side raised an army to enforce them, and the matter would haue proceeded to battaile, had not the Pope quenched this flame, making them friends: but the Duke entring afterwards with a power into Vrbin, beheaded some of the chiefe of the sedition, and banished others, confiscating their goods, and then built a Cittadell at the Cities charge, the better afterwards to conteine them in their obedience. Don Iohn of Austria being at the same time in Sicily with a gallant Nauy, and vnderstanding that the Venetians had made peace with the Turkes, did by King Philips permission passe ouer with his forces into Affrick, to seate the sonne of Muleasses in the Kingdome of Tunis, who for his intelligence with Christians had beene expulsed by the Turkes, and had honorable entertainment giuen him by the King of Spaine in Goletta.

Troubles in the Dutchy of Vrbin.

Don Iohn goes into Affrick.

Being come into Affrick he landed his souldiers and in order of battaile marched to assault the City of Tunis, where no resistance being made the Christians without any slaughter entred and sacked it: then Don Iohn causing a fort to be built nere to the City, placed Gabriele Serbellone the Milanois in it with three hundred Italians, and himselfe with the fleet returned into Sicily.

About the beginning of the yeere 1574. the Venetians hauing intelligence that Selim armed at Constantinople, fearing that he would not obserue peace, suspected that hee ment to enterprise vpon Candy, wherevpon they leuied 12000. foot-men to guard it, and rigged their fleet, making Iacomo Souranza their Generall: but these preparations were needlesse, for Selim turning his deseignes vpon Affrike to bee reuenged on Don Iohn, ratified the peace, and tooke from them all suspition of being inuaded by him, sent Sinan Basha with a mighty army into Affrike to recouer Tunis and raze Goletta, the which in one month he he did. Selim perceiuing all things to ſucceed according to his deſire, intended to breake his word and oth with the Venetians, and to inuade the Ile of Candy; but whileſt he made his preparations, death ouerthrew his vniuſt and proud deſeignes, God ſo prouiding for the quiet and ſafety of Chriſtendome: Amurath his eldeſt ſonne ſucceeded him in the Empire.

In the meane time Henry of Aniou entring Poland, did vpon the confines in great power and magnificence meet with the chiefe of the Kingdome, who conducted him to Cracouia, where with royal ſolemnity he was crowned: and whileſt he buſied himſelfe with enquiring of their manner of gouernment, beginning by little and little to order the affaires of State, the Queene his mother ſent a ſpeedy meſſenger to him from France to aduertize him of the death of his brother King Charles, and to aduiſe him to returne into France with all poſſible ſpeed, to receiue the crowne, and to remoue thoſe troubles wherewith by his brothers death ſhe was entangled.

The death of Selim Emperor of Turkes.

The King accquainted the Polanders with theſe newes, telling them that hee was of neceſſity to returne into France to order the affaires of that Kingdome which were much embroiled. But the Lords which were then with him at Cracouia, anſwered that his departure could not be treated of but in the Generall Councell of the whole Realme, who would ſend him ſo well accompanied, as he ſhould terrifie thoſe that durſt make any reſiſtance. The Generall Eſtates of the Kingdome were to the ſame end ſummoned to Cracouia: but the King againe ſolicited by his mother to make haſt, and on the other ſide perceiuing that the Polanders did not proceed with ſuch celerity as his affaires required, and that they were vnwilling to let him goe, reſolued in ſecret manner to depart, and in diſguiſe by night leaping on horſe-back, him-ſelfe, with three more, went from Cracouia, and with great ſpeed haſted towards the confines of the Empire.

The King of Poland returnes ſecretly into France.

His departure was not long concealed, for the Earle of Tericenia the Kings Chamberlaine, with other Lords, comming to his chamber and finding him not there, did preſently take horſe, purſuing the ſame way that hee had taken, meaning to ſtay him and bring him backe, but the King made ſuch ſpeed as they could not ouer-take him till he arriued in the Empires territories, where they earneſtly entreated him to returne with them, which he not granting, they went back againe to Cracouia.

The King in the meane time purſuing his iourney came to Vienna where the Emperors ſonnes met him, and within a while after, the Emperor himſelfe, who very magnificently entertained him.

The entertainment giuen to the French King at Vienna in Auſtria.

From thence he ſent word to the Venetians that he determined to come and ſee their Citty. Archduke Charles accompanied him through his Cuntrey; vpon the Venetians confines, he met with a gallant troope of Noblemen who came to waite vpon him with eight hundred ſouldiers; the next day foure of the chiefeſt Senators of Venice came to him as Ambaſſadors, and intreated him to come and view their city, where all men with great deſire expected him; which he promiſing to doe, the Duke of Neuers who was then in Italy came likewiſe to him, and ſo altogether arriued at Maguera, the fartheſt place of the firme land on the lakes, where hee met with threeſcore Venetian gentlemen which came to waite vpon him, and entring into a Gondola, prepared for him, together with the Dukes of Ferrara and Neuers, attended by infinite numbers of Gondolas, hee came to Murana, where the next day hee was viſited by the Prince and Senate with foureteene Gallies, then beeing conducted to Lia, hee went into the Bucentauro, and with him the Prince and Senate, from thence with great magnificence he was brought to Venice, all that Channell betwixt Lia and the city beeing full of boates made in faſhion of ſea monſters, wherein were all the youth of Venice, ritchly attired, with infinite numbers of Gondolas who rowed before and on euery ſide of the Bucentaure, which was gently towed to Venice, where the King

The Dukes of Ferrara and Neuers come with King Henry to Venice.

The French Kings magnificent reception at Venice.

King remayning certaine daies the Signory shewed him all pleasures and delights that could be imagined: and at his departure, the Prince and Senate accompanied him three miles from the city, where taking leaue of each other, the King embraced the Prince, giuing him great thankes for his royall entertainment, which hee promised neuer to forget, and in so saying gaue him a diamond of great valew entreating him to weare it for his sake.

After his departure, whilest with his friends the Prince celebrated the day of his election, fire by negligence had like to haue consumed the dukes pallace, who was enforced to with-draw himselfe to the house of Giouan de Leggè, knight, and Procurator of Saint Marke: this fire besides the present great hurt it did was by some interpreted as a bad presage.

The death of Cosmo de Medicis 1st great Duke of Tuscany.

The same yeere died Cosmo de Medicis the first great Duke of Tuscany, a Prince of rare and excellent iudgment: Francesco his eldest sonne succeeded him. There arose likewise great troubles in Genoa, betwixt the antient and moderne nobillity, which continued the remainder of that yeere, and most part of next 1575. till that the Pope, Emperor, and King of Spaine, whom they had made vmpiers of their controuersies, made them friends.

Troubles in Genoa appeased.

An. 1575. So soone as Amurath had possest himselfe of his fathers Empire, following the president of his Ancestors, hee murthered all his brethren: and to let the world see that he was a souldier, commanded Vluzzali to prepare a mighty fleet: This did greatly trouble all Christian Princes, especially the Venetians, who fortified all their sea-coasts against the fury of this barbarous enemy: but they were soone freed from this feare, by a great plague and dearth at that time in Constantinople, which enforced the new Emperor to abandon his warlike deseignes, and to seeke meanes to redresse the miserie and calamity of the chiefe citie of his Empire: yet, to confirme mens opinions, conceiued of his new enterprises, he commanded (truce beeing not yet ratified with the Emperor) that his Garrisons neere to Hungary, should enter into the Empires territories to waste and burne the country, where the Turkes did not only execute many hostile and bloudy actions, but tooke diuers castles of the Empire, carrying away with them many Christian prisoners: whereof the Emperors Ambassador complayning to Amurath, he willed him to write to his Master, that if he ment to haue truce with him, he should resolue to pay him tribute for all his dominions, otherwise, hee would in person come into his country to ruine him.

The Venetians feare.

The Turkish army in the Empires confines.

Amurath was incensed against Maximillian, because that the Polanders, determyning to elect a new King by reason of King, Henries departure, he was one that laied claime to that crowne: and because the house of Austria and the Ottoman family had of a long time hated each other, Amurath would by no meanes haue him for his neigbour, and therefore inuaded him, to diuert him from those thoughts, sending word likewise at the same time to the Polanders, that if they could not agree about the election of their King, they should choose Stefano Battori Prince of Transiluania, threatning if they did not so, to waste and spoile their country.

The cause why Amurath hated the Emperor.

Amurath confirmes peace with the Venetians.

Whilest the Turke stood on these termes with the Emperor and Polanders, he sent one of his Chiaus to Venice to promise and ratifie both by word and writing perpetual peace with them: This Ambassage was enterrained with wonderful ioy, they being thereby freed from great care and expense. At the same time an exchange of prisoners, taken at the battaile of Lepanto (which were now at Rome) was granted, for Christian prisoners held by the Turke, among whom was Serbolone, and many others of note.

Toward the latter end of this yeere, the pestilence which had much afflicted the city of Trent, bewraied it selfe in Venice, where by reason of cold weather, it brake not forth much that winter: but the spring following the yeere 1576. it beganne to rage, and with the heate so encreased, as there died that yeere aboue aboue three ſcore and ten thouſand perſons: and no humaine remedy appearing, the Prince and Senate had recourſe to God, and meeting altogether in Saint Markes Church, the Prince in all their names made a ſollemne vow to God to build a Church and dedicate it to the worlds Redeemer, beſeeching him with heart and mouth, that it might pleaſe him of his infinite mercy to heare them, and to appeaſe his wrath, by reſtoring them to their former health. This gracious God heard their humble and deuout praiers, and from that time the ſickneſſe beganne to decreaſe, ſo that the City in March following was wholly freed from that ſcourge: wherevpon, a goodly Church was builded at La Zuecca, and dedicated to the Redeemer, where now the Capuchins abide: whither the Signory and Clergy doe yeerely goe in preceſſion euery third ſunday in Iuly to giue thankes vnto God, for his mercy and fauor ſhewed vnto them.

The Prince & Senates vow to God.

The city of Venice was not alone infected, but diuers other townes of the Marches of Treuiſo and Lumbardy, but eſpecially the city of Milan, where Cardinall Borromeo, Archbiſhop of the place, a Prelate of holy life, ſpared neither his means nor life for the releeſe of his flock, expoſing himſelfe without feare to all dangers that were offered.

Great charity of a Prelat.

Things thus variably changing, Lodouico Mocenigo Duke of Venice deceaſſed, in Iune, the yeere 1577. hauing gouerned eight yeeres, hee was honorably buried in the Church of Saint Iohn and Paul, vnder the great Gate, neere to Loredana Marcello his wife.

His funeralls ended, all men were deſirous to acknowledge the vertue and deſerts of Sebaſtiano Venieri, who when he was Generall had renounced the Chriſtian Commonwealth by ſo notable a victory; and though hee had competitors, did neuertheleſſe merit to be preferred before them all: wherevpon the forty one being aſſembled (of which number himſelfe was one) they without any contradiction choſe him Prince.

THIS election publiſhed, the people were very ioyfull of it. But that which ſeemed moſt ſtrange, and therewithall pleaſing, was, that amongſt ſuch multitude of all ſorts of people as went to congratulate his new dignity, ten Turkes who were then in Venice, came and kiſſed his feet, ſaying aloude, This is that inuincible Generall, who by defeating our fleet and vs, hath iuſtly purchaſed to himſelfe this deſerued crowne, vnto whom we wiſh a long and happy life. The Prince thanked them and with a liberall hand rewarded them.

Not long after, fiue correctors of the lawes were created, who had authority to order the affaires of iuſtice. For ſundry corruptions by long continuance crept into pleas, did much confound mens ſutes, to the preiudices of iuſtice: Theſe fiue were Giouan Donato, Iacomo Guſſone, Franceſco Venieri, Iuſtinian Iuſtiniani, and Lodouico Micaele, all Senators of great reputation. Then vpon intelligence that the Turke rigged certaine Gallies at Narento to ſend into the Hadriattick Gulph (contrary to the treaty of peace made with the Venetians) to defend his owne ſubiects trafficking on thoſe ſeas, whom the Vſcoques of Segna robbed, the Venetians ſent foure well armed Gallies thither, who cleered and defended thoſe ſeas from their theſts and robberies, whereof the Turke hauing notice called home his owne Gallies forth of the Gulph and freed the Venetians from all feare and ſuſpition.

Price ſet vpon all wares.

The Senate perceiuing that the prices of all things were exceſſiue in Venice, either by reaſon of the late ſickneſſe, or vpon ſome other occaſion; a decree was made to reduce all wares to the old price appointed by the lawes; and to ſee it effected, fiue Senators were appointed, namely Marco Iuſtiniano, Lorenzo Bernardo, Sebaſtiano Barbarico, Nicolo Quirini, and Lodouico Contareni.

Three Senators were afterwards deputed to take order for the diſcharge and payment of the States debts, occaſioned by the laſt warres: the Senat was deſirous (it hauing beene propounded by Giouan Franceſco Priuli, a wiſe and vertuous Senator) to pay euery man his due, and to that end, they appointed the ſaid Franceſco Priuli, Antonio Bragadino, and Iacomo Guſſone.

At the ſame time, Hanibal of Capua elected Archbiſhop of Ottranto came to Venice as the Popes Nuncio, whoſe arriuall was pleaſing to the Senate, for the memory of his dead vncle, who in former time had beene Legat there, as alſo becauſe that by his comming the paſſage towards Romagnia was opened, which till then had beene ſhut vp by reaſon of the late ſickneſſe; his preſence likewiſe brought content with it; for hee preſented the Prince with a roſe of gold from his Holineſſe, which is a guiſt which Popes are wont to beſtow vpon Princes which are their greateſt friends and fauorites: Pope Alexander the third in the yeere 1177. honoured Prince Sebaſtian Ciani with the like guiſt, and the ceremony of preſenting it was magnificently performed in Saint Markes Church, fifteene daies after, vpon the one and twentith day of Iuly, a publike proclamation was made, wherein the City was declared to bee cleere and ſound from all infection: At which publication the Prince and Senate went to viſit the new Church built in honor of our Sauiour at La Zuecca.

The Pope ſends a golden roſe to the Venetian Prince.

Not long after, Ormanetta Biſhop of Padua beeing dead, the Pope beſtowed that ritch Biſhoprick on Frederico Cornare the Biſhop of Bergamo, and that of Bergamo vpon Ieronimo Ragazzone Biſhop of Nouara: it did highly content the Senate to ſee one of thoſe Churches reſtored to the family of Cornares, who for a long time had gouerned it, and the other to a houſe ſo well deſeruing of the Common-wealth, for Ragazzone was brother to Iacomo and Placido Ragazzoni, beloued of the Signory for their good ſeruice done to the State.

This ioy, the fate of Breſcia did greatly leſſen, where the plague dayly conſumed ſumed multitudes: wherevpon in Iuly the Prince and Senate for three daies made ſollemne preceſſions, praying vnto God for their health.

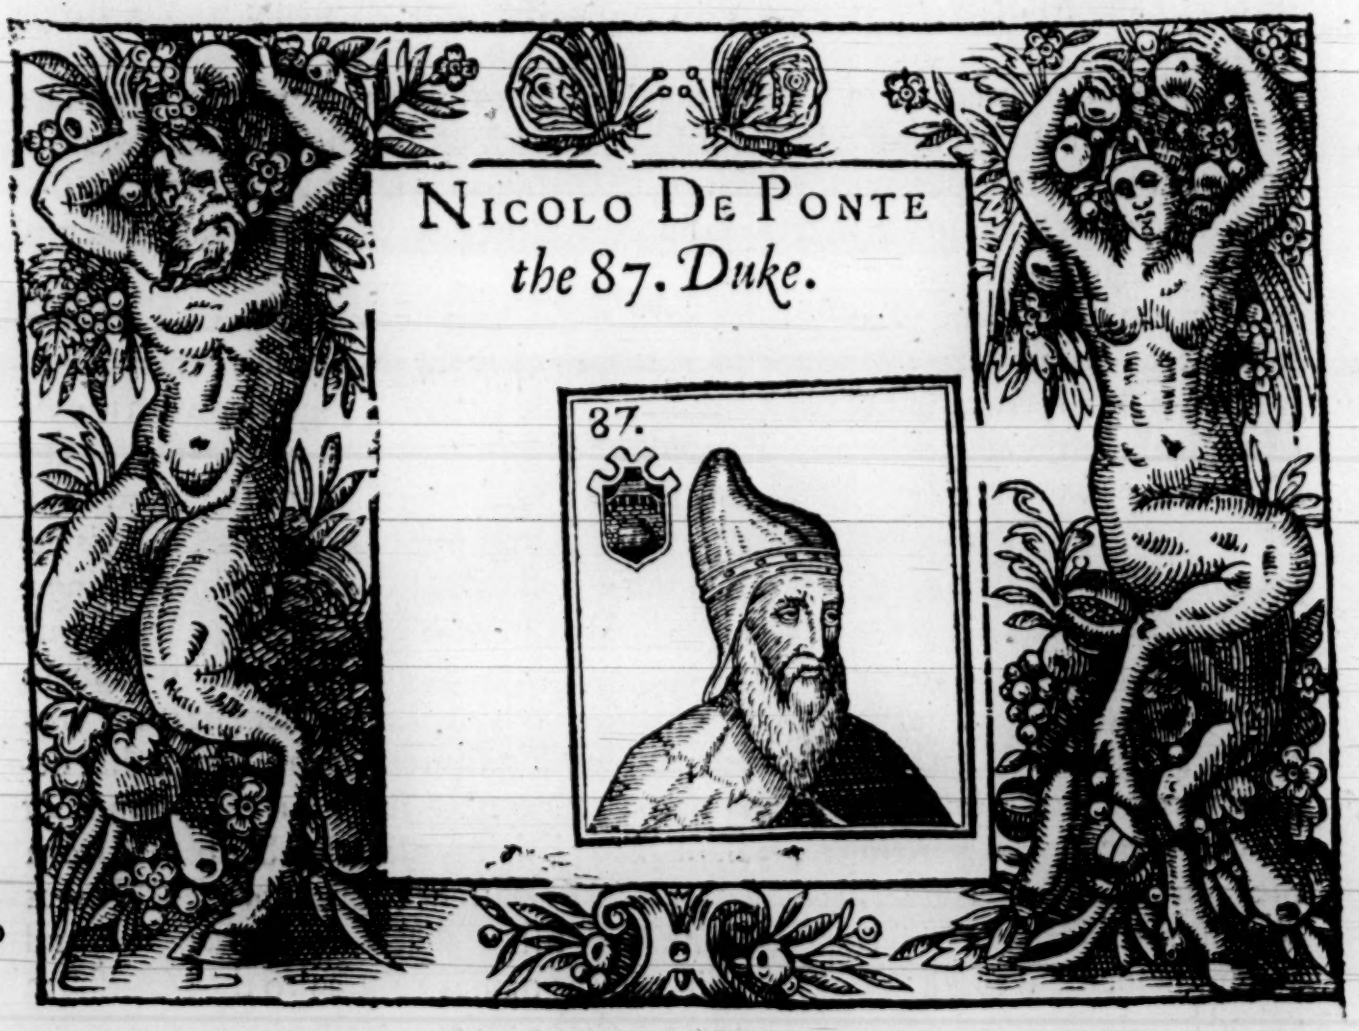
Breſcia afflicted with the plague.

The ſame yeere ſundry prodigies were ſeene, a great Comet ouer all Europe, and at Rome a globe of fire in the ayre like to a great tunne which, ariſing ouer the gate del populo, vaniſhed ouer Caſtle Angelo: beſides a cleere light was ſeene in Romagnia at midnight, which notwithſtanding the darkeneſſe ſhined ſo bright as that men did as eaſily ſee to read as at noone day, theſe were interpreted ſignes of future miſery.

Sundry prodigies ſeene in the ayre.

Not long after, newes was brought to Venice of the death of D. Iohn of Auſtria who deceaſſed at Namur in the beginning of the yeere 1578. at which time likewiſe Prince Venieri oppreſt with old age, and ſurpriſed with ſickneſſe (then when he thought to celebrate the birth day of Princeſſe Cecilia Contareni his wife, for which Franceſco Moroſini his ſonne in law a noble Gentleman prepared great triumphs) departed this mortall life on the third of March, being generally bewailed of the whole City hauing gouerned the Commonwealth eight months and twenty daies. The ceremonies which were wont to bee made in the Church of Saint Iohn and Paul, were by reaſon of the great raine performed in Saint Markes, his body was afterwards buried in the Church of Maran. The Archduke of Auſtria craued his picture of the Senate, together with his coate armour which hee wore vpon the day of the battaile of Lepanto, which the Senate willingly granted.

The funerall ceremonies ended, and the Senators after the vſuall manner proceeding to a new election, Nicolo de Ponte a very graue and noble Senator, foure ſcore and eight yeeres old, and Procurator of Saint Marke, being a learned man which in his youth had read publikely at Venice, was choſen. In his time the Commonwealth was peaceable, the Turke turning his force vpon the Perſian.



THE ſame yeere the great Duke of Tuſcany diſcouered a conſpiracy againſt himſelfe and his brethren made by certaine Florentine Gentlemen, who were apprehended and publikely executed, and not long after Iane of Auſtria his wife died in child-bed, a very vertuous Princeſſe. The yeere following 1587. though there were fierce wars both in the Eaſt, and Netherlands, men fearing that it would likewiſe renue in France, the Venetians were quiet ouer their whole dominions.

The ſecond yeere of Prince Ponte his ſoueraignty, an accident happened at Venice very pleaſing to the Senate. Franceſco de Medicis great Duke of Tuſcany a very potent Prince was deſirous to marry for his ſecond wife Bianca daughter to Bartilmeo Capello a Venetian Gentleman, and to that end ſent Mario Sforza to Venice to acquaint the Senate and her father therewith. The Senate ſent for Barthelmeo and his ſonne Vittorio whom they knighted, then adopted the great Dutcheſſe Bianca daughter to the Venetian Signory, in the ſame manner as in former time they had done Catherina Cornare Queene of Cyprus: the State then and afterwards ſhewing great ſignes of ioy, but chiefly vpon the arriuall of Don Iohn de Medicis the great Dukes brother, ſent to Venice to conduct her to Florence, and Giouan Micaele and Antonio Tepulo were ſent Ambaſſadors to the great Duke in the Senates name to congratulate his marriage, and to be preſent at Florence at the great Dutcheſſe coronation.

They likewiſe ſent Marco Iuſtiniano Ambaſſador to Charles Philibert the new Duke of Sauoy, to bewaile with him the death of Emanuell his father, a great friend to the Venetian State. And becauſe Philip had obteined the crowne of Portugall by the death of the Cardinall King, the Senate appointed Vincento Troni, and Ieronimo Lippomano both Knights and noble Senators, Ambaſſadours to his Maieſty, to reioyce with him in the Senates name for his happy fortune.

Ambaſſadors ſent to the King of Spain.

Now becauſe peace had in Venice begotten exceſſe in the expenſe of priuate Cittizens which commonly carrieth ſundry miſchiefes along with it (for there where frugality and parcimony hath place, religion, vertue, and modeſty doe flouriſh) a decree was made, that ſuperfluous expence in garments, feaſts and womens lying in, ſhould be moderated.

Decrees againſt the Venetians ſuperfluous expences.

They aboliſhed the vſe of all ſorts of pearle, true or counterfeit, onely women were permitted to weare a ſmall carkanet of them about their neckes: coſtly skinnes, and furres were wholly forbidden to bee worne, together with the vſe of any gold or ſiluer lace vpon garments: Moreouer, it was not lawfull for any Curtezan to weare any precious iem, iewels of gold or ſiluer, or to vſe any tapiſtry: Great penalties were impoſed not onely vpon the tranſgreſſors of this decree, but on workmen which ſhould make or ſell any of theſe prohibited things: and exceſſiue expenſe was not onely forbidden in womens lying in, but likewiſe the vſuall viſitation of friends, vnleſſe they were neere kinsfolke, and to preuent all deceit herein, the mid wiues were enioyned within three daies after any woman was deliuered of child to aduertize the Magiſtrate thereof. An other decree was made againſt ſuperfluous diet, reſtrayning it within the bounds of modeſty: peacocks, partridge, feaſant, and all dainty fiſh were banniſhed from the tables of delicious Epicures, Ieſters and Buffons from their houſes. It was likewiſe forbidden not to ſerue double meſſe of fiſh or fleſh into any banquet, and a commandement to all Cookes to giue in the names of ſuch to the Magiſtrate as had hired them to dreſſe any, together with the order therein obſerued.

A Decree againſt ſuperfluous diet.

All Gouernors of townes, and Iudges of Prouinces were likewiſe enioyned, not not to beſtow any exceſſiue coſt in garments, houſhold-ſtuffe or ſeruants, becauſe that modeſty and proportion in gouernors, is an aſſured bridle to hold back ſubiects from doing euill. For, where euery man is ſuffered to liue after his owne pleaſure without order of law, there of neceſſity muſt all miſchiefe and riot abound: for this cauſe the State enacted great and greeuous penalties vpon the tranſgreſſors of theſe ſo holy and wholeſome decrees: For it auailes not a Commonwealth to haue good lawes, vnleſſe ſubiects doe obey them, and Magiſtrates ſee them ſeuerely executed.

Whileſt the Senate were making theſe wholeſome lawes, the Perſian perceiuing that he had to doe with ſo potent an enemy as the Turke ſought to weaken him by buſying him in more places then one, and to that end did the ſame winter ſend an Ambaſſador to the Venetians, requiring that of them which they had propounded vnto him, for during the warre againſt Ottoman, hee intreated them to enuade the Turke now that hee was buſied in Perſia, promiſing ſo ſtreightly to encloſe them as they ſhould neuer eſcape from thence, thereby hoping wholly to roote out the tyrannous memory of the Ottomans who went about to make themſelues abſolute monarkes of the whole world.

A Perſian Ambaſſador comes to Venice.

The Venetians diſmiſſed this Ambaſſador with an ambiguous anſwere, as men that had no intent to entangle themſelues in a new warre, without likelihood of great aduantage, and aſſured hope of victory. In this manner ended the yeere 1580.

The yeere following 1581. Pope Gregory the thirteenth perceiuing that becauſe the courſe of the ſunne had not beene rightly obſerued, the Equinoctiall of the ſpring had gotten tenne daies before the courſe of the ſunne, whereby the feaſt of Eaſter (on which all other mouable feaſts depend) was not celebrated at the iuſt time appointed in the primitiue Church by the councell of Nice, which in congruity if it were not reformed, the holy daies of winter would bee kept in ſummer, and thoſe of ſummer in winter, he ſent for the skilfulleſt Aſtrologians of Europe to come to Rome, and commanded them after exact calculating the courſe of the planets, to referre the Equinoctiall of the ſpring to the 21. day of March, as it had beene in old time decreed by the fathers of the ſaid councell of Nice, and to finde out ſome meanes and rule, that the ſame inconuenient might for euer be remooued: Theſe learned men did what the Pope commanded, by referring the Equinoctiall to it true place, and by taking away for once, tenne daies from October: His Holineſſe aſſured that this was the onely true remedy, approued it, and by his iniunction commanded it to be obſerued ouer all Chriſtendome: only the Greekes and ſome other nations would not entertaine this reformation, which was diuiſed by Lodouicus Lilius a very famous Mathematician, and divulged ouer all Chriſtendome by his Holineſſe command.

Vpon what occaſion the Pope cauſed tenne daies to be taken from the yeere.

The ſame yeere there aroſe ſome contention betwixt the Venetians and knights of Malta, becauſe that thoſe knights ſcoured the ſeas to ſurpriſe the Turkes, whom ſome times they tooke in the Venetians ſeas, whereat Amurath being incenſed, ſent them word that if they would not take order that his ſubiects might ſafely paſſe through their ſeas, himſelfe would ſend a mighty fleet to ſecure them. The Venetians complained to the great Maſter of Malta, intreating him not to permit his veſſels any more to trouble the Turkes on their ſeas: but the Malteſes making no account hereof, the Venetians tooke from them a ſhip of warre which they ſent into Candy, and not long after tooke two Gallies from them, which being brought to Corfoù, all the Turkiſh ſlaues in them were ſet at liberty, and the empty Gallies reſtored to the knights. The Venetians the ſame yeere to ſatisfie the Turke did publikely behead Gabriele Heme a Venetian Gentleman.

Contention betwixt the Venetians and Knights of Malta.

A Venetian Gentleman is executed to ſatisfie the Turke.

This Heme in a Galley of his owne had in the Archipelago fought with a Turkiſh Galeot which was going from Argier to Conſtantinople with the vice-vice-queene of the ſame Kingdome, and a ſonne and daughter of hers, which carried rich preſents to Amurath, all the Turkes both men and women in it he put to the ſword ſetting all the Chriſtian ſlaues at liberty.

Beſide the execution of this gentleman, the Venetians, to appeaſe the Turke, were enforced to ſend home foure hundred Turkiſh ſlaues in ſtead of ſo many Chriſtians which the ſaid Heme had ſet at liberty, and to pay him in ready money the ſum of 800000. Ducats.

But to giue this yeere a more pleaſing farewell, the Prince of Mantua did with great ſolemnity and magnificence marry one of the daughters of Franceſco great Duke of Tuſcany: and Catherina Infanta of Spaine was by King Philip her father promiſed in marriage to the Duke of Sauoy.

Not long after, Pope Gregory the thirteenth died in the foure ſcore and third yeere of his age: his funeralls ended in Saint Peters Church, where he was buried in a chappel which himſelfe had built, the Cardinals entred into the Conclaue, where after twelue daies, they elected Cardinall Felix Perreti of Montalto a Caſtle in the marches of Ancona, a Monke of Saint Francis order who tooke vpon him the name of Sixtus the fifth.

The creation of Pope Sixtus the fifth.

The ſame yeere on the fourth of Iune, Nicolo de Ponte the Venetian Prince, died, beeing ninty foure yeeres of age, hauing gouerned ſeuen yeeres and odde months, he lies buried in Saint Maries Church; his funeralls ended, and the forty one proceeding to a new election, Paſcale Cigogna, Procurator of Saint Marke, was choſen Duke on the eighteenth of Auguſt of the ſame yeere.

A Dutcheſſe is cruelly murthered in Padua.

IN his time there happened a tragicall act in Padua a towne vnder the Venetian Signory, into whoſe territories preſently vpon the election of Pope Sixtus the fifth, Paulo Iordano Vrſino Duke of Braſciano retired himſelf (iealous of the Pope who ſuſpected that the Duke had put a kinſman of his to death before his Papacy, hauing married his widdow Victoria Corembona a beautifull Lady)

Lady)and there dyed, not without ſuſpition of beeing poyſoned, for which loſſe the Dutcheſſe beeing extreamly greeued, retired with two of her bretheren to Padua, vnder the protection of the State of Venice, till ſuch time as ſhee pleaſed to returne home to her father at Eugubia. Lodouico Vrſino kinſman to the deceaſed Duke, lay at that time in Padua, for whoſe ſake the Senate gaue him imployment in a iourney into the Leuant: this man, either of himſelfe, or prouoked by others, did on a night with diuerſe armed men, go to the Dutcheſſe houſe, whom hee cruelly murthered, together with one of her bretheren.

The report of this murther beeing carried to Venice, the Senate ſent Commiſſioners to puniſh the Author and complices of this homicide. Vrſino hauing notice heereof, and certaine of his letters intercepted, which diſcouered the fact, ſo as hee could not deny it, reſolued to defend himſelfe in his houſe with fifty of his owne followers, determining to hold out till the laſt man: but the Magiſtrates enuironing the houſe with their gardes, and perceiuing that hee would not yeeld, cauſed a Cannon to bee brought, wherewith they battered and beat downe part of the houſe, killing ſome of the defendants. Lodouico at laſt perceiuing longer reſiſtance to be vaine, yeelded himſelfe, who beeing impriſoned, together with ſome of his complices, and found guilty of the Dutcheſſe murther, himſelfe was ſtrangled in priſon, and his adherents publickly executed.

The murtherers are put to death.

The end of the third Booke of the ſeuenth Decade.

The Contents of the fourth Booke of the ſeuenth Decade.

HEnry the third, French King, is ſlaine by a Monke. Henry of Bourbon King of Nauar is proclaimed King of France, Foure Popes dye in leſſe then a yeare. The Venetians are iealous of the Turkes and Milaneſes. The building of the Bridge of Rialto. The conuerſion of Henry of Bourbon French King, hee ſends a ſollemne Ambaſſage to Rome, where Pope Clement the eight refuſeth to giue him his bleſsing. All the Citties of France yeeld to Henry the fourth. The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to him. Pope Clement bleſſeth the French King. Peace betwixt the French and Catholick Kings. The French King marrieth the Lady Mary of Medicis Princeſſe of Florence. Peace betwixt the French King and Duke of Sauoy. The Venetians cleere the Adriattick Seas from Pirates. A decree of the Venetian Senate againſt the Clergies purchaſing of lands. An other Decree concerning building of Churches. The creation of Pope Paul the fifth Hee complaines to the Venetian Ambaſſador againſt the Senates law, forbidding the Clergie to purchace lands, or to build Churches without licence. The Popes reſolution vpon the Venetians refuſall. Hee ſends two Iniunctions to them concerning that buſineſſe, with the Senates anſwer. Excommunication againſt the Venetians is publiſhed at Rome. They make two Declarations vpon the Popes excommunication. The Pope and Venetians warlike preparations againſt each other. The French King is a Mediator for Peace betwixt the Pope and Venetians, and to that end ſends the Cardinall Ioyeuſe to Rome. The Pope after ſundry difficulties condiſcends to reuoke his cenſures, and to giue the Cardinall Ioyeuſe ample Commiſsion to doe it. The ſubſtance of the Articles whereby the Cenſures were reuoked. And laſtly the reuocation of them by the ſaid Cardinall in Venice.

The

The fourth Booke of the ſeuenth Decad of the Hiſtorie of Venice.

WHILEST the Venetians, and generally all Italy enioyed peace, France and the Netherlands were afflicted with warre: And Henry the third French King beeing treacherouſly ſlaine by a Monke, the cheefe of the Army as well Catholicks as Proteſtants, proclaimed Henry of Bourbon, King of France and Nauarre, as firſt Prince of the bloud, and next heire to the Crowne.

But to returne to the Venetians vnto whom our Hiſtory doth cheefly belong. The yeare following 1590. there was a great dearth of Corne ouer all Italy, but the Venetian Senate made ſuch ſpeedy prouiſion of graine from England and Poland, as during that time of ſcarcity, Bakers ſtalls and markets were better ſtored with bread, and the price thereof cheaper then in any other Citty of Italy, where men could not buy as much as they pleaſed, though in Venice no man was limited. The ſame yeare on the 27. of Auguſt, Pope Sixtus the fifth dyed, hauing held the Papacie fiue yeares, foure moneths, and three dayes: Twenty dayes after, Cardinall Giouan Baptiſta Caſtagna a Romaine, was created Pope, intitling himſelfe Vrban the ſeuenth, putting all men in hope of an happy gouernment: but he enioyed the Papacie onely twelue dayes. After his death the Sea was vacant aboue two moneths; in which interim, more then ſeuen hundred Bandetti ſpoiled the countrey round about Rome: againſt them the colledge of Cardinals, and great Duke of Tuſcany ſent forces. At laſt the Conclaue choſe Cardinall Nicolo Sfondrato of Milan Pope, intitling himſelfe Gregory the foureteenth.

Pope Sixtus death, with the creation of Pope Vrban the 7.

Creation of Pope Gregory the 14.

Toward the latter end of this yeare, there was in Venice a Greeke called Marco Bragadino Mamagna, one that had beene a Monke famous for opinion men had of him, that he could tranſmute quick-ſiluer into gold, the people were not alone bewitched with this golden dreame, but the Nobility, and ſome Princes of Italy, ſought his friendſhip, hoping by his meanes to turne mountaines into gold: but this Impoſtor beeing no longer able to conceale his deceit, fled from Venice into Bauaria, where the Duke diſcouering his couſenage, impriſoned and condemned him to be hanged, but the priſoner making ſute to bee beheaded, the Duke granted his requeſt. The Venetians hauing carefully prouided for the famine (as hath beene ſaid) were the yeare following 1591. much perplexed, hauing intelligence that the Turke made great preparation for warre. They ſent forces into Candy and to other places, confronting the enemie: but they were ſoone freed from that feare, being aduertiſed that the Turke did it at the requeſt of the French King, to infeſt the Spaniard, they did afterwards fortifie Breſſia and Bergamo, ſuſpecting the great forces which were in the ſtate of Milan: they did likewiſe build that goodly bridge ouer the great Canall of the Citty, called the bridge of Rialto.

The deceit of a Greeke.

The Venetians are iealous of Turke and Milan ſes.

The building of the bridge of Rialto.

In the meane time Pope Gregory the fourteenth dyed, the tenth moneth and tenth day of his Papacie, hee was a great fauourer of the French league, to whoſe ayde he ſent forces vnder the command of his Nephew Hercole Sfondrato Duke of Mont marcian at the charge of the Sea Apoſtolick; but after the Popes death their pay beeing no more currant, thoſe troopes by little and little disbanded.

The death of Pope Gregory the 14.

The

The Creation and death of Pope Innocent the 9.

The Sea was vacant thirteen dayes, at the end of which Cardinall Giouan Antonio Faschinetta the Bolognesse was created Pope, assuming the name of Innocent the 9. at first he seemed to fauour the league of France, but his deseigns were vain for he liued but two monethes and one day after he was made Pope.

The Cardinalls went into the Conclaue at the beginning of the yeare 1592. and elected Hipolito Cardinall Aldobrandino nominated Clement the 7. who seemed willing to aid the French league with men and money.

The Creation of Pope Clement the 7.

A Prodigie.

At the same time Candy was miserably afflicted with the Pestilence, where in a short space dyed twenty thousand persons: one thing is worthy to be noted, that toward the latter end of August, when the sickness beganne to decrease, there was seene in a night on the east side of the Island a great cloude of fire which giuing light for an houres space as if it had beene noone dayes, did to the great terror of the beholders runne through the ayre as farre as Spina longa, and there fell into the Sea, where for a long time it burnt in the water, and at last it vanished.

Now the Citty of Venice hauing beene (as all men know and as wee haue declared in the first booke of this History) builded by those, who flying from the fury and incursions of barbarous nations, retired into those lakes where it now standeth; and in the same manner as it beganne, hath still daily augmented and encreased, so as till this day many famous men, learned in all arts haue come thither from all parts of Christendome as to the Sanctuary of the Muses, where those which are excellent in any art whatsoeuer are so honored and cherished by the nobility, as they presently forget their natiue Contrey, making their perpetuall abode there: where vppon it came to passe the same yeare that certaine fauorers of learning hauing honorable command in the Citty propounded the building of an Academy there, where by turnes they would meeet, and read publicke lectures in that art which euery man profest, and to this end nine gallant spirrits ioyned together (Pompeo Limpia de Bari, Lucius Scarannus de Brindiz, Fabio Paulino de Vdina, Giouan Baptista Leone, Georgio Contaren of Venice, Guido Cassono de Seranall, Theodore Angelucio de Bella forte in la Marca, Vnicentio Galieno the Roman, and Giouan Paulo Gallucio de Salles) and laid the foundation of this vertuous work, chooſing a fit place for the purpose, where continuing their ordinary lectures the glory and reputation of this Venetian Academy extended so farre, as diuers notable men haue since then come thither, whereby it is daily much beautified and augmented.

The Institution of the Venetian Academy.

Thus ended this yeare. At the beginning of the next which was 1593. though the Venetians sought to satisfie the Turke, by keeping the Vscoques of Segna from scouring the Adriattick Seas, yet, not relying on their perfidious promises, beeing aduertised that they made great preparations by land and Sea, they re-enforced the Garrisons of Candy, which were much weakened by the late pestilence: then perceiuing that the Turkish Army, which came from Constantinople, made incursions through Croatia and approached the Contry of Frioul, belonging to their state, resolued to build a fort vpon the Confines thereof, at al times to defend the Contry from the Turkes incursions, they committed the building thereof to skilfull Ingeniers, and to some of the cheefest Senators which for that it is seated in a goodly soyle tenne miles from Vdina, and within halfe a mile of the Emperors territories, was called Noua Palma.

The same yeare, Henry King of France and Nauarre, after sondry battailes and ouerthrowes of his enemies did through the instruction of the Arch-bishop of Bourges and sundry Doctos of Paris require to bee reconciled vnto the Roman Church, and on the fiue and twentith day of Iuly made publick profession thereof, in Saint Denis Abbey, before the said Archbishop, accompanied by the Cardinall Bourbon Archbishop of Rouen, nine Bishops, and diuerſe other Prelates and Religious men, proteſting to liue and dye in the ſayd Catholick religion, and to maintaine it with, and againſt all men: hee made profeſſion of his faith, accompliſhed all ceremonies requiſite in ſo ſolemne an acte, and then receiued abſolution, to the wonderfull ioy and applauſe of the people.

diuerse

Not long after this publick conuerſion, the King ſent the Duke of Neuers and other Prelates to Rome, by them to preſent his obedience to the Pope, and to witneſſe his deſire to imitate the example of the Kings his Predeceſſors, and by his actions, like them, to merit the title and grade of the Churches eldeſt ſonne, and to intreate his Holyneſſe to approoue his conuerſion, and to honor him with his bleſſing.

A ſolemne Ambaſſage from France to Rome.

The Pope after ſundry honors done to the Duke of Neuers, would not at firſt endure to heare tell of the King, notwithſtanding that the Duke and Prelates, which accompanied him, aſſured him that his conuerſion was true and vnfeigned, and therefore humbly beſought his Holyneſſe to beleeue it, which hee refuſing to doe, would neither abſolue the King, nor ratifie that which had beene done at Saint Denis. The French in the meane time perceiuing that the King had abiured his former errors, and was become a Catholick, and afterwards crowned and annoynted at Chartres with the holy oyle, according to the ancient cuſtome of the French Kings: all rebellious citties, one after another, returned vnder his obedience. The Venetians ſent Ambaſſadors to the French King, to congratulate his conuerſion, and to reioyce with his Maieſty for his happy ſucceſſe, in recouering the greateſt part of his kingdome.

The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to the French King.

At the beginning of the yeare following 1595. Amurath the Turkiſh Emperor dyed, Mahomet his eldeſt ſonne ſucceeded him, who calling all his brethren into his chamber, cauſed them to bee ſtrangled in his preſence.

The Pope beeing aduertiſed of the French Kings good ſucceſſe, who ſtill humbled himſelfe to the Sea Apoſtolick, and had againe ſent Dauid du Perron Biſhop of Eureux to Rome, to procure his abſolution, was willing to grant his requeſt, notwithſtanding many were of contrary opinions: Wherevpon, comming one Sunday morning beeing the eighteene of September, in his Pontificalibus into Saint Peters Hall, hee approoued King Henries abiuration, with all ceremonies therein requiſite, receiuing him to fauour, and into the boſome of the Church, with his bleſſing Apoſtolicall, inioyning him due penance: which done, Drums and Trumpets ſounded in ſigne of ioy, and Cannons thundred from Caſtle Angelo, all men reioycing at his good fortune, (the Spaniſh Ambaſſador excepted) who in his Maiſters behalfe proteſted, that the ſame act could not preiudice his Kings titles.

The Pope bleſſeth and abſoluth the French King.

During theſe ſolemnities at Rome, Paſcale Cicogna Duke of Venice dyed, beeing foure ſcore and fiue yeares old, hauing gouerned the Common-wealth nine yeares, one moneth, and fifteene dayes, hee lyes buryed in the Church of Santa Maria de Cruciferi.

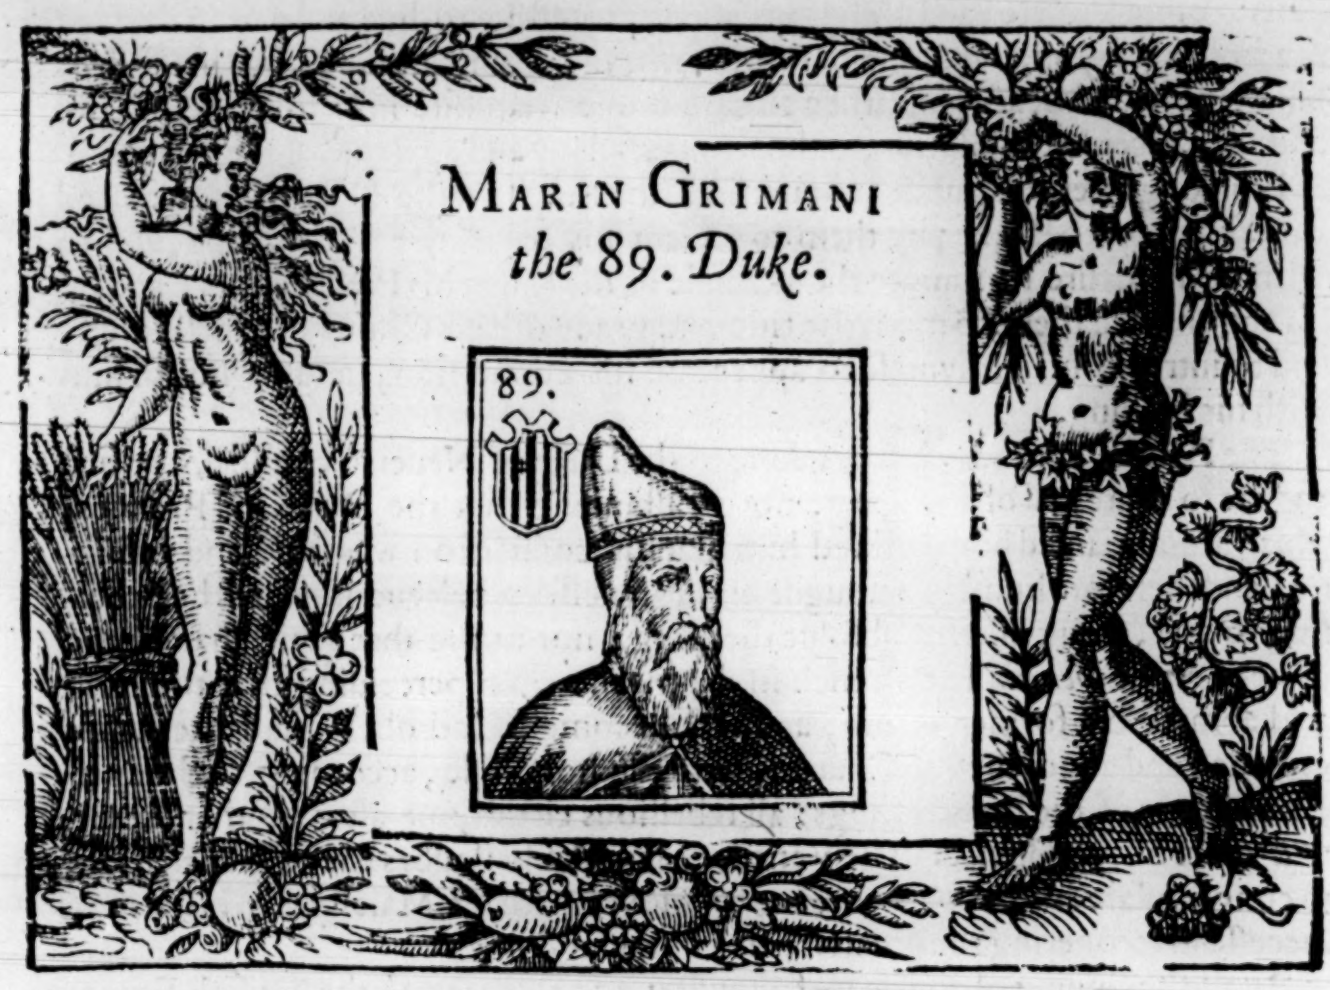
Marin



The Cardinall of Florence Legat in France.

MARIN GRIMANI Knight and Procurator of Saint Marke, succeeded him, beeing beloued of all men for his rare vertue and charitie to the poore. The Pope in the meane time to confirme what hee had done to the most Christian King, sent the Cardinall of Florence his Legate into France, who was honorably entertained at Paris, where hee made some aboade; for open warre beeing denounced betwixt France and Spaine, the Pope became a Mediator of peace, and to that end sent the Generall of the Fryers, a Sicillian, with ample Commission, together with the Legat, to treate of peace betwixt those two great Kings; hee had receiued the like authority from the King of Spaine; and in the end, after sundry goings too and fro, peace (which all men desired) ensued, the yeare 1598.

The Venetians perceiuing that the Vscoques did not giue ouer their robbing the Dalmatian and Histrian seas, sent certaine Galleys thither, vnder the command of Giouan Bembo their Generall, assisted by Colonell Piercente Gabutio & his troopes, who defeated these theeues, and cleered the seas. Heerein, during peace did the Venetians busie themselues, whilest the Turke enuaded Hungary and Transiluania. But the Vscoques in the yeare 1599. continuing their incursions, the Venetians sent Nicolo Donato, who succeded Bembo, against them, together with the same Colonell Piercente Gibutio and his Regiment, who entred and wasted their countrey, tooke diuerse of theirs Castles, and slew many of them.

The Venetians defeat the Vscoques.

Henry the 4. motioneth a marriage with the Princesse of Florence.

Henry the fourth French King, vpon diuerse iust and reasonable causes, hauing obtained the Popes dispensation, to repudiate his wife the Lady Marguerite of France, sister to the late King, and to marry an other by whom hee might haue issue, craued the Lady Mary of Medicis, Princesse of Florence, daughter to the late Francisco great Duke of Tuscany, and Neece to Ferdinand de Medicis, now great Duke, a Princesse beside her youth, endowed with rare beauty, wisdome, and many excellent parts. The great Duke perceiuing how honorable this match would bee to himselfe and the whole family of Medicis, did willingly consent thereunto, whereupon so soone as it was determined and concluded, a great Lord of France was sent thither, who in the Kings name married her at Florence, honoring her as his maiſters wife: Then all things prepared for the iourney of ſo great a Princeſſe towards the latter end of the yeare ſhe embarked hir ſelfe and traine in the great Dukes Gallies, ſailing to Marſeilles, where arriuing, ſhe remained for certaine daies, receauing magnificent entertainment, till ſhe might farther know the pleaſure of the King her husband, who at that time made warre vpon the Duke of Sauoy, for recouery of the Marquiſat of Saluſſes, which that Duke had ſeazed on during the ciuill warres of France: His Maieſtie hauing intelligence that the Queene his wife was arriued at Marſeilles, ſent word that ſhee ſhould come to Lyons, whither himſelfe came in poſt, and conſummated the marriage begun at Florence.

The Kings mariage celebrated at Florence.

Italy zealous of the Spaniard.

Italy in the meane time was in all arme, becauſe the Count Fuentes being by King Philip ſent Lieutenant Generall to Milan, made great leuies of ſoldiers both Spaniards, Italians, Swiſſes and Almaines, vnder collour of aiding the Duke of Sauoy againſt the French King, if peace betwixt thoſe Prines, treated of at the Popes command by his Nephew the Cardinall Aldobrandini, tooke not effect.

Peace betwixt the French King and Duke of Sauoy

This troubled all Italy, and eſpecially the Venetians in regard of their townes in Lombardy. The great Duke likwiſe grew iealous: whervpon, each of them armd, and gaue order to fortifie their frontiers: the like did Franciſco Maria Duke of Vrbin Peace in the meane time being proclaimed at Lyons betwixt the Chriſtian King and duke of Sauoy at the beginning of the yeare 1601. and Count Fuentes for all that not diſarming, but on the contrary encreaſing his forces, made the French King to renew his league with the Swiſſes, and to leuy new troupes, that if the Spaniard ſhould enuade any of his friends, or Confederats in Italy, him ſelfe might ſpeedily be able to ſuccor him.

King Philip, aduertized of this iealozy commanded Count Fuentes to diſarme, whereby al theſe ſuſpitions ceaſed.

Not-with-ſtanding, the Venetians ſent the Colonell Pier-conte with other Captaines into Lombardy; whither like-wiſe by their commandement the Generall Leonardo Donato was gone, together with Giouan Baptiſta, Generall of their fantery, to fortifie their frontier townes, hauing diſcouered a plot laid to ſurprize one of their cheefeſt Cities; and although Count Fuentes, by his maſters commandement, had deuided his Army at Milan into ſundry parts, namely into Flanders, Croatia, and to Prince Doria, yet he ſtill retained ſuch great numbers at Milan as might iuſtly cauſe his neighbors to feare and ſuſpect: The Venetians likewiſe armed certaine Gallies and two Galeaſſes.

The cauſe of the Venetians iealouſie.

Diuers cauſes mooued the Venetians to doe ſo, but cheefly, becauſe Prince Doria, by King Phillips commandement, hauing rigged a mighty fleet houered vp and downe the mediterranean, no man knowing his deſeigne: in the end he cleered this doubt, for he ſailed to Argier in Barbary, making an attempt there, which by reaſon of ſundry difficulties had no good ſucceſſe.

In the yeare 1602. the fort called Palma Noua by the Venetians was ended, and is thought to be one of the goodlieſt in all Italy, which beeing inhabited, they there beganne to build faire houſes, and goodly Pallaces, ſo as in a ſhort time they hope it will prooue as populus as ſtrong. The Senate afterwards perceiuing that one of the mouthes of Po, would in time choake vp with aboundance of earth, the Hauens of Chioggia and Malamoc, to the great preiudice and hinderance of the Citty of Venice, which by that meanes would looſe the ordinary trafficke and commerce of thoſe Hauens, cauſed a great trench to bee made, through which they diuerted that mouth of the Riuer another way, making it to fall into the Sea at a place whereas it could doe noe more hurt.

At the ſame time Philippo Paſcalic arriued at Venice returning from his iourney againſt the Vſicoques, hee was ſent by the Senate as Prouidator Gene-

Generall of Dalmatia, wherein hee got great commendation, hauing defeated those theeues who were afterwards wholy rooted out by the Archduke. Theodoro Balbi likewise Prouidator of the Gulphe, did put the Pirates of Barbary to flight, who scoured the seas almost to Venice, from whom hauing taken three Galeots, and set many Christian slaues at liberty, hee did so terrifie them, as they durst no more come into those seas: The great Dukes Galleys had the like good hap, which according to their custome sailing in the Archipelago to meet with Turkish Foists, and to spoile their sea coasts, incountred the Galleys of Rhodes, which they fought with, tooke some of them, and carried a rich booty to Florence.

Diuers Pirates are defeated.

But not to stray farre from the Venetians, the Clergie of Prague hauing vehemently contested against Doctor Francisco Zabarello, for the suite preferd to sell certaine antient Church lands; The Senate made a decree, that the Church should not appropiate vnto it selfe rents possessed by the Layety, grounding that decree vpon a prohibition made by the Senate, in the yeare 1333. that no lands should bee giuen or bequeathed in perpetuity to Churches within the Citty and Dutchy of Venice: and if any were left vnto them, they should bee sold by a certaine time prefixt, and the money alone to be theirs: alledging for reason, that the Clergie, who pretend themselues and goods to bee exempt from all necessary charges belonging to the Common-wealth, the number of them dayly increasing, and on the contrary, that of the Cittizens still decreasing, who serue, and busie them selues in the ciuill gouernment, and the quantity of their goods whereon the publick reuenew depends, beginning to faile, in the end all wealth would of necessity fall to the Clergie.

The Senates Decree against the Clergie.

This law was variously obserued till the yeare 1536. when it was reduced to this forme, That none of what quality soeuer, should giue lands to the Church, but onely for two yeares space, in which time they should be sold: and if the sale were not made by the Clergie, a ciuill Magistrate should bee appointed to doe it. This beeing considered by the Senate, hath euer since beene generally practised ouer the whole Venetian state.

The yeare 1603. the Councell of the Preguays at Venice, decreed, that no Venetian cittizen, of what degree or quality soeuer, should in the Citty, without the Senates consent, build any new Church, Hospitall, or Monastery, not that the Senate would wholy prohibit such buildings, but becaus the Prince and Senate as Superiours would consider whether it were needfull or not, there beeing in the citty one hundred and fifty Churches, Monasteries, Hospitalls, and other like places of deuotion. The yeare following 1604. the Venetians inioying peace, warre remooued it selfe to other places, as Germany, the Leuant, and Flanders.

A decree concerning building of Churches.

In the yeare 1605. Pope Clement the eight falling sick on the twelfth of February, dyed on the third of March following, hauing gouerned the sea of Rome thirteene yeares, his body was carried to Saint Peters Church, and buried in the Clementine chappell which himselfe had built: Then the Cardinalls entring into the Conclaue, elected Alessandro de Medicis Cardinall of Florence, sonne to the illustrious Octauio, who beeing Archbishop of Florence, was made Cardinall by Pope Gregory the thirteenth, and beeing chosen Pope, tooke vpon him the name of Leo the tenth. The Romaines were very glad of his election, but their ioy lasted not long, for hee dyed of a Feuer, the twenty sixth day after hee was made Pope: Some thought hee was poysoned, but his body beeing opened in the presence of diuerse Physitions, they found it otherwise, hee lyes buryed in Saint Peters Church.

The death of Pope Clement the viii.

The election of Pope Leo the 10. and his sodaine death.

The Cardinals proceeding to a new election, and desirous to make haste, the Cardinalls Farnese and Montalto went to Cardinall Aldobrandini, intreating him to name three among the whole Colledge of Cardinalls (Tuscus and Baronius excepted) and they would choose one of the three: Wherevpon, the the Cardinals Clement, Arragon, and Borgeſius beeing named, Borgeſius as beſt beloued, was preſently ſaluted Pope by way of adoration, intitling himſelfe Paul the fift. This Pope deſcended from an ancient family in Syenna, was ſonne to a Romaine Gentlewoman, his Father comming to dwell at Rome. The creation of Pope Paul the fift.

But the Venetian Clergie, notwithſtanding the Senates decree, did dayly more and more augment their reuenues and poſſeſſions, as well within the Citty as abroad: the Senate for reducing their whole State to one conformable cuſtome, had before (as hath beene ſaid) diuulged their law ouer all their dominions, and added therevnto a prohibition, that none within their Citty or Signory, vnder what coullor ſoeuer, ſhould ſell, giue, or in any ſort alienate lands to the Clergie without the Senates permiſſion, which ſhould not be granted, but with the ſame ſolemnities, vſuall at the alienation of the publick reuenue, and all alienations made otherwiſe, to bee declared voide, the lands confiſcate, and Notaries puniſhed. The Pope at the beginning of his Papacie, hauing notice of this law, did duly examine it, and would in no ſort approoue it: but toward the end of October the ſame yeare, complained thereof to the Venetian Ambaſſador, at the time of publick audience, ſaying, That whileſt the Sea of Rome was vacant, the Venetians had made a lawe, which prohibited the Clergie to purchaſe lands; adding (though it were made vpon important occaſion, and by vertue of a former decree) yet the Cannons diſanulled them both; therefore his pleaſure was to haue them reuoked, inioyning the Ambaſſador in his name, to ſignifie as much to the Signory. The Pope complaineth to the Venetian Ambaſſador.

The Ambaſſador did what the Pope commanded, and within a while after receiued inſtruction and Commiſſion from the Senate, to acquaint his Holyneſſe with the equity of their cauſe, and iuſtice of their law, together with the Signories power, and authority to make ſuch decrees. The Pope, confident in his owne opinion, ſaid aloud, That he gaue him audience, onely to content the Venetians, and not to admit any of his propounded reaſons or excuſes: then made an other complaint, about the detaining of a Channon of Vincenza, and the Abbot of Nerueze, both of them accuſed of notorious crimes: and within a while after another, concerning the law, forbidding to build Churches without permiſſion: beeing reſolute to haue thoſe two lawes reuoked, and the priſoners deliuered to his Nuncio reſiding in Venice. And on the tenth day of September, making two Iniunctions, one concerning the two lawes, and the other about ſentencing the Clergie, hee ſent a Commiſſion to his Nuncio to preſent them, reſoluing vpon their anſwer and refuſall, to proceed to excommunication. But the Nuncio beeing peraduenture mooued with pitty, becauſe the Senate at that time had choſen an extraordinary Ambaſſador, by humble meanes to ſeeke to diuert his Holineſſe from his reſolution, and to induce him better to conſider of the matter, delaied the preſentation of thoſe iniunctions, which the Pope tooke in bad part: whereupon, in all haſt he ſent him an expreſſe commandement to preſent them without farther delay. In regard whereof, vpon Chriſtmaſſe day, when Duke Grimani lay at point of death, and that the Signory and Senators were aſſembled, ſome of whom had receiued the holy Sacrament, and others were ready to receiue, the Nuncio craued audience, and preſented the two iniunctions, which, notwithſtanding the Dukes death happened the day following, were not opened till after the election of the new Duke. The Popes reſolution vpon the Venetians refuſall.

Prince Grimani hauing gouerned nine yeares and odde moneths, departed this mortall life in the Chriſtmaſſe holy-dayes, in the yeare 1605. his funerals ended, Leonardo Donato Knight, and Procurator of Saint Marke, was after the vſuall manner choſen in his ſteed, on the tenth day of February 1606.

AFter his election, the two iniunctions beeing opened, were both of one substance, containing that his Holynesse was aduertised, that the Venetian Senate had decreed diuerse things contrary to the liberty of the Church, and authority of the Sea Apostolick, and diuulged ouer all their Signories certaine lawes particular to the Citty of Venice, forbidding to build Churches and Monasteries, and to allienate secular possessions to the Clergie, without the Senates permission: which as repugnant to the Churches liberty, his Holynesse declared to bee of no force; and they who had made them, to haue incurred Ecclesiasticall censures, commanding them on paine of excommunication, presently to reuoke and breake those lawes; threatning to proceed farther, if they obeyed him not.

The Senates answer to the Pope.

To this, the Senate answered on the 28. of Ianuary, the same yeare 1606. That with greefe and amazement it vnderstood by his Holynesse letters, that hee disliked the lawes of the Venetian common-wealth, prosperously obserued for many ages, and neuer till then taxed by any of his predecessors, the reuocation whereof would ouer-throw the foundation of their State; that hee accounted those lawes to be contrary to the authority of the Sea Apostolick, blaming those which made them, as infringers of the Churches liberty, notwithstanding that they had beene men of singular piety, done good seruice to the Sea of Rome, and were now in heauen: That the Senate according to his Holinesse aduertisement, had examined both the old and new lawes, and could find nothing in them, but what might be decreed by a Soueraigne Prince; concluding, that the Venetians did not thinke that they had incur'd any censures, nor that his Holynesse, repleate with piety and religion, would without considering the cause, continue his menaces. This answer did much displease the Pope, who presently thundred an excommunication against them, which on the seuenteenth day of Aprill the same yeare, was published ouer all Rome, and hung vp in the vsuall places, namely on the great gates of Saint Peters Church, Chancery, and Market place of Campo de Fiore, by Christofero Fonduto, and Giouan Dominico de Pace, the Popes Pursuiuant.

The censures against the Venetians are published.

The

The Prince and Senate hauing intelligence what was done at Rome, to preuent popular troubles and commotions, which might thereby ariſe in the townes and cities of their iuriſdiction, were deſirous to acquaint all their ſubiects therewith, and to this end, made two declarations, the one directed to all the Clergy of their dominions, and the other to the Magiſtrates and officers of the State, to ſtop and reſtraine all diſorders that might ariſe: whereupon all that yeere diuers bookes were written on both ſides, ſome condemning the Venetians, others the Pope, euery man according to his owne paſſion.

The Venetians make a declaration vpon the Popes excommunication.

But at laſt this contention had like to haue beene decided by the ſword, both ſides making great preparations for warre: for the Venetians hauing intelligence that great numbers of horſe and foot were already leuied at Ferrara, and that the Romans had offered to aide the Pope in that warre with men and money, they likewiſe for their parts raiſed forces, fortifying their townes with men and neceſſary munition, becauſe they would not be taken vnprouided, ſo that there was great likelihood of a bloudy warre: But our good God, who with an eye of pitty lookes vpon his children, and takes no pleaſure to ſee their bloud ſpilt, raiſed vp a Mediator, by whoſe meanes this ſchiſme and controuerſie betwixt Chriſtians was appeaſed.

It was Henry the fourth French King, who to preuent the danger and skandall which might ariſe by this warre, did ſpeedily ſend the Cardinall Ioyeuſe to the Pope and Venetians, from him and in his name to mediate peace betwixt them; which had good ſucceſſe. For Cardinall Ioyeuſe being in haſt diſpatched from France with inſtructions from the King, neceſſary for his negociation, arriued at Rome on a Thurſday night the three and twentith of March 1607. and the ſame euening conferred with the Cardinals and French Ambaſſador about propounding this buſineſſe to the Pope, the next day after dinner, himſelfe and the Ambaſſador went to ſee his Holineſſe, vnto whom the Cardinall did at large reueale the cauſe of his comming: But becauſe the Pope ſeemed inexorable to any entreaty of agreement with the Venetians, till the Clergy and Ieſuits were firſt reſtored to their Churches and Colledge (the Venetians ſtill oppugning the Ieſuits) the Cardinal at this firſt audience would not altogether put him out of hope of their reſtitution, but only told him that he did not deſpaire of reconciling the Ieſuits to the Venetians, hauing bethought himſelfe of a fit meanes by which hee hoped if his Holineſſe would make vſe thereof to preuaile, which the next day he promiſed to propound.

The French King mediates peace betwixt the Pope and Venetians.

The Pope, deſirous to know his deuiſe, did early the next day ſend for them, and then the Cardinall Ioyeuſe told him, that to hope by any expreſſe treaty to obtaine of the Venetian Senate the reſtauration of the Fathers Ieſuits, were but to loſe time, and to no purpoſe, but if his Holineſſe would giue him ample commiſſion and authority to reuoke the cenſures, and with it ſend him to Venice; he ſhewing this commiſſion to the Senate, and ſaying vnto them, loe, I haue here power and authority to take away the interdiction, but vpon this condition, that you reſtore the Ieſuits, happily the ſight thereof will make ſome impreſſion in them.

The Pope made ſhew that hee neither would nor could approoue this motion, ſaying, that he had engaged his promiſe not to abandon the Ieſuits, who had beene expulſed for fauoring his interdiction, vnto whom hee had giuen his word neuer to be reconciled to the Venetians till they were reſtored, and after ſundry other allegations this ſecond conference was to no purpoſe, euery man perceiuing by his Holineſſe countenance that he was much perplexed.

The French Cardinalls and other of the Kings ſeruants, meeting to conſult vpon ſome meanes to remooue theſe difficulties, entreated the Cardinall Perron to goe the next day after dinner to get expreſſe audience of the Pope, and if it were poſſible, to induct him, to grant certaine points for the furtherance of the buſineſſe.

Cardinall Perron confers with the Pope.

Cardinall Perron at their intreaty, vndertooke the matter, and for a while disputed with his Holinesse about the restauration of the Iesuists, shewing him the danger whereunto he exposed the Church and Christian Religion for one particular order, whose restoring was to be hoped for, though for a time deferred: he told him that his Holinesse should first re-establish his owne authority in Venice, and that once done, there was no doubt but that the Iesuits would ere long bee restored; and after many other important reasons, he at last obtained of his Holinesse, that seeing for that present he could not preuaile in the Iesuits behalfe, hee should let it passe and insert some clause in the Articles, whereby it might appeare to the world that he had not neglected their restauration.

The Pope grants a commission to the Cardinal Ioyeuse.

Then the Cardinall speaking of the Commission, the Pope would hardly bee drawne thereunto, supposing it to be dishonorable for the sea Apostolike, saying that the reuocation of the censures ought to bee done at Rome, and not sent to Venice; notwithstanding, the Cardinall alleadging diuers reasons to the contrary, the Pope at last consented to giue the Cardinall Ioyeuse a commission to reuoke the censures, which he should carry with him to Venice, but on this condition, to do his best for the restauration of the Iesuits, before he disanulled the interdiction. Hee did also (though with some difficulty) induce his Holinesse to bee pleased, that the French Ambassador resident at Rome, and not he which lay at Venice should in the French King and Venetian Signories name craue of him the reuocation of the censures in writing, for the Pope told him that the Spanish Ambassador resident at Venice, had craued it in the name of his Master and the Signory.

In a word, his Holinesse granted all his demands, onely he seemed vnwilling to declare his intent to the Consistory, saying he supposed that he ought not to doe it publikely, because he had not yet acquainted the Cardinals therewith, neuertheless hee would resolue vpon it, and the next day in the consistory would impart it to some particular Cardinals, and the same after-noone, call them one after an other into his chamber to take their vowes in secret.

According to his resolution his Holinesse hauing in the consistory declared his intention to some particular Cardinals, he did the same after noone call the rest into his chamber, secretly to take their vowes, and in that businesse spent the week. The Spaniards being iealous and malcontent that they were not imployed in that negociation, and desirous to frustrate the matter, diuulged certaine rumors, contrary to the Popes will and meaning, and among others a cunning letter written from Venice by D. Francesco de Castro, by which he certified the Pope, that if hee stood fast for the restoring of the Iesuits, he should obtaine it, and that the Venetians determined to make protestation, by surrending the prisoners, contrary to that which had beene concluded, and which his Holinesse had promised to himselfe. These false rumors did somewhat trouble the Pope who thereupon made some difficulty to proceed any further; but Cardinall Perron soliciting and assuring him of the contrary, hee deliuered (according to his former resolution) the commission to Cardinall Ioyeuse willing him to make haste to Venice.

The Commission is giuen to Cardinal Joyeuse to reuoke the censures at Venice.

The Spaniards being not able to crosse this resolution, made sute to haue Cardinall Zapala to bee ioyned in commission with Cardinall Ioyeuse, but their labor was lost; and yet in other solemnities Zapala and the Spanish Ambassador had in apparence some equality which the French Kings Ministers, because in their Kings name they were sureties for the Venetian Signory, as were Cardinal Ioyeuse and the French Ambassador for the Christian King: yet the world accounted it but a vaine and idle fable, for they had no such authority from the Signory of Venice, as had the French, who executed their commission to their Kings great fame and glory.

Cardinall Ioyeuse, together with the commission, receiued from his Holinesse the conditions on which the censures were to be reuoked, being in number fixe,

the

the effect whereof is thus: That the two Church men priſoners, namely the Abbot of Nerueze, and the Channon of Vincenza, ſhall bee freely giuen to the Pope: That his Holineſſe ſhall reuoke his cenſures, making a declaration thereof to the Colledge: That the Venetian Signory ſhall within a while after ſend an Ambaſſage to the Pope: That the Duke by a declaration ſhall certifie the Clergy of his State, that the firſt declaration is reuoked: That the three Decrees mentioned in the Popes interdiction, and other lawes of the Signory ſhall continue in their full force and power, with this prouiſo, that the Senate ſhall promiſe the French and Catholike Kings not to execute them before the buſineſſe be fully ended betwixt his Holineſſe and the State of Venice, hauing firſt better and more amply informed the Pope of the iuſtice and equity of thoſe lawes: And laſtly that all Churchmen and Religious orders which are baniſhed and expulſed from Venice, or the iuriſdiction thereof, by reaſon of theſe troubles, may returne home to their houſes and couents. But concerning the returne of the Ieſuits, his Holineſſe is content to deferre it, till an Ambaſſador from the Signory haue treated particularly with him concerning that point, certifying him that their expulſion proceeds from certaine cauſes and reaſons which haue no community with the interdiction, and if it ſhall be found otherwiſe, then as eaſily to admit the reſtauration of the Ieſuits, as that of other Clergy men.

The Articles on which the interdiction was reuoked.

Now Cardinall Ioyeuſe departed from Rome with commiſſion and Articles, and arriued at Venice, where hee was honorably receiued and entertained, many Senators going to meet him in the Bucentaure: Then the next day, beeing the twentith of Aprill, one of the States Secretaries, accompanied with the captaine and other officers of the priſon, and for greater ſolemnity, with a publike Notary, brought the two priſoners to the houſe of the Sieur de Freſne, Ambaſſador to the French King, and deliuered them to him, as granted to the Pope at the intreaty of the King his Maſter, without preiudice to the States iuriſdiction in ſuch like caſes, and the French Ambaſſador did preſently conſigne them into the hands of the Cardinall Ioyeuſe who was in the ſame houſe, in the preſence of the Secretary, with theſe words, Theſe are the priſoners which the Signory hath granted to his Holineſſe, not adding at whoſe entreaty, and ſo the Cardinall receiued them as the Popes priſoners; whereunto the Secretary at that time made no reply: In this manner by this omiſſion on the one part, and ſilence on the other, it ſeemeth that ſome doubt, not well vnderſtood, remayned betwixt the Pope and Signory, which neuertheleſſe holds it honor preſerued by the forme of the conſignation inregeſtred by a publike Notary: and the Cardinall ſuppoſeth that the Pope ought to reſt ſatisfied with the words of the Sieur de Freſne, or rather with his caſuall or voluntary omiſſion.

The Cardinals reception at Venice.

After what manner the priſoners were deliuered.

Then the next morning, which was the day appointed by the Senate, the Cardinall comming to the Colledge, after ſome circumſtances of the Popes fatherly goodneſſe, did aſſure them that the cenſures were reuoked, & hauing giuen them his bleſſing went to celebrate maſſe in the Patriarkes Church.

The manner of reuoking the cenſures.

The Dukes firſt declaration was likewiſe reuoked in this manner. Leonardo Donato by the grace of God Duke of Venice &c. To the reuerend Patriarkes Archbiſhops, and Biſhops of our State and iuriſdiction of Venice, and to the Vickars, Abbots, Priors, Rectors of parriſh Churches, and all other Eccleſiaſticall Prelats, greeting. Seeing it hath pleaſed our good God to finde out a way whereby our holy Father Pope Paul the fifth hath beene daylie informed as well of our good meaning, as integrity of our actions and continuall honour and reuerence which wee beare to the Sea of Rome, and thereby to take away all cauſe of ſtrife, Wee, as wee haue euer deſired and procured vnity, and good correſpondence with the ſaid Sea, of which wee are louing and obedient children, receiue likewiſe this contentation, to haue at laſt obtained the accompliſhment of our holy deſire.

The Duke reuoketh his firſt declaration.

Therefore

Therefore we thought good by our declaration to aduertiſe you hereof, giuing you beſides to vnderſtand, that whatſoeuer did belong herevnto, hauing beene faithfully perſormed on both parts, and the cenſures and interdiction remoued; the proteſtation likewiſe, which we made againſt them, hath beene and is reuoked: we being deſirous that herein, and in all other our actions, the piety and religion of our State may ſtill more and more appeare, the which we will carefully obſerue, as our Predeceſſors haue euer done. Giuen in our Ducall pallace the one and twentith of Aprill 1607. ſigned Marco Ottobon Secretary.

The Senats doubt.

The Duke hauing publiſhed this declaration, and by deliuery of the priſoners ſatisfied for his part the conditions mentioned in the accord, the Senate was perplext, with a doubt of no meane conſequence, which was, that the Pope for his part hauing made no mention at all concerning bookes and writings, publiſhed in behalfe of the ſaid decrees, nor of the authors of the ſaid bcokes, which are two very important points, and which did wholly ſeeme to breake of this reconciliation, the State doubting that the Pope by this ſilence and omiſſion had an intent to proceed afterwards againſt the Authors of the ſaid bookes by the ordinary way of Eccleſiaſticall iuſtice; and thinking it a matter againſt all reaſon to abandon thoſe that had done them ſuch good and faithfull ſeruice, after mature conſultation, the Senate made a very notable and honorable decree that the Signory ſhould protect them againſt all men, and aſſigne them a perpetuall pention.

In this manner, is the Commonwealth by Gods goodneſſe, and reuocation of the cenſures, reſtored to her former ancient peace and glory.

The end of the fourth and laſt Booke of the ſeuenth Decade of the Hiſtory of Venice.

FINIS.

A Table of the principall matters contained in the firſt Volume of the Hiſtorie of Venice, compiled for the more eaſie finding out thereof by the right courſe of Alphabet.

AVthors meaning wherof to treate. Fol. 1
Authors opinion concerning the Cities foundation. 4
A verie curious obſeruation. 5
A wonderfull miracle ſmelling ſomewhat of Poperie. 5
Attila defeated neere Tholouſe. 5
Arrian ſect ouer all Italy. 7
Ancient cuſtome of marrying their daughters. 9
A great miracle at Verona. 10
A league made with Luitprand. 12
A cruell and vnworthie act. 18
A puniſhment of God. 18
Ancient Malamocc ruinated. 24
Albiolans yeeld. 24
A verie excellent Librarie within the Palace. 27
A conſpiracie againſt the Prince diſcouered. 28
Alexandrines, inſolent to ſtraungers. 30
Auguſtus his Prouerbe. 30
A Sea-Armie granted to the Grecians againſt the Sarracens. 34
A fleet ſent againſt the Narētines. 45
A ſolemne oath made by the Clergie and chiefe Citizens. 45
A meruailous example of fortune. 51
Ambaſſadors of Dalmatia, Liburnia and Hiſtria, come to Venice to complaine of the Narentines. 55
Ambaſſadors offers to the Venetians. 56
Albania is a part of Illiria 56
A diuine punniſhment. 65
A wonderfull viſion hapned to Peter the Hermite. 69
Aſſemblies anſwere to Pope Vrban at the councell of Clermont. 71
An admirable matter. 71
Alexis practiſeth treacherie. 72
Alexis & Beamond reconciled. 73
A new agreement betweene Alexis and the Chriſtian Princes. ibid.
A new Armie of Infidels. 74
A great battaile betwixt the Chriſtians and the Infidels. ibid.
Armenia Maior giuen by the French men to Palmurus. 75
A verie dangerous way. 76
A luckie euent for the Chriſtians. ibid.
Antioch S. Peters firſt ſeat. 77
Abundance of victuals at the beginning of the ſiege. ibid.
A great quarrell betweene Beamond and the Earle of S. Giles. 79
Agreement made with the king of Tripolie. ibid.
A new fleete of Venetians in Syria. 85
A new Armie of Hungarians in Dalmatia. 88
A couragious act of Prince Michaeli. 93
A ſtrang caſe of a Pigeon. ibid.
All the Iſlands of the Grecian Empire taken. 95
A new religious Order. 97
Agreement with the Piſans. ibid.
A new Armie againſt the Normans. 98
A ſodaine fire. 99
A league with William king of Sicill. 100
A ſecret league betwixt the Greeke Emperour, and the King of Sicill. 101
A great fleete againſt the Greeke Emperour. 102
A new deceit of the Greekes. ibid.
An example of great affection to a mans countrey. 104
All the Princes of the Greeke Empire murthered. 106
A generall Councell publiſhed to be holden at Dijon. ibid.
A reſolued Ambaſſade to Frederick in the Popes behalfe. 107
At what time the Venetian Prince began to ſeale with lead. 108
At what time the Venetian Prince began to marrie the Sea. ibid.

The first Table.

Ancient manner of distributing almes. 112
A new manner of electing the Prince. 113
A new army of Christians for recouery of the Holy Land. 114
Agreement betwixt the Venetians and forraine Princes. 116
Agreement with the Bandetti of Zara. 118
A great fight at the Hauen of Constantinople. 119
An assault giuen to the Citie. ibid.
A discreet answere of a young Emperour. 120
A new Greekish inuention to deceiue the Christians. ibid.
A new agreement betwixt the Venetians and the Princes. 121
A decree of the Venetians about possession of the Islands. 124
A great courtesie. 126
A new strife betwixt the Venetians and Paduans. 126
A sedition of the Constantinopolitans affirming their Church not subiect to Rome. 127
A Colonie sent to Corfu. ibid.
Andrew king of Hungarie, chiefe of the voyage into Syria. 128
A Colonie sent into Candie. 131
A new commotion in Candace. ibid.
Accord betwixt Tepulo and Sanuto. 132
A new commotion in Candie. 133
Agreement betwixt the Venetians and Greekes. ibid.
Agreement with the chiefe Rebels of the Island. 135
Angelo Gradonico Gouernour of Candie. 136
Agreement with the Candiots. ibid.
Armie of the Greeks before Constantinople. 137
Articles of the truce betwixt the Venetians and Genoueses. ibid.
Andrea Tepulo sent to aide the Genoueses. 140
Agreement with the king of Hungarie for Zara. ibid.
An armie at Venice against Eccelin. 142
An assault giuen to Padua. 143
A noble courage of a Preneſtine. ibid.
Acre taken by the Venetians. 147
A new Venetian fleet in Syria. 151
A new Venetian army sent to Modon. 152
A new Venetian armie against the Genoueses. ibid.
An vsuall Prouerbe. 155
Anconitans seeke to defraud the Venetians of their Impostes. 157
Anconitans pollicy to surprise the Venetians. ibid.
Anconitans send to Pope Nicholas the third. ibid.
A new warre with the Patriarch of Aquileia. 158
A traitor punished. 159
Acre taken by the Infidels. 160
At what time the Christians were driuen out of Syria. ibid.
A popular tumult about the creation of the Duke. ibid.
Andrew king of Hungary commeth to Venice. 163
A new war with the Genoueses. ibid.
A wonderfull matter in the Fennes Mæotides. 164
A strange death of one of the Generals of the Venetian armie. 165
A new armie of the Venetians. 166
An enforced peace betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueses. ibid.
A detestable act of a bastard. 167
A pension giuen to the woman who slue Baiamont. 169
Another opinion concerning the issue of the conspiracy. ibid.
Authors discourse on the doings of the Pope and Dandulo. 170
A deed worthy of a Generall of an armie. 173
A new armie against the Genoueses. ibid.
Abundance of corne in the City. 174
Agreement with the Patriarch of Aquileia. 175
A wonderfull eclipse. ibid.
Albert of Escalla, recouereth Vderza. 181
A generall reuiew of the armie. 182
Albert of Escalla flieth. 183
Antenor laid the first foundations of Chioggia. 184
Ambassadors sent to Venice to procure a peace. 185
A wise retreat. 186
A discreet resolutiõ of a Generall. ibid.
A notable sentence. 188
A treatie of peace broken. ibid.
A prodigious storme at Venice in a night. 190
A wonderfull apparition to a poore Fisherman. ibid.
A Generall assault giuen to Zara. 194
A wonderfull earthquake. 196
At what time the infection beganne and ended in Venice. 197
Albert Prince of Croatia pardoned. 198
A discreet act of the Generall. 199
A cruell night-fight. 201
Arragonois Generall slaine in the battaile. ibid.
A new Genouesan armie commanded by Pagano Doria. 205
A great brauerie of a Genouese Gallie. 207
Aristocratia reputed best of the gouernments. 208
An excellent architect punished for conspiracie. ibid.
A religious and godly act. 210
Almaines defeated through their owne default. 214
A Citie brauely defended. 215
A peace more necessarie than honourable for the Venetians. ibid.
Ambassadors sent euerie where against the Candiots. 216
Aduertisement to Christian Princes against the Candiots. ibid.
A free speech of two Senators of Candie. 218
Almiron. 219
A new commotion in Candie. 221
Anopolis taken. 224
A merrie answere of a souldier to one of the Rebelles. ibid.
A Venetian armie against the Threstines. 225
A base retreat of the Almanes. 226
A new warre with Francisco Carrario. ibid.
Alberto Carrario in Rayniero his place. 229
Almaine marchants imprisoned in Venice. 230
An absolute peace with Leopold. 231

An

An agreement betwixt the Venetians and the King of Cyprus. 235
A stratagem of the Genoueses to auoid the fight. 236
A braue answere of those of Sicco. 237
A quarrell against the Venetians at Barletta soone appeased, 239
A battaile at Sea betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueses. ibid.
A memorable enterprize of Carrario. 242
A diuine punishment. 245
A new decree of the Senate in fauour of those who should relieue the Citie. 250
A liberall offer made to the Senate by a Citizen of Chioggia ibid.
An enterprize attempted with bad successe. 251
A great Barze of Genoa taken. 252
A Genoueses ship esteemed to bee worth 500000. crownes. ibid.
A sharpe fight in the hauen of Brondolli. 254
A great fight on the lakes. 259
A discreet answere of the mercenarie Captaines to the enemies. 261
After what manner the Paduan had inclosed the passages towards Treuisa. 266
An vnworthie act of a Garrison for want of pay. 268
A sill yeelded to Carrario vpon Composition. 270
Ambassadors sent from Venice to Treuiso to Leopold. 273
A monster borne at Venice. 274
A Venetian armie to subdue Tenedos. 276
A law against murtherers. 277
Antonio of Escalla defeated by Giouanni Galeas Visconte. 278
A French man punished for indiscreet speaking. 282
A Venetian Garrison sent to Vincenza. 283
Albert de Æste maketh warre on the Venetians in behalfe of Carrario. 284
Accio of Æste recalled from Candie to make warre on Albert. ibid.
An Amphitheater in Verona. 286
A cruell and vnusuall punishment. 287
A meruailous storme. 291
Ambassadors of Philip Duke of Milan at Venice. 298
Alliance concluded betwixt the Venetians and Florentines. 305
Articles of the agreement. ibid.
A Rampier built against the Castle of Bresia. 310
An assault giuen to the Castle of Bressia. 311
An agreement made with the Garrison in the Castle. 312
A new league against Philip. 314
A troupe of Venetian Marriners defeated by Philips forces. 316
A furious sallie of the besieged. 318
A battaile betwixt the Venetians and Philip. 319
An extreeme frost at Venice. 327
A cruell decree of the Florentines. 328
An enterprize vpon the Castle of Lodes discouered. ibid
A bloudie fight. 330
A nauall fight betwixt the Venetians and Genoueses. 331
A fierce fight by land. 332
An enterprize of the Venetians vpon Cremona. ibid.
Attendulo recouereth sundrie places for the Florentines. 334
Articles of peace betwixt the Venetians and Philip. 336
Accord betwixt Sforza and Picinino. 339
A Treatie of peace almost concluded is broken off. 341
A Cittadell made at Bologna. 342
Articles of agreement betwixt Philip and Sforza. 346
A complot to assaile the Venetians on all sides. 348
Auogadre his remonstrance to the Senate. 357
A wonderfull proposition of a Candiot. 360
After what manner the Vessels were brought to the lake of Benac. ibid.
A league concluded betwixt the Venetians, Florentines, and Sforza. 361
A nauall battaile betwixt the Venetians and the Mantuan. 363
A fierce fight neere the lake of Benac. 365
A Venetian armie for the Lake. 371
A new designe of Sforza to relieue Bressia. 372
An enterprize vpon Verona. 374
A leaguebetwixt Philip and Cornetano the Popes Generall. 379
A battaile vpon the lake betwixt the Venetians and Philips forces. 382
Ambassadors come to Sforza from Bressia and Bergamo. 385
Andrea Dandulo sent Ambassador to the Soldan of Babylon. 396
A great deluge at Venice. ibid.
Alexander, Sforza his brother, reuolteth from him. 401
Andrea Donato accused to haue beene corrupted, is condemned in a pecuniarie fine. 402
Attendulo his incursions vpon the Millanois 403
Anconitans yeeld to the Venetians. ibid.
Accord betwixt the Milanois and Sforza. 404
Ambassadors sent from Milan to Venice: with Venetians answer ibid
A nauall Armie against Pirates. 405
Alphonso imprisoneth all the Venetians in his kingdome. ibid.
Alphonso his answere to the Venetian Ambassadors. ibid.
Accord betwixt the Venetians and Sforza. 408
A battaile betwixt the Turkes and Christians at Adrianople. 409
Aphonso expelleth the Venetians out of his dominions. 411
A motion of peace betwixt Sforza and the Milaneses. 411
Accord betwixt the Venetians and Milaneses. 412
A cruell fight at the mouth of the hauen of Siracusa. 414
Ambassadors assembled at Venice. ibid.
A great dearth in Milan. ibid.
An excellent example of chastitie in a Germaine Ladie. 415

A fierce fight with victory on neither side. 419
Alphonso pursueth the Florentine. 420
Aide entreth into Constantinople by Sea. 422
Ambassadors sent into Germany to the Emperour. 426
Antonio Marcello Prouidator besiegeth Thryeste. 435
Assault giuen to Thryeste hath no good successe. ibid.
Arimini and Thryeste freed from the siege. 436
A memorable offer of two brethren of Candie. 444
A generall assault giuen to Nigrepont by the Turks. ibid.
A new pollicy of Ottoman. 447
A generous act of a Dalmatian woman. 452
Ambassadors of Vssan-Cassan king of Persia come into Italy. 453
A braue deed of a young man. 466
Ambassadors of Cassim-bet sent to the Venetian Generall. 467
After what sort the Ianisaries are made. 468
Ambassadors come to Mocenigo from the king of Cyprus sister 469
A battaile betwixt the Turkes and Persians. 470
Andrea Cornari murthered. 474
Antonio Legiero Gouernour of Scutarie. 486
Arragonians defeate the Florentines. 490
A cruell assault by night. 501
Alphonso aided by the Colonessi & the Sauelli besiegeth the Pope. 502
A cruell fight betwixt Alphonso Duke of Calabria,& Roberto of Arimini General to the Venetiãs. ibid
Alphonso his great progression. 508
A subtile stratagem of Viari. 510
Alphonso taketh Carpinetta. 511
Alphonso takes Azzola. ibid.
Alphonso his exclamations. 512
Arrogant brag of Porco. 514
Alphonsos army at Quintiana. 515
Alphonso takes Metella. ibid.
A great plague at Venice. 517
Ambassadors sent to the K. of Romans and to the king of Portugall. 521
A league betwixt the Pope and Venetians. 522
Almaines besiege Rouero. 524
A law carefully obserued by the Venetians, with their great iustice. 531

B

Bonitendius opinion concerning the association of a colleague in the gouernment or principality. 20
Blondus his opinion concerning the French war against the Venetiãs. 23
Battaile of Crotona. 35
Benet the Pope comes to Venice. ibid.
Berengarius defeated by the Hunnes. 40
Battaile betwixt the Venetians and the Hunnes. 41
Buriall of Pietro Candiano, and his young sonne. 47
Berengarius and his sonne Albert defeated. 51
Bishop of Grada his present to the Duke. 56
By what meanes the Normans grew great. 65
Beamond assailed by Alexis subiects. 73
Battaile betwixt the Christians and the Infidels. 74
Beamond giues the first assault to the Citie of Antioch. 76
Beamond his great authority. 78
Bethlehem, Braim, Berithon. 80
Bodies of S. Theodore, and S. Nicolas, brought to Venice. 84
Baldwin king of Ierusalem. 85
Beamond is set at liberty, and returnes to Antioch. ibid.
Baldwin surnamed Burgensis king of Ierusalem. 86
Baldwin taken prisoner by Dalochus king of the Parthians. 89
Barbarians defeated by the Venetians before Ioppa. 91
Building of the hospitall of the publike charity. 95
Baldwin of Flanders chosen Emperour of the East. 121
Boniface king of Thessaly. 124
Bishops Sea at Malamoc translated to Chioggia. 127
Benedicto Treuisano. 141
Brent and Bachillion turned backwards. 142
Bolognians intent discouered. 154
Bolognians defeated. 155
Buconio his conspiracie. 166
Braue resolutiõ of a great captain. 183
Bresia besieged by Luchin Viscounte. 187
Bresia and Bergamo taken by Luchin. ibid.
Building of Saint Anthonies Hospitall. 194
Battaile betwixt the Venetians and Genoueses. 203
By what meanes the plot was discouered. 208
Base retreat of the Almans. 226
By what means the Isle of Tenedos came into the Venetians possession. 232
Battaile at Sea with the Genoueses. 233
Bebia recouered. 264
Bresia and Senia taken by Lauretano. 267
Boucicault a French man, Generall of the Genoa-army. 281
Both fleets dissemble. ibid.
Bathes in time past at Verona. 286
Boldnesse of Picinino, one of Philips Captains. 312
Brissels taken. 315
Battaile betwixt the Venetians and Philip. 319
Bresia somewhat relieued 362
Barbaro his politick wisedome. 368
Bresians terme Barbaro Father of their countrey. ibid.
Bresians are put to rout. 369
Braue message of the Gouernour of the old Pallace to the Prince of Mantua. 376
Bresia is relieued with victuals. 379
Borsia de Æste is put to rout. 384
Bregnan, Trioill, and Rimolca in the Gyradade recouered by Sforza. 385
Battail of Anglare betwixt Picinino and those of the league. 386
Bresians recompenced for their loyalty. 388
Bistice assailed by the Venetians. 396
Bolognese hauing recouered their liberty, craue the alliance of the Venetians and Florentines. 399

Bertoldo D'Æſte is ſlain at the ſiege of Corinth. 433
Bartholomeo of Bergamo bringeth forces into Tuſcanie. 440
Battell of Molinella. ibid.

C

CReation of Tribunes. 8
Comming of the Lombards into Italie. ibid.
Churches builded by Narſes. 9
Church of Grada made Metropolitane by the Pope. 10
Church of Grada robbed. ibid.
Complaint againſt the Tribunes. 11
Creation of Exarch. 14
Conſpiracie againſt the Duke. 20
Cruel death of the biſhop of Grada 21
Conſpiracie againſt the Duke diſcouered. ibid.
Cauſe of the warre betwixt the two Empires. 22
Comming of Theodoſius to Venice. 34
Citie of Crotona. ibid.
Citie of Venice new fortified. 39
Ciuill warre betwixt the Hunnes. 40
Commachians vanquiſhed. 43
Complaints againſt the Narentines. 45
Church of the Auguſtines builded. 46
Complaint of Vitalis biſhop of Grada. 51
Ciuill diſcords. 53
Cruell intent of the Calloprini. ibi.
Calloprini returne to Venice. 54
Cittie of Pharos deſtroyed. 58
Conditions of peace graunted to the Narentines. ibid.
Church and Monaſterie of Bennet, builded by the Phaledrini. 60
Conſpiracie againſt the Duke, and his baniſhment. 61
Centranico depoſed from his dignitie, is by the people ſhorne, and made a Monke. 62
Cuſtome of taking a Colleague into the Principalitie aboliſhed. 63
Crueltie of the Mahometans. 70
Charlemain his exploits againſt the Infidells. 71
Complaints of the Chriſtians before Antioch. 78
Cæſarea. 80
Chriſtians beſiege Ieruſalem. 82
Chriſtians take Ieruſalem. 83
Caſtle of Soball built by Baldwin. 86
Chioggia built with the ruines of Malamoc. 87
Ciprians Monaſterie built. ibi.
Caloman king of Hungary dieth ſodainely. 88
Croatia brought vnder the Venetians obedience. ibid.
Conditions graunted by Varimond to the Venetians. 92
Chriſtians ſtratageme before Tyre. 93
Corfu taken by the Venetians. 98
Contagious ſickeneſſe in the Venetian armie. 103
Creation of the Ten. 104
Crueltie againſt the Law of Nations. 105
Cruell determination of a woman. ibid.
Chriſtian Princes arriued at Venice. 116
Complaint and requeſt of young Alexis. 117
Conſtantinople beſieged by Sea and Land. 118
Conſtantinople beſieged the ſecond time. 121
Conſtantinople yeeldes. ibid.
Coronation of the Emperour Baldwin. 122
Cauſe why the Emperour Emanuell hated the Venetians. ibid.
Colonie ſent into Corfu. 127
Count of Auxerre choſen Emperor of the Eaſt. ibid.
Count Mailloc his enterpriſe vpon Candie. 130
Colonie ſent to Candie. 131
Candace taken by Tepulo. 132
Cyani willingly depoſeth himſelfe. 134
Conſtantinople beſieged againe by Vattaſus. 137
Craft and ſubtiltie of the Genoueſes. 138
Court of Requeſts eſtabliſhed in Venice. 139
Cittie of Pola taken and ruined. 140
Cittie of Epidauro called at this day Maluaſia. 149
Crueltie of the Greekes and Genoueſes. 150
Chriſtians in Syria diuided into ſacrions. ibid.
Cania in Candie ruined by the Genoueſes. 152
Certaine Genoa ſhips taken by the Venetians ibid.
Carolo and Andræa Dandulo Generalles of the Venetian Armie. 165
Cydon in Candie taken by the Genoueſes. 166
Cittie of Ferrara recouered by the Popes Legate. 168
Conſpiracie of Tepulo. ibid.
Conſpirators purpoſe. ibid.
Conſpirators aſſaile the Dukes pallace. 169
Courſe of the warre with thoſe of Eſcalla. 176
Cauſe why the Paduans reuolted from thoſe of Eſcalla. 185
Caminenſis wife ſlaine in the habite of a ſeruant. 186
Charles ſon to the king of Boheme, incamped before Feltra. ibid.
Citty of Feltra taken by the king of Hungary. 187
Candie is appeaſed by the Rebells puniſhment. 191
Certaine Lords of Candie doe rebell. ibid.
Chiefe conſpiratours puniſhed. 208
Cauſe of the warre betwixt the Venetians and the king of Hungarie. 212
Commiſſioners ſent into Candie to appeaſe the troubles. 216
Calergo the murtherer taken. 218
Candiots reſolue to yeeld to the Genoueſe. ibid.
Candiots crueltie to the Venetians. 219
Candiots deſeated. 220
Citie of Candace yeelded. ibid.
Candiots deſeated and put to flight by Giacomo Bragadino. 222
Contareni his fault inexcuſable. 225

Carrario his purpose discouerd. 226
Cause of the fourth warre with the Genoueses. 231
Carrario beginneth warre against the Venetians. 234
Cause of the taking of Famagosta. ibid.
Cities of Cesalta and Saligetta taken. 237
Caballa of Verona, Generall of the Venetian footmen. 241
Carrario ioyneth himselfe with the Genoueses. 242
Chiurani, for not doing his dutie is condemned to perpetuall imprisonment. ibid.
Cap-darger taken by Carrario. 245
Common cõplaint of the people. 246
Charles, sonne to Lewis King of Hungarie, commeth before Treuiso. 248
Charles returneth to Hungary. 249
Citizens resolution. ibid.
Caloianes earnest intreatie to the Venetians for succour. 252
Cornari seizeth on Brondolli. 253
Carolo Zeni arriueth in the hauen of Chioggia. 255
Cap-Histria taken by the Genoueses and giuen to the Patriarke of Aquileia. 264
Carolo Zeni Generall of the Venetian armie. 266
Cape-Histria taken by the Genoueses. 271
Conditions of peace betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueses. 274
Cruell warre at Tenedos. 276
Carrario imprisoned in the Medozian Tower. 279
Carrario his lands diuided. ibi.
Castle of Padua recouered for Nouello. ibid.
Carrarians make incursions on the Vincenzans. 282
Carrario wrongeth the Venetian Ambassador. 283
Carolo Malateste of Arimini generall of the Venetians armie. 284
Conditions of peace made with Albert of Este. 285
Conditions of peace propounded vnto Carrario. 287
Carrario his great cruelty. 288
Ciuidalians yeelde to the Venetians. 293
Carmagnolla leaueth Philip, and commeth to the Venetian. 297
Cornari his Oration to Philip. ibid.
Carmagnolla called into the Senate, with his Inuectiue against Philip. 302
Carmagnolla Generall to the Venetians. 307
Certaine Venetian troups defeated by the armie of Philip. 310
Castle of Bressia yeelded to the Venetians. 312
Casal-Maior taken by Picinino. 315
Carnagnolla before Monteclaro. 317
Carolo Malateste Generall of Philips armie. 320
Chiefe cause of Carmagnolla his death. 321
Cause of the renewing of the war betwixt the Venetians & Philip. 323
Carmagnolla escapes by flight. 328
Carmagnolla giues ouer his charge, for sorrow that he had done a fault. 331
Carmagnolla conuicted of treason is beheaded. 334
Cornari dieth in prison. 336
Cause of the renewing the warre betwixt the Venetians & Philip. 338
Carrario commeth forth of Germany to take Padua. 339
Carrario is discouered and executed at Venice. 340
Cosmo de Medicis sent to Venice. 344
Cosmo goeth to the Pope. 346
Casall yeeldeth to Picinino. 348
Cause of the commotion of Padua & Vincenza. 367
Commissioners of Verona come to Venice. 378
City of Antiuari subiect to the Venetians. 396
Christians possesse the Streight. 397
Cause of Sforza's hatred to king Alphonso. 398
Ciarpelions death. 400
Carolo Montone taketh the Venetians party. 403
Coione takes the Venetiãs part. 406
Coyone his victory. 409
Crenia yeeldes to the Venetians. 411
Coyone assailed by command of the Senate. 416
Carolo Gonzaga imploreth the Venetians aide. ibid.
Coyone makes incursions vpon the Bressan territorie. 418
Constantinople besieged. 422
Captaines of gallies punished for leauing the fleet without licence. 425
Conditions of peace concluded betwixt Sforza and the Florentines by meanes of an Hermit. 426
Cause of the warre betwixt the Thryestines and those of Cape-Histria. 434
Capel his exploits. 439
Capel dieth with griefe, 440
Canalis speech to Mocenigo. 447
Canalis condemned to perpetuall banishment. ibid.
Commissioners return from Constantinople without any conclusion. ibi.
Coccina in the Isle of Lemnos is reedified. 448
Citie of Vdina affrighted at the comming of the Turkes. 454
Christians besiege Smyrna. 465
Coric yeelded. 468
Caraman his present to the Venetian. ibid.
Conspirators flie from Cyprus. 475
Croia yeelded to the Turkes. 486
Conditions of peace betwixt Ottoman and the Venetians. ibi.
Confederate armie against the Florentines. 489
Comparison betwixt the Romans and Venetians. 491
Cause of the warre of Ferrara. 493
Castel-nouo yields to the Venet. 498
Cõditions of peace betwixt the States of Italie and the Venetians, vpon the end of the warre of Lombardie. 516
Ceremonie at the Duke of Venice his funerall. 522
Charles the eight French king sends an Ambassadour to Venice: with the Senates answere. 532

D

Diuers opinions of the Historians concerning this Historie. 3

Duke Paulutio the first takes oath. 12
Duke Horteo murthered by his owne Citizens. 14
Difference arising about the creation of a new Duke. ib.
Dominico Leon, the first master or Colonell of the men at armes. ib.
Duke Giouanni and his sonne expelled the Citie. 21
Description of the situation of Venice 24
Different intents of Combatants. 25
Dukes Pallace in Rialto. 27
Description of the Dukes Pallace. ibi.
Duke Giouanni flieth. 32
Duke Giouanni deposed from his charge, and becomes a Priest. 33
Duke Tradonico murthered. 35
Dorsse-Dura newly inhabited. 37
Duke Giouanni his brother taken by the Count of Commachia. 38
Duke Giouanni doth voluntarily depose himselfe. ibid.
Duke Pietro dieth fighting with the Narentines. 39
Duke Vrso his sonne taken at sea. 42
Duke Vrso voluntarily deposeth him selfe, and becomes a Monke. ibid.
Duke Pietro his sonne, who was his Colleague, stirs vp sedition in the Citie, and is banished. 45
Duke Pietro dies for griefe. ibi.
Duke Pietro the fourth marrieth Walderta daughter to Guido. 46
Duke Pietro his tyrannies ibid.
Death of the Duke and his son. 47
Duke Pietro Vrseolo his secret departure. 52
Dominico Morosino murdred. 54
Death of Otho the second, Emperor. ibid.
Duke Tribuno voluntarily deposeth himselfe. 55
Description of Illyria. 56
Duke Vrseolo the second his great wisedome: permitted to associate his sonne Giouanni into the gouernement. 59
Duke Vrseolo the 2. his last will. 60
Dominico Vrseolo vsurpeth the Dukes Pallace. 62
Durazzo besieged by the Normans. 66
Description of Hierusalem. 81
Duke of Venice comes to Hierusalem. 92
Description of Tyre. ibid.
Distrust conceiued against the Venetians. 93
Death of Rogero King of Sicil. 99
Diuers opinions of the Historians concerning the reconciliation of Pope Alexander and Fredericke the Emperor. 109
Death of Cyani, and his last wil. 110
Description of S. Marks church. ibi.
Description of Constantinople. 118
Discreet answer of a yong Emperour. 120
Death of the Emperor Baldwin. 122
Decree of the Venetians about possession of the Ilands. 124
Damiet in Ægipt taken. 128
Description of the Ile of Candie. 129
Death of Theodore sonne to Vattasus. 148
Death of Baiamont. 169
Dalmasio the Spaniard proues a traitour to the Venetians. 171
Dalmasio diuinely punished for his treacherie. ibid.
Dandulos pietie acknowledged. 173
Description of the Arcenall. ibid.
Diuers sorts of Earthquakes. 196
Discreet act of the Generall. 199
Doria spoileth the Adriaticke Gulph. 205
Duke of Venice denied a pasport. 213
Duke of Austria comes to Venice. 215
Dominico Michaeli Generall of the Venetians nauall armie. 217
Demand of the Grecke multitude. ibi.
Death of Nicholao Dandulo and his brother. 221
Duke of Austria bringeth aide to the Thryestines. 226
Diuers opinions concerning Rainiero his dismission. 229
Diuers opinions in the Senate concerning the taking of Tenedos. 232
Diuers opinions concerning the taking of Famagosta. 235
Description of the hauen of Brandissa 236
Description of the city Chioggia. 243
Diligence vsed in fortifications. 247
Diuers and sundry incounters where the Venetians had the better. 248
Dandulo goeth to Venice about the souldiers demaunds. 269
Duke of Sauoy a Mediator for peace. 272
Diuers publike shewes made in the city for loue to the Duke. 280
Death of Paulo Sabello. 285
Duke of Milan his victorie ouer the Florentines. 296
Description of Bressia. 308
Duke of Sauoy & Montferrat make incursions on the Milanois. 319
Double treacherie vpon the Castle of Soncina. 328
Discourse betwixt Conzaga and the Venetians. 347
Description of the lake of Benac. 349
Duke of Ferrara complaines vnto the Pope. 352
Death of Pietro Lauretano, and his strange buriall. 360
Disposition of Picinino. 374
Doubt of those of Verona. 375
Description of the Riuer Adice. 376
Diuers Gallies armed at Venice against the Turkes. 397
Diuersity of opinions in the Venetians campe. 407
Dandulo his braue answer. ibid.
Diuers townes of the State of Milan yeelde to Sforza. 409
Death of Hermolao Donato. 416
Death of the last Emperour of Constantinople. 424
Description of Morea. 431
Description of Corinth. 433
Death of Hieronimo Barbadico. 440
Description of the Isle of Nigrepont. 442
Description of the Isle of Chios. 445
Description of the Isle of Cyprus. 475
Death of Iulian de Medicis. 489
Death of Ottoman. 492
Description of the Isle of Rhodes. ibid.
Duke of Ferrara declareth himselfe enemy to the Venetians. 494
Description of Lombardie. 495
Death of Roberto of Arimini. 502
Defeate of the Ferrarois. 503
Duke of Lorraine returneth into France. 509

Death

Death of Giouan Heme. 510
Diuers expostulations vpon the yeelding of Azzola. 511
Death of Generall Marcello. 514
Dukes Pallace reedified. 516
Death of old Sanseuerin the noble Venetian Generall. 527

E

Extent of the Country of Venice. 2
Exhortation to the Venetians. 40
Enemies that came to sccour Antioch, defeated. 78
Emanuel his request against the Normans. 98
Emanuel his Ambassadours at Veniee. 101
Emanuel seizeth on the Citties of Dalmatia. 102
Example of great affection to a mans Country. 104
Example of great loue towardes ones country. 114
Eccelin in Padua. 138
Eccelin, what he was, with his comming into Italie. ibid.
Eccelin before Mantua. 143
Eccelin his crueltie against the Paduans. ibid.
Enforced peace betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueses. 166
Enterprise against the Turks broken. 175
Earthquakes of diuers sorts. 196
Earledome of Val-marin fallen to the Venetians by the death of Phalerio. 211
Enemies cunning. 244
Enemies vniust demands. 248
Enterprise attempted with bad successe. 251
Entertainement giuen by the Christian Princes to the Venetian Ambassadours. 217
Entertainement giuen to the Veronagentlemen. 288
Effect of Cornari his Oration to Philip. 297
Exploits of Philip. 314
Eugenius the Pope leaueth Rome, and commeth to Florence. 338
Eugenius the Pope, Venetians, and Florentines in league together. 339
Enemies intent against the Venetians. 354
Enemies are driuen from the mountaines toppes. 355
Enemies assaile the forragers. 358
Enemies answer to Sforza who offered them battell. 369
Enemies take the Castle of Maderna. 371
Enemies vanquished at Thyenna. 373
Enemies in Verona. 374
Enemies flie from Verona. 377
Effect of Auogrades speech to Sforza. 383
Eugenius the Pope his death. 402
Emperour of Constantinople in despaire. 424
Enemie buildeth a bridge ouer the Gulph at Nigrepont. 442
Enemies fleet afraid of the Venetians. 446
Enemies take the Isle of Lissa. 509
Enemie retires from Corfou. 510

F

Foundation of Padua. 2
Fruitfulnes of the Venetians country. ibid.
Foundation of the Rialto. 3
Foure and twenty houses burned at once. 5
From whence the Venetians that now are be descended. 6
First gouernement of Venice vnder Consuls. 7
From whence the Lombards are descended. 8
Foundation of Heraclea. 10
Foundation of Equiline. 11
Fælix Cornicula, the second master or Colonell of the men at Armes. 14
First association into the Principalitie. 20
French take Commada. 23
French vanquished by the Venetians. 25
From whence came the name of Saracens. 29
From whence the Sarracen Moores are descended. 34
Flight of the Calloprini to the Emrour Otho, with their promise to him. 54
Fortie Narentine Merchants taken. 57
Familie of the Vrseoli for euer banished from the citty. 63
French arriue at Constantinople. 72
Frenchmen and Venetians ioyned together. 84
Faneses made tributary to the Venetians. 97
Family of the Iustiniani worne out by the sickenesse: and againe restored. 103
Flight of Pope Alexander. 107
Frederickes answer to the Venetian Ambassadours. 108
Frederickes menaces. ibid.
Frederickes fleete put to flight, and his sonne brought prisoner to Venice. ibid.
Fourth rebellion of Zara. 113
Fredericke the Emperour dieth in Armenia. 114
Famine in the Campe before Ptolomais. ibid.
Flight of Alexis. 119
Fifteen men appointed to elect a new Emperour. 121
Friendship betwixt the Emperour Robert and the Venetian Magistrate. 128
Fredericke against the Venetians. 139
Fift rebellion of Zara. 140
Forme of the electing the Venetian Prince. 141
Flight of Ansedin. 143
Fleete of the Genoueses in the Adriaticke sea. 164
Fort of Thealdo taken by the Venetians. 168
Francisco Dandulo his great pietie. 172
False reports against the Genoueses. 173
Fort of the salt-pits taken. 184
From whence the contagion came to Venice. 197
Foure new Officers created in the Armie. 202

Feare, which was in Venice for the enemies comming. 203
Fifteene villages revolt. 222
Fontano's exhortation to his souldiers. 229
Feltra besieged by the Venetians. 231
Famagosta taken by the Genoueses. 234
Flight of three Genoueses gallies. 236
Flight & deceit of the Venetians. 240
Fort of Nasariola taken. 242
Famine enforceth the Genoueses in Chioggia to yeeld. 262
French Kings Nephew and Duke of Austria come to Venice, to goe to the holy Sepulcher. 280
French-man punished for undiscreet speaking. 282
Francisco Gonzaga Generall of another Armie for the Venetians. 284
Francisco Carrario his great cruelty. 288
Fortie Gentlemen of Verona come to Venice in Ambassage. ibid.
Faires of Tane robbed and spoiled by the Scythians. 291
Florentines Ambassage to the Venetians. 296
Florentine ambassadors Oration. 299
Florentines ouercome the Cremonois under the conduct of Nicholao d'AEst. 308
Francisco Sforza commanded to relieue Bressia. ibid.
Francisco Gonzaga a braue and couragious Captaine. 309
Fregosi banished from Genoa defeated. 315
Fortes builded by Philip in the midst of the Po. 316
Fortes taken by the Venetians. ibid.
Florentines auouch what Bracchian had done: and will him to proceed on. 325
Florentines defeated by Picinino. 326
Foure Venetian gallies taken. 330
Fiesca and Adorini are treacherously slaine. 332
Francisco Gonzaga giueth ouer his place of Generall. 344
Florentines answere to Sforza. ibid.
Fiue and 20000. men in the Venetian Campe. 350
Famine and Pestilence afflict the besieged Bressians. 357
Fight betwixt Paris Lodron and Italus. 359
Forlimpopoli is taken by Sforza. 366
From whence the Hadriatick sea taketh the name. 367
Fight betwixt the Bressians and Italus. 369
Feare of the Florentines. 380
Francisco Barbaro highly esteemed in Venice. 388
Fight betwixt Picinino and Sforza broken off by approach of night. 390
Famous theft enterprised by a Greek. 409
Frederick the Emperour with his wife commeth into Italie. 415
Florentines send to the French King. 418
Florentines recouer Foglian. 421
From whence Dyrrachium tooke the name. 477
From whence the Po tooke her name. 497
Ferrarois abandon Trecenta. 498
Ferrarois complaints. 504
Florentines craue Councell of the Venetians: with their answere. 535

G.

GEnerall assembly held at Heraclea 11
Gouernment of Dukes restored. 17
Greeks defeated before Commada. 23
Giouanni deposed by the people. 28
Greekes flie. 35
Great strife among the Citizens. ibid.
Giouanni Partitiatio takes againe the Gouernment vpon him. 39
Great crueltie of the Huns. 40
Great praise giuen to the Duke Tribuno. 41
Generall Councell held at Rome, declares the Church of Grada for Metropolitan. 46
Great harme done by fier. 47
Guerin comes in Pilgrimage to Venice. 52
Great ingratitude of the Venetians. 33
Greeks ouerthrowne by the Normans before Durazzo. 67
Great effusion of blood in the Teple. 83
Godfrey of Bolloigne King of Ierusalem. ibid.
Great priuiledges granted to the Venetians by the Emperour Henry the fourth. 86
Generall Councell published to be held at Dijon. 106
Great famine in the Campe before Ptolomais. 114
Great ingratitude and crueltie of a brother. 116
Greekes put to flight neere Constantinople. 110
Genoueses defeated by the Venetians. 125
Great friendship betwixt the Emperour & the Venetian Magistrate. 128
Gouernour of Candie flies disguised like a woman. 131
Great reasons in Sanuto's behalfe. 132
Gradonico dieth. 135
Greekes defeated. 137
Genoueses resolution. 147
Genoueses defeated by the Venetians. 148
Great treacherie of a Greeke. ibid.
Genoueses defeated by the Venetians. 148
Great treacherie of a Greeke. ibid.
Genoueses league with Palcologus. 149
Genoueses put to flight. 150
Genoueses defeated before Trapani. 151
Genoueses come into Candie. 152
Great scarcitie of victuals in Venice. 153
Generall of the Venetian Armie punished. 157
Great ouerflowing of the sea, with an earthquake. 158
Godly deeds done by Prince Marini. 171
Great pietie of Francisco Dandulo. 172
Girard Caminensis taketh Vderza 181
Great insolencies of the Lancequenets. 184
Great dearth in Venice. 191
Great desolation in Venice. 197
Genoueses take Nigrepont. 199
Greekes base flight. 201
Grimaldi General of the Genoueses. 203

Great crueltie falsly imputed to the Venetians ibid.
Great lamẽtation made at Genoa. 204
Genoueses commit themselues to Giouanni Viscont Archbishop of Milan. ibid.
Genoueses take Parenza. 205
Great discomfort in Venice. 207
Great brauerie of a Genoueses gallie. ibid.
Great sedition in Candie. 216
Genoueses answer to the Cãdiots. 218
Great ioy at Venice for the recouerie of Candie. 220
Great boldnesse of the rebels. 222
Giacomo Caballa Generall of the Venetians Armie by land. 230
Great ingratitude of a sonne to his father. 232
Gouernour of the Island for the father refuseth to obaie the rebellious sonne. ibid.
Genoueses surprise Lemnos. 233
Greekes and Genoueses defeated by Zeni at Tenedos. ibid.
Genoueses allie themselues against the Venetians with the King of Hungarie, Bishop of Aquileia and the Carrarians. ibid.
Genoueses put to flight. ibid.
Girard Caminensis taketh the enemies partie. 234
Genoueses reuenge. ibid.
Genoueses fly from the fight. 239
Genoueses chalẽge the Venetians. 240
Genoueses before Chioggia. 241
Genoueses take Loretta and the Tower of Bebia. 245
Great sorrow in Venice for the losse of Chioggia. ibid.
Genoueses wholly ruinate Malamock and Poueggia. 250
Genoueses fortifie Chioggia. 251
Great losse sustained by the Genoueses at the taking of Brondolli. 258
Genoueses put all vnprofitable eaters forth of Chioggia. ibid.
Genoueses pollicie to get forth in despite of the Venetians. 261
Genoueses on their knees beg life. ibid.
Great dearth in Treuiso. 267
Garison of Nouella for want of pay, yeeld it to Carrario. 270
Genoueses fleet flyeth. 271
Genoa-prisoners in great danger at Venice. 272
Genoueses take 14. Venetian vessels. ib.
Galeas Viscont taketh Padua. 278
Galeas besiegeth Mantua with fourtie thousand men. 279
Galeas is repulsed by water and land ibid.
Genoueses great losse. 281
Giles the black greatly honoured. 282
Giacomo Carrario departing from Verona, is taken in flight. 285
Gonzaga besiegeth Padua. 286
Giouanni of Padua punished for hauing secret conference with the enemie. 287
Gonzaga his answere to Carrario. ibid.
Great contention among the Sibenssans. 291
Great crueltie of the King of Hungarie. 292
Great disorder in the battell by reason of dust which blinded the souldiers. 319
Guenesio going about to treat with the Florentines is discouered by Sforza. 326
Genoueses reuolt from Philip. 340
Grecian Emperour and the chiefe of the Greekes Empire, come to Venice to conferre with the Pope about religion. 342
Gonzaga maketh alliance with Philip. 347
Great spoile in the Camonic vally. 350
Great disloialtie. 355
Great distresse of the Bressians. 368
Great extremitie of Bressia. 370
Great ioy in Venice vpon the recouery of Verona. 378
Giouanni Cornetano is committed to prison in S. Angelo's castle. 379
Great crueltie. 383
Great entertainment giuen to Sforza at Venice. 388
Great triumphs at Venice at the wedding of the Princes sonne. ibid.
Gotholans vanquished at Ortona. 411
Great entertainmẽt giuen to the Em-
Frederick at Venice. 416
Great reioycing at Venice in regard of the peace. 426
Genoueses come into Morea about the yeelding vp of the Island. 427
Gauardo Iustinopolitato is sent against the Thryestines. 435
Giacomo Venieri returneth safe to the Fleet. 438
Great outrage cõmitted in Oenos. 441
Great valour of a young maid. 481
Galeas Duke of Milan slaine at Messe. 489
Gouernour of Corie his answere to Mocenigos Herald. 486
Great mortalitie in the Venetian Campe. 501
Greatnesse of the Vrsini. ibid.
Gallipolis taken. 514
Great prosperitie of the Venetian State. 521

H.

How the Islands were inhabited. 3
How the Original of Venice happened. 5
Heraclea after it was repaired, was named Villa-noua. 27
Huns come into Italy the secõd time 39
Hunnes assailed Venice. 40
Husband and wife vow chastitie. 51
Histrians tributary to the Venetiãs. ib.
How the Prince spent his time till hee departed. 52
Hadrians defeated by the Duke. 60
Henry the Emp. comes to Venice. 68
Hugo commeth to aid Beamond. 72
How great Beamond's authoritie was. 78
How glad the Armie was to fight, to free themselues from famine. ibid.
Hungarians giue ouer their pretended right to Dalmatia. 84
How the Columnes were erected, and by whom. 105
How the Venetians entertained the Pope when they knew him. 107
How farre Otho his entreatie preuailed with his father. 109
How long the Venetian Princes haue vsed the Canopie. ibid.
Histria reduced to the Venetians obedience. 117
Henry, brother to Baldwin, Emperour of the East. 112
Henry the fisher makes attempts on the Isle of Candie. 125
How great mischiefe the Emperours absence out of Italy hath caused. 167

How

How highly Pietro Rossis was lamented. 188
How men may foretell an earthquake. 196
How long the Earthquake lasted at Venice. 197
Histrians reduced to the Venetians obedience. ibid.
How the Senate disdained the losse of the battell. 202
How hardly Contareni accepted his dignitie. 225
Hungarians come to aide the Paduans. 228
Humaga, Grada, and Caorli taken by the Genoueses. 241
How the Mariners loued Pisani. ibid
Hauen of Venice fortified. ibid.
Hatred which Nouello bare to the Venetians. 282
How much money was spent in the warre with the Carrarians. 288
How secret those things are kept, which are determined in the Senate. 334
Hannibal Bentiuole trecherously murthered by his enemies. 399
Honest answere of the Florentines. 427
Happinesse and content of Venice during Foscari his Principalitie. 430
Hadria taken by the Venetians. 498
Hercules d' AEste comes to the reliefe of Stellata. 510
Hercules plaintiue letters to Alphonso his brother. 512
How much the Venetians spent in the warre of Lombardie. 516

I.

IVliano Cepari, the fourth Master or Colonell of the men at Armes. 14
Iustiniano, the Dukes sonne sent to Constantinople. 27
Iustinians last will & Testament. 31
Infidels aduertised of the Christians enterprize. 72
Infidels retire. 74
Ierusalem. 80
In whose time the Turkes recouered the holy land. 95
Incursions of the Bandetti of Zara. 118
Isaac the Emperour ratifies what his sonne had promised. 119
Isaac deliuered out of prison. ibid.
Isaac dieth sodainly. ibid.
Isle of Candie giuen to the Venetians. 122
It is lawful for all men to defend their owne. 138
Ioppa besieged by the Barbarians. 91
Inconstancie and lightnesse of the Greekes. 151
Ingratitude of the Venetians neighbours. 153
Incursions of the Turkes. 175
In what place and manner the battell was fought. 203
Ingratitude of a son to his father. 232
In what maner Pisani fortified Venice. 247
In what place Zeni receiued newes of the losse of Chioggia, and the Cities siege. 252
Ielousie betwixt Pisani and Thaddeo Iustiniano. 254
Iohn d' Agons a Frenchman Generall of the Venetian Armie. 257
Iustiniano is sent to Apulia to forrage. 259
Iustiniano is taken by the Genoueses. ibid.
In what esteeme the Citie of Verona is. 286
Incursions of Nichola Stella, vpon the Lucan territories. 324
Italus of Friull, and Giacomo Guiuano are put to death. 401
Inestimable valew of the treasure of Venice. 410
Inuention of the Art of Printing attributed to a German. 431
Isle of Lemnos deliuered to the Venetians. 436
Isle of Delos described. 451
Italian Princes send a present to Matthias King of Hungarie. 479

L.

LOmbards giue limits to the Venetians. 8
Luitprand Duke of Forleini. 11
Leo the Emperor giues many goodly reliques to the Prince. 28
Lewis King of Germanie, Tributary rie to the Huns. 40
Leo the Pope comes to Venice. 64
Leo the Pope vanquished by the Normans. 65
Length of the siege of Antioch, with the want in the Armie. 78
League with Wiliam King of Sicill 100.
League of Achaia with the Venetians. 150
League renewed betwixt Palcologus and the Venetians. 155
Ligustick and Lybick warre had almost one selfe same end. 163
League and alliance against those of Escalla. 176
Lewis King of Hungarie defeated before Zara. 195
Luchin Vermio of Verona, Generall of the land Armie. 217
Lightnesse and inconstancie of the multitude. 218
Lithernians returne to the Venetians obedience. 223
Liberall offer made to the Senate by a Citizen of Chioggia. 252
Loretta recouered. 256
Leopold accepteth the Venetians offer. 273
Leopold his proud answere to the Paduan. 273
Leopold entreth Treuiso. ibid.
Leopold rendreth Treuiso to Carrario vpon conditions. 277
League against Galeas Viscont. ibid
Ladislaus selleth Zara to the Venetians. 290
Lauretano respected and beloued of euery one. 352
Lauretano besiegeth Sermone. 360
Legnaga is taken. 365
Longina is taken by Sforza. 369
La Garda, Bardolin, and Lansiza are taken. 383
Lioncllo d' AEst commeth to Venice. 397
La Marca reduced vnder the Popes obedience. 400
Lodes and Plaisancia yeeld to the Venetians. 404
Leonesio his death. 421
Lauretano his exploits in the Isle of Nigrepont. 425

Lamentation and great courage of a woman. 465
Lodouico Lauretano commeth from the Popes Legate. 470
League betwixt the Venetians and the Kings of Portugall: with the cause of that league. 518
Law of Nations violated. 524
Luca Pisani his opinion on Sanse-ucrino his desigme. 525

M.

MAcrin Gouernour of Hungarie ouercome by the Huns. 3
Monegario his miserable end. 19
*Miraculous aparition of S.*Marke 30
Malamoc ruined. 32
Moores returne into Italie. 34
Murcimirus, King of Croatia, sends Ambassadors to the Duke. 57
Molloc, *Gouernour for the Greeke Emperour, deceiueth his fellowes.*66
Muraſis yeelded. 76
Moores came into Dalmatia. 35
Michael the Emperour, driuen from Constantinople. 66
Murderers punished. 36
Malamoc burnt and drowned. 87
Myrtillus issued from meane parents. 120
Myrtillus speach to the people. Ibid.
Myrtillus flight. 121
Meaning of the Prophecie. 123
Modona and Corona receptacles of theeues and Pirates, ruined. 125
Mount Ida. 130
Michael Paleologus his treacherie. 148
Mastin beggeth peace of the Venetians. 181
Mastin raiseth his campe from Pontremolle. 182
Mestra yeelded to the Venetians. 185
Mastin incampeth to shut victuals from the Venetians. 186
Marsilio his answere to the Venetians. 188
Mastin imploreth aid of the Duke of Bauiere, ibid.
Mastin enforced, accepteth peace on any conditions. 189
Mastin made a gentleman of Venice. 190
Manner of Phalerio his conspiracie. 207
Marco Cornari Vice-duke, during the troubles. 209
Miserable death of Andrea Cornari. 217
Marco Gradonico murthered in the Palace. 218
Mocenigo his resolution. 223
Marsilio Carrario forsaketh his brother. 230
Mestra besieged by the Carrarians. 237
Mestra relieued by the Venetians. ibid
Mutatio his answere to the Venetians and Genoueses. ibid.
*Market place of S.*Marke paued with bricke. 280
Malateste giues ouer the Generals place. 284
Massolerio conuicted and punished for treason. 287
Milanois offer to Philip. 314
Malateste Generall of Philips Armie. 320
Marquis of Montferrat commeth for refuge to Venice. 334
Mellato his valour. 343
Mellato conducteth the Venetian Armie. 346
Mantuans excuse. 347
Mellato speedily dislodgeth. 348
Martinenga's and Auogadres in Bressia are reconciled. 349
Mellato commeth forth of Bressia, and is constrained to returne. 353
Mellato departs from Bressia, and marcheth towards the mountaines. 354
Mantuan fortifieth Po. 356
Mellato made Generall of the Venetian Armie. 357
Mellato prouides to relieue Bressia. 359
Mantuans plot to send the warre farre from his owne Countrie. 362
Mantuans pollicie for the passage of his gallies. 363
Mantuans gallies passe into the Adice. 364
Mellato fortifieth the passages neere to Torbolles. 372
Malateste Prince of Cesenna is taken prisoner. 373
Maguis entreateth the Prince of Mantua not to spoile Verona. 375
Mantuan proclaimed Prince of Verona. ibid.
Mantuans preparation for defence of Verona. ibid.
Maguis brought before Sforza, is cleered. 377
Malatestes take the enemies partie. 379
Mellato his death. 396
Mount Barri is taken. 403
Milaneses suspect Sforza. 408
Manerbia and Pontenico yeelde to Sforza. 421
Malateste besiegeth Sparta. 437
Mocenigo his answere to Canalis. 447
Mocenigo his first exploit. 448
Mocenigo his Oration to the Popes Legate. 451
Mocenigo his incursions into Asia. 454
Mocenigo his answere to the King of Cyprus. 469
Micra is taken by composition. ibid.
Mocenigo his answer to the Ambassadours from the King of Cyprus his sister. ibid.
Mocenigo his answere to Lauretano. 470
Mocenigo aduertised of the enemies purpose. 474
Mocenigo his diligence to relieue Cyprus. 475
Mocenigo punisheth the murtherers of Cornari. 476
Mocenigo is chosen Gouernour of Cyprus. ibid.
Matthias King of Hungarie a great souldier. 479
Mantuan Prince goes to the Confederates Armie. 509
Mantuan discontented, leaueth the Armie. 510
Maximilian is chosen King of the Romans. 521

N.

NArses comes into Italie. 9
Narses answere to the Empresse. ibid.
Narentines rodes euen to Caorli. 35

Narentines

Narentines great incursions. 55
New officers sent to the Cities newly conquered. 58
Normans driue the Saracens and Greeks forth of Italy. 65
Nicholas the Pope, Tributarie to the Normans. ibid.
Normans defeat Molloc. 66
New titles giuen to the Duke of Venice. 68
Nicea besieged. 73
Nicea yeelded: and vpon what conditions. 74
Number of those who tooke the Croisado after the councell at Claremont. 71
Number of the dead Infidels farre greater than of the Christians. 75
Number of the Infidels Armie. ibid.
New religious order. 97
New army against the Normans. 98
New deceit of the Greeks. 102
New manner of electing the Prince. 113
New Armie of Christians for recouerie of the Holy Land. 114
Number of the Christian Armie. 116
New Greekish inuention to deceiue the Christians. 120
New agreement betwixt the Venetians and the Princes. 121
New strife betwixt the Venetians and Paduans. 126
New commotion in Candie. 131
Noble courage of a Prenestine. 143
New warre against the Greekes. 94
New warre against Bolognians. 154
New warre with those of Cape-Histria, & with the Anconitans. 156
New contention with the Paduans. 167
New stirres in Candie soone suppressed. 174
New Magistrates created. 195
Nicholas Pisani Generall of the Venetian Armie. 200
New Prouidatori sent with supplies to Candie. 222
New suplies come to the Armie. 225
Nouello sonne to Francisco Carrario comes to sweare to the peace at Venice. 230
Number of the Genoueses army. 240
Noualla besieged by the enemie. 267
Nouello sonne to Carrario recouereth Padua. 279
Number of the Venetians army. 311
Number of Philips armie. ibid.
New league against Philip. 314
Number of the Venetians nauie. 352
Nicholao de Æste fortifieth his owne estate, and is afterward freed from his feare and suspition. 353
Notable seruice of women. 356
New Orgies yeelded to Picinino by treacherie. ibid
Nicolao de Æste his motion made to the Senate. 358
Nicholao de Æste is receiued into the league. 361
Newes of the league brought to Venice. 362
Nicholao de Æste commeth to Sforzas campe to treat a peace. 387
Nicholao de Æste bringeth the Ladie Bianca to Mantua. ibid.
Nauall Armie determined against the Milanois. 404
Nauall Armie against Pirates. 405
Nicholo Canalis Generall of the nauall Armie. 441
Nauall Armie giueth an assault to Sattalia. 452
Number of the Turkes and the Persians Armies. 471
Number of the Turkes Army before Scutarie. 477
Noblest families of Rome. 501

O

ORiginall of the Huns, and their comming into Italy. 3
On what day the Citie of Venice was builded. 4
Obellerio practiseth treason against Pepin. 23
Otho the second hateth the Venetitians. 53
Otho the second his designe. 54
Otho Duke of Venice vanquisheth the king of Croatia.. 61
Otho the Duke dieth in Greece. 62
Originall of the Plaies, dedicated to them that are married. 43
Otho the Emperors answere to Vitalis. 51
Occasion of the war betwixt Alexis and Beamond. 86
Ordelapho comes againe into Dalmatia. 88
Ordelapho dies, and the Venetians are defeated. ibid.
Otho his discourse to his father Fredericke. 109
Orlando Rossis chosen Generall of the Armie. 188
Of all earthquakes the agitatiõ of the water is most dangerous. 196
On what conditions Arba was deliuered to the Genoueses. 265
On what conditions Tenedos was yeelded. 276
Officers sent by the Sen. to Padua. 288
Occasion of the warre against Philip Duke of Milan. 295
Oration of Cornari to Philip. 297
Oration of the Florentine Ambassador. 299
Oration of Carmagnolla to the Senate. 302
Oration of the Milanois to Philip. 313
One Prince waiteth vpon anothers funerals. 430
Occasion of the Ottomans warre against the Venetians. 431
Order of Ottomans campe against the Persian. 470
Ottoman besiegeth Rhodes. 491
Ottoman takes Ottranto. ibid.
Opinion of those dissuading warre with the Ferrarois: with the contaries answere. 494
Originall and spring of the Po, with her course. 496
Originall of the Rheticke warre. 523

P

PAduan fugitiues dwell at Embragola. 10
Pepin king of Italy. 22
Pepin retires to the firme land. 26
Publike games at Shrouetide. 28
Pollicie of those which carried Saint Marks bodie into the ships. 30
Prophecie accomplished. ibid.
Pola an ancient Citie. 33
Pythagoras and Milo, the two ornaments of the Crotonians. 35
Pope Bennet comes to Venice. ibid.
Pouegia newly inhabited. 36

People sweare to the Prince. 50
Palace, and Saint Markes Church repaired. ibid.
Prince resolues to giue ouer his place. 52
Plague and famine in the Citie. 60
Pepin, Patriarch of Aquileia, disquiets Grada. 61
Pepin obeyes the Popes commaundement. 64
Pope Leo comes to Venice. ibid.
Pope Leo vanquished by the Normans. 65
Pope Nicholas tributarie to the Normans. ibid.
Peter tels his message to the Pope. 70
Pope Vrban comes to the councell at Cleremont. ibid.
Pope Vrban his Oration. ibid.
Peter the hermit ignorant of martiall discipline. 72
Prohibitions to pay no more tribute to the Barbarians. 55
Priuiledges granted to the Venetians by Henry the fourth. 86
Pope Calixtus his resolution for succour of the Holy Land. 89
Phœnicians the inuenters of Arithmeticke, the Alphabet, and Astronomie. 92
Proofe of the Venetians loyalie. 93
Paduans defeated. 97
Plague very great in Venice. 103
Prince Vitalis murthered. 103
Pope Alexander comes to Venice in disguise. 107
Preparations for warre against Fredericke. 108
Ptolomais yeelded. 114
Pisans take Pola. 115
Pisans defeated by the Venetians. ibid.
Peace granted to the Brunduſians. 116
Prince Dandulo deceaseth. 122
Pleasant games inuented at Treuiso. 126
Paduans and Venetians quarrell at the games at Treuiso. ibid.
Paduans make roades on the Venetians. ibid.
Paduans defeated. ibid.
Peace betwixt the Paduans and the Venetians. ibid.
Peter Count of Auxerre choſen Emperour of the East. 127
Pope Gregories entreatie to arme against the Turks. 138
Pietro Tepulo defeated and taken prisoner. 139
Pope Alexanders diligence to make peace betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueſes. 147
Power of the French much decayed in Greece. 148
Paleologus taketh Constantinople. 149
Paleologus readie to leaue Constantinople. ibid.
Popular commotion in Venice. 152
Pope Clement endeuoreth to accord the Venetians and Genoueſes. 153
Peace granted to the Bolognians. 155
Paleologus defeateth them of Nigrepont. ibid.
Patriarch of Aquileia succoureth the Rebels. 156
Patriarch of Aquileia allieth himselfe with Count Gorcian. 158
Patriarches Armie comes to Thryeſte. 159
Pope Nicholas exhorteth the Christian Princes to vndertake the voyage into Syria, with his offer. 160
Popular tumult about the creation of the Duke. ibid.
Pisans vanquished by the Genoueſes. 164
Pera taken and burnt by the Venetians. ibid.
Punishment of the guiltie. 166
Peace with Paleologus. 167
Punishment of conspirators. 169
Pension giuen to the woman that slue Baiamont. ibid.
Polans and Valesians brought vnder the Venetians obedience. 175
Power of those of Escalla. 176
People come from all parts to the Venetian Armie. 178
Pietro Rosis declared Generall of the Venetian Armie. 179
Pietro Rosis his first victorie. 180
Pietro de Rossis arriueth at Venice. 181
Pietro Rossis Oration to his souldiers. 183
Padua reuolteth from those of Escalla. 187
Pope Clement, the Venetians, and other Christian Princes in league against the Turke. 193
Pope Clement permitteth trafficke with Infidels. ibid.
Prince Dandulo causeth all the decrees of the Citie to bee gathered into one forme. 195
Pagano Generall of the Genoa Armie. 200
Petrarch his speech concerning the battaile. 202
Pisani Generall of the Venetian Armie. 203
Pisani ioyneth with the Arragonois. ibid.
Petrarch Ambassadour for the Milanois. 205
Pisani retires to Dalmatia. ibid.
Prodigies appeare before the losse of the Armie. 207
Phalerio his picture razed out of the great Hall. 208
Phalerio is put to death by decree of the Senate. 209
Peace betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueſes with their allies. 210
Peace refused on vniust conditions. 213
Pretence of a murtherer to execute his enterprize. 217
Popes Indulgences against the Candiots. 222
Pisani with the Captaines of the fiue Gallies imprisoned at Venice. 240
Peleſtrina taken by the Genoueſes. 241
Pisani set at libertie by the Senates decree. 246
Pisani his great modestie. ibid.
Prince Contareni his speech to Pisani in open Senate. ibid.
Pisani his answere to the Prince. ibid.
Pisani restored to his former Office. 247

Prisoners sent home vpon their word. 231
Prince Contareni with his Armie in the Hauen of Chioggia. 253
Passage of Brondolli shut vp to the Genoueses. 254
Pisani appeaseth his murmuring Souldiers. 255
Pisani entreth into Brondolli. 259
Paduans defeated. ibid.
Pola taken by the Genoueses. 264
Paduans besiege Treuiso. 265
Pisani dieth, and is honourably buried. 266
Peace betwixt the Venetians and Genoueses. 273
Perfidious treacherie. 282
Paulo Sabello a Romane, Generall of the Venetians. 284
Padua taken, and the Tyrant with three of his children brought to Venice. 288 Prisoners by the Senates commaund strangled. ibid.
Paduans Ambassadors come to Venice. 289
Pius the Florentine makes incursions on the Venetians. 292
Prince Mocenigo constrained to pay forfeiture for infringing the Senates decree. 295
Philip his dissimulation. 296
Philip his answere to Cornari. 298
Prince Foscari his Oration. 394
Peace betweene Philip and the Venetians. 312
Philips complaints to the Popes Nuncio. 313
Philips answer to the Milanois. ibid.
Philip changing his mind, the Milanois waxe cold. 314
Philip reneweth the warre with the Venetians. ibid.
Philips forces driuen forth of Brissels. 315
Philippes speech to the Milanois. 318
Philip comes to the Armie. ibid.
Philips Armie marcheth in battaile against the Venetians. 320
Philip hath recourse to the Emperour Sigismond. 322
Philip marrieth the Duke of Sauoys daughter. ibid.
Peace betwixt the Venetians and Philip. ibid.
Philippe contrarie to his promise makes warre on the Bandetti. 323
Paulo Guenesio Tyrant of Luca. 324
Prince Foscari outraged by a mad man. 325
Picinino commeth to the aide of the Luquois. 326
Philippe promiseth to giue his daughter in marriage to Sforza. 327
Picinino defeateth Barnabo Adorini. 333
Picinino and Stella make an accord together. 338
Pope Eugenius leaueth Rome, and commeth to Florence. ibid.
Picinino defeateth the Armie of the league. 339
Philip solliciteth the Paduans against the Venetians. 340
Picinino his complaints against the Florentines. 341
Prince of Mantua Generall of the Venetian Armie. 342
Picinino defeateth the Venetians at Pontoglio. 343
Prince Foscari and the Senates answere to Sforzas Agent. 344
Picinino encampeth before Casall-Maior. 347
Picinino his designe to famish the Venetian Armie. 349
Picinino besiegeth Rhoades. 351
Philip exhorteth his Captaines to besiege Bresia. 355
Philip enforced to raise his campe from Bresia. 357
Penetra yeelded to the Venetians. ibid.
Pilosus death. ibid.
Philip delayeth and deludeth Sforza. 361
Picinino flouteth Sforza. ibid.
Picinino besiegeth Legnaga 364
Picinino attempteth to burne the Venetians Armie. 372
Picinino put to rout. ibid.
Picinino escapeth in disguised habit. 373
Picinino maketh warre in Flaminia. 379
Politiana is taken by Picinino. 380
Picinino his good fortune beginneth to decline. ibid.
Prouidators aunswere to Sforza. 383
Picininos proiect. 385
Picinino despaireth after the losse of the battaile. 386
Picinino his vnlooked-for arriuall into the countrey of Bresia. 388
Picinino his complaints vpon report of peace. 391
Philip is reduced to greate necessitie. 390
Peace is concluded betwixt Sforza and Philips commissioners. 391
Pope Eugenius and Philips discontents. 398
Pope Eugenius, king Alphonso, and Philip make a league against Sforza. ibid.
Picinino departeth from La Marca. ibid.
Picinino entirely defeated by Sforza, and the death of Picinino. 400
Philippes Ambassadors come to Venice to treat of peace. 402
Pope Eugenius death. ibid.
Princes sonne confined into Candie. ibid.
Plague in Venice. 403
Philips death. 404
People of Milan come forth disbanded against Sforza. 409
Peace betwixt the Venetians & king Alphonso. 415
Pope Nicholas honoureth the Venetian Prince with the Golden sword, the girdle, and ornament for his head. ibid.
Paleologus the Emperour his exhortation towardes his souldiers. 423
Pope Nicholas his recompence to as many as should arme against the Turke. 424
Pope Nicholas his Nuncio commeth to Venice to treat of peace. 425

Pope Pius comes to Ancona to prepare an Armie against the Turkes, and there dieth. 438
Pietro Mocenigo is chosen Generall of the nauall Armie. 446
Peace concluded betwixt Ottoman and the Venetians. 486
Peace betwixt the Florentines & the associates. 490
Persia vanquished by the Turks. 470
Pope Sixtus withdrawes himselfe from the Venetians. 506
Pope Sixtus excommunicateth the Venetians. 507
Part of the Dukes Pallace burnt 511
Peace concluded betwixt the States of Italy and the Venetians. 516
Peace betwixt the Pope and Ferdinand. 521
Prince Barbadico his instructions to his children on his death bed. 522
Peace conlcuded betwixt Sigismond and the Venetians. 528
Philip de Commines Ambassador for Charles the eighth at Venice. 534

Q

QVirini safe conducts the great vessels to the fleete. 464

R

RAuenna taken by the Venetians. 14
Rialto chosen for the Princes ordinarie residence. 27
Reuolt of Cape-darger. 54
Raoul the Norman Captaine becoms a Christian. 65
Raimond, a Germane chosen in the Hermites steede. 72
Raimond flies to the enemie. ibid.
Rebellion of Zara. 87
Rogero sonne to Guiscard king of Sicilie. 98
Robert the Emperour his vnfortunate marriage. 128
Radamanth and Minos Lords of Candie. 130
Rainiero Dandulo his death. 131
Request made to the Venetians for the preseruation of the Greeke Empire. 136
Reason why the Venetians succoured Constantinople. 138
Rogero Morosino Generall of the Venetian armie. 164
Rossis departeth in disguised habite. 180
Rossis first exploit. ibid.
Rossis receiueth the ensignes of Saint Marke. 182
Rossis chalengeth Mastin. 184
Rossis at the gates of Padua. 185
Resolution of a desperate man. 186
Reward propounded against the Rebels. 191
Reddition of Zara. 195
Rethimna taken by the Rebels. 222
Rebels enforced by famine yeelde to the Venetians. 223
Rebels executed. ibid.
Rashnesse of a Rebell. 224
Rainiero Vasco Generall of the Venetian Armie. 227
Retreat and dismission of the Generall. 228
Roberto de la Marca hanged at Venice. 261
Resolution of the Counsellers of the widow of Galeas 283
Rampier builded against the Castle of Bressia. 310
Remonstrances of Vrban of Dertonna to keepe Storza and Picinino from battaile. 339
Rhoades & diuers other Towns yeeld to Picinino. 352
Riua is taken by the Venetians. 383
Rauenna vnder the Venetians. 387
Ragusa in Dalmatia described. 479
Roberto Malateste Generall of the venetian Cauallerie. 489
Rouero yeelded to the Almanes on composition. 524
Reception of the Queene of Cyprus at Venice. 530

S

SVndry opinios of Historians concerning the building of the City. 6
Sophia the Empresse reproacheth Narses. 9
Strange prodigies. 10
Succor sent to the Greeke Emperour against the Sarrazens. 29
Saint Peters Church at Rome taken by the Moores. 34
Spoiles made by the Moores. ibid.
Saba the Moore before Tarentū. ibid
Sarracens before Grada fought withall. 37
Sundrie opinions of the Normans comming into Italy. 66
S. Marks miraculous apparition. 68
Sixtie thousand Turks come to succour Nicea. 73
Soliman Generall of the armie. 75
Strabo his opinion concerning Moses. 82
Sinne the cause of the destruction of Ierusalem. ibid.
S. Cyprians monastery builded. 87
Strange case of a Pigeon. 93
Sodaine fire. 99
Secret league betwixt the Greek Emperour & the king of Sicily. 101
Saladines Armie defeated. 114
Seditiō against the yong Emperor. 119
Sedition of the Constantinopolitanes affirming their Church not subiect to Rome. 127
Sedition in Candie. 131
Sanuto comes to aide the Venetians in Candie. ibid.
Sanuto chiefe of the rebels. 132
Sanuto narrowly followeth the enemie. ibid.
Sanuto his designe. ibid.
Sedition in Candie by ouer-much libertie. 134
Sanuto commeth to the aid of Candie. 135
Since when the forme of electing the Prince hath beene in vse 142
Sacco taken by the Legate and the venetians. 143
Scarcity of victuals in Venice. 153
Situation of Italy. 162
Sundrie opinions touching the battaile at Corfu. 165
Strange death of one of the Generals of the Venetians Armie. ibid.
Strange prodigies hapned that day that the conspiracy should haue bene executed. 169
Sixt rebellion of Zara. 170
Sentence of a great Captaine. 180
Sacceans yeeld to the venetians. 183
Secret practise of Marsilio Carrario with the venetians. 185
Serrauall vnder the venetians. 186

Sundrie

The first Table.

Sundry opinions vpon Earthquakes. 196
Strangers that would come and people the City made Citizens of Venice. 197
Spoiles made by the Candiots. 222
Situation of Tarentum. 236
Sicco taken by the venetians. 237
Souldiers moleſted with hunger and cold. 238
Stratagem to auoide fight. 236
Supplies come to the Genoueſes. 244
Seuenth rebellion of Zara. 194
Sharpe fight in the hauen of Brondolli. 254
Senates anſwere to the garriſon of Serrauall. 270
Seuere iuſtice of a father on his owne ſonne. 278
Sabello endeuoreth to ſtay his amazed ſouldiers. 285
Secret practiſes of Marſilio Carrario. 291
Strife betwixt the Biſhop of Aquileia and the Vdinois. 293
Skirmiſh neare vnto Cremona, where the venetians had the worſt. 316
Sforza comming to aide the Luquois cauſeth the enemy to raiſe his camp 325
Stratagem of Philips Captains. 329
Supplies from Genoa to Chios. 333
Silueſter Moroſino ſent to the aide of Corfu. ibid.
Sigiſmond in the behalfe of Philip commeth into Italy. 335
Sigiſmond crowned Emperour at Rome. ibi.
Sforza ſeizeth on the Marca of Ancona. 338
Sforza his ſucceſſe. ibi.
Sforza and Attendulo ioyne together. ibid.
Spinola author of the Genoueſes rebellion. 341
Sforza recouereth that which Picinino had taken. ibi.
Sforza at the venetians intreaty commeth to Regio. 343
Sundry exploits betwixt Sforza and Picinino. 344
Sforza his demaunds to the Senate and the Florentines, with their anſwer. ibid.
Subtilty of a Centurion. 355
Senates anſwer to Nicolao D'Ælte 358
Sundry opinions concerning the venetians retreit. 364
Sforza goeth forward towards Verona. 369
Senats care for the Breſſans. 371
Sforza exhorteth his ſouldiers. 373
Sforza his great valour. ibid.
Sforza marcheth to the reſcue of Verona. 375
Sforza his ſpeech vnto his Captaines. 376
Sforza puts ſupplies into the Fort of Feliciana. ibid.
Sforza his aduiſe to the Prouidator, and Captaines of the army. 383
Sforza vanquiſheth the enemies. 384
Soncina taken. ibi.
Sforza recouereth Caſal-Maior, and taketh Carauazza. 385
Sforza his great conqueſt. 386
Sforza his anſwere to thoſe that entreated him to goe thither where Bianca lay. 387
Sforza recouereth the bridge of Valeza. 389
Sforza his ſpeech to his ſouldiers. ibi.
Sforza beſiegeth Martinenga. 390
Sforza his Oration in the Senate: with their anſwer to it. 392
Sforza his ſpeech to his future Bride. 392
Sforza his ſentence concerning the ſtrife betwixt the Ambaſſadours. 393
Sforza with his wife commeth to Venice. 394
Sforza ſends his brother to the aid of Renatus. 398
Sforza comes to the field. 404
Sforza taketh diuers townes. 406
Sforza beſiegeth Carauazza. ibid.
Sforza defeateth the venetians. 407
Sforza his reſolution and his ſecret practiſes with the venetians. 408
Sforza marcheth againſt the Milanois. ibid.
Sforza beſiegeth Milan. 409
Sforza his anſwer to the propoſition of peace. 411
Sforza maketh warre againſt Venice and Florence. 412
Sforza his preparations. 414
Sforza his wiſe and diſcreet reſolution. 415
Sforza is proclaimed Duke of Milan. ibid.
Senates decree to get money to furniſh the expence of the warre. 417
Sforza with 20000 men commeth into the Breſſan territory. ibi.
Sforza his troupes defeated. 419
Sforza taketh Caluiſiana. ibi.
Sforza compared to Cæſar. ibi.
Sforza refuſeth fight, and retireth into his winter garriſons. 420
Stephano Porcio his conſpiracie againſt the Pope. ibid.
Stephano Porcio put to death. 421
Sundry incounters betwixt the venetians and Sforza. ibid.
Sforza his exploits in Lõbardie. 424
Saint Andrews head brought to Rome. 432
Senate grieued at the news of the ſiege of Nigrepont. 443
Scanderbeg a famous captaine. 453
Smyrna is taken by the Chriſtians. 465
Senate recompenceth the brother and ſiſter of the yong man that burned the Turkes gallies. 466
Situation of Coric. 468
Seleucia yeelds to the venetians. ibid.
Souranza his propoſition to the conſpirators. 475
Situation of Scutary. 476
Soliman the Eunuch Generall of the Turks army before Scutary. 477
Scutarians prepare for defence. 478
Siege raiſed frõ before Scutary. 480
Soliman beſiegeth Lepanto. 481
Some of the Milanois defeated in an Iland. 500
Sanſeuerino in battell before Ferrara. 504
Sanſeuerino his Apologie to the Senate, with their gratious acception. 508
Situation of Valegia. 511
Sanſeuerino comes to Valegia. 511
Sanſeuerines ſpeed. 512
Sanſeuerino his magnificent entertainment at Venice. 513
Sanſeuerino aids pope Innocẽt 519

Sanſeuerino recouereth Pontenomentana. 520
Sanſeuerino deſpoiled of his forces. 521
Sauorgnane defeats the Almaines. 525
Sanſeuerino his reſolution. ibid.
Siege of Trent reſolued. 526
Senate ſends George Cornari into Cyprus to demaund the Realme of the Queene for the Venetians: her anſwer, his replie, and her conſent vpon it. 529

T

THe true originall of the firſt Venetians. 2
The trouble which the firſt Venetians had to keepe that which they had conquered. ibid.
The true time when the Cittie of Venice was built. 6
The parts of mans life compared with Cities. 8
The Trieſtines defeated. 9
The taking of Rauenna by the Venetians. 14
The troubles round about Grada. ib.
Theodore, the third Maſter or Colonell of the men at armes. ib.
The retreit of Valentine, and all the Venetians to Rialto. 24
The Princes houſhold ſeruants retired into the Pallice capitulate. 36
Three men appointed by the people to enquire of the Princes murder. ib.
Treuiſo taken by the Hunnes. 40
The Dukes ſonne warres on the Venetians. 45
The Duke ſeekes to ſaue himſelfe and his yong ſonne. 47
The Dukes requeſt to the people. ibi.
The bodies throwne vpon the common dunghill. ibi.
The Emperours cruell Edict againſt the Venetians. 54
The peoples reuenge on the Calloprini. ibi.
Three ſonnes of Stephano Calloprini ſlaine. ib.
The ſituation of Pharos. 57
Thoſe of Pharos ſummoned ibi.
The taking of the Caſtle and Towne of Pharos called Leſsina. 58
The Emperour graunts ſundry priuiledges to the Venetians. 59
Tho Emperor Otho comes to Venice in diſguiſe. ibid.
The Dukes laſt will. 60
Too great niceneſſe of a woman. 84
The ſundry paſſages of the Chriſtians into Syria. 72
The ſtrength of Nicea. 73
The Turkiſh ſuccour defeated. 74
The great danger the Chriſtians were in. ibi.
The taking of Iconium. 75
Tharſis being yielded is giuen to Baldwin. ibi.
Treachery of a Citizen of Antioch. 78
The taking of Antioch. ibid.
Tripoly beſieged by the Chriſtians. 79
The defeat of the enemy before Ieruſalem: with the number of the dead 83
Acon taken by Baldwin. 85
The taking of Sydon. 86
The Caſtle of Soball builded by Baldwin. ibi.
The Emperours mediation betweene the Venetians and Paduans. 87
Two great accidents of fire. ibid.
Truce with Hungary for 5. yeres. 88
The Duke of Venice comes to Ieruſalem. 92
The lot fell vpon Tyre. ib.
Tyre beſieged. ibi.
The diſtruſt conceiued againſt the Venetians. 93
The Chriſtians ſtratagem before Tyre ibid.
The third part of Tyre giuen to the Venetians. 94
The building of the Hoſpitall of the publike charitie. 95
The originall of the games at Shrouetide. 101
The anſwer made to the Greeke Ambaſſadours. ibi.
Treachery of Emanuel. 102
The contagious ſickeneſſe in the Venetian armie. 103
Three great pillars brought to Venice. 104
The recompence which the Inginer demaunded. 105
The true cauſe of Vitalis his death. 106
The Emperor Fredericks rigorous Edict againſt the Pope. 107
The Prince imbarketh himſelfe in the Popes preſence. 108
The Emperor arriues at Venice. 109
The Emperors obedience to the Pope. ibid.
The ornaments and enſignes of the venetian Princes. 110
The death of Cyani, and his laſt will. ibi.
The recouerie of Zara. 117
Theodore Laſcaris ſallies foorth on the Chriſtian pilgrims. 118
The mutuall comfort of the father and the ſonne. 119
The treachery of Myrtillus. 120
Thomaſo Moroſino Patriarke of Conſtantinople. 121
The Princes liberality to the new Emperour. ibid.
Thrace reduced to the Emperors obedience. ibi.
Thomaſo confirmed Patriarke by the Pope. 122
The names of the Iſlands poſſeſſed by particular perſons. 125
The Biſhops See at Malomoc tranſlated to Chioggia. 127
The Emperour Peter murdred. ib.
Tepulo Gouernour of Candie. 131
Two Prouidators giuen to euery armie. 135
The Pope excommunicateth the Emperour Fredericke. 139
The riuers Brent and Bacchillion turned backewards. 142
Twelue thouſand Prænestines ſlaine by Sylla in cold blood. 143
The originall of the war betwixt the Venetians and Genoueſes. 146
Their difference referred to the Pope. ibidem
The Popes Sentence. ibidem
The treatie of peace broken. 147
To what extreamitie Baldwin was brought. 149
Treachery of the Greeks againſt the French. ibid.
Tyre beſieged by the venetians. 151
The Genoueſes ambuſh diſcouered. 151

The first Table.

Three Genoueſes gallies taken by the venetians. ibid.
The people beare ſmall reſpect to the Prince. 152
Truce graunted betwixt the venetians and the Genoueſes. 154
Thoſe of Ancona complaine to the venetians. 155
The truce betwixt the venetians and the Genoueſes prolonged. ib.
Thrieſte beſieged by the venetians. 159
The diſtance betwixt Venice and Genoa. 162
The Conſpiratours deſigne. 166
The tenour of the Excommunication. 168
Thoſe of Pera conſtrained to ſue for peace. 173
Turkes put to flight by the venetians. 175
Treachery practiſed by Maſtin. 182
The ſuburbs of Meſtra burnt by Maſtin. 183
The territory of Verona ſpoiled. 186
The King of England craueth aide againſt the French King. 191
Truce takē with Lewis king of Hungary. 197
Thoſe of Cape-hiſtria reuolt. ibi.
Thoſe puniſhed which did not follow the Senates commandement. 198
The Genoa-gallies taken. 199
The armie returneth to Venice with great booty. 200
Truce taken with Viſconte. 207
The manner of Phalerio his conſpiracy. ibi.
The diſcouerer of the conſpiracy recompenced with his diſcontent. 209
The king of Hungary his great armie in Dalmatia. 212
The king of Hungary beſiegeth Treuiſo. ibid.
Treuiſo brauely defended. 213
The king infringeth the peace. 214
Threatnings of the Candiots. 288
The ſituation of Anopolis. 224
Thryeſtines doe reuolt. 225
Thryeſtines reſolue to yield to the Duke of Auſtria. ibi.
Thryeſtines returne to the venetians obedience. 226
Traitours in the Senate knowne and puniſhed. 226
The king of Hungary reſolueth vpon peace. 230
The enemies put to flight before Longina. 231
The Fort of Catharra yielded. 236
The common complaint of the people. 246
The peoples talke in fauour of Piſani. ibi.
The Genoueſes determination fearing to be ſhut vp. 253
The Genoueſes beate backe the Venetians to their gallies. ibid.
The Stellani warre on the Genoueſes. 254
Two and fiftie gallies in the venetians army by ſea. 255
Tumult in the venetian army. 257
Thryeſte reuolteth and yieldeth to the Genoueſes. 263
The Caſtles of Thryeſte razed by the inhabitants. 264
Treachery of two Captaines of the garriſon of Conigliana. 272
The traitors puniſhed. ibid.
Thryeſtines yield to Leopold. 277
The Caſtle of Padua recouered for Nouello. 279
The death of Paulo Sabello. 285
The goodly ſituation of Verona. 286
Two Forts at Verona. ibid.
The poore entertainement which the Paduans gaue Carrario returning without peace. 287
The death of Pipus. 292
The Florentines Ambaſſadour at Venice. 298
The Caſtle of Breſsia yielded to the Venetians. 312
The Dukes of Sauoy and Montferrat make incurſions on the Milanois 319
The chiefe of Florence animated againſt the Venetians. 324
Thoſe of Luca craue aide of the venetians, of Philip, and the Sienois. ibid.
The Prince outraged by a mad-man. 325
Theſſalonica in Macedonia taken by the Turkes. 327
Tollentine leaueth Philips partie. 329
The Prince of Mantua Generall of the venetian armie. 334
The two nauall armies of the venetians and Genoueſes returne home. 335
Treaty of peace almoſt concluded broken off. 341
Thoſe of Caſal deſire parlie. 347
Treachery plotted againſt the venetians. 348
The two armies skirmiſh. 352
The vnlooked for danger whereinto the Common-wealth was like to haue fallen. ibi.
Thoſe of the vally of Sabia ſeeke to ſtop their paſſage. 354
The order which the beſieged Breſſans kept in the Citty. 356
The part of a true Generall of an armie. 373
The valour of Contareni. 382
Three new Procurators of S. Marke created. 396
The king of Arragons daughter commeth to Venice. 397
The thiefe that would haue robbd the treaſury of Venice hanged: and the accuſer recompenced. 410
The king of Boſſina ſendeth Preſents to the venetian Prince. 416
Turkiſh cruelty. 424
Turkes ſucceſſe both in Aſia and Europe. 427
Traitor puniſhed according to his deſerts. 432
Turkes before Naples. 434
Turkes leaue Naples. ibid.
Thryeſte beſieged. 435
Thryeſte and Arimini freed from the ſiege. 436
Turkiſh fleet at Tenedos. 441
Turkiſh fleet before Nigrepont. 442
Treaſon diſcouered. 443
Turkes take Nigrepont. 444
Tabia a city of Caria. 450
Turkes put to rout at Pergamus. 451
Turkes incurſions into Italie. 453
Turkes enter the Country of the Forlani. 454
The Popes Legate his ſpeech to Mocenigo at his departure. 465
The King of Cyprus ſpeech to Mocenigo. 418

Turkes

The Turks deſigne vpon the Boyano. 478
The manner of the Turkes aſſault at Scutarie. ibi.
The Turke retireth from the aſſault. 479
The Turke beſiegeth the Iſle of Lemnos. 281
The great valour of a young maid. ibi
The Turke beſiegeth Croia. 482
The Turkes come to the riuer Lizonza. 483
The Turkes take the Fort neare the bridge. 484
The Turkes burne the Country of Friul. 485
The Turkes great labour and daunger to paſſe the mountaines. 487
The Coritian Prince flies into Germanie. 493
Two Venetian fleets at once. 495
The State of the Roſsians of Parma yeeldeth to Lodowicke. 508
Two of Sanſeuerines ſonnes flie to the enemie. ibid.
The Tower Triſtania taken. 513
The French King by reaſon of ſickeneſſe ſtaieth at Aſt. 537
The King viſites Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan: the Dutcheſſe her lamentation to the king: and his anſwer to her. 538

V

Viſion in a dreame. 10
Venetians great modeſtie. 7
Venetians firſt voiage to ſea. 8
Vderza ruined by the Lombards. 10
Venetians haue euer kept their ancient libertie. 23
Venetians pollicie. 25
Venetians reſolution. ibid.
Venetians compared with the Romans ibid.
Vlric Biſhop of Aquileia vanquiſhed by the Venetians. 28
Vſurper puniſhed. 32
Veronois requeſt againſt thoſe of Bena. 33
Venetian armie defeated before Crotona. 35
Vrſo declared Protoſ-pater of the Gracian Empire. 37
Venetians conſtant reſolution. 41
Venetians ouercome the Hunnes. ibi.
Vderza taken and ruinated by the Duke. 46
Vrſeolo ouercomes the Sarracens before Barri. 50
Venetians braue reſolution. 54
Venetians free ouer all the Gracian Empire. 55
Venetians armie againſt the Narentines. 56
Venetian gallies ſurpriſe the hauen of Pharos. 57
Venetians army ſuccoreth Nicephorus. 66
Venetians victorious ouer the Normans. ibid.
Venetians defeated. 67
Venetians defeate the Piſans at Rhodes. 77
Venetians take Smyrna. ibid.
Venetians comming into Syria. 83
Venetians take Aſcalon. 84
Venetians and Frenchmen ioyned together. ibid.
Venetians agreement with Caloman, King of Hungarie. ibi.
Venetians take Brunduſium. ibid.
Venetians take Faronia by aſſault. 86
Venetians and Paduans reconciled. 87
Venetians reſolue to ſuccour the holie land. 91
Venetians army in Sicilie. 98
Venetians neighbours take armes againſt them. 101
Vlrich Biſhop of Aquileia brought to Venice priſoner. ibid.
Vitalis Duke of Venice murdered. 103
Venetians bountie to the Chriſtian Princes. 116
Venetians and the Princes reſolue to goe to Conſtantinople. 118
Venetians fleete againſt the Pirates. 125
Venetians ſend a Colonie to Candace. ibid.
Venetians armie in Candie. 131
Venetian ſupplies in Candie. 132
Venetians defeated in Candie. 133
Vattaſus his army ſuccoureth the rebells in Candie. 135
Vattaſus army leaues Candy and ſuffers ſhipwracke. ibi.
Vattaſus ſendeth new aide to Candy ibi.
Venetians fight with the enemies. 136
Venetians fleet commeth to the aide of Conſtantinople. ibid.
Venetians ioy at the returne of their Nauy. 137
Vattaſus Nauie put to flight, and his death. ibid.
Venetians take Fredericke s great ſhip. 139
Venetians commanded to leaue Acre. 146
Venetians ſend a fleete to guard the Iſlands. 149
Venetians in Nigrepont. 150
Venetians victory againſt the Genoneſes. 152
Venetian fleete ſcattered by tempeſt. 157
Venetian Ambaſſadors brought back to Rome. ibi.
Venetians take truce with the King of Babilon. 159
Venetians offer for the voyage of Syria. 160
Venetians and Genoueſes compared to the Romans and Carthaginians. 162
Venetians defeated at Corfu. 165
Venetians defeated at the ſtreight of Gallipolis. 166
Venetians maſters of Ferrara. 167
Venetians excommunicated by Pope Clement. 168
Venetians reſtore the Paduans vnto their libertie. 174
Viari confined to perpetuall priſon. 175
Venetians beſiege the Fort of the ſalt-pits. 114
Vpon what cauſe the Venetians made warre on thoſe of Eſcalla. 189
Venetians, Rhodians, and Cypriots defeated by the Turke. 193
Venetians in league with the King of Arragon. 200
Viſconte his anſwer to the Genoueſes. 204
Victory of the Venetians ouer the Genoueſes in Morea. 205

Venetian Senate displeased with Visconi. ibid.
Venetians incensed against Carrario. 213
Venetians enforced to sue for peace. 214
Venetian Ambassadours taken prisoners in Germanie. ibid.
Venetians vanquished by the Barbarians. 228
Venetians build two forts on the lakes. 229
Venetians victorie ouer the Hungarians. ibid.
Venetians General his sonne taken prisoner. 231
Venetians in Constantinople wronged. 232
Victor Pisani Generall of the Venetians. 233
Viscont of Milan giueth his daughter to the King of Cyprus. 234
Venetians take the Hauen of Famagosta. 235
Venetians deceiued by the Anconitans, taken and spoiled by the Genoueses. 239
Venetians enforced to retire into Chioggia 244
Venetians besiege Pera, in hatred of Andronicus. 252
Venetian barkes taken and burnt by the enemies. 253
Venetians and Genoueses lodge at one time in one Hauen. 254
Venetians repulsed from the fort at the Milles. 259
Venetians recouer Chioggia. 262
Venetians nauall Armie of 100. vessels. 265
Venetians recouer Cap-histria. ibid.
Venetians enforced to offer Treuiso to the Duke of Austria. 268
Venetians hated of all their neighbours. 269
Venetians troubled about the yeelding vp of Tenedos. 275
Verona pillaged. 279
Venetians in danger before the comming of Hermolao. 281
Verona possessed by the Carrarians. 282
Vincenzans aduertisment to Galeas his widowe. 283
Venetians entertaine the Vincenzans Commissioners. ibid.
Venetian Garison sent to Vincenza. ibid.
Venetians allie themselues with Gonzaga. ibid.
Venetians nauall Armie defeated. 284
Venetians affrighted at the arriuall of young Carrario. 285
Verona in the Venetians power. 286
Venetians enter Padua in the night by Scalado. 217
Venetians recouer Feltre, Belluna, and other places. 294
Vdinois voluntarily yeeld to the Venetians. ibid.
Venetian Ambassadours sent to Duke Philip. 296
Venetians denounce warre against Philip. 306
Venetians enter Bressia by treachery. 308
Venetians troupes defeated by Philips Armie. 310
Venetians send new supplies to Bressia ibid.
Venetian Commissioners ill dealt with at Milan. 313
Venetians take Casal-maior. 319
Venetians besiege Maeale. 320
Venetians take the new Orges. 321
Venetians answere to the Ambassadors of Sienna. 325
Venetians summons to Philip. 326
Venetians proclaime warre against Philip. 327
Venetians put to rout vpon the Cremonese. 328
Venetians nauall Armie defeated. 330
Venetians defeat the Genoueses Nauie. 332
Venetians defeated by Picinino. 335
Venetians perswasions to the Genoueses. 340
Venetians craue aide of Sforza. 342
Venetians great distresse. 355
Venetians ratifie the league with the Florentines. 363
Venetians victorie neere the lake of Benac. 365
Vnion of the Grecke Church with the Latine. 370
Venetians Nauie defeated on the lake of La Garda. 371
Veronois protestations to cleare themselues. 377
Venetians victory vpon the lake. 382
Venetians take Pescara. 387
Venetians in Sforza's behalfe denounce warre to Philip. 401
Venetians vanquish Philips forces. ibid.
Venetians reuoke all which had beene giuen to Sforza. ibid.
Venetians take Brebia. 403
Vitalis Sarde the Pirate hanged. 405
Venetians Nauall Armie defeated. 406
Venetians suspect Sforza. 410
Venetians Nauall Armie against Alphonso. 411
Venetians resolue on warre against Sforza, and choose Malateste for their Generall. 414
Venetians Ambassadour murthered in Milan. 415
Venetian troopes come to the gates of Milan. 417
Venetians besiege Soncina. ibid.
Venetians great discretion in doing nothing without good aduise. 426
Venetian Army besiege Argers. 432
Venetians make a Val at the Streight. 433
Venetians raise their Campe from before Corinth. ibid.
Vrso Iustiniano is Generall of the Venetians Nauie. 436
Vrso Iustiniano giues two assaults to Mytilene. 437
Vrso Iustiniano dieth with griefe. ibid.
Venetians assault Rhodes. 438
Vittore Capello Generall of the Nauall Armie. 429
Venetians defeated, and Barbadico the Prouidator slaine. ibid.
Venetians take Oenos. 441
Venetian Fleete escapeth from the Turkes. 442
Venetian Fleet entreth the channel of Nigrepont. 443
Venetians enterprize vpon Nigrepont fruitlesse. ibid.

Venetians

The first Table.

Venetians ioyne with King Ferdinands Fleet. 450
Venetians resolution. 452
Venetians install Hercules d' Elt in the Principalitie of Ferrara. 454
Venetians present to the Persian king. 466
Venetian Fleet in Cilicia. 467
Venetians take Sichin. ibid.
Venetians besiege Micra. 469
Venetians care for the relieſe of Scutarie. 477
Venetians prevaile againſt the Turkes. 478
Venetians defeated. 483
Venetians fortifications againſt the enemies incurſions. ibid.
Venetian Captaines reſolution more valliant then diſcreet. 484
Venetians defeated by the Turkes. 485
Venetians aide comes too late into Friuli. ibid.
Variance betwixt the Venetian Generall and the Turkes. ibid.
Venetians beſiege Ficarolles. 498
Venetians put to rout and their enterprise made fruſtrate. 500
Venetians take Ficarolles. 501
Venetians Armie croſſeth the Po. 504
Venetians build a bridge vpon the Po neere to Ferrara. ibid.
Venetians anſwere to the Pope. 507
Venetians come to Stellata. 510
Venetians craue a generall Councell. 513
Venetians beſiege Gallippolis. 514
Venetians take Calce. 515
Venetians put to rout. ibid.
Venetian Gallies aſſailed by Pirates. 518
Venetians loyaltie. 521
Venetians defeated. 525
Venetians in amaze. 527
Venetians ſend a fleet to guard Cyprus. 528

W.

Whereof the Authours meaning is to treat. 1
Who they were that began to flie. 4
What thoſe places were, whereon Venice is at this day built. ibid.
Where the firſt foundations of the Citie were laid. ibid.
What day the Citie of Venice was built. ibid.
What maner of people were receiued into this new Citie. 5
What the true foundation of Venice was. 6
Whence the Venetians that now are, be deſcended. ibid.
What the Venetians exerciſe was in the beginning. 7
Wherein the Venetians aided Narſes. 9
What moued the Venetians to change the gouernment. 11
What forme they obſerued at the firſt Dukes election. 12
What Bonitendius ſaith concerning the aſſociation. 20
Who led the French Armie againſt the Venetians. 22
Why the French did aſſaile the Venetians. 23
Wherefore they are called Perguais. 27
Why S. Markes body was brought from Alexandria. 30
What moued thoſe of Pharos to defend themſelues. 58
What the Normans were, and their originall. 65
Who was the Authour of the warre againſt the Turkes. 69
Wonderfull viſion hapned to Peter the Hermit. ibid.
What Charlemaine did againſt the Infidels. 71
Who gaue the name to Armenia. 75
What Antioch the Chriſtians did beſiege. 76
Why Alexis refuſed Antioch. 79
What account Baldwin made of Beamond. 85
Warre againſt the Paduans with their diſcomfiture. 86
When the Loane began at Venice. 106
Wherefore the Emperour Frederick hated Pope Alexander the third. ibid.
What time the Venetian Prince began to ſeale with lead. 108
What time the Venetian Prince began to marrie the ſea. ibid.
Who was the Authour of the publicke Almes. 112
Who were the chiefe of the enterpriſe againſt the Turkes. 114
What moued the Genoueſes to attempt on Candie. 130
What Eccelin was, with his comming into Italie. 138
Wonderfull crueltie of a Tyrant. ibid.
Wiſdome of the Gouernour of Tyre. 147
William Prince of Achaia ſet at libertie. 149
What was the number of the Bolognians Armie. 154
What miſeries the excommunication brought to the Venetians. 168
Warre concluded againſt thoſe of Eſcalla. 178
Who they were that appeared to the fiſherman. 191
Why the feaſt of the decollation of S. Iohn is celebrated at Venice. 199
What the Thracian Boſporus is. 201
Why the Authour names not thoſe that were guiltie of the conſpiracie. 208
What tribute the King of Hungarie demaunded of the Venetians. 212
Who wonne the honour at the Turnie in Venice. 221
What they ought to doe that are called to publicke Offices. 225
Warre prepared againſt the Carrarians. 226
Warre denounced to the Genoueſes. 233
What Carolo Zeni did after his departure from Venice. 251
What Loretano did after Piſani his death. 267
What harme three Genoa-gallies did the Venetians. 272
What eſtimation Verona is held of. 286
What Philip did in the vale of Sabia. 359
Wonderfull propoſition of a Candiot. 360
What moued Sforza to make a league with the Venetian. 361
Warre renewed in La Marca. 398

William

William of Mountferrat is vanquiſhed by Sacramor Viſcont. 418
Warre againſt the Turkes begun in Morea. 432
What Guidos was in former times. 451
Warre reſolued againſt the Duke of Ferrara. 495

Z.

Zara taken againe, which was reuolted. 63
Zara rebelleth againe, and recouered by the Venetians. 88
Zara reuolted the third time, is recouered. 95
Zara made an Archbiſhopricke. 100
Zara againe reuolted and recouered. 117
Zara the fift time reuolted and recouered. 140
Zara rebelleth the ſixt time. 170
Zara reduced vnder the Venetians obedience. 172
Zara rebelleth the ſeauenth time, inueſted by ſea and land, aſſaulted, and at laſt yeelded. 195
Zeni makes ſpoile vpon the riuer of Genoa. 251

FINIS.

A Table of the principall matters contained in the second Volume.

AGreement betwixt the Pope and the Venetians. Fol. 4
A strong suspition of the Pope concerning the French king. 6
Aduertisements to the Princes of Germanie to cleere the suspition. 7
Aluiana his exploits in Friul. 9
An old mans speech to the Senat. ibid.
Ambuscado to surprize the Count Petillan. 12
All Romagnia yeeldeth to the Pope vpon the fame of the kings Victorie. 17
An enteruiew resolued on betwixt the Emperour and the French king. 20
A Treatie of truce motioned betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians broken. 26
A generall Councell published at Lions. 37
A great earthquake at Venice. 42
A strang miracle in the mine at Bolognia. 49
Andrea Gritti, and Antonio Iustiniano taken prisoners. 53
Articles of the league betwixt the French King, and Venetians. 59
All the Dutchie of Milan in an vprore. 60
Aluiana his earnestnesse to the Senate, that he might fight with the enemies. 72
Aluiana sheweth himselfe at the enemies passage. ibid.
Aluiana encampeth at Olma, determining there to tarrie for the enemie. 73
A Venetian Ambassador sent to Selim. 75
Achmat brother to Selim vanquished and slaine. 76
Achmat sonne to Achmat in armes against Selim. ibid.
A great fire in Venice. 78
A new compromise in the Popes person concerning the strife betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. ibid.
Aluiana taketh Rouigo. 84
A Croizado in Hungarie against the Turkes. 85
Ambassadors from Venice with their request to the king of England.
Aluiana relieueth Vincenza 92
Agreement contracted with the Suisses and broken the same day. 94
Aluiana his enterprize vpon Bressia. 100
Aluianas death. ibid
Ascola and Lona taken by the Venetians. 101
Articles concluded betwixt the Pope and the French king. 103
Assault giuen to Verona. 111
Assailants retire with losse. ibid
Alliance renewed betwixt Solimon and the Venetians. 119
After what manner the Pope would consens to the French kings propositions. 120
A league betwixt the Emperour and the King of England. 137
Ambassadours of the Emperour and the King of England meet at Venice. ibid.
Articles of the alliance made betwixt the Emperour, Francis Sforza, and the Venetians. 139
Accord betwixt the Pope and Emperour. 152
Accord betwixt the Pope and the Venetians. 153
Articles of the agreement. ibid.
Agreement betwixt the Emperour and French king. 154
Armie of the league retireth from Milan. 157
Aquila taken by Rance de Cera. 168
Andrea Doria in the French kings service. 179
Articles of agreement betwixt the Pope and Emperour. 180
A colourable excuse of the king of England to the Venetians request. 184
An accord made with the Duke of Ferrara. 185
Ascoli and diuers other townes yeeld to the confederates. 190
A vaine and ridiculous challenge. 191
A policie of the enemies. 192
An enterprize of the Spaniards against the Gallies of Philippin Doria. 192

The second Table.

A fierce encounter of those of the league and the Imperials. 193
Andrea Doria reuolteth from the kings seruice. 194
Articles of Agreement betwixt the Emperour and Doria. 195
Aquila recouered of the Imperials. 207
Antonio de Leua assaileth the L. S. Paul. 210
Antonio de Leua followeth the Duke of Vrbin in his retreat to Cassan. ibid.
A discourse made in Senate concerning peace with the Emperour. 219
A discourse against the former. 220
Articles of peace betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. 222
Almaines require to haue a Generall Councell. 227
A league betwixt the Pope, Emperor and all the Italian potentates, the Venetians except. 235
A fight at sea betwixt the Venetians and Turkes. 240
A new practise betwixt the Pope and the Venetians. 246
Aiax Bassha perswadeth Soliman to make warre on Italy. 253
A league betwixt the Pope, the Emperour, and the Venetians against the Turke. 265
Andrea Doria chosen General of the Armie for the league by Sea. 274
A Treaty of peace betwixt the Emperour and French king broken off. 276
Ambassadors chosen at Venice to be present at the assembly of Nice. 277
A worthy recompence. 279
Armie of the league returneth to Corfu. 290
All men crie out vpon Doria. 292
Agreement betwixt the Pope and the Duke of Vrbin. 298
Ambassadors answere to the Bassha. 302
An Hungarian Ambassador commeth to Venice. 306
Answere of the Emperor & French king to the Venetian Ambassador. 307
Ambassadors braue answer. 109
A Turkish Ambassador commeth to Venice. 322
Agreement betwixt Stroffi and the Venetians concerning Milan. 323
A new practise to draw the Venetians to the league with the king. 324
A Spanish Frier biginneth the treatie of peace betwixt the Emperour and the French King. 325
A tyrannicall law of the Turkes. 328
Ambassadors frō Venice to Edward 6. king of England. 336
A generall dearth. 342
A discreet answere of the Venetians to the Duke of Ferrara. 345
A great Turkish fleet at sea. 347
All Germanie banded against the Emperour, and his brother Ferdinand. 348
Almans band themselues against the French concerning Metz, Thou, and Verdune. 354
A popular commotion in Rome. 362
A strange accident at Rome. 365
A mischieuous practise of a reuolted Iew. 368
Arcenall of Venice burnt. 370
Answere of the French King and Queen his mother to the Pope. 377
Astor Baillone Generall in Cyprus 385
A fierce assault giuen to foure bulwarks at one time. 390
An assault giuen to the bulwarke Constantia. 391
Articles of peace propounded by the Venetians. 399
Articles of the league. 403
Arriuall of Don Iohn with Spanish forces. 411
Articles of the Capitulation at the taking of Cyprus by the Turks. 416
Aduise of Bernardino de Requesens, for fighting or not fighting with the enemie. 418
An accident likely to haue bred great mischiefe. 420
Ali Bascha his speech of encouragement to his Captaines and souldiers at the instant of battaile. 440
Attempt vpon Castelnouo in vaine. 453
Ambassadors sent from Venice to France and Spayne. 457
A vaine & vnprofitable engin. 466
Articles of peace betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians. 474
Ambassadors speech to Selim. 478
Amurath confirmes peace with the Venetians. 480
Ambassadors sent to the king of Spayne. 484
A decree against superfluous diet. ibid
A Persian Ambassador comes to Venice. 485
A Venetian Gentleman executed to satisfie the Turke. ibid.
A dutchesse is cruelly murthered in Padua. 486
A prodigie. 490
A solemne Ambassade from France to Rome. 491
A decree concerning building of Churches. 494
Articles on which the interdiction was reuoked. 499
After what manner the prisoners were deliuered. ibid.

B

BEntiuoli discouraged, yeeld to the Pope. 5
Bologna yeelded to the Pope. ibid.
Bresia yeeldeth to the king. 16
Bishop of Gurcia cōmeth into France from the Emperour. 37
Bentiuoli with the French are in Bologna. 44
Breach made at Bologna. 49
Bergamo expelleth the French. 52
Bergamo taken and soone lost. 84
Battaile renued betwixt the French and Suisses by breake of day. 97
Bresia besieged by the Venetians, & againe by the French. 101
Bresia yeeldeth on composition. 108
Belgrade taken by the Turkes. 123
Battaile of Bicoca. 136
Bosco and Alexandria are taken by Laurec. 181
Brunswich Duke returneth into Germanie. 192
Brunduſium yeeldeth to the Venetians. 208
Barbaroſſa ſpoileth the Iſlands of the Archipelago. 278
Barbaroſſa cometh into Candy. 280

Barbaroſſa his retreat from Candy. 281
Barbaroſſa his conſideratiõs vpõ the ſundry opinions of the Turkes. 287
Barbaroſſa repenteth his comming forth of the Gulfe of Preueze. 289
Barbaroſſa ſummoneth the Gouernour of Catarra to deliuer the towne vnto him. 300
Barbaroſſa his vaine aſſaults to Catarra. 301
Badoario greatly perplexed. 308
Barbaroſſa his fleet at Marſelles. 320
Barbaroſſa taketh Nice. ibid.
Barbaroſſa his cruell ſpoiles in his returne home. 326
Baily of Venice his remonſtrance to the Baſcha Mahomet. 379
Baſcha Mahomet reniueth the treatie of peace. 398
Badoario contrary to Tepulo. 401
Baſcha Mahomet his propoſition to the Venetian Baylie. 405
Bragadino his exhortation to his ſouldiers. 412
Bragadino comes to Muſtapha his tent. 416
Barbarico his ſpeech perſwading to fight. 419
Baſha Mahomet ſollicitеth the Emperour. 451
Biſhop of Aix Ambaſſador from the French king at Conſtantinople. 473
Breſsia afflicted with the plague. 483
Building of the bridge of Rialto. 489

C

CAſtle of Creſte yeelded to the Venetians. 10
Confederacie of the Pope, Emperour, French King, & king of Arragon againſt the Venetians. 12
Caſal-Maior yeelded. 14
Cadora taken and ſackt by the Imperials. 21
Count Petillã cõmander of Padua. 23
Contention betwixt the Pope and the French king. 37
Cauſe of the Venetians hatred to the Duke of Ferrara. 25
Confederacie anew betwixt the Emperor & the French King. 37
Concordia takẽ by the Popes army. 39
Cardinall of Pauia dealeth badly with the Duke of Vrbine. 45
Cardinall of Pauia ſlaine by the Duke ibid.
Confederacy betwixt the Pope, the king of Arragon and the Venetians. 47
Cardinall of Medicis priſoner at Milan. 56
Cremona taken and ſackt by the Spaniards. 67
Conſtancie of the Venetian Senate. 74
Compromiſe made by the Pope. 75
Citie of Vdina abandoned to the enemies. 79
Countrey of Friul acquit by meanes of the taking of Frangipan. 85
Cardinal of Syens Oration to the Suiſſes. 95
Cardin. makes vſe of falſe rumors. 96
Charles king of Spaine choſen Emperour. 118
Commiſsioners of the Emperour and the Venetians meet at Verona. 120
Conditions of agreement betwxt the Pope and the Emperour. 126
Colonna fortifieth Milan. 130
Cremona yeelded to the enemies. 136
Creatiõ of Pope Adrian the ſixt. 138
Creation of Pope Clement the ſeuenth. 142
Cauſe of the French kings diſcontent with the Emperour. 145
Conditions of peace propounded by the Pope. 146
Children of France in hoſtage for the king their Father. 156
Confederates ſend Commiſsioners to the king of England. ibid.
Capitulation of Cremona. 161
Colonneſſi enter Rome violently. ibi.
Chiefe Articles of the treatie. 163
Confederates prouide to reſiſt the Emperour. ibid.
Confederates conſult about the ſiege of Naples. 167
Confederates Armie ſtill follows the Imperials. 171
Cardinals meet at Bologna to treate of the Popes deliuerie. 177
Cauſe of Andrea Doria his reuolt. 194
Capitulation about the yeelding of Auerſa. 198
Confederates take Pauia. 200
Caſtle of Genoa raſed by the people 201
Citie of Cambray choſen for the treatie. 212
Circumciſion of Solimans children 226
Caſtle of Milan, and the Citie of Coma renared to Duke Sforza. 228
Coron & Patras takẽ by Doria. 223
Cariadin Barbaroſſa his great experience at Sea. 241
Cariadine taketh Thunis. 244
Creation of Pope Paul the thiird. ibid
Cariadine his fleet. 247
Confederacie confirmed betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians. 249
Cauſes of the kings diſcontent with the Duke of Sauoy. 250
Confuſion of the Venetian Army ſeeing the Turks lie neere them. 262
Canalis commanded by Soliman to ſend to the Venetian Senate. ibid.
Candiots preparations for their defence. 280
Capello his anſwer to Doria. 288
Capels ſpeech to Doria to prouoke him to the battaile. 290
Confederates Armie commeth to beſiege Caſtelnouo. 293
Caſtelnouo taken by Barbaroſſa. 300
Cantelmo departeth from Venice without any commiſsion. 304
Cauſe of the warre of Hungary. 312
Controuerſie betwixt the Venetians and Ferdinand put to compromiſe. 319
Cardinall of Ferrara exhorteth the Venetians in the French kings behalfe. 324
Capitulations of the peace betwixt the Emperor & the French king. 325
Commiſsioners decide the controuerſie betwixt Ferdinand and the Venetians. 326
Contention betwixt the Venetians and the Turke. 328
Cardinall Farneſe commeth to Venice. 334
Cardinall S. George ſent Legate into France. 336
Contentiõ concerning the place where the Councell ſhould be kept. 340
Cardinall de Monte choſen Pope & called by the name of Iulius 3. 341
Catherine Zeni ſent Ambaſſador to the Turke. 342

Cauicello, the tenrentie the memorie and execution of the Last will of Cardinall Zem. 356
Creation of Pope Pius the fourth. 363
Cardinall Caraffa, and three of his kinsmen are put to death. 363
Charles the ninth French king. ibid.
Cardinals sent by the Pope to th. Councell. ibid.
Ceremonie of bringing Ambassadors to the great Turke. 368
Counsaile of Mahomet the Vizier Bashe. 371
Chancellor of Persia his answere Concerning the Emperours demaund. 378
Contents of Selims letters to the Venetians. 380
Count Roccas slaine. 391
Citie of Nicosia taken. ibid.
Cyprus yeelded into the Turkes. 392
Coloma escapeth two great dangers in his returne homeards. 397
Coloma his remonstrance to the Venetian Senate. 400
Christians surprize the enemies by ambuscado. 409
Care of those in Famagosta for their fortifications. 412
Corna his speech confirming Barbarico. 419
Catholicke kings resolution before the Ambassadors arriuall. 458
Colonna his aduise. ibid
Colonna his opinion concerning the setting forward towards the enemie. 459
Christians descrie the Turkish fleete. 460
Christians discampe from before Nauarin. 467
Causes moouing the Senate to embrace Peace. 473
Charles of Lorraine, Duke of Mayen in the confederates fleete. 465
Cause why Amurath hated the Emperor. 480
Contention betwixt the Venetians and the knights of Malta. 485
Creation of Pope Sixtus the fift. 486
Creation of Pope Gregorie the fourteenth. 489
Creation and death of Pope Innocent the ninth, and the creation of Clement the seuenth. 490
Cardinall of Florence Legate in France. 492
Creation of Pope Paul the fift. 495
Censures against the Venetians are published. 496
Cardinall Perron conferres with the Pope. 498
Commission is giuen to Cardinall Ioyeuse to reuoke the censures at Venice. ibid.
Cardinall Ioyeuse his reception at Venice. 499

D

Duke of Venice his answere to the French kings Herald. 14
Duke of Ferrara declares himselfe against the Venetians. 17
Duke of Ferrara defeateth the Venetians nauall Armie. 26
Duke of Ferrara takes Loretta. ibid.
Difficulties concerning the agreement betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. 58
Diuers Venetian young Gentlemen sent to Padua and Treuiso. 74
Death of Lewis the twelfth French king. 88
Dissension among the Suisses in Milan after the battaile. 99
Duke of Burbon Vice-Roy in the Dutchie of Milan. 104
Demaunds of the Venetian Commissioners. 120
Duke of Milan cōmeth to Pauia with fiue thousand Lansequentes. 134
Different opinions in the Senate concerning their alliance with the Emperour. 139
Duke of Vrbin Generall to the Venetians. 140
Duke of Burbon forsaketh the French kings partie. ibid.
Duke of Vrbins difficultie to execut. the Senates command. 142
Duke of Albany inuades Naples. 146
Duke of Burbon commeth to Milan. 157
Doria suspected to relieue Genoa. 159
Duke of Vrbin brings supplies to the siege of Verona. 161
Duke of Burbon marcheth into the field in despite of all difficulties. 189
Dominico Veniero put to his triall. 172
Duke of Burbons speed in his march to Rome. ibid.
Duke of Burbon assaults the suburbs of Rome. 173
Death of Duke of Burbon. ibid.
Duke of Vrbin taketh Perusa. 178
Duke of Brunswich commeth into Italy with great forces. 191
Duke of Brunswich ioyned with Antonio de Leua besige Lauda. ibid.
Duke of Vrbin runneth to the defence of his owne state. 208
Duke of Milans great humilitie to the Emperour. 202
Doria his subtile meaning. 233
Duke of Ferrara recouereth Modena and Regio by the Emperours sentence. 234
Dandulo banished at his returne to Venice. 239
Death of Pope Clement the 7. 244
Death of Francis Sforza Duke of Milan. 248
Duke of Sauoy denieth the French king passage. 249
Difficulties to accord the Emperour and the French. 250
Doria his incursions causeth the Turks to suspect the Venetians. 261
Doria his policy to enforce the Venetians to toyne with him. 262
Description of the Isle of Corsu. 264
Doria his answere and departure towards Genoa. 266
Descriptiō of Naples in Romagn. 267
Description of Maluesia. 268
Difficulties alleaged by the Duke of Vrbin. 284
Don Ferrans de Gonzaga cōmeth to Corsu. 285
Doria commeth to Corsu. 286
Doria in fauour to the enemies causeth his Armie to retire. 287
Doria his remonstrance to the whole Armie. 288
Doria his retreat encourageth the Turks. 290
Doria his excuse for shunning the fight with Barbarossa. 294
Doria with his Gallies retireth into Sicill. 294
Death of the Duke of Vrbin. 295
Draguts pollicy to compasse the Venetians Gallies. 298

Doria his propositon to the Proueditor Contaren. 301
Diuers opinions of the Peace betwixt the Emperor and French king 325
Duke of Saxony and Lantgraue of Hesse their suite to the Venetian Senate: with their answer. 333
Death of Francis the first, French king, and Henrie the eight king of England. 336
Death of Pope Paul the third. 341
Duke of Florence taketh the Emperours party. 344
Duke of Ferrara adviseth with the Venetians. 344
Discreete answer of the venetians to the Duke. 345
Death of Edward the sixth King of England. 356
Duke of Florence sendeth forces against the Siennois. ibid.
Duke of Alua taketh diuers townes from the Pope. 359
Duke of Guise commeth into Italie. 360
Death of Pope Paul the fourth. 362
Death of Andre Doria. 363
Death of Pope Pius the fourth. 367
Death of Solyman before Zighet. ibidem
Discord among the Commaunders in Famagosta. 387
Doria returneth home. 394
Diuers places subiect to the Turks doe yeeld to the Venetians. ibid.
Difficulties propounded by the Spaniards. 395
Don Iohn D'Austria Generall of the army. 402
Dulcigna yeeldeth to the Turks vpon composition, which is badly obserued. 408
Diligent care of the Captaines in Famagosta. 413
Don Iohns obiections against Venieri. 421
Don Iohn his Oration to his souldiers. 429
Death of Pius quintus, 453
Death of Sigismond king of Poland. 461
Difficulties arising about the meeting of Don Iohn. 463
Don Iohn goes into Africke. 478
Death of Selim Emperour of the Turkes. 479
Dukes of Ferrara and Neuers come with king Henry to Venice. ibid.
Death of Cosmo de Medicis the first great Duke of Tuscany. 480
Decrees against the Venetians superfluous expences. 484
Deceit of a Greeke. 489
Death of Pope Gregory the 14. ibi.
Diuers Pirats defeated. 494
Death of Pope Clement the 8 494
Duke Donato reuoketh his first declaration. 499

E

ENteruew of the Kings of France and Arragon at Sauona. 6
Enteruew resolued on betwixt the Emperour and the French King. 20
Enterprise vpon Genoa. 33
Earle of Mirandola sent from the Pope to the Lord of Chaumont. 38
Enemies spoile and ruine Vincenza. 71
Emperialls braue resolution. 73
Enteruew betwixt the Pope and the French King at Bolognia. 103
Excuses alleadged by Lautrec that he might discampe. 109
Emperialls besiege Parma. 127
Enemies passe ouer the Riuer Adda without impediment. 128
Enemies come to Milan, and winne the Roman gate and suburb. ibi.
Enemies surprise Lauda. 136
Emperialls take Garlas. 144
Englands curtesie toward the French King. 154
Enterprise of Milan broken. 200
Enteruiew of the French and Venetian army. 209
Enemies beaten by the Duke of Vrbin 211
Expectation of the Enteruew at Bolognia. 219
Entertainment giuen to the Emperor on the Venetian territorie. 224
Effect of Rangone his Oration to the Senate. 259
Expence diuided betwixt those of the League. 274
Enteruew of the emperor and French king at Aigues-Mortes. 278
Enemies escape by fault of the Leaguers. 289
Enemies besiege Milan. 325
Enterprise of Naples being found difficult, is reiected by the French king. 354
Enterprise of Marguerites broken off through the difficulty therof. 383
Enemies incāped before Nicosia. 387
Enemies fierce battery at Nicosia 390
Enemies fleet retireth foorth of the gulph of Venice. 409
Enemies army before Famagosta. 412
Enemies make 5 batteries at one time. ibid.
Enery Captains charge. 413
Enemies repulst from the breach. 414
Estate of the besieged enforceth them to yeeld. 415
Emperours excuses to free himselfe from entring into the league. 449
Extremitie of the Turkish fleet. 466
Enemies retire to Modon. 465
Entertainment giuen to the french K. at Viennam Austria. 479
Election of Pope Leo the tenth, and his sodaine death. 494

F

FLight of the Venetian garrison 10
French King complaineth of the truce. 11
French king dissembleth. ibi.
French take Treni. 14
Frangipane makes war in Histria. 22
French king greatly perplexed. 28
Ferrarois defeate two fleetes of the Venetians. 36
French army marcheth towards Bolognia where the Pope lay. 37
Flight of the Duke of Vrbin. 44
French Kings great desire to bee at peace with the Pope. 46
French after long fight become masters of Bressia. 53
French are victors in the battell of Rauenna. 55
French besiege Nouara in vaine. 63
French campe in feare at the Suisses comming. 64

The second Table.

French Kings answer to the Venetians. 68
Frangipane taketh Maran by treachery. 77
Frangipane entreth Maran with his succours. 78
Frangipane taken by the Venetians. 80
Francis Duke of Angolesme French King. 88
Francis confirmeth the league with the Venetians. 89
Francis his dissimulation. 91
French Kings great preparation. ibi.
French passe into Piedmont by Argentire. 93
Foure armies at one time in Italie. 95
French Kings entry into Milan. 100
French kings complaints against the Pope. 108
French and Spanish kings aspire vnto the empire. 118
French king and the king of England talke together. 124
French and Venetian armies on the Cremonois. 131
French campe before Milan. 133
French take Nouara. 134
French come to Milan. 145
French Agents sent to Venice to treat of an agreement. 153
Fortifications of Genoa. 159
Francis Sforza yeeldeth the Castell of Milan to the Imperials. 160
Francis Sforza ratifieth the league. ibi.
Foscari his exhortation to the Florentines. 165
Florentines answere and resolution. 165
French king sendeth Rance de Cera into Italie. 166
Frossolana besieged by the Vice-roy. ibidem
French and Venetian fleetes scattered by tempest. 182
French Kings Ambassador with the Pope. 186
French kings instance to the Venetians in the Popes behalfe. 202
Florentines send Ambassadors to the Emperour. 212
Florentines great troubles. 222
Ferdinands designes against the Turkes. 231
Francisco Dandulo taken by Pirats 239
Fight at Sea betwixt the Venetians and Turkes. 240
French Kings Ambassador to the venetians about Milan busines. 249
French take Thurin, Fossan, and Pigneroll. 250
French king sendeth Count Guy de Rangon to Venice. 259
French kings designes. 274
French King refuseth to enter into the league. 275
French Ambassadors designe. 299
French kings loue towards the Venetians. 303
Force offered to the lodging of the French ambassador at Venice. 308
French King complaines to the venetian ambassador: with the answer. 309
French king incensed against the emperour. 316
French king at one time raiseth three armies against the Emperor. 317
French king displeased with the Venetians. ibi.
Ferdinand peaceably enioyeth Transiluania. 347
Ferdinand to free himselfe from war with the Turke, offereth to be tributary. 348
Frier George the Cardinall murthered. ibid.
French king as farre as the Rhine in fauour of the Protestant Princes. 350
French king maketh incursions vpon the Dutchie of Luxembourg. 351
French kings demand to the Siennois 355
Francis Daulphin of Viennois marrieth the Queene of Scots. 361
French take Thyonuille. ibid.
First motion of the enterprise of Cyprus for the Turkes. 370
French kings offer to the Venetians. 377
Flight of the enemies gallies. 402
French king forbiddeth his subiects to goe into Flanders. 456
French kings answer to the Venetian Ambassadour. 457
French Kings magnificent reception at Venice. 479
French Kings marriage celebrated at Florence. 492
French King mediates peace betwixt the Pope and the Venetians. 497

G

Great preparations of K. Lewis, and the Venetians, to stop the Emperours passage. 8
Genoa assured for the King. 31
Generall Councell published at Lyons. 37
Gaston of Foix his incursions. 43
Gaston comes to the aid of Bolognia. 49
Gaston relieues the Castle of Bressia. 51
Gaston defeates Meleager of Forli. 52
Gaston besiegeth Ruuenna. 54
Gaston slaine by the Spaniards. 55
Genoa reuolteth from the King. 58
Great harme which the Croizado did in Hungarie. 86
Great dearth in Bressia. 102
Gritti the Prouidator his answere to Lautrec. 109
Great ioy of the Veronois for beeing reduced vnder the Venetians obedience. 113
Great numbers of Suisses in the French campe. 133
Genowais brauely repulsed. 160
George Frondsperg leuieth great numbers of Lansequenets for the Emperour. 163
Genoa reduced vnder the Kings obedience. 182
Great sorrow of the Lord Lautrec. 194
Great discommodity which the reuolt of Doria procured. 195
Genoa by meanes of Doria reuolteth from the King to the Emperor. 198
Genowaies fill the Hauen of Sauona with grauell. 201
Great valour of a woman in mans attire. 211
Great preparations of the Venetians. 212
Great entertainment giuen the emperour

ror on the Venetian territory. 224
Great troubles in Germany concerning the Duke of Wittemberg. 242
Great fleetes prepared at one time in sundry places. 243
Goletta besieged. 247
Genouese forbid Doria to carry the gallies out of Genoa. 257
Great signes why men did suspect the Emperor. 274
Gritti goeth to Constantinople to treate of an agreement. 296
Gouernour of Cethenx dois answere to Barbarossa. 301
Great hope of a long peace. 312
Great preparations for warre on all sides. 319
Gonzaga his excuse concerning the death of Pietro Lodouico. 337
German princes treat with the french King against the Emperour. 347
Germanie wholie banded against the Emperour and his brother Ferdinand. 348
Great terme done by the Inquisition after the maner of Spaine. 366
Generall of the Venetians and Prouidator vse reasons to Doria to perswade his stay. 394
Great impietie against the dead. 418
Generall Foscarin his answer to Colonna. 458
Gills Andrada his opinion. 459
Great charity of a Prelate. 481

H

How the Venetians were daunted at the report of the battells losse. 16
How the French K. ordaines his armie 96
Hugo de Moncada sallieth foorth vpon the confederates. 168
How the Venetians behaued themselues vpon the agreement betwixt the Pope and Emperour. 180
Heretikes begin to stir in Germanie. 218
How Doria's departure did trouble the Venetians. 266
Hungarian ambassador at Venice 306
Henry the second french king. 336
Horatio Farnese marrieth King Henries daughter. 337
Horatio Farnese puts himselfe and familie vnder the French Kings protection. 342
Hostages giuen on both sides of Turks and Christians. 416
Henry Duke of Anion chosen King of Poland. 478
Henry the fourth French king motioneth a marriage with the Princesse of Florence. 492

I

IOhn Paul Baillon yeelds vp Perugia and her territory to the Pope. 5
Iarring betwixt the Commissioners assembled about the truce. 11
Imperialls succour Verona with men and victualls. 25
Iniurie offered to the Popes statue in Bolognia. 45
In what manner the Venetians prouided for their Cities on the firme land. ibidem
John Paul Baillon defeated & broken by Gaston of Foix. 52
Imperiall army by night passeth the riuer Brento. 72
John Iames Triuulce generall of the Venetian army. 101
In what maner the Venetians did relieue the State of Milan. 127
In what order the French did assaile the enemies. 135
Imperialls pursue the French and take Garlas. 144
Iohn de Medicis a great captain 164
Imperiall fleete beaten by the confederates. 166
Imperialls great cruelty in Rome 174
Italie amazed at the Emperours comming. 212
Imperialls demand concerning the accord for Milan. 221
Incursions of the knights of Malta against the Turkes. 226
Iohn Pisani extraordinary Ambassador into France. 229
Islands taken from the Venetians by Barbarossa. 268
Instructions sent by the French king to bee propounded by Cardinall Tournon to the Senat at Venice. 345
Institution of the Venetian Academie 496
Italie iealous of the Spaniards. 493

L

League betwixt Maximilian Emperour and Lewis the French King. 3
Lewis his Ambassadours at Venice. ibi.
Lewis commeth into Italie. 5
Lord of Chaumont Generall of the kings armie. 14
Lord of Chaumont taketh the Pollesin of Rouigo. 29
Legnaga taken. ibi.
Lord of Chaumont takes diuers places which stopped the Emperors comming into Italie. 30
Lord of Chaumont with his forces returneth to the Dutchie of Milan. 31
Libells set vp in diuers places against the Pope. 45
Losse of Bressia troubleth the Venetians. 53
La Palisse forsaketh the field and guardeth the Towne. 57
League betwixt the Pope and the Emperour. 59
League betwixt the French King and the Venetians. ibid.
Lancequenets defeate the Venetian forces. 60
Legnago taken and dismantled by the Venetians. 65
League betwixt the Emperour, the king of Arragon, the Duke of Milan and Suisses. 91
Lautrec besiegeth Bressia. 108
Lautrec master of Bressia forthwith restoreth it to the Venetians. 109
Lancequenets refuse to besiege a citie belonging to the Emperour. 110
Lewis K. of Hungarie prepareth for defence against the Turkes. 119
Lord of Lescut discouers the enterprise of the Bandetti of Milan 125
Lord of Lautrec succors Parma. 127
Lautrec fortifieth Milan. 128
League betwixt the Pope the Emperour, the Venetians, the Milanois, and Florentines. 138

League

League concluded at Coignac. 156
Leuda is taken by the Confederates 157
Lord of Langi comes to Venice. 158
Lancequenets come into Italie. 164
Lautrec entreth the Dutchie of Milan with great forces. 181
Lautrec leaueth Milan and marcheth towards Rome. 183
Lautrec marcheth towards Naples. 187
Lautrec defieth and prouoketh the Imperialls to battell. 189
Lautrec incampeth within two miles of Naples. 190
Lord of Barbezieux commeth to Sauona. 193
Lord Lautrec his nature. 194
Lord Lautrec his sickenes and death. 196
Lord S. Paul leaueth Milan to goe to the reliefe of Genoa. 201
Lord Chastilion commeth to Venice 206
League betwixt the Pope, the Emperour, and Venetians, against the Turke. 265
Lodouico Badoario chosen Ambassadour by the Senate to goe to Solyman. 306
Losse of the battell of Saint Laurence, and the taking of S. Quintines by the Spaniards. 360
Long delaies vsed to the conclusion of the league. 395
Lodouico Mattinenga sends supplies to Famagosta. 396

M

MAximilian the Emperors Ambassadours at Venice in the Popes behalfe. 3
Maximilian the Emperours request to the Venetians. 4
Maximilian Emperour frustrate of his hopes. 7
Maximilian Emperor sommons the Veronois to giue him passage. 8
Maximilian Emperour reiterath his Ambassade to the Venetians. 9
Maximilians Armie dissolued for a small occasion. 10
Maximilian emperour breaketh the enterview betwixt himselfe and the French King. 20
Maximilian the emperour propounded to assault Venice. 21
Marquesse of Mantua taken prisoner and brought to Venice. ibi.
Maximilian besiegeth Padua. 22
Maximilian returnes into Germanie 24
Maximilian and the French King displeased with the Pope for absoluing the Venetians. 27
Monselice with her Castle taken and ruined. 31
Marques of Mantua set at liberty 33
Mirandola yeelded vpon satetie of liues and goods. 39
Maximilian the Emperour inclineth to peace. 42
Maximilian Sforza in possession of the Dutchy of Milan. 59
Motion of agreement betwixt the French king and the Venetians. ibid.
Maximilian Sforza retireth to Nouara. 62
Milan reduced to the French gouernment. ibi.
Meanes which the Senate vsed to get money. 81
Marke Antonio Colonna gardeth Verona. 95
Milan yeeldes to the French king. 99
Manfron and de Bue defeated by the Imperialls. 105
Marquesse of Brandenburg commeth to the Emperors armie. 108
Mamalukes vãquished by Selim. 116
Maximil. the Emperours death. 117
Milan sackt ten daies together. 129
Marques of Pescara causeth the Imperialls to tarry in Lombardy. 147
Marques of Pescara his audacious demand to duke Francis Sforza. 153
Malateste Baillon before Cremona for the league. 161
Marquesse of Salusses passeth the Po. 164
Marcello dieth for griefe. 113
Marquesse of Mantua ioyned to the league. 185
Monopli and Troni yielded vnto the Venetians. 190
Marquesse of Salusses Generall of the army after Lautrec his death. 198
Marquesse with his army retireth to Auersa. ibid.
Martrica taken by the Imperials. 207
Monopli besieged by the Marques of Guasto. ibid.
Marques retires from Monopli. 208
Marquisate of Mantua erected into a Duchy. 224
Meanes which the French Ambassadours propounded to Solyman against Charles the fift. 253
Moro his Oration to the Gentlemen of Candie. 279
Most part of Barbarossaes fleet cast away by tempest. 294
Marquesse of Guasto his speach to the Senate. 304
Mocenigo the Generall his Oration to the people of Naples. 309
Naran taken frõ Ferdinand. 317
Metz is taken by the French. 330
Maximilian Emperour in his furthers sted. 365
Mustapha Generall of the enterprise of Cyprus. 384
Mustapha by gifts seeketh to win the Cypriots. 385
Mustapha maintaineth the contrary opinion to Piali, & is followed. 386
Mustapha his great credit among his souldiers. 387
Marquesse Rangon Palauicin his excuse. 396
Mustapha his fained courtesie. 416
Mustapha his perfidious cruelty. 417
More than barbarous crueltie. ibid.
Mehemet Bey his speech dissuading from fight. 431
Memorable battell of Lepanto. 440
Mother-Queene of France writes to the Pope. 457
Motion of peace at Constantinople with the Venetian Baily. 470
Murtherers put to death. 487

N

NVmber of the French Kings armie against the Venetians and the Venetians against him. 15

New agreement betweene the Pope and the French King. 21
New confederacie betwixt the Emperour and the French King. 37
Number of the enemies before Padua 70
New compromise in the Popes person for the strife betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians. 78
Number of the Venetian Armie conducted by Aluiana. 94
Number of Suisses in Milan. 95
New succours enter into Bressia vnknowne to Aluiana. 100
Nouara taken by the French. 134
Nouara and Vigena yeelded to the French. 140
Number of the Armie of the League 157
Nauarre his couragious proposition. 165
Number of the dead and prisoners in a fight at sea. 193
Nouara and diuers other townes yeeld to the Confederates. 200
Number of the Emperours forces in Italie. 212
Number of the Turkish Armie. 232
New practise betwixt the Pope and Venetians. 246
Number of the Venetian forces at sea. 258
Number of souldiers and munition in the Island of Corsou. 264
Nadin yeelded to the Turkes. 282
Naples and Malnesia consigned to the Turkes. 310
Number of the Emperours Armie in Germanie against the Protestants. 332
Number of the Protestants Armie. 338
Number of the Christian Fleet. 393
Number of souldiers in Famagosta. 403
Number of the Turkish Fleete. 404
Number of seruiceable men in Famagosta. 412
Number of the Christian and Turkish Fleet at Lepanto. 460
Number of the Confederates Fleet. 464

O.

OF what importance the taking of Padua was. 69
Oration of the Hungarian Ambasdour. 121
Oration of the Popes Nuntio in the Senate. 86
Order of the French Armie in battel. 96
Oration of Triuulcio in defence of his opinion. 40
Offer of the Pope and Venetians to the French King. 159
Octauio Farnese marrieth the Emperours base daughter. 277
Oration of Selun the French Kings Ambassadour to the Venetian Senate. 353
Octauio Farnese restored to his Dutchie. 360
Offers of D. Iohn to the Venetians. 411
Ostages giuen betwixt the Turkes and Christians. 416
Order and forme of the Christian battell. 422
Order of the Turkish fleet. 432
Order of the Confederates fleet. 464

P.

POpe Iulius his answere to the Venetians offers. 4
Pope Iulius his request to the French King. ibid.
Pope Iulius threatneth the Bentiuoles. 5
Pope Iulius refuseth the Emperours request. 8
Pope Iulius his secret menaces to the Venetians. 12
Pope Iulius ratifieth the Treatie of Cambray. 13
Pope Iulius his terrible monitorie against the Venetians. 14
Pope Iulius moued with pitie, takes compassion on the Venetians. 18
Pope Iulius his answere to those who hindred the Venetians absolution. 24
Pope Iulius absolueth the Venetians. 27
Pope Iulius his meaning to the French King. ibid.
Pope Iulius in hatred to the French King assaileth the Duke of Ferrara. 28
Pope Iulius his secret practises. 31
Pope Iulius his Armie taketh Modena. 32
Pope Iulius his preparations against the Citie of Ferrara. 36
Pope Iulius excommunicateth Alforso d' Est and his adherents. 37
Pope Iulius his entertainment giuen to the Bishop of Gurcia. 43
Pope Iulius breakes off the Treatie betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. ibid.
Pope Iulius his answere to the Bolognois 44
Pope Iulius his perplexitie. 56
Pope Leo the tenth elected. 59
Pope Leo reuiueth the agreement betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. 67
Pope Leo his reprochfull speeches of the Venetians. 68
Pope Leo sends succours to the Emperour against the Venetians. ibid.
Prouisions made by the Venetians. 69
Padua furnished of all things necessarie to sustaine a siege. 70
Prouidator Loretano slaine. 74
Pope Leo resolueth on peace. 76
Pope Leo his arbitratiue sentence. 80
Prince Lauredano his answere to the Popes Nuncio. 87
Pope Leo his determination against the Venetians. 90
Pope Leo his publication against the Venetians. 91
Passages of Suza and other places guarded by the Suisses. 92
Prospero Colonna taken prisoner by the Lord Palisse. 93
Pescara taken by the Venetians. 101
Pedro of Nauarre his mine blowne vp. 102
Pope Leo motioneth a peace. ibid
Pope Leo yeeldeth Parma and Placentia to the French King. 103
Pope Leo his practises to breake the siege. 105

Pope

The second Table.

Pope Leo ſenaeth the Cardinall Bibiena Legate to the Emperonr. 106

Pope Leo exhorteth Chriſtian Princes to take Armes againſt the Turke. 117

Pope Leo and the Emperour make ſeeret alliance againſt the French King. 125

Pope Leo ſuſpecteth the Imperials. 127

Pope Leo his ſodaine death. 130

Pauia beſieged by Lautrec. 134

Pollicie of Lautrec. 135

Pope Adrian the ſixt his creation. 138

Pope Adrian zealous of an vniuerſall peace. ibid.

Pope Adrian his death. 142

Pope Clement the ſeauenth created. ibid.

Pope Clement his remonſtrance to the Venetians. 145

Pauia beſieged by the French King. 146

Pope Clement a Mediator betwixt the Emperour and the French king ibid.

Pope Clement proteſteth againſt them both, if they agree not. 147

Pope Clement and the Venetians feare leaſt the French King ſhould come to battell. 148

Pope Clement his reſolution after the defeat of the French. 149

Pope Clement and the Venetians anſwere to Don Hugo for the Emperour. 156

Pedro of Nauarre Generall of the Nauall Armie. 158

Pope Clement his agreement with the Colonneſi. 162

Pope Clement maketh meanes to the Vice-roy for an agreement. 166

Pope Clement his errour in diſarming himſelfe. 169

Pope Clement acknowledgeth his errour, and imploreth the aide of the Confederates. 171

Pope Clement with diuers Cardinals retireth to the Caſtle of S. Angelo. 173

Pauia taken by Lautrec. 182

Pope Clement complaineth of the Imperials dealings. 185

Pope Clement his excuſes to ſhun a new Confederacie. 186

Pope Clement his anſwere to the King, concerning Doria his entertainment. 195

Propoſition of the Count S. Paul. 199

Pope Clement his intention. 204

Prince of Orange determineth to goe to Peruſa. 208

Prince of Orange changeth his minde 209

Part of the enemies defeated by the Duke of Vrbin. 211

Publication of the Treatie of Cambray. 215

Pope Clement and the Emperour come to Bolognia. 221

Pope Clement his excuſes concerning the conuocation of a Councell. 227

Pope Clement acquainteth the Venetians with all his deſignes. 242

Philippo Mazzo a knight of Malta looſes his head for his many robberies. 244

Pope Paul the third taketh Armes for the Dutchie of Camerina. 245

Propoſitions in the Senate for the anſwering of Count Rangon. 259

Pople Paul his anſwere to the Venetian Ambaſſadour. 265

Pope Paul ſendeth to the Emperour and the French King to reconcile them. 274

Pope Paul reſolueth to goe to Nice, to attone the Emperour and the King. 276

Pope Paul denied entrance into Nice. 277

Propoſition of the Captaines in Dalmatia. 283

Patriarke Grimani his enterpriſe vpon the Caſtle of Preueze. 285

Petro Zeni choſen Ambaſſadour to goe to Soliman. 299

Pope Paul ſendeth the Cardinall Farneſe Legat into France. 306

Peace concluded with the Turkes according to their owne minds. 308

Peace confirmed betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians. 315

Polin ſoliciteth the Venetians to make a league with the French king. 316

Polin his practiſes againſt the Venetians. 317

Pope Paul goeth about to make alliance with the Venetians. 319

Pope Paul and the Emperours enteruiew at Buſſet to no pupoſe. 321

Pope Paule giueth Parma and Placentia to his ſonne Pietro Lodouico. 329

Proteſtants ſuite to the Venetians. 333

Pope Paul his diſcourſe to driue the Venetians from their ſuſpition. 334

Proteſtants take Chiuſa. ibid.

Pope Paul his complaints againſt the Emperour. 335

Piero Stroſſi ſent for from France to trouble the peace of Italie. 337

Pope and French King ſollicite the Venetians againſt the Emperour ibid.

Pope Paul to ſatiſſie the Almaines ſendeth a Legate into Germanie. 339

Paule the third his death. 341

Parma is kept by Camillo Vrſino. ibid.

Preſages of great warres. 342

Pope Iulius the third, not thinking thereon, cauſeth great warres in Italie. 343

Propoſition of agreement about Parma. ibid.

Pope Iulius ſeeketh meanes of agreement with the French King. ibid.

Pope Iulius, by his Legat goeth about to attone the Emperour and the French King. 347

Prince of Salerne commeth into France. 351

Prince of Salerne his propoſition to the Venetian Senate. ibid.

Pace of Chiuſa taken by the Proteſtants. 325

Peace betwixt the Emperour & Germane Princes. ibid

Prince of Salerne returneth to Venice from the French King. ibid.

Pope Paul the fourth enemie to the Spaniards. 359

Peace betwixt the Pope and the Spaniards. 360

Peace concluded betwixt the French and Spanish Kings. 361
Pirates pursued by Bembo, saue thēselues in Durazzo. 362
Pope Paul dieth. ibid.
Pope Pius the fourth created. 363
Pope Pius endeth the controuersie betwixt the Ambassadours of France and Spaine. 364
Pope Pius sendeth to the Catholike king to ioyne in the warre against the Turkes. 376
Pope Pius solliciteth the French King to haue an hand in this warre. 377
Pope Pius his proposition to auoid delay. 382
Pope Pius armeth twentie Gallies whereof Colonna is made Generall. 383
Piali of opinion to besiege Famagosta first. 386
Praiers and processions in Nicosia. 388
Pope Pius his exhortation for conclusion of the league. 395
Pope Pius and the Spaniards seeke to the Venetians to conclude the league. 400
Prince Mocenigo his remonstrance to the great Councell. 403
Pope Pius the fift solliciteth the king of Poland. 450
Priuce Mocenigo his Oration to the Councell of Ten. 471
Peace propounded in the Councell of Ten. ibid.
Peace concluded betwixt the Turkes and Venetians. 474
Prince and Senates Vow to God. 481
Price set vpon all wares. 482
Pope Alexander the third sends a golden Rose to the Venetian Prince. ibid.
Pope Sixtus death: with the creation of Pope Vrban the seauenth. 489
Pope Clement the seauenth blesseth and absolueth the French King. 491
Peace betwixt the French King and the Duke of Sauoy. 493
Pope Paul the fift complaineth to the Venetian Ambassadour. 495
Pope Paul his resolution vpon the Venetians refusall. ibid.
Pope Paul grants a Commission to the Cardinall Ioyeuse. 498

R.

RAuenna taken and spoiled by the French. 55
Resolution of the Suisses. 63
Rance de Cera his braue exploites. 79
Rance de Cera putteth Siluio Sauello to rout. 84
Rance de Cera leaueth the Venetian partie. 95
Rhodes taken by Soliman. 137
Resolution of the assembly held at Venice by the Confederates. 205
Resolution of the Venetian Councell vpon the Kings comming into Italie. 206
Report of the Lancequenets comming causeth the Venetian Armie to retire. 212
Retreat of Soliman, and of Charles the Emperour. 232
Retreat of the Turkish Armie. 233
Rangon is answered according to the opinion of Cornari. 260
Reasons of those who desired peace with Soliman. 274
Reasons of those who were desirous to warre on him. 275
Resolution of the inhabitants of Naples and Maluesia. 281
Resolution of the Turkes in Dalmatia 283
Resolution to giue battell, reioyceth the whole Armie. 288
Rimon and Fregosa sent Ambassadours to Soliman, murthered in their returne. 313
Reasons that moued the Venetians to keepe themselues Neuters. 314
Reasons propounded to the Pope to moue him to relieue the Venetians. 375
Rumors diuulged by the Spaniards. 451
Reasons alleadged by the Protestants to moue the French King to warre. 456

S.

SEnates answere to the Emperours Ambassadours. 3
Strange suspition of the Pope concerning the French King. 6
Six thousand Suisses come to Varesa against the French King. 32
Speech of agrement betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. 43
Sundry thoughts of the Bolognois. 44
Suisses desie Gaston of Foix. 47
Suisses come into the Dutchie of Milan. ibid.
Suisses returne home againe. 48
Strange miracle in a mine. 49
Suisses hatred to the French King. 57
Suisses discontented, make warre on the French. 62
Suisses great boldnesse, and their victorie at Nouara. 64
Selim marcheth into Asia with an Armie prepared for Europe. 76
Strasoda and Montfalcon taken by Frangipan. 78
Senate recompenceth Sauorgnane. 80
Selims victorie against Ismael. 85
Soliman entreth Hungarie. ibid.
Suisses determination in the streights of the mountaines. 92
Suisses retire to Nouara. 93
Suisses retire with soft pace to Milan. 97
Siege of Bressia resolued on. 100
Senates recompence to the widowe and children of Aluiana. 101
Suisses nature. 106
Senate disburdeneth the Commonwealth in time of peace. 115
Selims victories. 116
Selim takes Cairo. ibid.
Selim granteth the Venetians demands. ibid
Soliman resolueth to inuade Hungarie. 121
Suisses leaue the French Campe for want of pay. 128
Sforza arriueth at Milan. 134
Suisses boldnesse in assailing their enemies. 136
Sundry opinions on the publication of the League. 147
Senates answere to the Imperials. ibid.
Sorrow of all France for the kings captiuitie:

captiuitie: and the Councels resolution. 152
Senates answere to the French Commissioner. ibid.
Senates answere to the Lord of Langi 159
Senate after the taking of Rome, determine to oppose against the Emperour. 176
Sundry opinions about the Popes deliuerie. ibid.
Strife betwixt the Confederates concerning the taking of Alexandria. 181
Solimans liberalitie to the Venetians. 183
Senates answere to the Pope. 188
Sundry opinions of the Imperials Captaines. ibid.
Sixe Cities appointed to the Venetians by the agrement of the League. 190
Secret practises betwixt the King and the Venetians. 203
Senates suspition concerning the kings comming. 207
Soliman taketh Buda. 218
Sundry opinions in the Senate concerning the motion of peace with the Emperour. 219
Soliman restoreth Iohn king of Hungarie to his Kingdome. 223
Soliman suspecteth the Venetians. 225
Solimans purpose to enrich Constantinople. 226
Solimans designe against the Christians. 229
Soliman with his Armie commeth into Hungarie. 232
Sundry opinions in the Senate concerning Canalis cause. 240
Senate acknowledge Canalis seruice by recompencing his sonne. 241
Solimans great preparations for warre. 242
Senates holy resolution. 243
Senate sendeth eight Ambassadors to the Pope. 245
Soliman aduertiseth the Venetians of what hee had done in Persia. 247
Soliman consenteth to make warre on the Emperour. 253
Soliman aduertiseth the Venetians of his determination. ibid.
Sundry reports concerning the Turkish Armie. 256
Senates care for mesnes to discharge the expence of warre. 257
Solimans discontent for two accidents. 260
Soliman resolueth to warre on the Venetians. 262
Senate determineth to fight with the enemie. 264
Soliman dislodgeth from Corfou. 267
Soliman determineth to assaile Naples in Romagnia. ibid.
Scardona taken by the Venetians. 269
Soliman seemeth to desire peace with the Venetians. ibid.
Senate determines warre against Soliman. 274
Senate vseth meanes to get money to defray the expences of the warres. 276
Succours sent to Antiuari. 283
Sibensans braue resolution. ibid.
Sundry opinions of the Turkish Armie. 286
Sundry opinions in the Confederates Councell. 293
Spaniards insolencie. 294
Senate resolueth on peace with the Turke. 295
Senates answere to the Emperours Ambassadour. 296
Spaniards not being able to keepe Castel-nouo, offer it to the Venetians. 300
Senates answere to the Ambassadors of the Emperour and French king. 305
Sorrow and griefe of those of Naples and Maluesia when they vnderstood the conditions of peace. 309
Soliman incensed against Ferdinand determineth to make warre in Austria. 312
Senate refuseth to haue the Councell held at Vincenza. 314
Senate refuseth to make any new alliance. 315
Senates answere to Polin. 316
Senates answere to the French ambassadors and their answere to Ferdinand. 318
Sharpe warre about Morea. 322
Senates answere to the Cardinall of Ferrara. 324
Soliman falsly informed of the Venetians. 327
Senates answere to the Protestants. 333
Siennois rise against the Spaniards. 336
Solimans armie against the Persians 339
Soliman makes truce with Christian Princes. ibid.
Strife betwixt the Emperour and French King. ibid.
Soliman sendeth imperious letters to the Emperour. 340
Senate sendeth Ambassadors to the Pope. 341
Strossi his pollicie to victuall Parma. 344
Senates answere to the Cardinall of Tournon. 345
Senates answere to the Prince of Salerne. 352
Spaniards demaunds vpon the Treatie of Peace with the Pope. 360
Senate of Milans answere to the king of Spaine concerning the Inquisition. 369
Selim resolueth to inuade the Isle of Cyprus. 371
Senate aduertised of the Turkes enterprise. 373
Supplies sent to Cyprus. 375
Selim sendeth a defiance to Venice vnlesse they would surrender Cyprus. 379
Senates answere to the Chiaus. ibid
Senates answere to Selims letters. 380
Selim discontented for the small respect giuen his Chiaus. 381
Situation of the Citie of Nicosia. 387
Sundry opinions of the Captaines of the Christian Fleet. 393
Spaniards idle excuses. 395
Sebastiano Venieri made Generall in Zanne his sted. 397
Senates answere to Colonna. 400
Snpplies sent to Famagosta. 402

Small

Small hope in the reuolt of the Turks subiects. 449
Spaniards feare least the Venetians make Peace with the Turke. 452
Souranza honourably entertained by D. Iohn at Messina. 454
Spaniards iealous of the French mens actions. 456
Senates resolution perceiuing the Spanish delaies. 458
Situation of the Castle of Nauarin. 466
Spaniards desirous to returne into the West. 468
Spaniards conference with the Venetian Ambassador. 471
Senates resolution to peace. 473
Sundrie opinions concerning the Venetians peace. 476
Sundrie prodigies seene in the ayre. 483
Senates decree against the Cleargie. 494
Senates answere to the Pope. 496

T

THe king of Arragon commeth into the Realme of Naples. 5
The false reports which the Pope threw abroad against the French king. 6
The Senates answer to the Emperors Ambassadors. 9
Truce betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. 11
The Pope ratifieth the Treatie of Cambray. 13
The Duke of Venice his answere to the French kings herald. 14
The kings resolution to enforce the enemies to fight. 15
The great progression of the French Armie. 27
Treuiso continueth obedient to the Venetians. 18
The Venetian Ambassadors come by night into Rome. 22
Treatie of Truce betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians broken. 26
The kings anger against the Suisses. 28
Those of Mirandola yeeld vpon safetie of their liues and goods. 39
Triuulcio his Oration in defence of his opinion. 40
The king sendeth the Bishop of Paris to Mantua. 42
Triuulcio taketh Concordia. 43
Triuulcio draweth neere to Bologna. 44
The kings forces in the Dutchie of Milan. 47
The Pope will by no means haue peace with the French. 56
Triuulcio of opinion to abandon the Dutchie of Milan. 57
The Treatie betwixt the Emperour and Venetians handled. 58
The king prepareth for his returne into Italy. 60
The whole Dutchie of Milan yeeldeth to Sforza. 64
The French kings submission to the Pope. 68
The incursions of Rance de Cera Gouernour of Crema. 69
The tenour of the Senates letters to Aluiana. 74
Troubles in Asia. 75
The Emperour Maximilian prouoketh Selim against the Venetians. 76
Traitor punished. 77
To what intent the Spaniard spake to the Venetians of peace. 88
Those of Bresia make a sally on the Venetians campe. 101
The retreat of the Venetians Armie. ibid.
Triuulcio leaueth his charge. 104
The Emperours comming into Italie. 105
The whole countrey betwixt Oglio, Po, and Adda, yeelds to the Emperour. 107
Truce renewed betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. 117
The King of England chosen Vmpier betwixt mightie Princes. 124
Traitours in Milan giue aduertisement to Prospero Colonna. 128
Triuulcio taken prisoner by the Imperials. 129
The protestation of the Emperor, and King of Englands Ambassadors in Senate. 139
The French King will by no meanes discampe from Padua. 148
The French King is taken by the Imperials; and the Armie defeated. ibid.
The Emperours speech and gesture vpon newes of the victorie. 149
The King of Englands courtesie towards the French king. 154
The King of Englandes aunswere to the Commissioners of the league. 156
The two Armies of the Pope, and the Venetians march together to Milan. 157
The offer of the Pope and the Venetians to the King. 159
The King of England offereth the Pope a great summe of money. 163
The Emperours preparations by sea and land. ibid.
The two Armies of the league, and Imperialles at once in Tuscanie. 171
The king of Fraunce and England resolue to free the Pope. 176
The Emperours dissimulation concerning the Popes taking. 177
The French kings great preparations to send into Italy. 179
The Turke being assailed by Marcello, hath speedie reuenge. 183
The Emperour commaundeth the Pope to be enlarged. 115
The French kings answere to the Venetians Ambassador, and his determination. 206
Treason discouered in Barletta 207
The two Armies of the French, and Venetians distrust one another. 209
Triuulcio his request from the king to the Venetians. 213
The Emperours arriuall at Genoa. 212
The Kings request to the Venetians. 215

The second Table.

The king entreateth the Emperour to make an accord with the Venetians. 216
The Emperour is desirous of an accord with the Venetians. 218
The Emperour is crowned at Bologna. 224
The Emperours gift to the Venetian Ambassadors brought into the publike treasurie. ibid.
The Turkes complaints against the Venetians. 226
The Emperour granteth an Interim concerning the difference in Religion. 228
The king of Hungarie seeketh peace of the Emperour and Ferdinand. 230
The Emperour with a mightie Armie encampeth before Vienna. 232
The Emperours and Solimans naual Armie. 233
The Emperour returneth into Italie. 235
The Turkes recouer Coron. 243
The Turkish fleet scoureth the Seacoast of Calabria. 244
The Emperour seeketh to the Venetians. 245
The Emperour for the Venetians sake doth maintaine the Duke of Vrbins cause. 246
The Emperours preparations for Africke. ibid.
The Emperours great Armie for his voiage into Affricke. 247
The taking of Thunis and Bonna. 248
The Emperours captious answere to the Venetians concerning the State of Milan. ibid.
The Emperour challengeth the French King to single fight. 250
The Emperour enforced to retire forth of Prouence. 251
The three chiefe pointes which the Pope handled with the Christian Princes. 252
The French king sendeth an Ambassador to Venice to draw them from the Emperour. ibid.
The king purposeth to vse the Turke against the Emperour. 253
The king commeth to Lyons to go into Italy. 257
Three sundrie accidents that caused warre betwixt Soliman and the Venetians. 260
The Turks of Obrouazzo retire to the Castle. 269
Treatie of peace betwixt the French king and the Emperour broken off. 276
The Emperour declareth that hee could not take Armes for the league. ibid.
The Emperour and French King refuse to see one another at Nice in the Popes presence. 277
The Turkish feastes of Baieran. 278
The Turks wast Dalmatia. 281
The Turkes take the Castle of Laurana. 282
The Turks leaue Dalmatia, and goe into Hungarie. 283
The Turkes arriuall makes the Venetians quit Obrauazza. 284
The Turks wonder at the Christians boldnesse. 286
The Turkish Gallies put to rout by the Armie of the league. 287
The Turkes come forth of the Gulph and put themselues in battaile. 288
The Turkes purpose broken by Doria. 289
The Turkish Armie retireth into the Gulph of Larra. 292
The Emperours excuses for not performing his promise. 295
The Turkes great preparations for recouerie of Castel-nouo. 298
Truce for three monethes betwixt the Turkes and Venetians. 299
Truce prolonged with the Venetians. 300
The Basha his demaunds to Contaren. 302
The Emperour desireth passage through France to goe into Flanders. 303
The Emperour and French king send to the Venetians to diuert them from peace with the Turks. 304
The Emperour commeth to Paris. 307
The traitors which bewrayed Badoario his Commission to the Turks discouered. 308
The traitors punished. 309
The Emperours resolution contrarie to his promise. 313
The Emperour allieth himselfe with Henrie King of England. 319
The Turkes take Regio in Calabria. 320
The Emperour returneth into Italy. ibid.
The Emperour refuseth to conferre with the Pope. 321
The Turke makes warre in Hungarie. 322
Two Legates sent to the Emperour and the French king to procure peace. 324
The Emperour and Ferdinand send Ambassadors to treat of peace with the Turke. 326
Truce for one yeare betwixt the Emperour, his brother, and Soliman. 328
Tyrannicall law of the Turks. ibid.
The Emperor refuseth to inuest Pietro Lodouico in the Dutchie of Parma and Placentia. 329
The Emperours & the French kings difficulties, cause of peace in Italy. 330
The Emperours complaintes against the Pope with his returne so Milan. 335
The Turke sendeth an Ambassador to Venice. 342
The Turkes make war in Hungarie and Transiluania. 347
The Emperour sendeth the Vice-Roy of Naples against the Siennois. 355
The Emperour Charles resigneth his whole state to his sonne Philip, and to his brother. 358
Truce granted and soone broken. 358
The taking of Calais by the Guise. 361
The forme of the great Turkes oath. 369
The opinion of the other Bashaes contrarie to that of Mahomet. 371

Treason

Treason practised by a Cypriot, discouered, and punished. 374
The King of Spaines answere to the Popes content. 376
The Turkes preparations for the warre of Cyprus. 378
The Emperours answere to the Venetian Ambassadour. 382
Turkes repulsed from Tina. 385
The Turkish fleete landed in Cyprus. ibid.
Turks build 3. Forts neere to Nicosia. 390
Turkes take the Bulwarke Constantia 391
The Emperour refuseth to enter into the league. 396
The Emperour will not allow of the Popes new Title giuen to the Duke of Florence. 399
Tepulo his opinion tends to warre. 401
The league against the Turke concluded. ibid.
Turkes put to rout in Candie. 404
Turkes waste the Islands of Xant and Zephalenia. ibid.
The League published at Venice. 407
Turks before Dulcigna. 408
Turkes before Mandrachia. 410
The king of Spaines answere to the Cardinall Alexandrine. ibid.
The leagues offer to the Emperor. 411
The besieged in Famagosta make a counter-batterie. 413
The Tower of the Arsenall ouerthrowne by a mine. ibid.
The Turkes in presence of their Generall giue a furious assault, and are repulsed. 414
The Turkish fleet in the Gulph of Lepanto. 420
The speech of Hassan Bascha perswading to fight. 430
The King of Portugalles answere to the Cardinall and the Venetians. 450
The Turkes opinion of the Christians before the battell. 451
Treatie of peace broken. 452
The true cause of Don Iohns delay. 454
Tepulo his suite to the K. of Spaine 458
Turkes retire from the Christian fleet. 461
Turkes comming to relieue the Castle much annoy the Christians. 467
The state of Dalmatia during the warre. 469
The Turkes build a Fort against Catharra. ibid.
The Emperor seeketh to hinder peace. 471
The Turkes deale roughly with the Venetian Bailie. 474
The King of Spaine not discontented with the Venetians peace. 476
The Turkish fleete departes from Constantinople. 477
Troubles in the Dutchie of Vrbin. 478
The king of Poland returneth secretly into France. 479
Troubles in Genoa appeased. 480
The Turkish Armie in the Empires confines. ibi.
The cause of the Venetians iealousie of the Spaniards. 493
The manner of reuoking the Popes censures against the Venetians. 499

V

VEnetians answere to the Emperour. 4
Venetians greatly perplexed. 7
Venetians resolute answer to the Emperors Ambassadors. ibid.
Venetians refuse to graunt Maximilian truce for three yeares. 10
Venetians secret practises with Maximilian. 12
Venetians attempt in vaine to beereconciled to the Pope and Emperor. 13
Venetians astonished at sundrie bad presages. ibid.
Venetians recouer Treui. 15
Venetians loose the battell of Gyradade. 16
Venetians seeke to be reconciled to the Emperor. ibid.
Venetians quit Padua, Verona, and their places of the firme land. 17
Venetians take Padua. 21
Venetians masters of the champaine Country. ibi.
Venetian Ambassadors come by night to Rome. 22
Venetians recouer Vincenza. 24
Venetians nauall armie scowreth the Po as farre as Fiquerolles. 25
Venetians recouer the Pollesin of Rouigo. ibid.
Vincentine Commissioners craue pardon of the Prince of Anhalt. 29
Vincentines yeeld themselues to the victors mercy. ibid.
Verona and her Territorie pawned to the French King for a hundred thousand crownes. 30
Venetians recouer all the places neare to Padua, which had been taken by the French. 32
Verona besieged. 33
Venetians raise their campe from before Verona. ibi.
Venetians take Azola. ibid.
Venetians intelligence vpon Bressia discouered. 36
Venetians still maintaine their fortes and greatnesse. 47
Venetians returning to the assault of Bressia enter the Citie. 52
Venetians constancie in maintaining their alliance. 60
Venetians take Valegia, Pescara, and Cremona. 61
Venetians besiege and batter Verona. 65
Venetians offers to the French King. 67
Venetians loose Pescara. 69
Venetian Ambassador sent vnto Selim. 75
Venetians besiege Maran. 77
Vitturi the Prouidator defeated and taken. 84
Venetians giue great entertainement to Rance de Cera. 85
Venetians send Ambassadours to the French King, and to the King of England. 88
Venetians desirous to drawe the Pope to their party. 90
Venetians send an Ambassador to the Pope. ibid
Venetians exhortation and their offer to the French King. 106

Verona beſieged in two ſeuerall places 111
Venetians remonſtrance to Lautrec. 112
Verona againe beſieged. 113
Verona conſigned to Lautrec for the French King, is deliuered to the Venetians. ibid.
Veronois ioy for their reduction to the Venetians ſubiection. ibi.
Vniuerſitie of Padua reeſtabliſhed by the Senate. 115
Venetians ſend two Ambaſſadours to the Turke. ibi.
Venetians ſend Ambaſſadours vnto Charles King of Spaine concerning traffike. 116
Vſuall trade of the venetian veſſells. 117
Venetians anſwer to the Popes exhortation. ibi.
Venetians anſwer to the French king. 118
Venetians Armie againſt the Pirates. 119
Venetians ſuſpect the French King. 120
Venetians ſend the King of Hungarie thirty thouſand ducats. 123
Venetian Common-wealth chriſten a daughter of the French King. 125
Venetians ſeeke to appeaſe the Popes indignation againſt the French. 126
Venetians diſſwade Lautrec from his reſolution. 130
Venetians leuie forces to march into the Dutchie of Milan. ibi.
Venetians great diſcretion in their reſolution. 137
Venetians ambaſſage to the Pope. 138
Venetians ſend Ambaſſadours to the Emperour to reioyce with him for the new league. 140
Venetians preparations againſt the French. ibi.
Venetians ſuſpect the motion of peace betwixt the Emperour and the French King. 142
Venetians make new leuies of horſe and foote. ibid.
Venetians ſend Ambaſſadours to the new Pope. ibid.
Venetians ſtand in feare of Solyman 144
Venetians ſought vnto by the Imperialls and the French. 146
Venetians diſcourſe on the French K. taking. 149
Venetians ſend Ambaſſadours to the Emperour. ibid.
Venetians make meanes to draw the King of England into the League. 155
Venetian ambaſſadors remonſtrance to the Pope. ibid.
Venetians anſwere to the Pope, inuiting them to an agreement with the Emperor. 162
Venetians anſwer to the French king concerning the renewing of the warre of Naples. 172
Venetians place a garriſon in Rauenna for the behooſe of the Sea of Rome 177
Vitturi contrary to the Duke of Vrbin. 178
Vitturi called to account for being againſt the Popes deliuerie. 179
Venetians oppoſe themſelues againſt Lautrec his propoſition to goe to Rome and leaue Milan. 181
Venetians ſuſpect the Duke of Vrbin. 183
Venetians Ambaſſade to the Pope. 185
Venetians preparations againſt the Duke of Brunſwich. 191
Venetian forces much diminiſhed. 201
Venetians keepe the Citties in Apulia. 202
Venetians anſwere to the Kings Ambaſſade. ibid.
Venetians great preparations by Sea and Land. 204
Venetians loue to the French and the Duke of Milan. 205
Venetians ſollicite the King to come into Italie. 207
Valor of a woman in mans attire. 211
Venetian Senate male-content with the French King. 212
Venetians meaning for the articles of peace at the treaty of Cãbray. 213
Venetians anſwer to Triuulcio. ibi.
Venetians recourſe vnto the King of England. ibid.
Venetians exhortation to the Confederates. 215
Venetians offers to the Duke of Ferrara. ibid.
Venetians anſwer to thoſe that motioned peace with the Emperor. 219
Venetians ſend Ambaſſadours to the Pope and the Emperour. 223
Venetians ſend an Ambaſſage to Soliman. 225
Venetians forbid the Knights of Malta to come no more vpon their gulfe 226
Vmpires choſen to end the controuerſie betwixt the Archduke and the Venetians. 228
Venetians craue the nomination of Biſhoprickes vnder their dominions. 229
Venetians craue the Tenths leuied vpon the Cleargie to helpe them againſt the Turkes. ibi.
Venetians by chaſing the Pirats ſecure the Seas. 230
Venetians in vaine ſollicite the Pope for the King of Hungarie. ibid.
Venetians exhort Ferdinand to peace 231
Venetians anſwer concerning the renewing of the league. 235
Vmpires appointed with a third man to end the controuerſie betwixt Ferdinand & the venetians. 238 venetians victorie at Sea againſt the Moore of Alexandria, who was taken. 240 venetians ſhips ſtayed by the Turkiſh officers. ibi.
venetians anſwer to themperor 245 venetians ſeek to appeaſe the ſtrife betwixt the Pope and the Duke of vrbin. 246 venetians anſwere to the Emperours Ambaſſadour. 252 venetians anſwer to Solyman. 254 venetians preparations to ſtand vpon their gard againſt the Turke. 257 vncertaine courſe of the Turkes fleete puts the venetians in doubt. 258 venetians remaine Neuters betwixt the Imperialls and the Turkes. ibi.

Venetian Fleet looseth foure galles taken by the Turkes. 261
Visier Basha his reasons to direct Soliman from his resolution. 263
Venetians imprisoned and their goods seized ouer all the Turkish Empire. ibid.
Venetians remonstrance for the Pope. 265
Venetians constancie. 266
Visier Basha counsaileth Soliman to raise his siege in Corfou. ibid.
Vittore de Garzons Gouernour of Naples. 268
Venetians suspect Soliman, desiring peace. 269
Venetians diligence to fortifie the Islands against the Turkes. 273
Venetians acquainted with Solimans preparations for warre, are exhorted to peace. 274
Venetians seeke to draw the King of England to the league. 275
Venetians take Obranazza. 284
Venetians naual Armie and the Pope ioyned together. ibid.
Venetians grieued because there was no Duke of Milan. 315
Venetians solicited to leaue their Neutralitie. ibid.
Venetians raze the Fort of Maran. 318
Venetians excuses to the Emperour and Ferdinand concerning Maran. 323
Venetians reasons to diuert the Pope from medling with the Protestants 332
Venetians grant passage to the Pope and Emperours troupes. ibid.
Venetians gentle answere to those of Ausburge. 333
Venetians preparations against the Turkes. 344
Viceroy of Naples spoileth the Countrie of the Sienois. 355
Venetians entreated by the Pope seeke meanes to pacifie the Duke of Alua. 359
Venetian Prelates that were present at the Councell of Trent. 364
Venetians chace the Pirates. 365
Venetians send Ambassadours to Selim the new Emperour. 368
Venetian Ambassadors Oration to the Emperour. 369
Venetians purge the seas of Pirates. ibid.
Venetians prepare for the warre of Cyprus. 373
Venetians implore the aid of Christian Princes. 375
Venetians sollicite the Persian to make warre on Selim. 378
Venetians send Ambassadours to the Emperour, soliciting him to enter into the league. 382
Venetians propositions in the Court of Spaine, with the difficulties alleadged thereupon. ibid.
Venetian Fleet leaueth Corfou by the Senates commandement. 384
Venetian Generall resolueth to send aid to Famagusta. 306
Venetians great doubts and perplexities with their request to the Pope. 398
Venetians resolue to hearken to peace. 399
Venetians raze the Fort of Dombelle. 403
Venetians expect the Confederates Fleet. 407
Venetians will not heare of Peace. 408
Venetians complaints to the Pope. 410
Valour of the besieged in repulsing the enemie. 415
Vniting of the Confederates Fleete. 418
Venieri his answere to D. Iohn his obiections. 421
Venetians preparations against the Spring. 449
Venetians solicite the Cardinals in the Vacancie of the See. 453
Venetians Ambassadours discourse to the French King. 457
Vluzzali his pollicie. 461
Vluzzali determineth to assaile D. Iohn. 463
Vluzzali returnes to Constantinople. 468
Venetians complaine to the Pope. 469
Venieri his honourable entertainment and welcome at Venice. ibid.
Venetians send an Ambassador to the Pope. 476
Venetians feare. 480
Vpon what occasion the Pope caused tenne dayes to be taken from the yeere. 485
Venetians iealous of Turkes and Milanois. 489
Venetians send Ambassadours to the French King. 491
Venetians defeat the Vscoques. 492

W.

WHat was concluded in the Diet at Constance. 9
War resolued against Maximilian. 10
What was practised vnderhand against the Venetians. 11
Wherunto the Popes actions tended. 28
What astonishment the losse of the battaile brought to Rome. 56
Whole Dutchie of Milan yeeldeth to Sforza. 64
What importance the taking of Padua was of. 69
What shifts the Pope vsed to declare himselfe openly against the French King. 91
Whole Countrie betwixt Oglio, Po, and Adda, yeeldeth to the Emperour. 107
Why the French King distrusted the elect Emperour. 119
What moued the Emperour to send his Ambassadours to the French King. 124
Why the King delaied to conclude the league. 125
What the Popes and Emperours designes were. ibid.
What hindred the Lord of Lautrec from assailing Milan. 133
With what feruencie the Milanois endured the discommoditie of the siege. ibid.
What Prospero Colonna did vpon report of the arriuall of the French. 140
Why the Grisons would not leaue their houses. 144
Why the French king was displeased with the Venetians. 145
Whereunto the Pope attended. ibid.
What moued the Senate to allie themselues with the French. 147
What caused the Imperials to come into the field. 148
What letted the taking of Naples. 168

The second Table.

What moued the Pope to seeke agreement with the Viceroy. 169
What caused the Duke of Bourbon to march to Rome. 172
What great forces were requisite to free the Pope from prison. 178
What moued the Lord Lautrec to change his determination. 183
What moued the Venetians to be at the charge of the warre in Lombardie. 184
What was the Emperours meaning concerning peace. ibid.
What the Popes intention was. 186
Wants of the armie before Naples. 195
What kept the Venetians from sending Ambassadours to the Emperour. 212
What moued the Emperour to enforce the Florentines to obey the Pope. 223
What moued the Kings of France and England to make warre on the Emperour. 231
Wrongs done the Venetians in Solimans Dominions. 254
What the Senate propounded to write to the Baily. 275
What moued the Emperour & French King to grant the enteruiew at Nice. 277
Warre renewed betwixt the Emperour and the King. 278
What Doria his purpose was. 289
What the Senate enioyned Badoaro Ambassadour to Soliman. 306
Who they were that tooke part with the Protestants. 333.
What bee Venetian gentlemen with their prerogatiue. 334
Who hindred the Emperour from allowing the agreement. 343
Warre continued in Italy. 344
Warre betwixt Solimans two sonnes 361
Warre opened in all places. 381
Warre resolued against the Turke. 401
What moued the Generall Venieri to saile to Messina. 407

FINIS.

REPRODUCED FROM THE COPY IN THE

HENRY E. HUNTINGTON LIBRARY

FOR REFERENCE ONLY. NOT FOR REPRODUCTION